

Chapter 1: The Secret Prince

In the smallest bedroom of number four, Privet Drive, a boy of no more than ten, sat on his stool and surveyed his latest piece. Vivid blues, golds, oranges, and reds formed into the abstract of a flower, pouring out a vibrancy that clashed with the dull, gloomy image of its maker. Pale skinned, lanky, and dressed in dingy over-sized clothing, the only hint the boy held any sense of beauty lay in his vibrant green eyes, which flashed between his painting and his pallet in contemplation. With slow deliberateness, he dipped his brush into the black acrylic and set it to canvas. With a continuous, spindly line he completed his latest work with a single name.

Heinrich.

“Heinrich! Lunch!” a shrill call rang up from the kitchen.

Quickly, he set about collecting his supplies. Small tubes of acrylic paint, brushes, a spatula, and his pallet. He took them to a large bucket of water and began to clean them carefully and thoroughly. It would not do to be lectured on proper respect for his relative’s gifts. Especially, since they were the only gifts he received from them. One look around the stark, gloomy bedroom was testament to that. A creaky bed, small table and chair, and a wardrobe (that couldn’t decide if it was white or the color of rotten wood) were all the furniture supplied (in other words, already happened to be there when he first arrived three years ago). There were no photographs, posters, toys, or books. The only sign of personality were the few watercolor pictures he had painted himself, each with their own glaring flaw that made them unsaleable, and cheap enough to make so that his relatives didn’t destroy them because of his intentional waste of their gifts.

He left his stuffy bedroom, stopping briefly in the bathroom to wash his hands and a smudge of paint from his nose. Barefoot he reached the bottom of the stairs, and barely saved his toes from being crushed when Dudley, his whale of a cousin, nearly stomped them as he rushed into kitchen first.

“Watch it, ‘sauerkraut’,” the larger boy sneered, not even stopping.

'Heinrich' scowled at the back of his head. He could hear the television still on in the living room, blaring out a noisy, ridiculous dialogue of some cartoon super hero. Had Dudley been waiting for him to come down just to pick on him? Probably. Which meant his cousin was in one of his moods.

He entered the kitchen, making it a point to stay out of his cousin's reach and intending to make it the trend for the rest of the day. His Aunt Petunia was just finishing up with lunch. She set a large slice of roast beef, carrots, and potatoes in front of Dudley, cooing at her 'Duddykins' like the fat baby he was, before turning to him. Her scowl made her horse like face look even longer, as she picked up what he assumed was his plate.

"Picture?" she asked.

'Heinrich' tilted his head, as if trying to understand her, then lifted his hand and made a gesture for 'tiny'. She scowled and put her free hand on her boney hip.

"How long?"

Ah, now he was having a conundrum. If he told her it was done, then he would get to eat, but he might also be sent outside to garden, making him fair game for Dudley's cruel, infantile jokes. If he told her it would take too many hours she might send him up to his room without eating, scolding him for being lazy. After considering for a moment, he held up two fingers. Her scowl didn't ease up, but she handed him his plate. It was only carrots and potatoes.

"It better be done by then, or you can forget about dinner."

"Danke, Aunt Petunia," he said, sitting down. He pushed his chair as far from the table as he could manage to avoid his cousin kicking him, and ate in a sullen silence. Petunia joined them a moment later, nibbling at pieces of carrots as she flipped idly through a beauty magazine. Despite 'Heinrich's' smaller portion, Dudley finished scarfing down his meal first and elbowed him sharply on his way back to the living room, abandoning his dishes on the table. When he finished, he gathered up both of their dishes, and washed them, along with his aunt's, and all of her cooking utensils.

Finally, he made his way back up the stairs to his room. He hesitated when he reached the top of the stairs. Hadn't he closed his door when he came down? With a sudden feeling of dread, he opened the door the rest of the way.

Dudley sat, a parody of deep thought, flipping through a sketch book. 'Heinrich' froze, a cold, heavy sensation settling in his gut. That was not his 'project' sketchbook. That one was large and spiraled at the top. That one looked more like small text book, with plain black binding. That one was his 'private' sketchbook.

"Hhhmmm," Dudley said, looking at one picture with particular interest. "This'un isn't half bad." The fat boy turned to his cousin, tilting the colored pencil picture so he could see it. A woman in a sun dress and hat stood under a flowering tree, her hair a brilliant red and verdant eyes that mirrored 'Heinrich's' own. She was smiling, a cross between sly and coy that had boggled him even back when he had attended primary school. Mom.

"Real looker," his cousin said, turning the picture back towards himself. "Kinda of slutty looking, but hey... You know what a slut is, sauerkraut?"

The coldness in his gut suddenly turned hard, and the hardness spread into his chest, and moved into his shoulders, before finally reaching his hands that clenched so hard he might have shattered stones in them. Dudley leered at him.

"So they taught you that much at least, huh, stupid?" Abruptly, he ripped the picture from its binding. A corner was torn off, coming dangerously close to decapitating the beautiful woman. 'Heinrich' stepped forward quickly. Dudley took the remains of the picture in two hands, looking at his smaller cousin with sadistic glee. 'Heinrich' stopped. "Mind if I take this? Daddy won't buy me girly mags yet, but this will due for a while.."

If possible, his insides hardened further, seeping into his head, crushing all thoughts except rage and horror. His vision was turning red, like the blood that was now seeping out between his clenched fingers. Dudley, stupid and arrogant, saw only the usual impotent rage, heedless of the danger and laughed. In a final act of cruelty, he stuck out his tiny pink tongue, and gave the image a lascivious lick.

What happened next, Dudley would relive in nightmares for the rest of his life. Though therapy and endless repetitions of 'it was a bad dream' would stave off the fear in his waking hours, sleep would bring the terror and incredulity of that memory back in all the vividness of the event itself. 'Heinrich' would remember it as his first conscious act of magic. It began as he stepped completely into the little bedroom. His cousin's porcine laughter was abruptly silenced as the door slammed shut without being touched. For a moment, Dudley seemed merely surprised. The completed painting near the window suddenly bursting into flames quickly turned his confusion into blatant fear. He shot off the bed, dropping the notebook and the picture. He made a run for the door and 'Heinrich' was certain he would have been knocked to the other side of the room, if the thin sheets on his bed hadn't suddenly seized the fat boy.

Dudley let an ear splitting shriek, shattering the stone-like power that had been crushing 'Heinrich's' fear and surprise. His thoughts and feelings suddenly scattered into so many directions, leaving him weak and suddenly terrified of what was happening. On his bed was the rather hoaky idea of a ghost, a dingy grey sheet draped over some unseen person. Only there was nothing hoaky about this. Parts of the sheet had twisted themselves into tight spirals, forming skeletal hands that clutched and clawed at their fat prisoner, who beat at them uselessly. No matter how hard Dudley struggled the sheet wraith refused to relinquish its hold, intent, it seemed, on dragging him to the bed itself.

'Heinrich' floundered uselessly for a bit. A part of him wasn't sure if he could help his cousin, and certainly not without becoming the... thing's next victim. If that happened he certainly wasn't going to get any help from his cousin. Another part whispered that the disgusting little Stück Abfall deserved this. That he had wanted this to happen. That he had made it happen.

Oh God, he had made it happen.

He didn't know how, but he was certain of it. He was bloody Carrie! Luke Skywalker! That girl in Firestarter.

A FREAK!

A new fear arose, almost as terrifying as his cousin being smothered to death in front him by the linens. A fear of his Uncle when he found his son smothered to death in the FREAK's room. As if to taunt him, he could suddenly hear footsteps hurrying up the stairs.

"Dudders? Baby? What going on?" came his aunt's voice.

"MUMMY! HELP ME!"

A moment later, the handle to the door was jiggling. But whatever power had slammed it shut was still holding it shut. Petunia let out a desperate yell, resorting to kicking and throwing her stick-like body at the door. Panicked almost as much as his relatives, for entirely different reasons, 'Heinrich' forced himself to move.

He ran around Dudley, snatching up his private notebook and the picture of his mother, leaping back quickly incase the sheet wraith attacked him as well. He went, ignored, to his opened bedroom window, careful to avoid the charred remains of the painting, and barefoot he made the jump he had longed to make for the last three years.

Behind him he heard the door finally give way to his aunt. He had no time to wonder what she would do. The ground came up to meet him, and he barely remembered to unbrace his legs and roll as he landed beside the shrubs. He laid there stunned by the impact, stunned by what he was doing, before stiffly climbing to his feet. His feet hurt from the landing, but nothing was broken or sprained. As quickly as he could, he hobbled away from number four, Privet Drive and prayed it was forever.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Mr. Dursley had never been so angry in his life. He was a man very prone to anger so that was saying something. He had been in the middle of yelling at some nitwit at work, when a call had come in from his wife. She had been frantic and stuttering, crying about 'Dudders' and about something that wretched nephew of hers had done to him. Nothing she had said made much sense to him, but he could tell it involved some of that Potter weirdness.

As he drove home from work, taking the day off and threatening to fire an entire department if even one person dallied while he was gone, his thoughts ran in a continuous angry circle. He knew, he knew, he should never have allowed that boy into their home. He knew that expenses had been a little tight, especially as Dudley was growing into more expensive tastes in toys and games, but the government stipend for his care and the boy's rather impressive trust fund could not have been near enough to cover the mere inconvenience of housing the ungrateful wretch.

For one, he couldn't speak a whit of English. His British parents didn't have the bloody decency to teach their son the proper Queen's English! They could shout and lecture him all day and he would just tip his head at them and look confused. Or worse, he'd start talking in that funny German way, and he knew it wasn't anything good. No matter how patiently Petunia tried to teach him, just wouldn't learn. Sending him to a proper English school was out of the question. They wouldn't tolerate the sheer embarrassment it would cause them.

As if that wasn't enough of an issue, the brat had the nerve to refuse the cupboard under the stairs as his bedroom. When they had first tried to send him to the little room, he had looked at them with utter disbelief. This was followed quickly by anger and a stubborn refusal to move. It hadn't bothered Mr. Dursley much, as he a little twig of a kid, and he threw him in anyway and locked it. The brat had kicked up such a racket! He had screamed and kicked the door, and it had been amusing for the first fifteen minutes, but then he wouldn't stop. All day and into the sleepless night, he kept kicking and screaming. Not even yelling or belting the boy had silenced him. Eventually, a very cranky

Dudley had generously offered the smallest bedroom to his cousin if only to shut the other boy up.

That was years ago. Now all the little leech did all day was laze around the house and paint. A foolish past time, but apparently one his clever little wife had found profit from. That there were so many ridiculous people in the world who would call a child's paint smudges art and actually buy it, was infuriating.

And worst of all, was the boy's parents. What a perfectly abnormal lot they had been. Doing their silly wand waving and nonsense muttering and frog spawn cooking. And look at the trouble it had gotten them into? Run out of the bleed'n country (and good riddance too!) by their own foul ilk! Even then, they couldn't settle for being normal! They went off and became a bunch of smelly, hippy artists! Which was only slightly better than... that other thing.

He didn't care what his sister said about the boy not knowing any of their freakishness. If he knew how to paint, then the brat likely knew the other stuff. And this had just proved it. The moment he got his hands on that boy, he was going to beat all that nonsense out of him and use that trust fund of his to send him to the cheapest, most miserable, most far away boarding school he could find.

Mr. Dursley pulled into his driveway, his knuckles alternately popping and turning white as he clenched and unclenched his hands around the steering wheel. If he weren't so furious with the entire situation, he would grin with anticipation. Finally, finally he would be rid of that miscreant, and the Dursley family would once again return to the perfect normalcy they had previously enjoyed.

He mounted the steps to the house, ignoring his neighbor's friendly waving, and reached for the door. Yet, amazingly, before he could touch the knob, the door swung open. A tall man with a hooked nose and dressed in a formal black business suit stood before him. The man's greasy, shoulder length hair, which was enough to earn Mr. Dursley's disapproval already, but then the other had the nerve to be standing in his house.

"What-" he began to bellow.

“Good afternoon, Mr. Dursley,” the man practically hissed, “You wouldn’t happen to know where your nephew is, would you?”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The next two days passed slowly for ‘Heinrich’. He wandered around aimlessly, his only precaution an avoidance of Privet Drive. All of the houses looked the same, all the gardens were unoriginal, and cars in the driveways were generic. Even if the monotony was not so all encompassing, he had nowhere to go anyway.

He slept short, fitful hours in garden sheds, sneaking in after the houses had gone dark, and leaving before dawn. The hunger set in early the morning after the ‘incident’. He managed to ignore it until evening, where he finally gave into his body’s needs and stole tomatoes from a garden, feeling like a wretch with every bite he took.

His feet started to crack and bleed shortly after.

With every passing hour, the fear of the Dursley’s unknown retribution was being smothered by how utterly helpless he was on his own. He had no clothes, shelter, or food. He was filthy, tired, and hungry. He had no friends to stay with and no neighbors he trusted to take pity on him. There was no one he could turn to except...

But bloody hell, he hated the Dursley’s.

He hated them, but as evening came on and the air began to smell of rain he realized he needed them. With this miserable understanding, he finally returned to number four, Privet Drive. He was vaguely surprised to see the porch light was on. Had they left it on for him? Did they want him back? He snorted to himself. They probably just didn’t want the stigma of having their oh-so-grateful little orphan actually run away.

Steeling himself for the inevitable shouting and perhaps the worst belt thrashing his uncle had ever inflicted, he stepped up to the front door. The sound of voices stilled his hand over the door bell. There were several of them, faint and muffled, but definitely not his uncle's thundering baritone or his aunt's shrill tones. Had the Dursley's actually called the police? Had they been called to find him or arrest him? Was there a charge for assaulting someone with a bed sheet?

With a little less certainty, he pressed the doorbell. The house went suddenly silent. Unease crawled into his gut, and he felt the distinct urge to run away. He turned around to do just that, but the door opened and he was hauled into the house by his collar. Letting out a startled yelp, he fell to the floor, barely avoiding the edge of the stairs. He whirled around on his hands and knees, expecting to see his uncle.

Instead, he met the coal black eyes of a complete stranger. The man was tall with a large hooked nose, and was dressed as if ready to attend a funeral. Bloody hell! They called the government. They're going to dissect my brain!

"Young man," the stranger said, his voice silky even in disdain, "Considering how tiny your brain is, I doubt anyone would be able to find it, let alone dissect it."

He read my mind. That is so ...awesome... or would be if he weren't such a twat about it.

"Language, Heinrich. You've caused quite enough trouble to vex a great many people... you do not want to add me to that list. Get up and go to the living room. There are matters that need to be addressed."

Reluctantly, he climbed to his feet and skirted his way around the stranger and made his way to the living room. There were two more strangers there. A woman and a man. Unlike the dark man, however, they looked considerably less dour. One was a middle-aged woman, attired in a rather nice blue dress with a matching ribbon tying back her blond hair. She reminded him of one of his school teachers back in Germany, who talked softly and always reminded everyone to play nice. The man was older, with thick white hair and a neat mustache, dressed in brown tweed and red tie. They both gave him a comforting smile when he entered, and he felt his lips twitch to return it. However, the sight of the Dursley's kept his expression completely blank.

Dudley was, fortunately?, still breathing, although he was looking white enough he might have been mistaken for the dead. He was staring ahead at nothing, saying nothing. His aunt had a protective arm around him, rubbing his arm and shoulder as if he might be cold, cooing softly and telling him everything was alright. Vernon Dursley, however... well 'Heinrich' was glad he wasn't alone with the man. The man glared mutinously at the benign pair, and turned even darker as gaze landed on Harry. When the Dark Man strode into the room though, his beady eyes quickly settled on the floor.

Harry quickly moved out of his way and took a seat on the ledge of the fireplace, next to 'Mr. Tweed'. 'Miss Blue' smiled knowingly at him, and took a seat in his uncle's sitting chair. The Dark Man planted himself directly behind the Dursley's couch, his hands coming to rest on either side of the family patriarch. He couldn't help admire the sheer dignity the tall man maintained while still exuded the highest level of malevolent intent. His uncle always came off as a raging walrus and Petunia merely looked like she had bitten into a lemon.

"Ah, good, we're all here," began the woman, her voice well suited to children and perhaps overly timid adults. "We were rather worried something had happened to you, Mr. Makowski."

'Heinrich' threw her a baffled look. I'm Makowski now? That's not even a German name. The Dark Man gave an impatient sigh.

"Yes, yes. Burned at the stake and fed to Catholics, or some other horrible fate, but since the worse you seemed to have suffered is a brief stint to a third world country, perhaps we might move on to relevant matters."

"Really, Mr. Snape-" his aunt began.

"Professor Snape."

"Professor Snape, it's pointless to ask him anything. He barely knows any English. He can't string a sentence together to save his life."

“Really? After three years under your tutelage and still so little progress? I suppose that’s why your not Professor Dursley then,” Snape sneered.

Petunia turned pink. Vernon, already red, turned purple and moved to stand. Snape’s hands were suddenly resting on the larger man’s shoulders. The effect was immediate. Mr. Dursley sat back down, his face looking as haunted as his son’s.

“Professor...” ‘Mr. Tweed’ admonished, although his expression was clearly amused.

“Why don’t we just try some questions first, and see how it goes. Will you answer some questions for us, Mr. Makowski?” ‘Ms. Blue’ asked. ‘Heinrich’ merely nodded, unused to a complete stranger looking at him with such affection. If she started cooing at him, he resolved to take the first opportunity to run away and stay away this time.

“Of course,” Professor Snape agreed, “Perhaps, we will luck out and someone here will actually tell the truth. It’s a novel idea, but one most conducive to one’s health, yes?”

“Now see here, are calling my family-”

“Shut up.”

Mr. Dursley’s mouth snapped shut. ‘Heinrich’ could barely suppress a laugh, but managed it rather quickly when those dark eyes suddenly fell on him.

“The truth, if you please, young man. What is your name.”

“We told you his name. It’s-”

“Madam, if you do not hold your tongue, I will make you swallow it. Am I perfectly clear?”

Somehow she managed to turn even pinker.

"Y-yes, sir."

"Yes, what?"

"Yes, Professor."

"You both will remain silent until spoken to. I will not warn either of you again," he said, his voice soft as silk and sharp as a knife. He turned his attention back to the subject of interest and found him watching him with rapt attention.

"How do you do that, Professor?" the boy asked, his voice carrying just the slightest hint of a German accent. Everyone in the room, even pale Dudley, turned to him, startled. Everyone except the Dark Man, who regarded him with cool disdain.

"There are those who strive for violence, young man, and those who live it. Those who strive so meekly can not possibly hope to stand up to those who live it. Like those who try and those who do. They are people on completely different levels. Now, your name."

"Harold James Potter."

A strangely sardonic look came across the professor's face, and his scowl twisted up in a mockery of a smile. "Of course it is."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Piece of trash

Chapter 2: The Prince and the Dragon

“...Now, your name.”

“Harold James Potter.”

A strangely sardonic look came across the professor's face, and his scowl twisted up in a mockery of a smile. “Of course it is.”

Harry frowned, wondering if the man thought he was lying. It would be the first time he had used that name since moving in with the Dursleys. They knew he was Harry Potter. At least Vernon and Petunia Dursley did. He wasn't so sure about Dudley. The idiot only ever called him things like 'sauerkraut' and 'lederhosen-boy'. Regardless, the Dark Man continued with his questions.

“Date of birth?”

“August 1st, 1996.”

“Parents?” Again that sardonic tone, as if he knew already and found it amusing.

“James and Lily Potter.”

“Siblings?”

“They keep my evil twin in the closet under the stairs.”

“Ha. Ha. Stay on topic, boy. Have you ever been informed of wizards or witches outside the relation of fiction or religious fanaticism?”

“Er... I wouldn't know?”

“Do you have any objections to witchcraft due to religious beliefs?”

Harry hadn't been allowed near the Christmas tree, let alone gone with the Dursley's to church on Sundays, and his youthful memories of it with his parents had all seemed rather dull. He couldn't ever remember them lecturing him against it in Sunday school. Why was he being asked such an absurd question to begin with?

“As long as Satan isn’t involved in anyway, I guess I don’t care.”

Snape looked ready to sneer, then seemed to remember something or someone, and moved on.

“Any allergies or health concerns?”

“Er... I’m allergic to penicillin.”

“And your eyes?”

“What about them?”

A sigh. “Near-sighted, far-sighted? Astigmatism?”

“Er... I couldn’t see a barn while standing next to it without them on?”

“Astigmatism, then. Is your prescription current?”

“I dunno.”

“No, then.”

“Are you taking any medication or nutritional supplements?”

“No.”

“Parasites?”

“What? Of course not!”

Snape eyed his dirty, ragged appearance critically. “We’ll see.”

“Hey!”

“Let us be on our way then. This has taken more than enough time as it is,” Professor Snape said with an air of finality. The other two strangers nodded in agreement and rose to their feet. Harry stood instinctively. The Dursley's were about to stand as well when the three strangers each removed what looked like twigs from out of thin air, and simultaneously called out 'stupefy'. His relatives suddenly slumped back limply onto the couch, their expressions dazed.

"What did you do?!" Harry cried, moving to Dudley's side to make sure he was still breathing.

"A simple stunning spell, Mr. Potter," 'Mr. Tweed' said, patting him on the shoulder. "No cause for alarm. We've found it's easier for all parties involved if muggles are stunned just before they're obliviated. Less of a struggle. Less chance for mishaps."

"What? Stunning spell? Obliviated? What are you doing to my relatives?! Who are you people? What are you people?"

"Why, we're wizards, Harold," 'Mr. Tweed' said, as if it were the most obvious thing in the world. "Just like you." Harry turned to him, looking for any sign of mockery or dementia. The elderly man stared back, his expression calm, his eyes sparkling with intelligence and confidence. A hand landed on his shoulder, making him jump. He looked up to see Professor Snape's cool regard.

"It's time we were on our way, Mr. Potter. Do not bother with goodbyes. In an hour, they won't remember you anyway. You will take nothing..." With the speed of a cobra, he snatched away the sketchbook Harry had been clutching through the entirety of the strange interview. "...of your current or past life with you."

Harry immediately went to grab the sketchbook back, but Snape held it above his head, and the boy was more than a little embarrassed that he was short enough for the tactic to be effective. But as the man had said earlier... there are men who try and men who do. Refusing to be defeated, he leapt up onto the back of the sofa, and then made a lunge from it once again. Snape was actually caught off guard, and rather than be taken down along with the boy, he released his hold on the book. Harry landed heavily on his arms, but with his prize in hand, he scrambled to his feet and made a dash for the front door.

He was half way down the hall, when he heard the shout of 'lipo' and his legs snapped together. He fell forward, his sketchbook flying the rest of the way down the hall. Shaking, and a bit stunned by the fall, Harry lifted himself on to his elbows. He tried to move his legs, but found them firmly stuck together.

The Dark Man strode forward, his expression promising violence. The boy cringed at his approach, but the man strode right past him to snatch up sketchbook once again. As he did so, however, the picture Dudley had assaulted days before, fell out of the binding and landed at his feet. Snape glanced down, seemed to disregard it, but then looked again. Longer this time. His expression turned inscrutable. He then turned to look at Harry, still sprawled out in the middle of the hall glaring daggers at him, and seemed to consider something. He finally picked up the picture, getting a closer look, then carefully replaced it in the sketchbook.

"Mr. Potter, I can tell you are going to make this difficult. I am sure I can make it doubly so. In the interest of your health and my time, which I would rather not spend filling out paperwork on why you are no longer intact, I am willing to make a deal with you. If you come along quietly and behave yourself, I will consider returning your little scribble book."

"And if I refuse?" Harry snarled.

"I will burn it right in front of you, cast a full body bind on you, and drag you along... without consideration for stairs, broken glass, or any sort of foul matter we should happen upon along the way... to WYRA Headquarters. Don't get the delusion that you actually have a say on whether you are going. You may only decide on how you'll get there."

"...WYRA?"

Snape smirked. "Don't worry, Mr. Potter, you will be well acquainted with WYRA soon enough." The man strode back down the hall, over Harry, and back to the living room to inform his compatriots that he was taking their charge on ahead. They cheerfully waved him off, then continued to do who knows what to the Dursley's. He pointed his stick, Harry believed it was called a 'wand', and muttered 'solvo' at him. Immediately, Harry felt his legs release and he scrambled to his feet. Snape's thin, powerful hand was on his arm before he had even balanced himself, dragging him purposefully towards the door.

They left the house and made their way to the street, where Harry was surprised to find a sleek black car, that looked better situated for the 1920s than the 1990s, was parked. The door opened for them and once both were seated in the back seat, it started and drove away without a driver. Harry balked, a thousand odd, incredulous thoughts flitting too quickly through his brain.

"So... a wizard," Harry said, forcing himself to focus on something solid. At the moment, the most solid thing present was the snarkiest bastard he had ever had the misfortune to meet.

"Yes."

"And you're abducting me because I'm a wizard?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

Snape didn't turn his head from the front window, but his dark glittering eyes slide over to him. "Wizards belong with wizards."

A jolt of excitement ran through Harry at the prospect. Other wizards? Like 'Mr. Tweed' and 'Miss Blue'? Like him? There must be other children wizards then. Would he finally make friends? Would he go to school again? Did they have schools just for wizards and witches? Wizarding teachers? Wait...

"Do you teach at a magic school, Professor?"

"Yes, Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, the finest wizarding school in Europe." There was a definite sound of pride in the man's voice that time.

"Will I go to a magic school?"

“Can you read?”

“Yes.”

“Can you write?”

“Yes.”

“Can you cause spontaneous combustion, seal a room, and animate bed sheets into relative-eating monsters?”

“Er... I guess.”

“Then the chances are that you’ll go to Wizarding school. Considering the level of accidental magic you performed, you’ll probably end up in Hogwarts, or maybe Redbridge if you continue to be an utterly incorrigible brat. Although... you’re rather a bit older than most children WYRA comes to collect.”

Harry shrugged. His thoughts were dizzy with the possibility of wizarding school. Of any school at all really. He hadn’t been to school since he came to live with the Dursley’s. They had been so convinced when the social worker dropped him off that he wouldn’t know a sniff of English they had immediately went off into a long, meaningless dialogue that would be the defining moment for the rest of his life with them. Out of spite, and more than a little fear, he had not disillusioned them. It had been a very small, but very real power he had held over them. The only form of control he had over his life.

“Tell me, Potter, where are your parents?”

There was a pregnant pause.

“Potter?”

“They’re dead, Professor. They’ve been dead for three years now,” he said finally, and then, just to keep the other man from asking he continued. “They... they were shot to death in a robbery. In the middle of the day. Just like that. No one saw a thing. Perhaps if they had...”

There was another pause, one that Snape shared with his charge in quiet introspection of some past memory. Finally, the man plowed through the silence.

“Where was this?”

“Cologne, Germany.”

“That would explain why it took so long for us to find you. You probably did accidental magic when you were younger, just not in England.”

“There isn’t a Child Abduction Squad in Germany?”

Snape let out a snort at the ridiculous title.

“WYRA’s jurisdiction extends only to the British Isles. Germany’s policies on magical children’s upbringing is considerably more... liberal.”

“But what is WYRA?”

“Look out your window and see for yourself.”

In the fifteen minutes Harry had been concentrating on Snape, the view outside his window had changed from a monotonous suburbia to... something else. The roads were cobblestone, although the car ran smoothly along, and everything outside seemed to come out of a Victorian novel. Gas lamps lined the narrow street, illuminating shop windows with store names like “Madam Madora’s Magical Menagerie” and “Popkin’s Artificial Anatomy and Prosthetics”. A few vendors selling jewelry, or furs, or small animal corpses were packing up for the evening, flicking their wands about until their stalls and wares folded themselves down to the size of a suit case. People strode about, many of the men dressed like ‘Mr. Tweed’ and the women in frilly full length dresses, most of them with robes of various colors in the place of jackets and shawls. Even as it was approaching eleven at night, the entire neighborhood was still bustling with activity.

Where were they? They couldn't possibly be anywhere in Little Whinging. But where could a community this large and this... unusual go unnoticed? Just as he was about to turn ask Snape that very question, the car stopped in front of a large official looking building.

At first, Harry thought it was a bank with its Greek style columns and sturdy stone architecture, but then he noticed the statue. It was a bronze statue of a tall, handsome man with a young boy on his right side and an even younger girl on his left, both clutching either of his hands. Harry noticed that while the man was dressed in elaborate robes, the children looked like he had just pulled them out of a slum in their tattered clothes. It all looked a bit contrived to Harry. Then he noticed that there were words written on the pith of the statue.

"Wizarding Youth Reclamation Agency," he read out loud. He turned to Snape, who was smirking at him. "It's an orphanage!"

"It is not an orphanage," the man snapped. "It's just as it says it is. A Reclamation agency. Only in this case, they reclaim wizarding children."

"And do what with them?"

Snape made a dismissive gesture. "Quarantine. Then adoption. Some preliminary education if necessary."

"It's an orphanage."

The Dark Man sent him a rather wicked smirk. "Orphanages are for children whose parents are dead or abandon them. I assure you most of the children you find here do not fall under that category. Now, get out of the car."

The car door opened, and Harry scurried out of it if only to avoid being mowed over by the taller man. He whirled around to face him, but was struck speechless when he realized the car they had arrived in had completely disappeared. He probably would have stood there gawking for several minutes, if Snape hadn't grabbed him by the collar and pulled him roughly towards the Agency's doors.

"Bloody hell, you really are a Child Abduction Agency. That's sick!"

"Oh, Mr. Potter, you have not even glimpsed the depravity of this world. This is likely the most humane aspect of our government that you will ever encounter. Now stop dallying. Your romp through wild suburbia has set us days behind schedule, and I do have more important matters to attend."

"Need to go back to your lair to pull the wings off pixies, eh?" Harry groused under his breath.

"Now that you mention it, I am running low," the man said evenly. Harry couldn't tell if he was joking or not. There was really no winning against this man... bat... ghoul... whatever.

They entered through a set of large marble doors inlaid with a carving of a phoenix, which opened and closed with an ominous rumble. Inside, Harry was surprised it looked just as grand as the outside. There was thick gold carpeting, antique but comfortable looking couches, several small potted trees, and pictures of children decorated the wall. Strangely enough, all the children in the paintings appeared to be asleep. He was dragged to what seemed to be the reception desk, and as Snape began talking to the pretty woman behind the counter, he thought he might have seen one of the children yawn.

"Did that-"

"Yes," Snape said, and then turned to leave. Confused, Harry moved to follow him, but the witch behind the counter placed a hand on his shoulder to stop him. She gave him a comforting smile.

"You'll be with me for now, sweetheart," she said.

"Oh."

Just as Snape reached the door, Harry remembered why he had been following the man in the first place. He turned back, slipping out of the woman's gentle grip, and ran towards him. "Hey! My book!"

Snape stopped. "What about it?"

"You said if I behaved and came along quietly I could have it back."

"No," he said, his voice dripping with cruel condescension. "I said I would consider giving it back to you. And I have considered... and decided against it. Goodnight, Potter." With that, the man walked out the door. Flabbergasted, Harry just stood there, then made a rush for the door only to find there was no handle with which to open it.

"How the bloody hell- That slimy, greasy, lügen, diebstahl, Bastard. Ich töte ihn!" he raged at the door.

"Mr. Potter..." came a deep voice from behind him.

Harry turned around to see the pretty woman still standing where he had left her. Only now she was joined by an older, much larger man with a no-nonsense face that rivaled his previous warden's. Though he wasn't wearing what Harry normally associated with guards, there was a hardy blandness about his robes that reminded him of security guards. In one hand he held a clipboard, and in the other a wand.

"... I trust we won't be having anymore trouble out of you, eh lad?"

The only thing Harry could do was nod meekly, and follow the pretty woman deeper into the mansion.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Severus Snape returned to his private quarters in Hogwarts just after one o'clock. He went immediately to his liquor cabinet and selected the strongest bottle of brandy he had. In thirty minutes, he had shed his robes and was nursing his third glass in his favorite chair. His thoughts twisted about, finding paths to old memories he had thought forgotten. Memories of less complicated days, when enemies meant fist fights and jibes, and his greatest responsibility was to pass his NEWTs. Nostalgia was strange company for someone like him, and memories of his childhood nemesis and crush were particularly unexpected.

He had heard about their deaths of course. Albus had made a vague reference to it. Murdered by a muggle. Ironic. Sad. Vaguely pathetic. He had not thought about it much then. He hadn't seen or heard from the Potters in seven years, when- in a rather unGryffindorish act- they had fled Britain and the fight.

He had completely forgotten that they'd had a child.

Forgotten about it until he came face to face with the incarnation of them. James's, the plebeian narcissist, shaggy hair and stubborn mouth and Lily's eyes, so brilliant they should have glowed in the dark. It had been... painful? to see those forgotten features in living form, no longer a past idea, but something that thought and spoke and felt. He had almost forgotten that James and Lily had been actual people.

He wished he didn't remember.

He wished for purely selfish reasons, that whatever cruel bit of fate had thrown Harry Potter right back into the twisted hands his parents had fled the country from had never occurred. And knowing that wish was now utterly futile, he wished that he never saw the boy again. Yet even as he repeated that wish over and over in his head, his hand rested on the stolen sketchbook, twitching every so often as if to fight the urge to open it.

Chapter 3: The Enchanted Fortress

The next three hours were likely the most uncomfortable hours of Harry's short life. From the lobby, he was taken straight to a white tiled room lined with showers. While the pretty woman, who told him to call her 'Edith', waited outside, the large man, referred to as Mr. Mufflin, stood guard at the door and informed him in a tone the brooked no disobedience, exactly what he was to do. Reluctantly, Harry stripped off his ragged clothes and showered, scrubbing every nook and cranny until the man was satisfied.

Once he was done showering and thoroughly mortified, Mr. Mufflin flicked his wand about and muttered something, and Harry suddenly found himself dry. Another wand flick and mutter, and some clothes appeared at Harry's feet. They were only a pair of draw string shorts and shirt that had to be tied close, in identical pale blue. No socks or underwear appeared. He dressed quickly. The moment he tied his shirt close, the name 'Harold' suddenly appeared in dark blue stitching over his left breast.

From there, he was taken to another room that vaguely resembled a doctor's office. Only instead of cotton swabs and stethoscopes, there were shelves crammed with phials of different colored liquids and eye balls in jars that seemed to be moving. He sat on a stool as the boniest man he had ever seen hovered around him, holding up one of said eyeballs to his face and looking him over. Every so often he 'hhhmmm...' and gave him a phial to drink (he quickly came to dread that 'hhhmmm...') and scribbled something down. Finally, after what seemed like hours and twenty phials of liquified 'ick', Edith and Mr. Mufflin escorted him down a long corridor to a door the same pale blue as his clothes.

"Now, Harry," Edith said, crouching down so she could look him in the eye, "I know this must be very confusing and frightening for you, but I don't want you to worry. We'll make sure nothing bad happens to you. You trust me, don't you, Harry?"

Frankly, he didn't. He didn't know how she could expect him to trust anyone who participated in child abduction. Although, she did appear as if she was more experienced with children much younger and more gullible than him. In any event, he was tired and still embarrassed from the shower fiasco and just wanted to be left alone for a while, so he nodded.

“I’m glad. Now, I know you’re probably very tired, so we’re going to take you to the boy’s dormitory. The others are sleeping right now, but we’ll be sure to introduce you in the morning, okey-dokey?”

He nodded... or twitched. He wasn’t entirely sure.

They opened the door, and from the light filtering in from the corridor, Harry could make out eight small bed in two columns along each wall. Seven of them had little bodies in them, and as they walked quietly towards the one empty bed, Harry could see they were little boys between the ages of five and eight.

Something painful clenched in his heart as he stared at their peaceful cherubic faces, thinking of the mothers and fathers who must be out there worrying and crying over each stolen child. In a soft whisper, Edith performed a spell on his newly assigned bed, and it grew in height and length.

Depressed and suddenly fearful of his future, he slowly crawled into the bed. He did not think sleep would be possible after his intoxicating, frightening, frustrating thrust into a world where magic was a common as sixpence. However, there must have been a spell on the bed, because as soon his head touched the pillow the world went dark, and he felt himself sink into a warm, quiet place.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The seven beds were empty when Harry woke the next morning. He blinked owlishly, his vision blurry without his glasses, and sat up. After a bit of floundering, he found his glasses sitting on a night stand that hadn’t been there the night before and got a good look around. Sunlight filtered in through the two large windows that stretch almost floor to ceiling, through which he could see a peaceful countryside he knew could not possible exist since he knew WYRA was in a city. Each bed had an old-fashioned style gold bar head and foot boards with identical sets of dark blue and gold sheets, and a blue trunk with gold fastenings at the foot of the bed. If he looked closely he could just make out name plates on the trunk. Aside from that, only the colorful crayon drawings at the head of each bed differentiated them.

The rest of the room was decorated in creams, golds, and blues, from the furniture to the fixtures. A short shelf and an open toy chest revealed collection of children's toys, coloring books, and puzzles. A grandfather clock beside the door read seven ten. There was another smaller door across the room, that he assumed was either the bathroom or a closet.

It was a rather depressing realization that this pseudo-orphanage was a lot nicer than his sad little room at the Dursley's or of any non-wizarding orphanage he had ever heard of. It was also a bit depressing to realize he had been placed in a nursery. Sighing, he climbed out of the bed intent on doing some exploration.

Something grabbed his ankles.

"GAH!"

Harry immediately jumped back into the bed. A loud burst of giggles emanated from beneath him. Curious, he stuck his head under the bed to find seven impish faces grinning back at him. Somehow, all seven of his new dorm mates had squeezed underneath his bed to wait for him to wake up. He rather admired their resolve.

"Well, good morning to you too," he said. The boys all giggled and pulled themselves out of their hiding spot.

"We got you good!" said freckle-faced boy. "You yelled really loud!"

A blonde child with a cut on his nose, mimicked him by shouting out a 'gah' and jumping onto the bed next to him. That brought another round of giggles, and even Harry managed to crack a smile.

"Your name's Harold, ya?" the oldest boy of the lot asked. "That's what it says on your trunk."

Harry stood up and walked around the end of the bed. Sure enough, he had a trunk with the name 'Harold' engraved on the name plate. Where did these people get these things? Surely there weren't spells for every little thing, right? He looked at the other boys, who were now all crowding to sit on his bed and looking at him eagerly.

"Call me Harry."

"Just like me!" said the blond boy. "My trunk says 'William', but it's really Billy. No one but the nurses call me 'William'."

"Yeah, the nurses are weird like that," piped in another of the older boys. "My name's Nat, even though everything here says I'm 'Nathaniel'. Blah."

"So..." Harry said, pointing to the two boys. "Billy and Nat. And the rest of you lot?"

"Edgar!" called one the smallest boy, his smile missing half his teeth.

"Brandon!"

"Norton!"

"Freddy!"

"Michael!"

"Nice to meet you," Harry said politely.

"Hey, how come your so old? You're way older than Norton," cried Edgar. The boys all nodded in agreement, and Nat and Norton threw him a suspicious look. Harry felt suddenly nervous. He didn't have much experience with younger children, and for the life of him he could not remember what he was like when he was their age. He didn't remember being that hyper.

"I don't know. Snape said it was because I didn't come to England until I was older," he said finally. At the mention of his main kidnapper's name, the boys each shared a look of horrified disbelief.

“You actually talked to him?!”

“No way!

“He didn’t make you eat your tongue? He said he’d make me eat my tongue when I started asking questions!”

“Does his head really twist all the way around? Norton said he could turn it all the way around like an owl, but I don’t believe him!” said Freddy, who had been quiet until then.

“How would you know, you got picked up by a girl!” Norton retorted.

“I still don’t believe you!”

Seeing that things were quickly escalating into...something, Harry spoke up to distract them. “I didn’t see his head turn all the way around, but he is a wizard. He could probably turn himself into an owl and do it for sure.”

“Oh yeah, I didn’t think of that,” Freddy conceded.

“That would be brilliant! I want to turn into an owl!”

“I want to turn into a tiger!”

“When I’m a real wizard, I’m going to turn into whale and swim all over the world! Even to the bottom of the ocean!”

“What about on land, stupid! If you’re a whale you can’t climb a mountain or swim up a creek.”

“Ha! I’d turn into a whale and a...a... dog! Or monkey! Or anything I want!”

Pretty soon the boys were all speculating on what sort of animals they would turn into and what sort of adventures they would go on. It wasn’t long before they were all acting out their future plans, barking and flying and climbing all over the place. Harry sat on his bed and watched, baffled at his current predicament. How long was he going to be staying with this band of mayhem incarnate?

Just as Norton was about to be set upon by a pack of shapeshifting lions, the door opened and a jolly looking woman walked into the room dressed much like Edith had the night before. With her plump, rose cheeks, Harry thought she looked like she should be serving cookies to Santa in the North Pole. The boys immediately stopped what they were doing, some of them looking rather guilty. The woman took a sweeping inventory of the room, put her hands on her hips, and scowled (and still managed to look cute while doing so).

"I don't suppose you've all brushed your teeth?" she asked.

"No, Miss Marilyn," they replied in practiced unison.

"Have you washed your faces? Changed your clothes? Gotten your bags ready?"

"No, Miss Marilyn."

"Well, then hop to it!" she said, clapping her hands together. "Go! Go! Go!"

Or else I'll tell Santa to put you on the 'naughty' list, Harry mentally added.

The boys broke apart into well organized chaos, some heading for the second door which did turn out to be the bathroom, while others dived for their trunks. Harry just stood there, unsure what to do. Miss Marilyn, quick to spot him, marched right up to him.

"You must be Harold then," she began, a little less sternly than when she'd walked in. "You are a bit older than we're used to, but don't worry. I've been here since WYRA first started, and have seen young men and women older than you pass through these doors. You'll do fine."

"Ma'am, with all due respect... what exactly will I be doing 'fine' at?"

“They didn’t tell you about WYRA when you came in? No, I suppose you came in a bit late... Well, just get ready for the day. I’ll give you a proper introduction while the boys are having their lessons.”

“Lessons? Like wizarding lessons?” he asked, eager to start those himself.

“Oh no, just reading, writing, and math. Spells and such aren’t taught until they’re at least eleven...”

“I’m almost eleven...” He couldn’t hide the eagerness in his voice. For all the uncertainty of his future, he could not help but think that becoming a true wizard would somehow clear everything up. After all, there was a spell for everything. Certainly there were spells that help him get even with that Snape bastard and well on his way to Germany. Snape did say the German wizards were more liberal and didn’t go around kidnaping children. He could be happy there, right?

“Yes, well... we’ll talk about that later. Norton! Come here and help Harry. Show him what to do, just like you did with Edgar and Nathaniel, ok?”

She quickly wandered off to help some of the younger children dress and find their supplies, and Norton quickly appeared and led Harry away to the bathroom. Harry mimicked the younger boy as they prepared for the day. The bathroom had a low shelf with small baskets of personal hygiene items. They brushed their teeth, washed their faces, and Harry made a half hearted attempt to tame his hair. Back in the room, Norton opened Harry’s trunk and pulled out a plain black school bag. As the younger boy started loading it with pencils, a notebook, and other items; Harry changed into the set of slightly darker, but otherwise identical set of clothes. They had just finished getting ready when Miss Marilyn called everyone to the hall.

The children all lined up from oldest to youngest (except for Harry who lingered in the back of line), and made there way single file through the hall, where they were joined another line of boys in green and two lines of girls in pink and purple. Altogether there were about forty children, five nurses, and two large ‘guards’ in the procession.

They all made their way through a series of corridors to a large dining hall, where two sets of parallel tables and one shorter table at their head. The girls went to one long table and boys to the other, while the adults took the short table so that they might oversee them all. The tables were all fully set and there were large dishes piled high with all sorts of breakfast sorts. When everyone had settled, everyone bowed their heads and took their neighbor's hand to pray.

"God bless Britain," Miss Marilyn began.

"God bless Britain," everyone repeated.

"God bless the Community of Magic. And God bless me, that I might grow powerful, wise, and fearless. Bless my brethren, that they may grow powerful, wise, and fearless beside me. And bless the Father of the New Wizardry of Britain, so that he may lead us to a world of glory and justice for all wizarding kind. Amen."

When the prayer was done, leaving Harry feeling strangely like a foreigner, the dining hall broke out into a wordless chaos as children eagerly gathered up food onto their plates and passed dishes around. Harry grabbed some waffles, eggs, and sausage as he realized how truly starving he was. He hadn't had anything but a few tomatoes the morning before. Gradually, as tummies filled, the children all started talking and gossiping.

The atmosphere was all very amicable, and Harry wondered how these children couldn't be even a little distressed at being ripped away from their families. Certainly all their parents hadn't been nearly as wretchedly selfish and neglectful as the Dursley's had been to him. Yet no one mentioned their father or mother or siblings or past friends or pets. It was as if they had completely forgotten about their life outside of WYRA.

He had a dreadful premonition that it was a sort of magic, and as he looked down at his wonderfully delicious breakfast he couldn't help but wonder if it was enchanted somehow. If he stayed at WYRA long enough, would he too forget about his family? He certainly wouldn't miss the last three years spent cloistered at number four, Privet Drive with the Dursley's, but what about his parents? What about the memories of summers they'd spent together wandering the beach, spring festivals, and Christmas? What about all the quiet moments they spent together in the studio, his mother teaching him about perspective and proportions, and his father teaching him the proper way to mold clay?

Only half done, Harry pushed his plate away.

He spent the rest of breakfast listening to the other children, and piecing together what life was going to be like at WYRA. It all seemed a bit like boarding school. Everyone got up at the same time, went to breakfast at the same time, took lessons on generic subjects like math and geography, had lunch, had recesses and activity times for play, a story time, study and homework time, a shower just before dinner, a nightly prep, and finally lights out. Although it wasn't said directly, he got the impression there were no weekends or holidays. And then he overheard a conversation at the girl's table involving 'quarantine'.

"Miss Rachel says I'll be done with quarantine this Friday. I'll get to go with you guys next Saturday if I don't get sick," said an eight-year old girl with ebony hair pulled up into pig-tails and a purple outfit. Her friend in pink beside her squealed in delight, and started speaking in an Irish accent.

"Tha's great! It's non fun going anywhere without ya. Beth picks on me when yar gone."

"If she tries it while I'm there I'll pop her in the nose, and then see who wants to adopt her!" The little girls laughed and started talking about Beth and all the mean pranks they could pull on her when the adults weren't looking. Harry turned to Norton.

"What happens on Saturdays?"

Norton made an unpleasant face. "Adoption parties. They're a real drag. We just wander around a room and adults talk to us about stuff. Sometimes a kid gets adopted, but mostly it's a waste of time. The food is always really weird too."

“Adoption parties? Who adopts us? Who get’s adopted? What’s quarantine?”

“Gosh, I don’t know. Quarantine is just us waiting around to see if we get sick. Sometimes a kid gets something like chicken pox, only they get blue spots and the lights turn off every time they sneeze. If you go so long without getting sick, you get to go to the parties. I don’t know who adopts us... wizards and witches I guess.”

“How long does it usually take to get adopted?”

“I dunno. The younger kids usually get picked up pretty quick, though. I’ve been here three months, and I’ve been here the longest of our class,” he said, fairly glowing with pride. He didn’t seem to release that him being there so long meant no one wanted to take him home. Harry didn’t have the heart to suggest it to him. Frankly, he was probably in the same boat. Who would want to adopt someone as old as him? If it was as Snape suggested, he would going off to school soon, so there really wasn’t much point was there?

Breakfast ended, and while the nurses and guards escorted the children to their lessons, Miss Marilyn pulled him into a small office for a private chat. The office looked like an office, only it ran itself. The mail slot seemed to be having an ongoing battle with the filing cabinet, spitting out or swallowing pieces of parchment as they zipped through the air. A diagram on the wall depicted WYRA headquarters in its entirety with little colored dots that moved about it. Harry suspected each dot was a person, which seemed to be confirmed by the blue dot and the black dot that occupied the room they were currently residing in.

“Now Harry, I just wanted to take a moment to see how you are doing and explain a few things. You seemed be taking everything in stride so far, but I’m sure this must be disconcerting for you,” she said.

“Oh...well, yes... I dunno. It’s strange... kinda scary, but... not too strange really... not yet anyway. The kids all seem well taken care of, even if you do kidnap them.”

The woman coughed into her hand at his last statement. "Yes, well... there are good reasons for that, I assure you. Most importantly, it's dangerous, for both the child and their non-magical families to suddenly have a witch or wizard in the family. Neither one understands what is happening and the outcome can be... tragic. Before WYRA was founded there were a lot of horror stories about wizarding children being abused or killed by parents who mistook their magic as a sign of demonic possession or the anti-christ. You understand, I hope, that all the children here, you included, were removed for your protection?"

He didn't like it.

Parents should at least be given a chance, he thought. The idea that his parents could possibly reject him because he had magic seemed absurd to him. He couldn't help but think they would have been delighted at the idea. At the same time, his parents had been artists. They were weird by most people's standards. The Dursley's certainly wouldn't have been a safe place for a child with any unusual talents. Would they have doted on Dudley if he'd started levitating things or turned into a owl or something? And of course, WYRA did seem to think they were doing what was best for the children.

Except for maybe Snape. How that callous, lying, greasy bastard could be allowed anywhere near children was beyond him.

"Of course, Ma'am."

"I'm glad you understand. Now, I know you didn't get a proper explanation about what we do here at WYRA when you came in. Basically, we're a transition center. Children who display magical abilities are brought here from all over Britain. First we register them as citizens of the Wizarding Community of Britain, they're given a thorough health exam, vaccinated- I'm sure you recall all those awful potions you had to drink when you first arrive?- and then held over a period of three weeks to make sure you don't get sick. Understand that despite the vaccines, a lot of children still get Blue Pox or the latest magical flu. This waiting period also helps children adjust to being away from their families, become used to magic, and the like.

Our main purpose, however, is to place all the children here into proper wizarding homes."

"So that's what the adoption parties are for?"

"Ah, so you heard a little something about those?"

"I heard the younger children are the first to get adopted. I can't help but think I'll be here for a very long time."

She gave him a sympathetic smile.

"That's what I really wanted to talk to you about, Harold. I'm afraid the chances of you being adopted are... well, very slim. The good news, however, is that you'll be old enough to attend a wizarding school come September. Since you are old enough that childhood ailments are less of a concern, we'll let you skip the quarantine period and attend some of the adoption parties- just to give you a fair opportunity- but if you're not adopted, then when you go to receive your education, you'll become a ward of the Community and under the guardianship of your school's administration. Do you understand?"

"If I'm not adopted by a wizard family, I'll be adopted by a school... Do I get to keep my last name then?"

"Of course. I must say, young man, you're taking this all rather well."

Harry gave her a sardonic smile. "I'm used to big, sudden changes in my life."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It wouldn't be until later that evening, as she settled down to more carefully review Harold James Potter's file, that Miss Marilyn fully appreciated exactly what he meant. His records played out like war-time drama. His parents turned out to be wizards, which would have been a major benefit to his future, if it weren't for the fact that they had both been very high on You-Know-Who's Most Wanted list. They had been in league with Dumbledore, James Potter was even an auror, but they had pulled out of the country and the fight shortly after their son was born.

No one knew what had happened to them. There were apparently some reports that they had gotten to France, but after that there was no documented information. Snape's report suggested they had hidden themselves from the wizarding world completely, living as muggle artists in a studio apartment in Cologne. Harry didn't know anything about it either.

They had died with their secrets, and without anyone knowing Harry was a wizard, he had been returned to England to live with his muggle relatives. And what a wretched lot they seemed to be! Padlocks on the bedroom door, no formal education, and Dr. Helm found evidence of malnutrition!

It was cases like this that made Miss Marilyn proud to have supported You-Know-Who during the war and taken on a position at WYRA. Who knows what would have happened to poor Harold? Raised by abusive relatives to be an ordinary muggle, never comprehending the strange things that followed him through his life. On the off chance the former government had spotted him, he would have been thrust into society without a leg to stand on, and likely failed miserably into the dredges of society.

With WYRA hard at work though, no child was ever left hungry or floundering for guidance. They would raise all their children to be obedient, productive, proud members of society. How fortunate Harold was, how all wizarding children were, to have such a compassionate ruler as You-Know-Who!

Chapter 4: The Prince, the Knave, and the Ace of Hearts

Four days passed in a routine that was the same as the first morning Harry had arrived. He did pretty much everything the younger children did, except lessons, which he took to studying on his own (he hadn't had any formal schooling since he was eight, but he'd done a lot of Dudley's math homework at the Dursley's and knew a fair bit of Geography), and playtime he usually spent reading "Witches, Wizards, and Whatevers; a Practical Guide to Modern Culture in Wizarding Britain". Miss Marilyn had given the book to him so he would stop bugging everyone else with questions.

The book was pretty vague and its references obscure or inaccurate, but Harry got a general idea of the Wizarding World. Non-magical people were called muggles, and since he was born from muggles he was called a muggleborn. Not exactly common, but not really rare. Wizards and witches who had wizarding parents were called purebloods. Harry wondered what they called a magical person born from a muggle and a witch or wizard. There was no reference for it, so Harry assumed it just didn't occur very often.

According to his book, even though wizards lived amongst or beside muggle communities, there wasn't any real interaction. Wizards had their own government, economy, education, and culture completely separate from Muggles. As far as the Muggle world knew, there was no such thing as magic. In fact, it was apparently illegal to do business with or marry a muggle. It would explain why there weren't any muggle/wizarding children.

Otherwise, the Wizarding World ran a bit like the muggle world, only everything seemed to involve magic. They had radios (although not televisions oddly enough), newspapers (the photographs actually moved!), and all sorts of magazines (He was curious as to what Potion's Weekly involved). There were sporting events (Quidditch was apparently the national sport of choice), a wide selection of hobbies, festivals, and Halloween and Christmas had their own particular traditions. While none of them looked familiar, many of them did look like fun. The government was a cross between a monarchy and a bureaucracy, and a representative body called the Wizengamot that didn't really seem to have a purpose. He also couldn't figure out who was the head of the government, and only knew that it wasn't a king or queen or some other form of royalty. They referred to this person as You-Know-Who, but since Harry really didn't know who it was very frustrating.

He was almost to the chapter that went into magical vacation spots when Saturday arrived. All the boys spent an extra long time grooming themselves and their younger friends in the bathroom. There were light hearted bets about who might get picked that day. After a particularly energetic breakfast, everyone went to lessons, but groups of four or five would routinely be called out of class. When they returned their hair was trimmed or curled or modestly styled. Harry got a turn as well, and in the shower room he was set on a stool. His barber, an elderly man with neatly trimmed mustache, took one look at his wild mop and declared it hopeless.

As soon as lunch was through, most of the boys and girls were gathered up into two lines. About a dozen remained behind, some of them marking their fellow's departure with a distinct pout, and went on to playtime and study period. Harry and the children were escorted by two nurses and two guards to a room that he had never seen before. It was a small room with plain white walls and wood flooring. The only thing there was a large cabinet standing directly in the middle of the room. It was carved of dark wood and had a small brass nob shaped like a lion, and as Harry moved closer he could make out symbols burned along the outer edges.

Miss Marilyn went to the door. She took a moment to check her pocket watch, nodded to herself and then tapped the cabinet lightly with her wand. "Aquo questo portello all'atro lato." The dark symbols turned a electric purple, flickered into light blue and then faded to dark. When the symbols had faded completely, the door fell open.

"Bloody hell," Harry muttered, looking through the door to see not a cupboard, but a the parlor of a large mansion.

"Harold!"

"Sorry, Miss Marilyn."

She let it slide, and moved out of the way so that the children could file through. As Harry moved through the door he felt the briefest moment of disorientation, as if he had just stepped off of an elevator. He quickly moved aside to allow their guardians to step through behind him, and looked back. They had all apparently stepped through someone's grandfather clock, and Harry could only shake his head at the concept. Did the cabinet and the clock connect only to each other or did they connect to other places? If wizards could do this sort of thing, why had Snape taken him to WYRA in a car?

Harry lingered close to the adults at first, but the other children quickly scattered into little clusters of friends to play games or investigate the room. It was a very lovely room with an air of antiquity Harry was coming to understand as the norm for the Wizarding world. There was an enormous white marble fireplace, engraved with dragons, a phoenix, and other fire related creatures that he couldn't identify. Elegant furniture that looked more beautiful than comfortable was scattered about the room, and a long table stood laden with an assortment of finger food.

"Where are we?" he finally asked, to no one in particular.

"Gnarlsbriar Manor," replied one of the guards offhandedly, watching closely so that none of his wards broke anything. "Summer estate of the Brimwoods Family, just south of Edinborough."

Harry glanced up to see a enormous gold and crystal chandelier laden with plain wax candles. "Are all wizarding homes this nice?"

The older man snorted. "They certainly like to pretend they are. Run off, Harold. My job isn't answering your nosey questions."

He frowned, but did as he was told. He found himself standing by an open window, looking out over a verdant Scottish countryside. In the distance, he could make out the dark shape of horses grazing behind stone paddocks. Trying to keep his thoughts from speculating on what strange thing might happen next, he kept his attention on those horses and their strange reddish hues. The longer he looked at them the stranger they began to look. Were those wings?

The sound of doors opening and the muffled thump of many footsteps drew Harry's attention to the other end of the parlor. Approximately twenty witches and wizards entered the room, all of them in pairs. At first Harry assumed the pairs were spouses, but there was one pair of only women and two of only men. As he pondered the peculiar arrangement, the witches and wizards (for that was the only thing they could possibly be dressed in their elaborate robes and some even with pointed hats) filed into the room and without preamble began cornering children. When ever a child was cornered, they'd stop what they were doing to talk to the pair. Some of the children were better at it than others. The bolder ones smiled brightly and chatted as if to one of their friends, while others stammered or looked down shyly or nearly burst into tears. Harry had a feeling he was going to fall into the second category, and even though he was incredibly curious, he turned back towards the window and prayed no one would approach him.

For a while, it seemed to work. The adults would always pass him by, occasionally turning curious glances at him, but never stopping. With this blatant disregard, it wasn't long before Harry began overhearing conversations he was certain he shouldn't have been privy to. One of the pairs of males, both young, slender, and dressed in a way that reminded Harry of accountants and investors, stopped not two feet away from him and began gossiping between themselves.

"Not much to pick from, is there Robert?" said the darker of the two.

"Josephine did say it was to be expected. It took her two years and eight parties just to find Carolyn. It's always a gamble when dealing with Muggle-stock."

Muggle-stock? What were these men here for? Children or cattle?

"The little black haired boy might be worth looking into."

"He's a bit of a scaredy-cat."

"He's five. He can be trained."

Fetch. Speak. Sit. Stay.

"I wanted a brunette or a blond. If he doesn't look at least a little like one of us then we'll look like a rather motley family. You remember Dorsey, right? His wife's has a light complexion just like him, but they kept adopting red heads. Their family portraits look like they've been mobbed by freckled woodsprites."

They both laughed loudly to each other, and Harry felt an up-welling of resentment towards them. Suddenly, both men stopped laughing, and slowly turned around to look at him. They both seemed startled to see him there, and even more startled at the malevolent look in his brilliant green eyes.

"Oh...h-hello," the blond said first, obviously embarrassed. His partner (Harry believed they were in fact one of those 'special couples' his mother had told him about) looked startled, but recovered quickly and looked down on him with a certain smugness. It was certainly more dignified than Dudley's infantile smirk, but no where near as grating as Snape's had been. Now, Harry may not have known how to be polite and sociable to adult witches and wizards, but he certainly knew how to be rude to them. Rude was easy.

"Hallo. Mein Name ist Harry. Ihr seid unheimlich eingebildet, oberflächlich und aufgeblasen. Ich würde euch nicht einmal eine Katze adoptieren lassen, geschweige denn einen kleinen Jungen,"(1) he rambled off. The wizards both looked at him blankly for a moment, then the blond one hurriedly opened up a pamphlet he was carrying and flipped through it. At first, Harry thought he was looking up what he'd said, but was proven wrong a moment later when the blond found what it was he was looking for.

"Ah... Harold James Potter. English born, but raised in Germany. Returned to England around eight or nine. Oh look there... almost eleven already. WYRA just picked him up last week. Imagine that? You rarely see them this old."

"Kein Grund so mich anzugaffen, du Fisch."(2)

"Are you sure the German wizards didn't just throw him back?"

“Robert!”

“He’s mocking us, Kyle.”

Harry grinned, all teeth.

“Er... yes, well... he is a brunette though. And your mother’s eyes were green too.”

Both Harry and Robert turned a disbelieving look at the smaller man.

“Don’t even suggest it. Does he even speak English? Never mind, of course he does. It’s bad enough dealing with backtalk in one language, let alone two.”

“Why not? You can each have your own language of sarcasm,” Harry offered.

“Yes, now see there,” Kyle continued. “You’d get the English sarcasm. You of all people should appreciate that.”

Despite himself, the corner of Harry’s mouth twitched. He still did not like them, but they were...a cute couple? The moment Kyle saw the little slip he broke out into a full out grin.

“Oh and he’s cute! He’s almost eleven and still cute.”

Harry blushed, which only seemed to delight Kyle further.

“No,” Robert said firmly. “Absolutely not. Aside from being a brunette- and we can’t be certain that bird’s nest is his natural color or it just hasn’t been washed properly- he’s the opposite of everything we were looking for to begin with! He’s too old, he’s disrespectful, doesn’t look a thing like me, and come on... it took ten years for his magic to pop up? He’s probably a wink and a whistle from being a squib.”

“Hey, I don’t go calling you seafood...” Harry objected. “Oh, wait...”

“Squib, squib, not a squid. A muggle born from wizarding stock. God, what do they teach you all day?”

“How to make puppets out of popsicle sticks, but that doesn’t matter. I’ll be going away to a real wizarding school come September, and that will be that.”

“There! See? He’d be in the house for what? A month? And then he’d be off to some trade school to making candles from the rest of the year.”

“Aww... but Robby-”

“For the last time, no! Now I’m going to go check out that blond kid, you can join me when your common sense returns.” With that, the man stalked off, leaving Harry alone with Kyle. The man put his hands on his hips and his expression was such that Harry was suddenly, and painfully reminded of his mother. He quickly went back to staring out the window.

“I’m sorry, Harold, but he’s being quite unreasonable,” the wizard said, ignoring the fact that his young companion was ignoring him.

“He sounded perfectly reasonable to me.”

There was a silence, and he wondered if Kyle hadn’t taken the hint and left. But no, the man merely moved closer towards the window to see what he was looking at. There was a look of surprise on his face, and then understanding as he looked towards the young man.

“You can see them, can’t you?” he said.

“What? The horses? Yeah, my eyes aren’t that bad.”

“Harold, those aren’t horses. They’re thestrals. Beasts of the underworld. Only someone who has seen death up close can see them.”

“ ... ”

“Harold-“

"Harry. My name is Harry."

"Harry, then. Why are you so against getting adopted?"

"I've been adopted before, thank you very much. I'd rather be on my own now."

"Ah..." They said nothing for a moment, Harry pondering thestrals and death and family and how they were all connected in his life. He had almost forgotten Kyle, when the man put his hand on his shoulder. "If you should ever change your mind, you can reach either Robert or me here."

He handed Harry a business card. It read:

ROBERT ALLEN REIGER

ATTORNEY AT LAW

CRIMINAL DEFENSE AND CIVIL SUITES

165 TAPERTY RD, LONDON

"I'm his personal assistant, so if you write there you'll get to me first."

Harry studied the card and then Kyle, more than a little baffled. "Thank you, sir, but... why are doing this? I'm a complete stranger and you've no benefit in befriending me."

"I've got a feeling about you, Harry. I think you're going to make something out of yourself. I've seen all sorts in my line work, and I can just tell. You've got character. It glows out through those pretty eyes of yours. Ten or fifteen years from now Robert is going to be kicking himself for missing out on the opportunity to adopt you. I'd bet my wand on it."

Harry blushed, not expecting the compliment and unsure if should believe the man. He certainly didn't feel special. He felt tired, small, and a little bit lonely. Kyle gave him an encouraging smile, a pat on the shoulder, and wandered off to find his husband? boss? Harry gave the business card a long speculative look and then slipped it into the folds of his shirt.

For the remaining hour and a half, Harry remained undisturbed by the other wizarding couples and eventually his gaze returned to the thestrals. Gradually, the adults left, a few of them taking a child in hand as they went, but most of the children were left and started to join him by the windows.

“Hey, Harry,” began Norton, tilting his head curiously. “What are you looking at?”

“Thestrals,” Harry said automatically.

“What’s a thestral?”

Now Harry wasn’t sure what to say. Could he really explain something as sinister as a horse that only one who has seen death can see them to an eight-year old? He didn’t like the idea that he was ten and could see them.

“It’s a type of bird. Those little brown birds hopping in and out of the grass.”

“Oh...I thought those were just sparrows.”

Edgar, the smallest of the boys there, stepped close to Harry looking off towards the meadows. He looked up to the older boy and gave him a confused look, but said nothing.

It was an epiphany for Harry. The realization that death did not care where and on who it landed, and it did not care who it left behind. It was a scary, horrible truth. It made Harry feel older and more prepared for his life to come, and he was glad it had been revealed to him.

1) Hello. My name is Harry. You are conceited, shallow, and pompous. You best bet is to adopt a cat, not a little boy.

2) That’s no reason to gape, you codfish.

Author's note: Many of the people who are in this first book of the series (yes, I intend to have a series with all seven years of Harry's life at Hogwarts, just like Rowling) will seem superfluous since they don't contribute to current plot much, but almost all of them will reappear in later books, including several of the orphans and Kyle and Robert (who does regret not adopting Harry when he had the chance). Have a bit of patience.

Also, if Harry seems a little OC, well, he would be given the circumstance. Rowling's Harry was raised by the Dursleys since he was one, but my Harry lived with his parents in Germany until he was eight and then lost them. So I think of him having more self confidence having grown up with his loving parents, and he understands his circumstances with the Dursleys was abnormal and not himself. His view of the wizarding world at the moment is that his life is better than what it was at the Dursleys, but not as good as the life he had with his parents, so he might come off as a bit cynical at times and then completely enchanted at others.

Please review, I will reply if you have questions (that don't reveal plot twists or future events in the story). Sorry, though, I don't take requests in plot. I have a definite picture of how this story will flow and the events that transpire are all related so they cannot be altered.

P.S. For those people whom it bothers, yes there will be some yaoi couples like Kyle and Robert occasionally (and some lesbians every so often as well), but nothing explicit and most of the characters in my story, including Harry, are straight. There's no male pregnancy anywhere in the series. And in case you're worried, Voldemort is still his delightfully evil (albeit mellow and much less deranged) self, without resorting to pedophilia.

Chapter 5: The Maiden and the Dragon

Edgar did not return with Harry and the other boys that Saturday. Neither did one of the six year old girls, but he had never met her. When they returned to WYRA headquarters, Harry was surprised to find that the boy's bed and trunk were gone, along with all his crayon drawings. None of the other boys questioned this, and in fact seemed to think Edgar had somehow beat them in a game and cursed him good naturedly. For Harry, his disappearance was devastating. That he or anyone of the children could simply disappear and not a trace of them remain...

When everyone else had gone to sleep, Harry avoided his bed like the plague, feeling some foul sort of enchantment had been placed on it to make him forget Edgar, forget his parents, forget himself. He spent the entire night drawing sketches of the missing child with colored pencils and crayons in the blank pages of his student notebook. When he was done, he tore out the pages and hid them in his book, along with the business card Kyle had given him. The parallels between his new secret sketches and his old ones made him simultaneously nostalgic and terrified. Surely his new life could in no way resemble the drab, bitter existence he'd had at the Dursley's?

The next day proceeded as all the days previously had in a comfortable routine. At night, Harry lingered behind the other boys, pretending to stay up late reading until they all had gone to bed and were magically enchanted into sleep. He would place stuffed animals underneath his covers and hide in the bathroom until the final bed check of the evening around nine o'clock, and then spend an hour or so sketching the other boys, or the staff, or the Reigers, or anyone he could remember and then hide them away in his book. Then he'd strip his bed of the pillow and comforter and sleep on the floor. His sleep was light as it had always been at the Dursley's, and he always woke earlier than the other boys so that he might make his bed and start his bathroom routine early without anyone being the wiser.

Life continued in this strange cross of comfortable routine and intense paranoia for three weeks. There were more adoption parties. Harry went ignored and was glad for it. He never saw Kyle or Robert Reiger at any of them. He wondered sometimes if they had adopted Edgar or perhaps the little girl he'd never met. Norton was finally adopted to a congenial pair of witches whose daughter had left for Redbridge and were looking for another child to open their home and lives to. Harry was happy for Norton, who had seemed as thrilled to be adopted as the witches had been to adopt him. At night, though, he would think the blue room had begun to look so very empty.

A boy named Alfred turned up one day shortly afterward. He was the first black boy Harry had seen at WYRA, and he was also the first child he had seen cry for his mommy. He cried all day, wouldn't touch his food or take a nap, and nothing the staff or the other boys did seemed to comfort him. When Alfred woke up the next morning, he didn't shed a single tear and ate his breakfast with as much enthusiasm as the other boys. Harry hadn't remembered feeling so alone since he was eight.

June rolled around, although Harry wasn't sure of the exact date, and Miss Marilyn pulled Harry into her office for a chat. At first, he was terrified at the possibility of her finding out he hadn't been sleeping in his bed and that she was going to take his sketches away. It didn't take long for her to alleviate his fears.

"Professor Snape is going to be dropping by tomorrow," she began, pulling out a file with his name on it. Harry frowned, thinking of the greasy bastard who had tricked him and stolen his sketchbook. "He's going to administer a magical aptitude test to determine your level of magic. Depending on how high you rank will determine which school you will be going to. Either way, things are going to get a bit hectic for you. After the test, you'll only have about a day or two before you're sent to your new home. You'll attend a school sponsored summer prep class with some other muggleborn children, and then attend proper classes with pureblood children at the start of term. Usually September first. Do you have any questions?"

Harry thought for a moment.

"Will it hurt? The test, I mean."

"No, Harold, it doesn't hurt at all," she said with a smile.

“... Can I take the book that you gave me? You know, in case I get confused about something?”

“You know you’ll get new, even better books at the school don’t you?”

“Yes... but, those will be the school’s books. I was wondering if I can have the book. You know, so it would just be mine?”

Miss Marilyn gave him a compassionate smile. “I don’t see why not. I have extras and they’re pretty out of date. Why not? You can keep your book, Harold. I don’t mind.”

Harry gave her the brightest smile he could manage. “Thank you so much!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

All of the following morning and afternoon, Harry waited anxiously for Snape’s arrival and his subsequent test. He wished now he had asked his current guardian when the man would arrive, but now it was too late. The woman was in her office all day working on paperwork and organizing the details of the next adoption party. Now all he could do was wait and wonder what exactly his test would entail. Miss Marilyn had said it wouldn’t hurt, but that didn’t necessarily mean it wouldn’t be difficult.

Would it be a written test? Would he have to try to do some spells? Would one of the staff doctors poke and prod him until they learned what they needed to know? What if there had been a mistake? What if he wasn’t a wizard at all? What if some wizard or witch was playing a cruel joke and had caste a spell through his open window that day at the Dursley’s? What if Dudley had caste that curse by accident and not him? Would he be sent back to the Dursley’s? Would they erase his memories and abandon him in some muggle orphanage? Would they dice him up into little bits and use him for dark rituals and potions ingredients?

His mind swam with these thoughts, and any and all attempts to distract himself failed to work for over a few minutes at a time. He paced during play and study periods, fiddled with his food during breakfast and lunch, and scanned his book from front to back in hopes of divining his future.

Finally, FINALLY, the time came and he was pulled away from dinner table by Miss Marilyn and taken to another room he had never seen before. It was large study with a giant fireplace, walls lined with enormous tomes, and set of comfortable looking chairs . A girl, no older than him, sat in one of the plush violet chairs already. She had spikey black hair with a tuff of purple running through her bangs, and wore a dark violet dress, black knee-high socks, and heavy black boots. She was the most normal looking girl he had seen in a month.

“Who are you?” she asked suspiciously, eyeing his bland clothing and wild hair critically.

“Harry Potter. And you?” He took the unoccupied seat across from her, and tried not to fidget.

“Emily White. Did they kidnap you too?”

Inside, Harry cheered. Finally, someone who thought of this entire matter as kidnaping. Really, how old did you have to be to figure this out?

“Yes, almost a month ago. Did they just pick you up?”

Emily visibly relaxed, although she looked suddenly confused.

“Yes. My family and I were going on holiday to France, and we were taking the ferry across the channel, but then... something happen. I remember going over the rail and then I remember landing in my bed at home, but I can’t remember what happened in between.”

“Sounds like you apparated by accident” Harry offered.

“Apparated? Is that a magic thing? I didn’t even have an hour to try to sort things out when these...people just burst into my house and dragged me here. They kept saying they were wizards and witches, and they did such strange things, and they said I was a witch too but that's impossible. I can't do magic like they could."

"Apparition is a sort of magic. Have you always lived in England?"

"Magic? Me do magic? No way, no way. That's awesome! Mum and Dad are gonna flip!"

"Um... Emily..."

"Oh, no! I completely forgot about them! They probably think I'm at the bottom of the channel by now! Do you think the weird wizardy people got a hold of them? How did they even know I did magic to begin with? Hey, could my parents do magic too, do you suppose? Perhaps, they know what happened already and they called them to come pick me up?"

"No, Emily, listen..."

"Is this a sort of... I dunno... magical police station? You know, in case children accidentally apparate away by accident? Is that what happened to you? Are you waiting for your parents too?"

"Emily, my parents are dead."

The gabby girl's mouth finally shut with a audible snap. She gave him a sheepish, apologetic look before saying speaking again at a more reasonable rate.

"I'm sorry, Harry. Listen to me blathering away, but it's just so exciting. This has to be the biggest adventure I've ever had, maybe the biggest one I'll ever have in my life, ya know? But, if you're parents are... you know, then what are you doing here."

Mentally, Harry cursed WYRA and the predicament they had just put him in. How was he suppose to explain all this to a girl no older than himself? He didn't even understand half of what was going on! Bloody insensitive bastards! He came here for a test, not... not... grief counseling!

"I...um... well... it's um... It's an orphanage... of sorts. Well, technically, it's an adoption center since...well... no one here's really an orphan... except me, of course, but I had relatives looking after me... so... really, it's a kidnaping center... kidnaping and adoption center... They'll never let you see your family again...Er..."

"WHAT?!"

She was on her feet in an instant, racing for the door. She tried the knob, but it held fast. She kicked at the door, lightly at first and then with full blown karate kicks but it wouldn't budge. She screamed and hissed and cried and begged. Finally, she was reduced to sobbing and turned back towards Harry who stood helplessly watching her from behind his chair.

"How can they? How can they just take me away from my mum and dad? What are they going to do with me? I can't... I can't do anything with out them..."

Harry timidly walked towards her, afraid at any moment she might lash out at him like she had the door, but he had barely reached for her when she suddenly leapt into his arms. She clung to him tightly, sobbing into his shoulder even though she was probably an inch or two taller than him. He hugged her awkwardly, unsure of what to say or do, but she didn't seem to care. Finally, she collected her self, a sniffing she pulled away to search for kleenex and trying to ignore everything else, including the boy she had cried on for ten whole minutes. Harry let her go, and just as he took his seat the study door opened.

Snape stalked in, his beaked nose and black robes making him look more like a vulture than Harry remembered. The vulpine man glanced at them both and sneered.

"Of course. A starving artist and a drama queen. I always manage to get the fun cases."

"You!" Emily began, snapping out of her distraught state in order to point an imperial finger at him. "I demand you bring me home at once! My family-"

Snape's wand came into his hand with a fluid familiarity of a maestro with his baton. He made a single gesture and Emily was suddenly silent. She kept talking, angrily by the looks of it, but Harry could not hear a thing she said. Though as she seemed to realize something had been done to her, he could guess at the rush of foul things she was spitting out at him. Snape merely regarded her with his usual smirk.

"Ms. White, your family believes you are quite drowned and will thus not be looking for you. You should mark yourself lucky. You at the very least, have a family that will remember your existence with some, no doubt exaggerated, fondness. A benefit no other muggleborn here can claim."

This silenced Emily for real, and she marked him with angry, but silent regard. Harry frowned angrily at the man, both for his insensitivity to the girl and-"I want my book back."

Snape regarded him with a vaguely curious look. "I am surprised, Mr. Potter, that you can even recall said item after a month at WYRA. So either the memory charms are starting to weaken, you have a one track mind, or... you haven't been sleeping like you should."

Harry squirmed a bit under his dark gaze. He was unsure how the memory of his book might have exposed the avoidance of his bed. He also wasn't sure how to take the confirmation of the fact that spells were being used against him and the other children.

"I want my book," he said by way of distraction.

"Of course you do," Snape said, moving away from both children so that he might set his bag on the study's desk. He gestured towards Emily, and she let out a loud, audible gasp. "Unfortunately for you, it has already been destroyed, as per WYRA regulations. You had best forget about it and any other misguided attachments you may have formed in your previous life. It is time for you to keep focused on your future, and not your past, or you may find yourself without either. The wizarding world is not a kind, safe place despite the impression this... facility might have given you.

"Now come," Snape continued, setting a two vials of clear blue liquid and an instrument that reminded Harry of those toy recorders they handed out in elementary music class. "We all have more important matters to attend. Miss White, you first."

Emily glowered at the dark man, but her posture was more wary than aggressive. She looked quite prepared to stay exactly where she was, and Harry pondered if she wasn't a bit spoiled.

"Now Ms. White!" the man snarled, making both children jump.

Harry, seeing that Emily was now stuck out of genuine fear and not just stubbornness, took her by the hand and walked her over to the desk. Snape sneered, and both gave him twin glowers.

"Drink this." He handed Emily one of the blue vials.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Even if I explained it to you, you would be too ignorant to understand. Now, stop wasting my time and drink it."

"It could be poison."

Snape smirked at that. "Yes, that's true. Now drink."

Emily turned to Harry, who could only shrug. Reluctantly, she uncapped the vial and took a swig. And just as quickly, spit it back into the vial.

"UGH!!! That's awful!"

"Oh for the love of Saint Francis, why do I work with children? You have to SWALLOW it, Ms. White. Imperio!"

Harry bolted out of the way as Snape lifted his wand, shouting out his spell at the girl. Emily jerked once, stiffened, and then relaxed. Her dark brown eyes turned glassy and when she drank the potion a second time she did not even grimace. Snape nodded in approval, apparently to himself, and glanced over at Harry.

“Pay attention, Mr. Potter, this is one of the most notorious spells of the wizarding world. The Imperius curse. A spell so powerful it can subvert the will of almost any it is cast upon. I say almost any, because the ironic truth of the matter is that if a witch or wizard is powerful enough to cast it, they are powerful enough to fight it off. Ms. White, clearly is not powerful enough. Ms. White, blow into this.”

Snape handed her the recorder-like instrument, and she did as she was instructed. The instrument gave off a dull whistle, and small white peg popped out of one of the key holes. Snape took the instrument, and smirked.

“As I thought, a low 4th level ranking. Barely more than a squib. Finite incantatem!”

Emily let out loud gagging cough, and Harry rushed back to her side to see if she had been hurt. She didn't seem any worse for ware, although she seemed desperate to get that awful taste out of her mouth.

“What happened?”

“As much fun as I am sure Mr. Potter is having witnessing the assortment of spells I have been casting on you, it is his turn, and I recommend you go sit down quietly over there.”

Emily gave him a nasty look, but then she was already looking green, and did as she was told without protest. Harry looked towards her and then back at Snape, who held out another blue vial. He briefly considered refusing, but the thought of being under the other man's control- literally and not just figuratively- prompted him towards obedience. He accepted the bottle, and plugging his nose he swallowed it quickly.

It tasted like spoiled milk and kool-aid. He started to gag immediately, but nothing would come up. After a few moments, he regained control himself. Snape handed him the instrument and he blew into it. Once again a white peg appeared, this time in a key hole farther up. Snape regarded it critically for a moment, and then turned his dark glare towards Harry. The boy felt a surge of panic, wondering what he could have possibly done wrong and what sort of curse the greasy bastard was going to throw at him because of it.

“Mr. Potter, have you ingested any potions recently? Perhaps some given to you by the medi-wizard? Or picked something up, a curious bauble or unusual plant from one of the parties?”

“...I don't think so... Why?”

“Your magical reading is unusually high.”

“So... the Imperial curse won't work on me?”

“Don't flatter yourself. And it's the Imperius curse, not the Imperial curse. The Imperial curse involves a generational contraction of very unpleasant venereal disease.”

“ ... ”

Snape let out a frustrated sigh and threw his instruments and empty vials back into his bag with enough force that something should have broken, but didn't. He reached in and pulled out two pieces of parchment. He handed one of the letters to Harry and then thrust the other in Emily's hand. He then stalked towards the door, his black robes billowing out like a malevolent shadow. Just before he stepped out of the room he turned sharply to Harry.

“Congratulations on your acceptance letter, Mr. Potter,” he snarled, “I look forward to seeing you at the start of term!”

The door slammed shut.

The room fell into a deep silence, a calm in the wake of Hurricane Snape. With a vaguely horrified expression, he turned to Emily for some sort of sanity. She gave him a tired, sickly grin.

“Better you than me.”

Chapter 6- The Land and Its Vassals

It turned out Harry had just over a day and a half to get ready. The letter Snape had given him had been an acceptance letter to Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, and summer classes he was required to take before the start of term began that very Monday. Miss Marilyn had been ecstatic when she heard the news, and had been brimming with tears she was so proud of him. It had been really embarrassing as far as Harry was concerned.

Emily had also gotten a letter, but it was for a place called Fellshire Magical Craft and Trade school. Harry worried about her. After Snape had left she had fallen into a depressed silence. He had tried to explain to her as much as he could about WYRA and how to avoid the memory spells, but he did not think she was listening or even cared. Once one of the nurses took her off to see the medi-wizard, Harry never saw her.

As much as Harry wanted to find her, and make her feel better, he was suddenly much too busy to do anything but look after himself. While Miss Marilyn puttered away about what a prestigious school Hogwarts was, how it was every parent's dream to have their child attend there, and how proud she was of 'Harold'; Harry was dragged from corridor to corridor and room to room, gathering up familiar and strange items as they went. His usual trunk was replaced with a larger, black standard school trunk and all the usual blue toned nic-nacs he had taken for granted like his toothbrush and notebook where all replaced with brand new black versions. His clothes were replaced too, with normal- as normal as wizarding clothes got- slacks, button up shirts, belt, vests, ties, and blessedly shoes and underwear all in an assortment of mix and match colors. Additionally, he was given a set of plain black student robes, and was told he would get a school badge once he was assigned to a house. Even his awkward, thick glasses where replaced with a set of elegant gold rims.

When Harry finally got a look at himself in the mirror he barely recognized himself. Gone was the poor waif in his baggy, thread-bare clothes and paint smeared hands, sulking in his room. Gone was the disoriented boy, clean and well kept like a pet dog, pacing the night away between the rows of peaceful children. Now he stood, dignified if a little rough around the edges, preparing to move towards an unknown future in an unknown world. Suddenly, he could see the man he wanted to be, and would become. He was terrified, but couldn't even fathom returning to what he once was.

When he returned to his room for the night, all the other boys were fast asleep. He wandered up and down the room, memorizing each of their cherubic faces and offering silent prayers that they would leave WYRA and find memories worth keeping and futures with families as loving, if not more so, than their old ones.

He woke in a chair at the work table before the other boys, startled out of dreams of life in Cologne with his parents and wizards and Emily and Snape. Miss Marilyn stood at the door, eyeing him with an unreadable expression.

"Harold, did you sleep there all night?"

Silently, Harry berated himself. He had fooled everyone for almost a month, why was everyone finding him out now? "Er... sorry, I-I-I was just ...so excited and nervous. I couldn't bring myself to lay down, ya know?"

She nodded, but her expression was just as unreadable as before.

"We'll be leaving in a few minutes, Harold. Your first summer class at Hogwarts starts at eight-thirty sharp and you'll need to meet with Headmistress Lestrage and get your books before that. Go wash your face and brush your teeth, and try your best to tame that wild mop of yours."

Harry did as he was told, thankful that she had apparently dismissed her suspicions in favor of staying on schedule. When he left the bathroom, his bed was gone and only his new black trunk remained.

"Can't I say goodbye to the others?" he asked.

"It would be better if you just let them sleep. They're so used to goodbyes they don't mean much anymore," she said dismissively, leading him out into the hall.

Harry knew she was probably right, but only because of those blasted memory spells. He prayed that the school beds weren't similarly cursed or that he would soon learn the counter spell to override it. What was it Snape had used to end his silencing spell? Finite Incatem? Incantatemum?

She caste a few more spells on his trunk, making it as small and light as a deck of cards, which he then placed in his pocket. She caste another spell on the clothes he was wearing, smoothing out the wrinkles he had gained from sleeping in them, and then they were off. They passed through the corridors, offices, dining room, and into the lobby Harry hadn't seen since he had first arrived. It seemed smaller than he remembered, but he didn't get to ponder what that might mean as they continued at a fast clip out the large marble doors and to the black familiar car waiting for them outside.

They climbed into the back, and this time Harry kept his attention glued to the outside, determined to see if they would be magic away like he had from Surrey. In the early morning, it was less crowded with people, and those present were hurriedly on their way to work. However, they were much more unusual in the light of day than they had been in the cover of night. The old-fashion cut of their clothes did not inhibit their sense of color, and by all accounts some of their outfits were quite garish. Bright pinks, purples, lime greens, canary yellows, pin stripes and polka dots, stars and moons, hieroglyphs, and peacock feathers were as common as black, whites, beiges, blues, pocket watches, and flowers. Occasionally, the car would stop at a crosswalk, and a pedestrian or shopkeeper would smile and wave at him. They all seemed so kind and friendly that Harry wondered why Snape had been so cynical about it.

Maybe the man had just wanted to scare him.

Maybe he was just paranoid.

Maybe he was scared of nice people?

The car passed through an alley, and once it had ended, they found themselves in the middle of the Scottish countryside. The land was rich green and partitioned into acreage by short stone walls. There were flocks of grazing sheep and cows here and there, and as far as Harry could tell they weren't in anyway magical. When he looked back in the direction they'd come from, it appeared they had merely passed under a small stone bridge.

"What just happened?"

"It's the same sort of magic we use to take you all to the adoption parties. It's rather complicated, but I'm sure you'll learn all about it in school. Speaking of which, Hogsmeade should be just over this next hill and it's only a short walk from there to Hogwarts."

Sure enough, not a minute later they passed over a hill and found themselves in a small wizarding village. The shops and business here were more quaint than those he had seen in the wizarding city, with mostly specialty shops, an inn, and a tavern. There were a few horse drawn carts and even some people walking around with broomsticks, but no other cars. They parked between The Hogshead and Honeydukes, and started the rest of the way on foot.

As they made their way towards an earthen road out of town, Harry could see what looked like an enormous castle off in the distance.

"Oh wow," he said, staring awestruck at the beautiful monolith. There was no way anything so large and beautiful could have ever been made by means other than magic.

"Wait until you see the inside," his guide said, off-handedly. Harry turned towards her, startled.

"Inside? You mean...that's Hogwarts?"

When he had thought of Hogwarts he had thought of all those fancy boarding schools from TV shows and movies. Wide, two-story buildings with tall windows, wrought iron gates, and expansive grounds. He had not thought of centuries old castles sitting at the top of a large hills, massive lakes, or thick primeval forests. If he'd had a horse, he would have felt very much like a knight on errand to the king of the land.

Or perhaps a squire tagging along.

It was half a mile walk to the castle, and the closer they got the more in awe Harry felt himself become. Not only was the castle rich in detailed statues and structure, but also in exceptionally good shape without a trace of wearing by weather or time. There was also additional structures coming off the castle, including a large green house, an impressive little stadium, a boat house, and stables. A quaint little cottage stood between the stables and the border of the thick forest, and he could just make out the shape of a gaunt looking man and an exceptionally short woman working around the garden surrounding it.

They were met near the castle gates by a witch with a stern look and a streak of silver in her black hair. Harry thought she looked very much like a headmistress at an all girl school should look like. Miss Marilyn, who had been going at a brisk pace, smiled as soon she saw the other woman and spoke rather breathlessly.

“Headmaster Lestrangle, I presume?”

The old witch gave her a wry smile.

“Unfortunately, no. Professor Lestrangle is very busy at the moment, as is the deputy headmaster. I am Professor McGonagall, Head of Gryffindor house and transfiguration professor here at Hogwarts. I will handle things from here. You have the paperwork?”

“Oh- oh, yes, just a moment.” Miss Marilyn checked her person, pockets, and hat before finally removing a full sized folder from her billowy sleeves. The transfiguration teacher accepted the file, and examined its contents. She suddenly grew pale. Looking up, she resolutely marched around Miss Marilyn and right up to Harry who had been looking out at the lake. He turned to look up at her, and felt concerned by her stricken countenance.

“The resemblance is uncanny,” she said, almost too softly for him to hear. Then she smiled at him, and Harry couldn’t think of last time he had seen a smile so sad or so genuine. “Welcome to Hogwarts, Harry.”

He blinked owlshly at her. No adult had called him Harry since his parent’s death. He had always been ‘Harold’ or ‘Mr. Potter’ or bloody ‘Heinrich’. Could she know him? That would be impossible, of course. She was a witch and wouldn’t have known his muggle parents, and he didn’t think she was the type to who would ever go visit little art studios in Cologne in any event. It was just coincidence and rather undue familiarity. Nothing more.

“Thank you, professor,” he replied politely.

“You may go, Madam McLaury. I will handle things from here. You will have your paperwork by Wednesday evening at the latest.”

Once again, Miss Marilyn looked flustered, apparently not used to being dismissed so readily. McGonagall took no notice, and with a gentle touch on Harry’s shoulder, she began leading him down towards the little cottage. As they walked, the professor seemed to recollect herself and began to lecture him.

“Mr. Potter, as you probably overheard, I am Professor Minerva McGonagall, Head of Gryffindor and your soon-to-be transfiguration’s teacher. After today, you probably won’t see me until the start of term. Most of the Hogwarts staff is either away enjoying their vacation or busy re-warding the school or making lesson’s plans in preparation for the start of term. As such, the school itself is off-limits to the public, that includes you, until September.”

“But...where will I be living? And where are the summer classes held, then?”

“You will be living with Mr. and , our resident ground keepers. They are both very busy year around, so if they should ask you for some assistance keeping house or on the grounds, I expect you to mind them as you would your own parents, is that understood?”

“Yes, ma’am.”

“Good. We will get you settled first, then I will take you to where your summer lessons will be held. Ah, here we are. Mr. Sleuw! Mrs. Sleuw!”

Up close the pair looked even more ridiculously disproportionate than before. Mr. Sleuw was a good six and a half feet, sun-darkened, and almost handsome except that his expression was slack and bland. His wife on the other hand barely reached his navel, had wild honey colored curls, and bounced about like a filly in spring. They were both tending the garden, but dropped what they were doing when McGonagall called them over.

“Oy, now. Is this the lad, then? A strapping young man, tish’t he, although a wee bit thin. Don’t you think so Bert?” Mrs. Sleuw gushed, smiling from ear to ear at him. Harry blushed and made a thorough study of his shoes.

“Uhhnnn...” Mr. Sleuw replied, expression as dead as his response.

“Yes, yes, Maggie. His name is Harold James Potter. You can all get better acquainted after his morning classes. Is his room ready?” McGonagall asked.

“Of course, just leave his things there and hurry along. We wouldn’t want him late for his first day of class, now would we?”

“No, we wouldn’t want that.”

McGonagall lead him to the little cottage, and opened the door for him. Harry walked in and his jaw dropped. From the outside the cottage didn’t look like could hold more than a small kitchen and an even smaller bedroom, but the inside was a different matter altogether. The interior was the size of a large farm house, with a full sized kitchen, sitting area, dining room, and a set of stairs leading up to a second floor that could not possible have been there. It was all very cozy and rustic, with hand made quilts over the sofa’s and chairs, rough wooden furniture, and dried flower decorations scattered about.

They went upstairs and entered one of four rooms there. It was clearly a guest bedroom, and only sparsely furnished. The brass framed bed had a light blue and yellow quilt, the wardrobe matched although the paint was starting to peel, and blue table with an oil lamp stood in the corner. A quick peek out the window revealed the Mr. Sleuw pulling up a particularly tenacious weed and confirmed to Harry he had not been transported through one of those magic portals.

“Do you have your trunk, Mr. Potter?” asked McGonagall. Harry nodded and removed it from his pocket. He set it at the foot of the bed, and with a flick of her wand the trunk resized itself. “Gather up your notebook and pen, Mr. Potter. You can unpack the rest of it after class.”

He did as he was told, and they left the little cottage. Harry did a double take once they were outside, still baffled by the dimensional disparity. They headed back towards the castle, but instead of returning the way they came, she lead him around the back. The castle turned out to have been built partially in the lake, but a tunnel and bridge allowed them to pass without resorting to a boat. Once on the other side, Harry could see a large tent had been set up, similar to those he and his parents had dined in during German festivals or weddings. His guide stopped him just outside the tent.

She pulled two books, one dark red and the other black, literally out of thin air and handed them to him.

“These are your textbooks. Lessons will be held here, Monday through Saturday at 8:30 am til 11:30 am. You may return to the house for lunch or eat with your classmates in the classroom. Classes resume at 12:30 pm and continue until 2:30. You may remain in study period until 4:00pm, during which time your professor will be available for questions. After that you will be expected to return to the house immediately, and under no conditions are you to ever wander into forest without Mr. or Mrs. Sleuw. Again, stay out of the castle. You are not permitted to swim, fish, or boat in the lake without an adult present, but I’m sure if you help the Sleuws with their chores they might spare some time to take you. Do you have any questions?”

Harry gave her a weak smile. “Only a million and one.”

She smiled back at him, her expression softening considerably. "Don't worry Mr. Potter, that's what these summer lessons are for. Now, I have to go talk to the professor about your sudden admittance before class starts, so why don't you go in and find a seat? Class is going to start in five minutes."

He nodded to her, and taking a deep breath he entered the tent, prepared to start his first day as a wizard-in-training.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McGonagal left Harry Potter feeling shaken. It had been many years since her self control had been tested so strongly. But to see him... to see the ghost of two dear friends made singular and whole in one frail, nervous little boy...

She didn't know if she wanted to weep or sing.

The entire situation seemed so utterly right and so utterly wrong. Lily and James' son at Hogwarts? Perfectly natural. Lily and James' son right under Voldemort's nose? She'd sooner see Snape cuddle a werewolf. Of course, Snape cuddling a werewolf wouldn't necessarily have been a bad thing to see in her opinion...

But by Merlin, how had Harry ended up here?

The Gryffindor professor took a brief detour on her way to the Headmistress's office to look through the papers she had been given. Lestrage wouldn't miss them for few hours. She probably wouldn't have missed them for a few days.

She considered holding onto the file for awhile yet, but when Snape's name came up as Harry's sponsor she quickly thought better of it. If that man knew Harry was coming, had actually sent him, than he doubtlessly be double checking or even triple checking his own reports. Since Lestrage had one up-ed him into becoming Headmistress, he'd been obsessive about crossing every 't' and doting every 'i'.

Lestrangle was exactly the opposite. Since her promotion, she'd been increasingly lackadaisical in her duties. Although her sense of competition with Snape had hardly dimmed. If the crazy hag didn't manage to off the other man or humiliate him completely in Voldemort's eyes, than she doubted she'd be calling Lestrangle 'Headmistress' for long. As much as she despised Snape at times, she despised Lestrangle even more and at all times.

Merlin's beard, she hoped she could keep her Gryffindors out of that mess. Both Slytherins were notorious for taking their frustrations out on her house, for which she had little defense. They were favored by the Dark Lord, and she, well, wasn't. Sure he had let her remain on as Gryffindor's head of house without persecution for supporting Dumbledore during the war, but that had been a political maneuvering in her favor. The students and parents were familiar with her, trusted her, and her no-nonsense demeanor lead most to respect her. She had been spared, not out of kindness, but to grease the wheels for the new regime.

And that's how it all made her feel.

Greasy.

But if she could protect the children, ones like Harry who had no one left to protect them, to fight for them, to face this degradation for them... She could live with being a little greasy.

With a quick glance around the hallway, she ducked into a little nook and began to read.

Chapter 7- The Prince's Lady

Once inside the school tent, Harry was once again introduced to the same wizarding trick that had been done on the Sleuw's cottage. Although the tent's yellow cloth walls remained, they were lined with a series of shuttered windows that remained open to allow in light and fresh air. The floor was not grass or dirt, but wood and tables were arranged three by five with a mobile chalk board and a teacher's desk stationed at the front. At the very back of the class were three large book shelves packed with books.

Most importantly, the room was filled with students. Like him, they all wore their black student robes, but that was where the similarities ended. Where Harry was little more than an orphan, these children were obviously from good families. They all had an air of health and confidence about them, and mingled with each other in a sort of familiarity Harry envied. It seemed impossible to him that they could be muggleborns, ever questioned the strange nature of their world, or walked the halls of WYRA headquarters. They huddled about in small groups, playing games with small magical objects or showing off some magical nic-nac they had gotten for their birthday or with their allowance money. It seemed so unfair that they should have gotten such a large head start on him. Bloody hell, why couldn't he have cursed Dudley when he was eight?

Realizing he was just standing at the door stupidly, and people were beginning to notice, he searched the room for a place to sit. He spotted a single empty seat at the front left corner nearest the board, right next to girl absorbed in an impressive looking tome.

"Is this seat taken?"

The girl, rather pretty with wavy auburn hair held back with a french braid, looked up at him as if startled. She looked around the room, and seeing it quite full, she turned back to him.

"Help yourself," she said dismissively. He took the empty seat, setting his notebook and pencil down. He caught her looking curiously at his supplies, and felt embarrassed when he noticed her much nicer leather bound notebook and calligraphy pen. "I haven't seen a notebook like that since I left WYRA,” she said, regarding him with a bit more interest and then introduced herself. “I am Hermione Granger of the Malfoy family, by the way.”

“Harry Potter. Nice to meet you,” he said, shaking her hand. Again she looked at him curiously, and then much to his despair she closed her book in favor of studying him.

“Have you gotten your wand yet, Potter?” she asked.

“Hm? No, not yet. I don’t turn eleven until August 1st. Have you?”

“No. I turned eleven last April but my foster father won’t let me get one until just before term starts. I wouldn’t be allowed to use it yet anyway, of course, but I can’t wait. I’ve been reading up on so many spells, and it’s so hard not to be able to try them out. I’ve got an entire notebook just filled with spells I’m going to try once term starts. What about you? Do you have any spells you’d like to try?”

Harry shifted uncomfortably under her intense scrutiny. Now here was a witch who knew what she was doing. She already had lists of spells at her disposal. How could he even begin to think he was ready for this?

“Er... I dunno... I haven’t exactly seen a lot of magics really. I’d like to learn that trick where you can get from one place to another just by passing through a door or a clock or tunnel or something.”

For a moment, he thought she was going to start asking him more questions about himself, but then her expression became vaguely dreamy.

“I believe that’s called ‘warping’, and I don’t think they teach that until seventh year... although you could look it up on your own, you know? Hogwarts has one of the finest libraries in Britain. They’ve got books up there that date back to the Founders. I heard there are even plans to add an extra wing for the extremely rare books and then another wing for experimental spells. Can you imagine-”

Her little lecture was interrupted by the loud, mocking snores of a black-haired boy sitting next to them. The others sitting around him broke up into laughter, and the 'sleeping' boy opened a greenish-blue eye and grinned over at them.

"Bloody hell, Granger, can you talk about anything other than books?"

"I don't know, Houghton. Can you say anything and not have people laugh at you?"

Everyone chuckled and 'ooohhed' at that, except for Harry who just wasn't sure enough of himself to join them. He was spared having to respond by the teacher walking through the door. He was a middle-aged man with barely any hair and coke-bottle glasses. He wore a magenta colored robe over his beige slacks and plaid sweater vest, and despite looking utterly ridiculous he held a dark scowl that rivaled Snape's. The only difference was this man didn't have a sense of humor, not even a sarcastic one.

"My name is Professor Timbal," he began without preamble, flicking his wand so that the chalk began writing his name. "I will be your professor until the start of term- September first. I will be preparing you for Entry Level Fundamentals or E.L.F. tests."

The board wrote the short hand of everything the professor said, and feeling nervous, Harry started writing it all down. It couldn't possibly hurt to remember the teacher's name or look up something later. He was vaguely surprised to see Hermione was taking notes as well.

"Should you fail your E.L.F. you will not be permitted to enter Hogwarts, and shall be held back a year or until you are capable of passing it, at which point you will be assigned to a trade school of my choosing. So if you don't want to spend the rest of your life making candles and polishing broomsticks I recommend you pay attention."

Yes, Harry thought, that was definitely a good motivation to pay attention. Inside, Harry despaired his future. How could he possibly keep up with the others in this class, when they all had at least three years more experience with the wizarding world than him?

“While some of you may think yourself already prepared for these tests, think again. As you are spontaneous wizards, you are held under a stigma of ignorance that must be dispelled before you ever enter the most prestigious academy of wizardry in Great Britain. Much of what you learn here is not even common knowledge for your pureblooded siblings or commonwealth adopted parents. If you wish not to make fools of yourself, and more importantly of your country, then I expect you to study. Alone, in groups, with your parents, tutors, and yes, even with me.”

Well... perhaps he was on more even ground than he thought? Glancing to his right he could see Thomas and his friends looking green. Glancing to his left he saw Hermione leaning forward in her chair, eagerly awaiting the man's every word. He wasn't sure whose reaction worried him more, but it all had him feeling vaguely ill.

“Now, for formality's sake, we will begin by introducing ourselves in the proper wizarding fashion. Who here can tell me the proper way to introduce yourself in a formal gathering?”

Hermione's hand shot up so fast, Harry flinched away on instinct to dodge it. Professor Timbal pointed at her and she stood.

“First one gives their birth name, followed by their family association, and then any formal positions starting from active government positions and leading down to honorary titles.”

“Correct. Now please introduce yourself to the class in the proper manner.”

Hermione turned sharply to face them all, her head held high and eyes defiant.

“Hermione Louise Granger of the Malfoy family.”

“Very good, now you young man,” the professor said, pointing to Harry. Harry blanched. What was he suppose to say? He knew his own name, but he didn't think he had a family association. What the hell was a family association? Reluctantly, he stood anyway and faced the class.

“Harold James Potter,” he said evenly, and then sat down quickly.

“Hey, he didn’t finish it!” protested a girl in the back.

“If Mr. Potter was somehow lacking in his answer, I assure you I would be the first to point it out!” Mr. Timbal snapped, and the chalk on the board flew across the board, creating an ear-splitting screech. The entire class cringed and fell into dead silence, and Harry thanked god that it was not his error that had brought it on. “Now, shall we continue. You, sir.”

The black haired boy stood up, looking almost as timid as Harry felt. “Clyde Houghton of the Stone family.” The next fifteen minutes went on similarly, until everyone had named themselves. Harry doodled a little diagram of their names, family associations, and basic description determined to memorize it later, perhaps even makes some sketches so he would remember them better. After that was through, Timbal handed out their work books. They were heavy, bound in brown leather with the title ‘The Ways of Wizards; Practical Exercises for Young Wizards’ by Antonia Majora’ printed in gold letters. This was followed by a syllabus and lecture on the general structure of the class.

Every morning would start out with a quiz of what was learned the day before, this would be followed by lecture, and practical demonstrations if necessary. They would break for lunch, and then return in groups of threes, fours, or fives to research the topic of the day and write a brief summary of their findings. The last part of the day would be dedicated to group discussion and off-topic questions. Fridays were for tests and reviews and Saturdays were for field trips- of which there would apparently be many.

Through it all Harry felt a mixture of trepidation and elation. He was becoming a wizard, a wizard for love of king and country! If only he had any idea what that meant!

Their first topic of study was wizarding government, which was of personal interest to Harry since he wanted to know more about WYRA and who exactly ran wizarding Britain. Unfortunately,

Professor Timbal had only just begun on the history of the Wizengamot when it was time to break for lunch. The Professor instructed everyone to push their chairs together to form a single long table. Harry and the rest had no sooner tucked in their chairs when their giant table was suddenly laden with food that appeared out of thin air.

“Why can’t they warn us before they do this sort of thing?” Harry lamented quietly to himself. Lunch with his class was similar and yet different than that at WYRA. Everyone was certainly lively and chatty as they filled their plates, but their topics of discussions were more real. The jokes were dirtier or more clever, the emotions varied between ecstatic and deeply depressed, and they spoke of their past, their families, and their future plans in ways the WYRA children had been unable to.

“I know most of the people here,” began Clyde who had sat across from him, loading up his plate with more sweets than nourishment. “Or at least recognize their family associations. But I don’t recognize you... and you didn’t have a family association, which is a bit odd, eh? So what’s your story?”

At this several of the other kids, including Hermione who pretended (rather badly) not to care, leaned closer for his answer. Harry shrugged, and tried to ignore them.

“I was never adopted. I don’t have a family association... That’s the family that adopts you right?”

“What do you mean you weren’t adopted? Everyone gets adopted eventually,” Clyde protested. “Did you get sick or something?”

“Clyde Houghton, really!” Hermione objected. “Could you be anymore rude?”

“Oh, like Ms. Know-it-all isn’t dying to know it all too!” remarked a blonde girl, smirking. Harry hoped they would start a fight and he would be forgotten, but he had no such luck. “So what’s the deal? Sickness, runaway, reject? Come on, we’ll find out sooner or later.”

Harry threw her a dark scowl. "Weißt du was, du Wichtigtuer. Ob ich adoptiert bin oder nicht, geht dich einen Scheißdreck an."

The blond looked at him with some alarm. "Did you just put a curse on me?"

Hermione broke out into a laugh, covering her mouth with her napkin as if it could possibly hide her amusement. "It's German, Natalie. I thought he had a little bit of an accent when he introduced himself."

"Oh, wow! A German wizard! How on earth did you get here?" asked Clyde.

"How can he be German with a name like Harry Potter? It's obviously an English name," griped Natalie.

"I'm an English citizen, but I was raised in Germany until I was eight," Harry said finally, realizing things could get out of hand if he didn't offer some answers. "I was only picked up by WYRA about a month ago."

"You're kidding? Your that green and they still had you sent to Hogwarts? How did you pull that off?"

Harry shrugged and tried to focus on his sandwich.

"Aw come on, fess up Potter. Inquiring minds want to know!"

"Will you all just leave him alone?" snapped Hermione. "Isn't it obvious he doesn't want to talk about it?" Reluctantly, the rest of class backed off and went to talking other things, all though they glanced at him often. Harry gave her a thankful smile.

"You know, I think sitting next to you was a stroke of good luck on my part?" he said. The smile Hermione gave him was bright and beautiful, and so much different from the cool curve of lips she had been wearing before. It was gone a moment later, replaced by a neutral expression and she nodded to him in acknowledgment and returned to her own meal.

Harry finished before the others and left the tent to get some fresh air, taking his new school books with him. He found a quiet spot beside the lake, only a short ways from the classroom. He spent the lunch hour skimming his books for answers to his thousand and one questions. Though the new books were much more detailed and informative than his first one, Harry still felt like he was missing a large piece of common knowledge that prevented him from truly understanding what the wizarding world was like. Frustrated, Harry returned to the class without any definitive answers.

The tables had all been moved back into place and people were already starting to form into clusters for their group assignment. Harry automatically went to stand by Hermione who once again had her nose buried in her book. Natalie, who had been at the far end of the class to begin with, moved all the way to the front to join them. The same sly smile was still on her face, and Harry couldn't help but suspect she was up to no good.

"Mind if I join you?" she asked. Hermione stiffened beside him, but did not look up from her book. Harry, having no real reason to object, merely shrugged.

"Get into six groups of four and two groups of three!" Professor Timbal ordered. It took less than a minute as most groups were already formed, and Harry, Hermione, and Natalie remained where they were. "Most of you come from families with members in the Wizengamot. I want you all to look up one person of your family in the Wizengamot, find their term of office, any laws or bills they proposed, and cite the source of your information. If you or one of your group members doesn't have an associated family member in the Wizengamot, you will look up a law that was passed by the Wizengamot but overturned by You-Know-Who. You have an hour and a half. Begin."

"I'll get the books," Hermione said, jumping to her feet and heading for the book case.

"I'll help." Harry got up to follow, but was stopped when Natalie took his elbow.

“Why don’t you let her be? Let her be alone with her books. That’s all she cares about anyway.”

Harry removed her hand from his arm and frowned at her. “Don’t be spiteful.”

Natalie’s eyes grew wide, and Harry stalked away from her to help Hermione who already struggling with two large tomes. He took the books from her so she could continue her search.

“I’m surprised you didn’t stay to talk with Natalie,” Hermione remarked. “She’s the prettiest girl in class, you know.” Harry shrugged.

“Her personality is kind of ugly though,” he said, recalling her callous disregard for other’s feelings, his and Hermione’s both. Hermione smiled a bit at him.

“And I’m so much better?”

“You’re nice enough, I think. It’s not like you’re ugly either. I mean, not that I would care if you were! But you’re not, so you shouldn’t think that way about yourself! Not that you were, but you know- Er...Nevermind!”

She smiled and rolled her eyes at him. Harry shifted from foot to foot, growing tired for holding the heavy books.

“So who was he talking about when he said ‘You-Know-Who’? Because, frankly, I don’t know who.”

“Oh! Him. I don’t suppose they would have mentioned him at WYRA, would they? Well, he’s...” Hermione took a look around the class and once determining no one was standing too close to them, she leaned over to talk softly in his ear. “He’s the dictator of Wizarding Britain. His name is Voldemort, but everyone calls him ‘You-Know-Who’.”

“If everyone calls him ‘You-Know-Who’, then how does anyone know his name?”

“When ever he passes a new law or a issues a personal statements, he always signs with his name and the government documents all use his name. My foster father works in the Court directly under him, so I’ve seen him a couple times. Everyone calls him Lord Voldemort when they address him personally.”

“Wow, so your family knows the ruler of the wizarding world? What’s he like?”

Hermione paused in her collection of books, her expression thoughtful.

“He’s... amazing, really. Scary, terrifying... but fascinating. You know he’s almost sixty and doesn’t look a day over twenty-five? Handsome enough, medium height, black hair. His eyes are red, bright red and I’ve heard they glow when he’s angry. I’ve also heard you can see fangs when he smiles, but I’m not sure I believe it. And he’s a parselmouth, so he always seems to be in the company of snakes. His familiar is a giant cobra named Nagini.”

Harry shivered at the description she gave, barley able to believe that such a person could possibly exist. He sounded more like the devil in human form than any of the wizards he had seen before.

“What’s a parselmouth?” he asked, despite himself.

“It means he can talk to snakes and understand them. It’s a really rare talent and only people said to be descended from Salazar Slytherin, the first parselmouth, are said to be able to do it. He’s the only person who is capable of it in the world at the moment.”

They made their way back to their table, where Natalie was lounging and looking rather peeved. “Did you two have fun? You looked like you were getting awfully cozy with each other.”

“We were having a blast. You really should have joined us,” Hermione quipped, handing her particularly heavy book. Grimacing under the weight of the book, Natalie, nevertheless opened it and began searching for her family name. Harry accepted a much newer book on wizarding law and began picking through it. For almost an hour they worked together, exchanging books occasionally and pointing out pieces of information relevant to the others. By the time Professor Timbal started collect their papers, Natalie had found a great uncle Thadeus Phelps, who had proposed legalizing blood prostitution for vampires. Hermione had found six Malfoys, all with particularly radical legislative ideas regarding muggles and muggleborns.

Harry had found out that wizards had mingled with muggles before Voldemort's regime, but that had been one of the first things the wizard had outlawed when he came to power a mere ten years ago. It was a piece of information he felt was the key to everything he had seen and experienced up until that moment. It explained why he had been kidnaped, why muggleborns weren't allowed to stay were their families, and why Snape had warned him about the wizarding world being a dangerous place.

Hermione finished her part of the essay within only a few minutes, but kept herself busy by leafing through her book.

"Potter."

Harry turned to Hermione, who had whispered very softly and was pretending she hadn't. She pulled the tome she had been looking through discretely in her lap, glanced at Natalie to make sure she hadn't noticed, and pointed to a section of her book. Scanning the small writing, something about acknowledging the territorial rights of centaurs, he couldn't figure out what she was expecting him to see when his own name appeared suddenly before him. He glanced around, making sure no one else was watching them, and pulled the book into his lap to get a better look.

After the death of his father-in-law, Andreas Maximilian Hartwell, Harold Jeremy Potter, inherited the additional votes necessary to overturn the new clause to the Sentient Magical Creature's Rights and Responsibilities doctrine. He went on to oppose three other similar amendments, maintaining the rights of woodland elves, centaurs, and other sentient creatures to refuse leasing or selling their land to wizarding folk or from paying property taxes to wizarding government. His family carried on his legacy three more generations until the rise of Grindlewald made it necessary for the Ministry of Magic to find additional sources of taxes to pay for increased national defense. Whether the action of the former Ministry of Magic was entirely legal is still debated, but has yet to be overturned...

Harry blinked. He reread the paragraph. He read before the paragraph. He read after it. The name didn't appear a second time, but it didn't disappear either.

There was a Potter on the Wizengamot, or at least had been. A Potter with the same first name as his. Could it possibly be coincidence?

He turned to Hermione, hoping for some sort of explanation, hoping she wouldn't think him crazy for thinking what he was. She leapt far ahead of him from crazy into sheer genius.

"You know, Harry. A lot of wizarding families fled to Europe during the war."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. You know, you are a snob? My adoption or lack of adoption is none of your damn business.

Author's note: Yes, Harry finally learns his parents were wizards, maybe, sort of, assumes so! He'll learn more as he goes along. And so will you all. Sit back and enjoy.

Chapter 8: Lords, Ladies, and Lessons

Harry's first summer as a wizard was an introduction in how magic could make even the mundane exciting. Living with the Sleuw's was nothing like living with the Dursley's. For one, they were actually pretty nice. For another, they were odd. Mr. Sleuw, who had not formed a single word in the entire time Harry was in his company, turned out to be something of a gentle, albeit dim, giant. He took all his instructions from Mrs. Sleuw, who while bubbly and energetic, wasn't that bright either. She was always forgetting what they needed to do that day, or where she left their wands, or if it was the right time of year to start planting a particular plant. Yet somehow they filled their days with endless toil, and dragged Harry into it whenever they could.

He didn't mind so much. The work was hard and often dirty, but unlike with the Dursley's, he always had proper tools, food, rest, and instruction to get the task done. And, like McGonagall had said, when he worked hard enough he spared up enough of their time that they would take him down to the lake or into Hogsmeade. He could not say whether or not they felt any fondness for him, but they certainly gave him a level of respect and consideration, which he was grateful for.

Professor Timbal, while a very strict man, was also very knowledgeable and never begrudged a question as long as you waited to be called on. Woe to those who spoke out of turn, however. Detentions were spent clapping chalk dust out of erasers for an entire hour

Classes were not as bad as he thought they would be either. There was certainly a lot of material covered and there always seemed to be more they didn't have time to get into, but with Hermione there to patiently fill in the details to matters that confused him, he felt on par with most of the class and scored fairly well on all his quizzes. He paired with Hermione on most days, and while the vast sum of her knowledge and long convoluted lectures were a bit irritating occasionally, she was a good study partner and generally patient with him. Natalie, who tended to group with them once or twice a week was a bit less reliable. Some days she was perfectly sweet tempered and helpful, and other days she was a spoiled brat. On all days she seemed intent on distracting Harry from working with Hermione. Dean Thomas, who grouped with them when a subject particularly baffled him (and thus required Hermione's expertise), would tease Harry for being a 'player'. Harry was more convinced that Hermione simply liked having someone actually listen to her lectures and Natalie just wanted to use him to annoy Hermione.

That they both happened to be the prettiest girls in the class was entirely beside the point.

Perhaps the hardest lesson Harry had to learn was one Hermione could not help him with. Apparently, it was still standard practice to use a quill and ink rather than a pen or pencil. Harry struggled time and again to keep from dripping ink all over the place and smudging his fingers. He wasn't the only one either. Everyone except for Hermione usually had charmed quills that didn't drip and to suddenly be without said charms was proving a bit of a frustration. Gradually, Harry got better at it, but was dismayed how much his handwriting suffered.

As the class became more comfortable together, lunch time grew shorter and play time grew longer. Harry and the other boys enjoyed short games of Ground Quidditch, which was similar to regular Quidditch except there were no brooms, the balls always traveled four feet above the ground, and the bludgers were a lot softer. Harry had a knack for the Seeker position and was often the first picked for a team. When it rained they would break out checkerboards and card sets, some of them already magicked to perform little tricks. Hermione would just roll her eyes at their antics and return to her book, while the other girls stood off to the side cheering them on or gossiping with each other.

By far the best part of his lessons were the field trips on Saturdays. They seemed to go everywhere, from court houses and museums, to workshops and sporting events, and even to a wildlife reserve for endangered magical creatures. Many of these places the others had already been too, but to Harry it was all a wonderfully new and peculiar. It earned him a fair bit of teasing, but he didn't care.

Aside from that first day, there were no further discoveries regarding any wizards or witches named Potter, but Hermione pointed out that there really weren't that many books in their pseudo-library and once term started they could make more definitive search. Harry was torn between longing and dread at the thought that he had wizards in his family. What if his father had been a squib and he'd been cast out of the family? If there were still a wizarding family of Potters would they one day learn of him and try and claim him as their own? What they be like? Like his father? Brave, playful, a bit immature at times? Would they be like the Dursleys? Arrogant, selfish, and prejudice? Had they aligned with Voldemort or killed during the war?

Sometimes he would stay up at night thinking about, a network of different paths leading down paths to different futures, too many to calculate. And sometimes it all seemed so trivial. Harry Potter was Harry Potter, and he was a wizard. The past couldn't change it, and the present didn't want to. .

He was enjoying himself so much that when August 1st arrived, he had completely overlooked the fact that he was now eleven. Hermione, however, proved once again she had a mind like a steel trap and presented him a small, neatly wrapped package during lunch.

"Happy Birthday, Harry," she said, placing her gift beside his sandwich.

Harry blinked at her owlishly. "I completely forgot. How could I have forgotten that? Wait, how on earth did you know today was my birthday?"

"You told me the first day we met, remember? When I asked if you had your wand yet you said you didn't because you wouldn't be eleven until the first of August."

"Yikes...no, I don't remember it all. I think the discussion about Voldemort kinda shoved the rest of it aside."

There was a loud clanking of dropped silverware and several students turned dark glares at him. "Potter! Don't say his name so nonchalantly!" snapped one of Thomas' friends.

Harry just shrugged and muttered a sorry, then turned back to Hermione.

“You didn’t have to get me anything, Hermione. I mean, we haven’t known each other that long and all.”

“If I had known you thirty years I would not have had to get you anything either. Just open it.”

Timidly, he followed her instruction. It turned out to be a gold plated pocket watch with the Hogwarts emblem on the exterior. He opened it, and inside was engraved ‘To Harry, Hope this keeps you on time and on track. Hermione.’

“Hermione, this is much too nice for me to accept!”

She merely waved off his concerns. “Don’t concern yourself with that. It’s just a transfigured stopwatch. My adoptive mother, Narcissa, helped me make it. It’s charmed to grow warm if you start running late for something.”

He smiled at her shyly, still rather awed by the gift. He hadn’t been expecting anything, and despite her dismissive attitude it was a beautiful gift. As he stared at it a sudden memory came to him. Years ago when he was only five or six, he had been sitting in the living room as his parents got ready to go out for the evening. He remembered his father standing in the hall, dressed in a tux and holding a gold pocket watch as he told his mother to hurry up. She had come rushing down the stairs in her high heels and red dress, her hair up in cascading red curls. His father had smiled at her wryly, showing her the time, and she had grabbed his arm and rushed him towards the door, kissing Harry goodbye as she went.

Feeling his eyes suddenly damp, he quickly got up and left the table, heading for the privacy outside. He was three steps out the door before Hermione caught up with.

“Harry, what is it? Did I do something wrong?”

“What? No! No, of course not.” Harry turned away from her a moment to dry his eyes and try to calm himself. He felt a fool for getting all weepy over something that wasn’t even sad. Not really.

“Harry, please talk to me. I promise I won’t tell anyone else, but please tell me what’s upset you?” she pleaded.

“It’s not you. Really, it’s silly. It’s just... while I was looking at the watch, I suddenly remembered my father had a watch like this. I mean, not like this watch, but you know, a gold pocket watch,” he began, and inexplicably his gaze found its way to bearer of his memories, the gold Hogwarts seal gleaming in the sunlight. “I remembered how he used to carry it around, and my mom never wore a watch so she was always asking him for the time or pulling it out of his pocket herself. It’s merely old memories. They just caught me off guard is all.”

When he looked up, Hermione was looking at him with such a sad look.

“I must be nice,” she said, “... to remember something like that about your parents.”

“Don’t you remember your parents?” As soon as he asked it, he regretted it. He knew the answer already. He knew she could not possibly remember them the way he remembered his. No child of WYRA could possibly have left with the memory of their muggle life intact.

“I remember one or two things. I remember they were both dentists. I remember that my room was blue and there were white lace curtains on my window. But I can’t remember what my life was like back then anymore. I don’t know if I have my mother’s or my father’s eyes, or how they sounded when they laughed, or if I had any siblings or not. I don’t remember much of anything. I was five when they took me away, but you’d think I would remember something more than curtains.”

They stood there silently, sharing something unspoken, an understanding Harry was afraid no one would ever share with him again. She was like him. She might not have remembered her parents or her life from before, but she felt the loss. WYRA and memory spells and time hadn't stolen that primeval instinct that desired the connection of kin. They may have both hid their grief from the world, but it was clear as day to each other in this moment.

It was a startling realization, that she was now his very best friend.

She was his only real friend.

And he had to give her gift as well, even if it hurt her to accept it.

"It's not your fault," he said, "WYRA...they put spells on our beds to make us forget. They took our lives from us, Hermione. In more ways than one."

Her eyes widen, suddenly shiney and wet.

"How do you know-"

"Snape. He mentioned it the day before I was brought here, but I suspected it before then. There was a little boy who came in about a week after I arrived. He kicked up such a fuss all day, but when he woke up the next morning he was... different. Like he had never lived another life or had family before. I never slept in my bed after that. I've probably lost some memories because of the week I did, but I like to think they're ones that involved the Dursley's."

"The Dursley's?"

"My relatives. They looked after me...er, let me live with them... after my parents died."

Hermione let out a little gasp.

"I'm sorry, Harry, I didn't know. That's why you came back from Germany, isn't it?"

Harry shrugged it off. Hermione paced back and forth, a habit she often adopted when puzzling through unexpected information.

"I wondered sometimes," she said, "If something hadn't been done to me... but then I just dismissed it as me making excuses for myself. I can't believe it. That they would... It's awful. It's immoral."

"It's the world Voldemort made for us," Harry said bitterly.

"Harry! Be careful what you say!"

"I'm tired of being careful of what I bloody say!"

"For both our sakes, be careful what you say!"

That shut him up fast, and he gave her a pained, apologetic look. Harry looked off towards the lake and wondered where his treasonous thought had come from. Certainly, he couldn't remember entertaining it before, at least not with any feeling behind it. Yet now that he said it, it rang with a certain truth. How badly had Voldemort damaged wizarding society? How many families had it destroyed and lives it ended? Finally, Hermione, who had been pacing again turned back to him.

"We should go back. Natalie has probably started all sorts of gossip already."

Harry nodded and quietly followed her back. There was some initial teasing when they entered the tent, but it quickly died off under their somber demeanor. The rest of the day was spent in quiet retrospect. Hermione lost in thoughts of the parents she couldn't remember, and Harry pondering how it could possibly be made right again.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Hermione returned home an hour earlier than usual. Normally, she would stay at the school until four, studying or talking with Harry or both. Today, however, neither had felt like company or studying the trade ban with Europe and the U.S. So now she found herself portkeyed to the back of the Malfoy estate just in time to see her adoptive brother Draco fall off his broom.

“Bloody sonofa-”

“Language, brother-dear,” she chided from across the lawn. Draco looked up, clearly surprised to see her there, and then grinned. He brushed himself off and made his way over to her.

“Well isn’t this a surprise,” he said, hugging her by way of greeting. She returned the affection, a bit longer and harder than usual. He pulled back and studied her more closely. “Are you alright? Did that boyfriend of yours do something mean to you? If he did, I swear I’ll curse him til Christmas when I see him next.”

She smiled and rolled her eyes over his protectiveness.

“Draco, you know as well as I do, that Harry Potter is not my boyfriend and I am not interested in making him my boyfriend. And no, he didn’t do anything mean.”

“Then what’s the matter? He didn’t like your gift?”

“No, he loved the gift,” she assured him, then let out a sigh. “It just brought up some unexpected issues.”

Draco quirked an eyebrow at her. “You’re eleven, Hermione. How many issues could you have?”

“Apparently, one pretty big one.”

“Hey,” he said, drawing her out of her depressing cycle of thoughts. “Whose your brother?”

She smiled a bit. “Draco Narcissus Malfoy.”

“And whose the most clever, most wicked, and most influential family in all of Britain?”

“The Malfoy family,” she said, dutifully.

“So who could possibly hurt the favorite little sister of the heir of the Malfoy family?”

“Absolutely no one,” they said together in unison.

“See now,” Draco said, “Don’t you feel better?”

Despite the fact that his little proclamation resolved absolutely nothing, she did feel better. Her parents and any siblings she may have had in her muggle life were lost to her, and she to them. But she had Draco. Her arrogant, devious, charming, over-protective brother. He had never made her feel like anything less than a magical princess.

“Yes, I do feel better,” she said, “In fact, I feel so much better I want to go swimming.”

“Now you’re talking.” Draco grinned at her victoriously, reaffirmed in his own perceived perfection as an older (by two months) brother. He took her hand, as he always had since she had first arrived on the Malfoy estates and been too timid to go anywhere outside of her room alone, and led her home.

Chapter 9: The First Quest

"I think I did alright, but there was that one question about the Founders. Perhaps I should have written a little more on Slytherin, rather than Gryffindor. I mean there wasn't a lot of space left, but I could have fit in a sentence or two about his-"

"Hermione, give it a rest!" lamented Clyde. "You did fine. I'd bet my wand you did the best in the class. So just stop!"

Harry nodded in agreement. While he had been stressing the last two weeks as much as she had been, once it was all over he was feeling much more confident. The questions had been fairly basic, considering all the research and reading they had done, and he wasn't absolutely dreading his future.

"Sorry," she said, "It's just-"

"Important that we get into Hogwarts-" Clyde continued.

"So that we can prove we are real wizards-" Natalie muttered.

"Despite our muggle heritage," finished Harry. "We know Hermione."

"Sorry."

They were spared further worrying by Professor Timbal stalking into the classroom, tossing down envelopes with their names on them.

"These are your test scores. You will open them at home. For those of you who may have failed, I don't want to witness the utter defeat of your self-worth. It's usually a big, loud mess and the rest of us still have more important things to do," he stated coldly. Reluctantly, they all set their letters aside, although they drew many longing and dreading stares.

It was Friday and normally they would have a test, but since they had already taken the most important test of the summer and the start of term was next week, their lesson plan took another route. Instead, Mr. Timbal went ahead and outlined the final field trip on Saturday.

"You will arrive here at the usual time, with your permissions slips in hand as usual. You should have on you at least forty galleons to purchase your wand and other school supplies, but I recommend ten or twenty more just in case."

The class broke out into excited murmurings, but their professors dark look quickly silenced them all.

"You will be divided into five groups, and escorted by a Hogwarts professor via floo to each shop. I recommend being on your best behavior, as this will give your future teachers their first impression of you. And no wandering off! These are Hogwarts professors, so they can and will assign you real detentions even before term starts if you make yourself a nuisance. Afterwards, you will all return here. You may do what ever you want after that. Any questions?"

Harry reluctantly raised his hand, but didn't need to speak a word before Professor Timbal pre-empted him.

"You are a ward of the school, Mr. Potter. Unless the headmistress, and later your head of house, forbids it, you automatically have permission to attend school related programs. You are also given a generous line of credit through the school to pay for your supplies and personal affects, but you will be expected to pay it off within ten years after you graduate. Does that answer your question?"

"Yes, sir. Thank you, sir."

"Any other questions? Then we are done here."

With that, Professor Timbal disappeared through the door. All of the students turned to one another, rather perplexed. No one got a chance to speak the questions they were all thinking when all of sudden their classroom disappeared. Everyone was suddenly on the dusty ground, staring up at the clear summer sky. Groaning, they all climbed to their feet.

"Rude, much?" griped Natalie, brushing herself off.

Everyone grumbled their agreement, even Hermione who was notorious for being over generous with teachers. Of course, her inkwell had landed all over her. As everyone began to recollect themselves, many of them started to take notice of their letters, scattered about. Several of them started opening their letters right away, Harry included.

"You know you're not suppose to open that yet, don't you Harry?" Hermion said.

"No, he said we weren't to open them until we got home. Technically, the school is my home so..." Grinning he opened his envelope and pulled three pieces of paper out. The first piece was his E.L.F. score. "Huh, I got an excellent. Oh wait, there's a note at the bottom."

Harry read it to himself and let out a rueful laugh, handing it off to Hermione who read it and gave him an equally rueful expression. "'You would have gotten an 'Outstanding' if your handwriting wasn't so atrocious. Keep practicing'? Harry."

"It's not my fault I don't have enough practice with a quill," Harry pointed out. "Open yours. I want to see if they gave you a little note."

Despite her earlier protests, Hermione opened hers eagerly. She scanned it smiling at first, then frowning as she reached the bottom of the page. Harry leaned over to read the note at the bottom of hers.

"'You are a wealth of information, and I am certain you will do well at Hogwarts. However, please learn to write more concisely.' Yeah, that sounds about right."

She smacked him on the shoulder. "I was just being thorough!"

"Hermione, given unlimited paper space and time, you would turn a test question into a textbook," Natalie said, coming up to stand beside them.

"How did you do?" Harry asked. She smiled slyly at them.

"Outstanding, of course."

“Any comments?”

“‘It’s Salazar Slytherin, not Salazar Slyverian and Rowena Ravenclaw, not Rowanda Ravenclaw. Please learn to spell people’s names properly.’ Oops!” Harry laughed at that, and Hermione scowled, probably on the sheer principle of the thing. “What about you, Clyde? Destined for candle wax and broom straw?”

“I passed!” Clyde said, grinning broadly, showing off his ‘Average’.
“Barely, but I passed.”

“Clyde!” All three said in unison.

The other boy just grinned more broadly. “I’ll see you all tomorrow! I’m going to go celebrate!”

Gradually, they all departed, Harry making plans with the two girls to have a butterbeer at Hogsmeade after their shopping trip the next day.

Saturday morning arrived gloomy and overcast, but it did little to thwart Harry or his friend’s good moods. Everyone arrived early to their usual meeting place, now completely devoid of their classroom tent. They didn’t wear their students robes either. In fact, many of them were dressed particularly nice that day.

Natalie was looking a bit like a French princess in her white velvet dress and hair tied up in blue ribbons. Hermione, while more practically dressed in a lavender cotton sun dress, was looking equally elegant with her hair tied up in elaborate braids and held in place by an ornate silver and opal hair pin and matching bracelet. Harry and Clyde (both similarly dressed in nice slacks, button-up shirts, and vests) could only stand there and gape at how pretty all their female classmates had made themselves for some simple shopping.

“Egad, I forgot they were girls,” Clyde said, watching a girl dressed in a pink silk blouse black skirt pass by him with a wink and a smile.

“The robes kinda do that,” Harry said.

“Boys!” Hermione said, rolling her eyes. Natalie merely smirked and threw them both a kiss.

“Hey! The teachers are coming!”

They all turned towards the castle to see a group of five wizards and witches making their way towards them. Harry scowled as he recognized the distinct profile of Professor Snape, who lead the procession along with Professor McGonagal. The other professors he didn't recognize, and he was certain he would have remembered them if he had. One of them was a middle-aged gentleman in a pointed cap, who had so much trouble keeping his eyes open that Harry wasn't certain how he hadn't fallen on his face. Another was a very short elderly man with pointed ears, and Harry couldn't help but wonder if he wasn't a dwarf. The third was a woman so dark, she had an almost purplish hue, and walked with the grace of a stalking panther with the golden eyes to match. When the teachers had reached the cluster of students, McGonagal stepped forward to address them.

“I am Professor McGonagal, this is Professor Snape, Professor Flitwick, Professor Quirrel, and Professor Toure,” she said, pointing to each professor as she introduced them. “We will be escorting you all on this venture. We expect you all to behave yourselves like mature ladies and gentlemen, and any behavior that reflects badly on the school will be disciplined most harshly.”

There was a great deal of discomfort at her stern warning. She did not look like a woman to be crossed, nor did Snape or Toure. Harry crossed his fingers and hoped he got placed with either Quirrel or Flitwick, or at the very least not Snape.

“There are some simple rules we expect you to adhere to. First and foremost, do not wander out of sight of your escort. If you wish to go to a particular store or a back room, you must first ask their permission. There will be absolutely no fighting, stealing, or mischief. You will be held responsible for your own money, so be sure to keep it in a safe place on your person at all times and make sure you buy all your supplies before you spend it all on non-essential items.

Additionally, you are not permitted to purchase any pets. While Hogwarts does permit owls, rats, toads, non-venomous snakes, and cats, your parents will be the ultimate authority on whether or not you may have one. Now, as each professor calls your name, please gather into a line in front of them and then we can be on our way.”

With that, she pulled out a list from her pocket and began to read off names. Hermione went to stand with her, along with Clyde. Each teacher began calling on their intended wards, and as each teacher finished, Harry was filled with increasing dread as he stood, the last of four other students before the only teacher who hadn't bothered calling anyone. Snape sneered down at them, sparing the largest portion of his vitriol for Harry.

“If you know what's good for you, you will not make a sound through the entirety of this excursion. Is that clear?”

The other four nodded quickly, and Harry just glowered at him. Snape seemed to consider him a moment, debating if he should cause trouble for Harry's lack of response or not. He apparently decided against it, and turning about he stalked after the other departing professors towards Hogsmeade. From Hogsmead they took the floo (the very least favorite form of travel Harry had encountered by far) in the fire place of The Three Broomsticks, and exited in a bustling floo station. Without a word, Snape exited the station, and he and his group scrambled after him to keep up.

They first stopped at a potions supply store called Potions and Powders, where they were given ten minutes to gather their cauldrons, scales, dragon-hide gloves, crystal vials, and some basic potions ingredients. Harry just barely managed to collect his intended items. He was perpetually distracted by the many strange objects. Jars of preserved animal specimens, vials of strangely colored sands or dirt, a particularly vicious set of instruments.

They were then hurried to Banikey's Books. Again they were given a mere ten minutes to gather their supplies. Luckily, Harry ran into Hermione there, who merely handed him all of her supplies.

“At this rate, we’ll be done in less than an hour,” Harry said. “I was looking forward to looking around.”

“Yes, he is being a bit inconsiderate,” Hermione agreed. “He’s usually not this bad, but he never did like large crowds.”

“What?”

Hermione gave him a smirk. “Didn’t I tell you Professor Snape is my brother’s and my Godfather?”

“What?!”

“Potter! You have two minutes to purchase your supplies or your walking back to Hogwarts!”

Harry turned a disbelieving look towards the older man and then an even more disbelieving look towards Hermione. His thoughts whirling with the potential implications and sheer ludicrousness of the situation, he was barely aware when Hermione dragged him over to the register to purchase his items, and only came back to himself when Snape grabbed him by the collar and dragged him out the door.

“Get your hands off me!” Harry snarled, jerking out of the man’s hold, barely keeping his balance or hold on his supplies.

“Watch your tone, Potter,” Snape snarled right back. “I’ll tolerate none of your juvenile sass, is that understood?”

“Perfectly, Professor.” Although his tone was far from commiserating, the man let it go once again in favor of stalking off. With the man’s back turned, Harry rolled his eyes and jogged after him with the rest of his troupe. They passed several shops along the way, and Harry cast long glances at the strange items proudly displayed through the storefront windows. But Snape did not stop or slow his pace, and soon they were standing before a rather shabby and narrow little shop. The sign read ‘Ollivander’s: Maker of Fine Wands since 382 B.C.’.

Harry felt a sudden, giddy rush. This was it. This was where he would obtain the defining tool of all wizards and the means to find that innate power buried somewhere inside himself.

Snape, amazingly, seemed to share his opinion of the importance of the event and regarded the little shop with a certain degree of reverence. He turned to his wards, glaring at them darkly.

“Pay attention,” he commanded, “This will be one of the most significant moments of your lives. A moment when you pass from being latent magical entities into actively magical ones. Your wand will become an extension of yourself, of your magic, and no other wand will work as well your first. With that thought in mind, Mr. Ollivander, the man who makes all this possible, will be given the utmost respect. Any delinquent or rude behavior and you will be sent home without a wand, and explain to your parents why that is so.”

Snape looked directly towards Harry. “And don’t think that gives you free reign to behave however you like, Mr. Potter. As a ward of the school you will answer directly to me.”

Harry clenched his fists, but said nothing, meeting that oppressive stare straight on.

“You will enter the shop one at a time, in order to prevent any accidents. Once you have obtained your wand, there will be absolutely NO careless wand waving. Your wand will come with a case, and you will not remove it until September first. Am I absolutely clear?”

“Yes, professor,” Harry sighed, and the rest quickly followed.

“Ms. Westfield, you’re first!”

With that Snape and the tow-headed girl disappeared into the shop. Harry and the others fidgeted for a while, before forming into a little cluster to talk amongst themselves. Harry pulled out his pocket watch frequently. Every time he did, he would be suddenly reminded that Snape was Hermione’s godfather. Ugh.

About fifteen minutes after Westfield nervously entered the shop, she came out practically glowing. She gripped her wand case tightly to her chest and was grinning like a lunatic.

"10 inches white oak, and griffin feather," she said proudly. "It's your turn Jacob."

And so it went, and much to Harry's frustration and very little to his surprise, he was the last to be called on. It was nerve racking. Although they would only be gone for ten to fifteen minutes each, he felt like he was on some invisible timer. As if Snape would leave after exactly one hour, regardless of whether Harry had his wand or not.

He tried to occupy himself by looking through his textbooks, looking for spells he wanted to learn, but it only reminded him that he needed his wand to cast any of them. He finally settled on his potions book, which very rarely required a wand. He read the first chapter on the first fundamental principles of potion making for the next hour, still checking his watch often, when the last of the other students exited the shop.

"Your turn," they said, going over to gossip with the others. Eagerly, Harry left his supplies with the others and entered the shop. It was gloomy inside as it was out, with an air of antiquity that rivaled all else he had seen before. The walls were lined with open cubby holes, each containing long narrow boxes. There was a single wing-backed chair, inhabited by Snape who regarded him coolly, and beside him stood the most unnerving individuals Harry had ever seen. He was elderly, sort of frail looking, but his eyes were ice blue and sharp as knives. The air around him seemed thicker, wavering yet not. Harry felt the air reach out and touch him, and shivered.

"You are Mr. Potter?"

"Yes, Mr. Ollivander," he said, thoroughly unnerved. The man's gaze lingered for a long moment before he turned away and headed for the shelves.

"Stand on the stool there," he said. No sooner had Harry done as he was told, than a miniature tape measure came zipping up to him. On its own it began to take measurement, none of which the wand-maker seemed to be paying any attention to. It measure his height, the width of his shoulders, the size of his feet, the circumference of his head, and strangely the distance between his nostrils. "Which is your wand hand?"

"Er... I'm right handed." The measuring tape then went to work measuring the length of his fingers, distance from wrist to elbow, armpit to floor, and so many other random distances Ollivander continued to ignore.

"Right then, that's enough," the tape measure crumpled lifeless to floor. "Try this one. Beechwood and dragon heartstrings. Nine inches. Nice and flexible. Just take it and give it a wave."

Harry accepted the wand, and feeling extremely foolish under Snape's ominous regard, and waved it around a bit. Immediately the wand was snatch out of his hand.

"Maple and phoenix feather. Seven inches. Quite whippy. Try-"

Harry tried, but that too was snatched from him even faster than the first. And that was how it went. He tried all sorts of wands. Unicorn hair, phoenix feather, dragon heartstrings. Hard woods, soft woods, and woods from distant lands. He tried short, long, flexible, and rigid. Yet no matter what he tried, nothing was quite right. As they started approaching half an hour, a sort of despair settled around Harry. For every wand that rejected him began to feel like a personal failure. His only consolation was that Ollivander only seemed to become more enthused with the hunt, and not the least bit discouraged.

"Tricky customer, eh? Not to worry, we'll find the perfect match here somewhere- I wonder, now. Why not try this one? Holly and phoenix feather, eleven inches, nice and supple. Here-"

Harry took the wand. He felt a sudden warmth in his fingers. His arm lifted, almost of its own accord, and came down in a powerful swish. Gold and red sparks flew out of the end like fireworks, sending the whole store dancing with light and shadows. In his chair, Snape's grip on the armrests tightened. Mr. Ollivander smiled in pure bliss and cried, "Bravo! Yes, indeed, very good. I've waited a long time to find the owner of that wand! I made this wand almost seventy-five years ago. The phoenix that donated the feather only gave two. I knew then those wands would be something special. And I was right. Within twenty years, its brother had risen in infamy along with its master. That fifty years should pass before its equal could be found. How remarkable!"

"Ollivander, you overstep your bounds," Snape suddenly hissed, jumping to his feet. "To even suggest this...boy might somehow be His equal."

Harry, his insides feeling as light as air, and his fingers tingling felt suddenly invincible and turned to both men. "And who's the owner of the other wand?"

Snape did not reply, and amazingly he even looked away from Harry. Ollivander, on the other hand, grinned and fixed him with a pale stare.

"I remember every wand I've ever sold, Mr. Potter. Every single wand. Your wand's brother- Yew, phoenix feather, thirteen-and-a-half inches- just so happens to belong to the most powerful wizard in Britain. Curious, indeed, how these things happen. The wand chooses the wizard, you know... I think we must expect great things from you, Mr. Potter... After all, You-Know-Who did great things- terrible, but great."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry sat in the Three Broomsticks at Hogsmeade, looking into his butterbeer and wishing there was actual alcohol in it. His wand was tucked into its thin leather case under his shirt. There was a strange feeling emanating from it, luring Harry to take it into his bare hands again. It was a feeling that promised magic. He could do anything once that bit of wood and feather was in his hand... just like Voldemort had.

"Jeez, Harry, you're not still sulking are you?" Natalie mocked, interrupting his dark thoughts. "I know Snape was an utter prat, but you'll have other opportunities to go shopping in Daigon Alley. I didn't think boys even liked shopping."

Hermione, of course, was quick to come to his defense... or argue with Natalie. One of the two.

"Don't be sexist, Natalie. Besides, Harry's never been to Daigon Alley, remember?"

Natalie waved off the logic with her usual feminine grace.

"Don't worry about it," Harry said, smiling weakly. "There's always next year."

"Hey," Clyde said, wiping away his foamy mustache, "We won't need our teachers as escort next year. We should all go out together and show Harry around. It'll be a riot."

Natalie grinned and lifted her mug. "I'll drink to that. What do you say, Harry? Hermione? Shall we all go together next time?"

This time his smile was a bit more real, and he lifted his mug. Hermione and Clyde lifted theirs, and they clinked them together and took a drink... and kept drinking. Whether they'd planned it that way or not, once they'd started Natalie and Hermione had somehow turned it into a contest, one which Clyde seemed more than willing to compete in and Harry wasn't going to be left out of. There was few seconds of silence and they gulped down the sticky liquid, and then...

"Ha!" Clyde cried, slapping his mug down, "I wi- BLEEEELCH."

Hermione choked on her glass. The boy winced, patting his chest. "Crikey, that actually hurt!"

The rest of them burst out laughing, causing Natalie to let a considerably smaller belch of her own, sending them all into even harder laughter. As Harry sat there in the little pub, sitting between his friends and trying not to shoot butterbeer through his nose, he felt the uncertainty of the day fade away. Harry Potter, he knew, was no Voldemort. Voldemort more than likely had never sat amongst muggleborns and halfbloods in a pub, belching and laughing like a loon. Surely, the Dark Lord had never felt this feeling Harry felt now. The feeling that he was in one of those perfect moments of time, ones he hoped he would always remember, because everything was so vivid and warm and beautiful.

Which was why he could never tell them. Not about his wand or what Ollivander had said about it. If there was ever to be perfect moments like this again, then he could never reveal to them that some part of him echoed of the British wizarding dictator. Natalie probably wouldn't have cared, may have even found it cool, but Hermione would pry and poke and worry and doubt. He didn't know what Clyde would do, but their friendship was still tentative and their bond easily broken even without this bit of knowledge.

It would just be a secret between him and Snape, who didn't look like he wanted to admit it to himself let alone anyone else, and Ollivander, who didn't seem the type to gossip. No one else would ever have to know.

Ever.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

This was the sort of thing that may potentially get a man killed or have no consequence whatsoever.

That was what Snape thought as he made his way to the dungeons to begin his report on that day's visit to Ollivander. The visit had gone as smoothly as it always did, each of his young charges too petrified of him to cause trouble, as they procured all they would need for the coming school year. He would never admit it to anyone, but he did take some enjoyment from his yearly appointments with Ollivander. There was something strangely exhilarating about seeing a child obtaining their first wand, the first conscious flush of power streaming through their small bodies, that look of epiphany on their innocent faces. Yes, child, that is magic. And you thought you knew, didn't you?

And of course, Potter just had to go and ruin it.

Well, perhaps not ruined it. His reaction had been just as exhilarating as everyone else's, perhaps more so when the sparks illuminated those brilliant green eyes and memories of another overlaid the reality of the moment. Lily's joy of her magic had never faded in all the time he had known her, and he briefly wondered if Harry would be like her or if that joy wouldn't fade into the arrogance of his father?

So, Ollivander had to go and ruin it.

Telling an eleven year old boy and him, one of Voldemort's own henchmen, that he may be the magical counterpart in the Dark Lord. Of all the stupid...

Now Snape had to deal with it, and it all broke down into two choices. One, he kept it a secret. There were two eventual outcomes of this decision, the most optimistic being that no one found out and nothing happened, and the other (and more likely outcome) was some one finding out and his possibly being accused of treason and dying horribly. Two, he could tell the Dark Lord. Option two had two outcomes as well. Optimistically, the Dark Lord wouldn't care and at most have the child observed for undue ambition. Realistically, he would care and have the child either killed as a potential competitor or brought into the fold of his dark court to be used as the wizard saw fit.

Snape wasn't sure what was worse. Lily's child being killed, Lily's child working beside him as Voldemort's pawn, or himself being dead.

Decisions, decisions.

Unless...

Snape smiled wickedly. Perhaps, he was looking at this the wrong way. After all, it's only a secret if he doesn't tell anyone, and it's only dangerous if Voldemort is the one to learn about it. All he had to do was tell the right person and Lord Voldemort might never find out.

He it just so happened he knew the perfect person.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Yes, I know that according to the seventh book Harry only connected to his wand because he was Voldemort's horcux, but I'm a fanfic writer and thus a character thief, and have very few scruples.

Chapter 10: The Pilgrimage

Harry stood on platform 9 3/4 and wondered why. He had floored from Hogsmeade to King's Cross, to wait for a train that would take him right back to Hogsmeade. Mrs. Sleuw, while she had been fluttering about the kitchen making him a particularly large breakfast, had said it was a tradition. He personally thought it was a tradition he could do without.

The train station was thick with families and cats. A meaningless roar of voices punctuated by shouting and baby cries and owl shrieks and mewling. While Harry did have the benefit of leaving his luggage at Hogwarts, he had to remain constantly alert unless he was knocked by someone else's. He had intended to stay outside the train until he could meet up with Hermione, but the ruckus was getting bad enough that he started to worrying about injury. He squeezed passed a cluster of redheads and managed to board the train with only a bruised knee and a banged elbow.

Inside was chaotic, but not nearly as much as outside. The hallway was jammed with students dragging their trunks, broomsticks, and animal carriers as they searched for empty compartments or friends. Harry ducked into the first empty compartment he could find and kept the door open incase some of his friends should pass by. He made himself comfortable and stared out the windows at the menagerie of people talking, crying, hugging, and kissing. For a while Harry could imagine his mother and father out there, waving at him in the window.

"Harry!"

He turned to the door to see Hermione smiling at him. Behind her stood a boy with the palest blond hair he had ever seen. He recognized him immediately as Hermione's foster brother, Draco.

"Hermione, I was wondering when you would show up. I would have thought you would be the very first person to arrive."

"And I likely would have, but Draco kept dragging his feet this morning," she said, glaring half heartedly at her non-repentant sibling.

"You woke me up at 5 o'clock in the morning. Five," was all he said to that. He turned his cool, grey eyes towards Harry, taking in his modest clothes and wild hair. Harry could just barely detect the hint of a sneer he had no doubt learned from his godfather. After a moment, he held out his hand. "Draco Malfoy of the Malfoy family."

"Harry Potter." They shook, both perhaps a little tighter than was polite.

"Hermione!" someone called, distracting the girl. As she turned away, Draco stepped into the compartment and up close to Harry so he could speak softly into his ear.

"I don't know what impression my sister gave you over the summer, but don't think for a moment you have a chance with her. She's a Malfoy, and I won't have her name dragged through the mud by hanging out with muggleborn riff-raff. So you either turn out very impressive or don't turn up at all. Do we understand each other?"

Before he could respond, Draco moved away and took Hermione by the arm. "Come on, sister-dear. You can catch up with Harry later. You have other friends you haven't seen all summer on board."

Hermione threw him an apologetic look, but dutifully followed her brother down the hall. Harry just watched them disappear, blinking stupidly. Had he just been threatened by Hermione's 'sweet and charming' older brother? She had mentioned that he was a little over protective, but egad! He felt inexplicable torn from wanting to throttle the other boy to admiring him. Certainly, Harry didn't think he had enough confidence to go around threatening people for the sake of Hermione's honor.

Had he learned that from Snape too? Bloody hell, what had Hermione learned from the overgrown bat?

"Harry!" Clyde stood in the doorway grinning at him. He was flanked by twin red heads, who were looking more than a little mischievous. "Mind if we sit with you? The rest of the compartments are getting full."

“Sure, I could use the company.”

“Oh, now, this-” started one of the twins, sliding inside.

“Must be, the illustrious-” continued the other.

“The infamous-”

“The indomitable-”

”Harry Potter,” they finished in unison. Harry smiled.

“What have you been telling them about me, Clyde?”

The twins grinned at each other, and Clyde turned pink around the ears.

“Oh, we’ve heard quite a bit. Heard you were a real ladies’ man.”

“The two prettiest girls in the class are after you.”

“And one a Malfoy, no less!”

“You player!” they said again in unison. At this Harry turned pink and turned a glare at Clyde, who was looking a bit sheepish.

“Ignore them!” he said, “They just like to tease everyone!”

It wasn’t long before the train whistle blew and the train began to move, pulling away from the station and the horde of people waving goodbye. The twins and Clyde both waved to some people in the crowd.

“And if you don’t mind me asking,” Harry said, as they all settled in. “Who are you two?”

Both twins shared a sad sigh, as they gave mock disappointed looks at Clyde.

“You mean Clydiekins hasn’t mentioned us?”

"I was trying to forget about your entire existence."

"I am Fred-"

"And I am George-"

"Don't believe them! It's probably the other way around!"

"Weasley of the Houghton family. We're Clydiekin's uncles."

"Uncles?" Frankly, Harry wasn't sure how that was possible. The twins only look a year or two older than Clyde.

"Yes, his uncles. It's a rather interesting story," said the boy who introduced himself as Fred (and probably lied).

"You see, our sweet nephew here has a muggle mummy-"

"And a wizard daddy, who alas-"

"Didn't make it through the war. So his mummy hid him away-"

"Until he was six-"

"And did a bit of accidental magic. Then in swoops WYRA. But it's learned that our dear sweet nephew, has living wizarding grandparents-"

"Who quickly take custody of their grandson, but not before adopting George and I-"

"I thought you said you were George," Harry pointed out.

"Semantics. Hush! Anyway, since we're the Houghton's adopted kids, and Clyde is their grandson..."

"You're his uncles. I get it," Harry said and sighed. "Jeesh. And I thought I had family drama issues."

“There you two are!” Another redhead entered the compartment. While Harry could easily see the family resemblances, the boy’s demeanor couldn’t have been more different from the others. He looked rather prim and proper, without a hint of humor.

“Percival! You old dog. What have you been up to?” asked Fred- or George- as they both rose to wrap him in their arms. ‘Percival’ tensed up and, as soon as they released him, checked his person for any tricks they may have played. He was rather quick to find the sign on his back and the exploding ink cap in his pocket.

“Yes, yes. Nice to see you too,” he muttered, then looked back, “I found them, Ronald.”

Yet another redhead appeared in the doorway, the same age as Harry, and looking a bit timid. This was not helped by the fact that his much taller brothers, immediately began cooing over him like he was an adorable infant.

“Oh, I remember when you were just this tall! You used to take off your clothes and run around the house naked! Mum and dad would run after you, picking up your nappies as they went!”

“I was three!”

“Oh, but look at how tall you’ve grown! The photographs just don’t do you justice! Did you see mum when you came on?”

Here the other boy smiled a bit.

“Yeah. Ginny too.”

“Little nymph, isn’t she? We’ll be beating the boys off her next year!”

It suddenly occurred to Harry that not only were there a lot of Weasley’s, but none of them apparently lived together. Harry, who had never had siblings, had a hard time imagining that many children in a single home (WYRA didn’t count. They cheated with spells) and yet even more problems imagining so many related children in different homes.

“Oh now, Ronniekins, this is your nephew Clydiekins and his friend Harry Potter. They took those wretched wizarding culture classes this summer. If you have any questions, you can ask them!”

“Yeah, if you want to know about the outside of the castle,” Clyde groused. “The entire school is closed off during the summer. Something to do with re-warding the castle.”

“You’re muggleborns?” Ron asked, looking suddenly hesitant.

“Technically, I’m half and half,” Clyde said. “Harry on the other hand, is a muggleborn, I think. German raised too. Go ahead, spout something off in German!”

“Das ist kein Taschenspielertrick, du Idiot!” he said, rolling his eyes.

“Oooooohhhh...” the twins said in unison. “Brilliant!”

Ron, however, didn’t look like he agreed. His expression darkened, his jaw set. Harry, who was becoming well versed in spontaneous animosity being directed at him, didn’t even bother wondering why. He met the other boy’s gaze openly, daring him to spit out exactly what he was thinking. When the boy said nothing, Harry stood. Ron moved back abruptly, posturing as if he was expecting a fight.

“There’s not a lot of room in here,” Harry said. “You guys are family, and should sit together. I’ll go find another compartment.”

“Ah! Don’t let Ron’s attitude scare you off! He’s just got family issues of a different kind!” George said.

“Yeah! You can sit in my lap!” offered Fred, patting his leg in invitation.

“Was that suppose to encourage him so stay?” Clyde asked.

Shaking his head, he shuffled passed Ron, who made it a point to avoid touching him and glared as he walked away. Once he was outside, the door was slammed behind him and Harry flashed the door a rather uncouth gesture. He wandered up and down the hall, but it seemed all the compartments were either filled with strangers or older students. He was almost ready to give up and return to the Weasley's compartment, when one opened and he was pulled inside.

"Natalie! I didn't even see you get on," Harry said, smiling at her. She gave him her patented wry smile. The compartment was even more full than the Weasley's, this time with people he recognized from summer school. Someone had left a trunk on the floor for extra seating and he perched himself there..

"I'm surprised you're even on board. Isn't it kind of silly making you take the train?"

Harry just shrugged.

"And why isn't Hermione with you? You're normally inseparable," the blonde girl said, not without a little bitterness.

"She's sitting with her brother and their friends. Clyde's sitting with the Weasley brothers. Did you know there were so many?"

"Ha! They've got two more brothers out of school and a little sister who starts next year. They're a family of bloody rabbits."

Everyone laughed at that, and Harry smiled weakly.

"What is the deal with that anyway? I got the impression that they don't live together, but I know they're not muggleborns or halfblood or Ron would have been in summer lessons, right?"

"Oh, now that's a bit of a scandal," said Westfield, grinning. Natalie nodded in agreement.

"I used to go to primary school with Ron. He was ok when I first met him," began Natalie. "But then there was this big scandal with his father. Something about muggle contraband. You know, nothing that would be that big of a deal except it was like his fiftieth violation or something. Apparently, he'd pissed off some of the Wizengamot, and they complained to You-Know-Who, who had him thrown in Azkaban."

Harry shivered at the thought. They had learned about Azkaban in summer school. A miserably stormy isle, designated a maximum security prison, with soul-sucking wraiths known as Dementors set as guards. That anyone, for any reason, should be sent there had struck him as beyond cruel.

“After that, Ron turned into an utter bigot. Their mother, poor thing, was a house wife- what else could she be with that many children needing her?- and couldn’t find work with enough pay to support them all and still take care of the baby girl’s needs. WYRA ended up stepping in and taking all her kids except the daughter, and had them divided up and sent to other homes. I guess I can understand him being bitter, but he’s turned into such a rotter. One day he’s going to start a fight with the wrong muggleborn, and I can’t wait to see it happen.”

Now Harry could see the twisted logic in hating muggleborns. After all, since they were all completely isolated from muggles, muggleborns were the next best thing. However, he couldn't condone it and wouldn't tolerate it. His father used to say the men who bow to injustice and cruelty only welcome more of it onto themselves. His mother used to say no one had the right to make anyone feel like they were born inferior. If Ron came after him or Hermione or any of his friends, then he was determined Natalie would see that prophesied fight.

They went on to talk about the coming school year, about the past summer, of birthdays, and holidays, Quidditch and fashion, traveling and weather. They played exploding snaps, poker, and wizarding chess. They ate too much junk food, and they all started Harry his first collection of chocolate frog cards. He got Helga Hufflepuff, Bellatrix Lestrage, Bartolome Suigi, Horace Slugworth, and Hedwig Vance.

By the time their arrival at Hogsmeade was announced, Harry was glad he had taken the train after all.

[illegible]

1. 'It's not a parlor trick, you idiot!' Actually, 'Traschenspielertrick' means prestidigitation, an uncommon word in America (can't speak for other English-speaking countries) but according to Ashere a fairly common word in German.

Author's note:

No, I'm not a Ron-basher. Like his brothers said, he's got issues, which unfortunately manifest themselves in bigotry. Will he be Harry's new arch nemesis in place of Draco? No, frankly I don't think he's savvy enough for that. Besides, Draco's just showed us a bit of arrogance and animosity we all know and love from Rowling's books. You'll just have to wait and see how it goes.

Chapter 11: The King and the Serpent

Harry sat in a boat, staring up at the castle set aglow in the storm. His eyes were as wide and enchanted as everyone else's. As if it were his first time seeing Hogwarts. As if he hadn't lived in its shadow for the better part of the summer. Staring out his window at night, it always seemed more like the dark silhouette of a hulking mountain than an enchanted castle. But now that dark silhouette was alight with a hundred thousand torches, glowing like a torch itself in the gloomy rain. His insides twisted with a hopeful longing as they drew across the inky lake, holding the castle's wavering reflection, everything enveloped in a sacred silence.

At last they passed under a low tunnel, curtained with ivy, and entered into an underground harbor dimly lit with torches. They scrambled out of the boats and onto the stone steps, aided and directed by the Sleuw's. Professor McGonagall was at the top of the steps waiting for them, and quickly ushered them into the school itself. The corridors were huge and echoed with their muffled footsteps. The first years were huddled closer together than usual, all feeling a bit overwhelmed as they passed endless rows of moving portraits, armors, and display cases. They followed the witch up a large staircase to the upper floors, and suddenly the distant sound of many voices could be heard.

Yet there was one voice much closer that drew Harry's attention.

"Run, run, run, little mousey. Nagini knows every tunnel. Nagini knows every hole. Run, run, run, because you can not hide..."

Harry looked around, seeing if anyone else was wondering about it. By all accounts it did not appear as if anyone had heard. Which seemed impossible since they were silent enough that Harry could hear the faint ticking of his pocket watch.

And hadn't he heard the name Nagini somewhere before?

"Crunch, crunch, crunch, grinding bones on which to munch. Come, come, come, little mousey," it continued to sing in a syllabant hiss.

He fell back from the others, taking a moment to peek down a hallway the voice seemed to be coming from. At first he saw nothing. Then he spotted a little brown rat turning a corner and scampering towards him. It was followed soon after by the largest snake he had ever seen. It was at least nine feet long and almost as thick around as he was. The rat was obviously running from it, but when it finally took notice of Harry, it stood up on its hind legs and froze.

"Look out!" Harry cried as the snake came up on the little creature.

The rat jumped out of the way, barely missing the snake's enormous fangs. It hopped about in a blind panic for a moment, unsure of which way to flee, before heading back towards Harry. He stood frozen, watching transfixed as both creatures made their way towards him. The rat reached him first, and amazingly dived beneath his robes, where he felt it climb up his leg and into his pocket.

This must be someone's pet rat, Harry concluded. He didn't get past that thought before he found himself staring face to face with the snake, who reared up to stand taller than Harry. They stared at one another, wide emerald eyes to glowing slitted yellow.

"Give it here, boy," the snake commanded. "Give it to Nagini."

Oh. So that's where the voice was coming from. A talking snake. Sure. Why not? Was it any stranger than the bathroom mirror that told him his hair looked silly in the Sleuw's house?

"Er... what?"

The snake looked startled- how he could tell, Harry wasn't sure- then, angry again.

"The mousey. Give Nagini her little mousey. It is Nagini's to play with. Master gave it to Nagini. It is Master's present! Give it here or Nagini will play with you instead!"

Harry didn't even consider giving the rat over. Not that he thought the rat's life was worth more than his own (he'd killed several over the summer to feed to the school's owls), he just couldn't stand in its presence a moment longer. He leapt out of Nagini's strike range, then bolted down the corridor. He heard her indignant cry, but she couldn't follow nearly as quickly.

Only now, Harry had lost sight of the other first years. Cursing himself for his own stupidity, he started his search. But the castle was a maze, and every corridor led to dozens of others. He tried to call for help, but no one came and he didn't dare stay anywhere too long lest Nagini find him.

Finally he started to hear voices. He followed the sound until he came to a narrow hallway, that led to a small antechamber. There was a small wooden door, and he pressed his ear to it to see if he could hear anything. The general roar was quiet now, but he could hear some one making a speech. He pressed harder to the wood, hoping to make out the words.

The door fell open. Caught off balance, Harry stumbled forward, through a curtain and onto a platform, tripped on a rug, and pitched passed a man standing at the podium and off the edge. He fell feet over head, and landed awkwardly on his side. Dazed he sat up, and through his spinning vision he could make out many people in black robes staring at him. His sight somehow ended upwards, and the people disappeared to reveal a starry night sky. He rubbed his eyes, not believing what he was seeing, and when he opened them again he found himself staring at a man. He was a young, pale man and his eyes were a the most vivid...crimson?

"Er..."

The hall suddenly burst out into raucous laughter. Harry's face burned. Looking over at the platform, he could see two tables on either side of the small platform with several familiar faces. Professors Toure, Flitwick, Quirell, and of course, Snape. They, however, were not laughing. His embarrassment was replaced with something else, and his burning embarrassment gave way to a cold fear.

"Silence!" Voldemort commanded.

Instantly, the laughing horde fell into a tense quiet. The Dark Lord turned his cold crimson gaze to the boy still sprawled on the floor beneath him, letting his expression clearly show his irritation. Strangely, Harry couldn't turn away. His eyes were wide and frightened, but he couldn't look away. It was like being caught in Nagini's eyes, only...

"And you are?" the man said. His voice sounded vaguely serpentine. Harry made a conscious effort to climb to his feet, although they felt as if they would collapse at any moment.

"I-I'm Harry Potter."

"Oh. You."

He flinched, but didn't turn away.

"Crucio!"

A sudden, excruciating pain flared through his entire body. It was like nothing he had ever felt. Not the localized pain of a broken bone nor the weak pain of a sunburn. This was something else. It was like every fiber of body, from skin to the internal muscles was being stabbed with wicked needles. There was screaming, and Harry couldn't tell if it was him or not. As suddenly as it was inflicted, the curse was removed. He found himself on all fours, trembling uncontrollably.

"In the future, Mr. Potter, it would be wise to remember I do not like to be interrupted while speaking. Especially by fools. McGonagall, you are responsible for escorting first years to the Great Hall. We will discuss your failure later."

Someone grabbed his arm, and he flinched from the contact expecting it to hurt, but the pain was an empty echo. He was dragged to his feet by McGonagall, looking very pale and tightlipped, and led to the line of other first years. Hermione and Clyde were immediately by his side, supporting him. Yet he couldn't help but notice that in addition to looking worried, they both looked very angry with him as well.

It's not my fault! he wanted to scream at them. But all he could do was try to regain his strength and stand on his own, hiding his embarrassment and shame. Voldemort continued his speech, and at some point Harry thought he saw an ugly hat singing a rather ridiculous song about houses.

It took him a minute to realize it was singing about Houses. They learned about them in summer school, of course, and Hermione even had a book called Hogwarts: A History that she was constantly referencing. When names started to be called, Harry made an extra effort to pay attention.

"Abbott, Hannah!" A rather plump girl with blond pigtails climbed onto the provided stool and McGonagall placed the singing hat on her head. It was barely there for two seconds before it shouted out "Hufflepuff!"

The girl quickly skipped off to join a table of cheering students. It followed that routine for all the gathered students. Some went to Hufflepuff, others Ravenclaw, Gryffindor, or Slytherin. Usually it only took a second or two for the hat to decide, other times it took almost a minute. Clyde was called and by then Harry was able to stand on his own, and watched as his friend was sorted into Gryffindor under the thunderous applause of the Weasley twins. Natalie was sorted into Slytherin, and looked perfectly pleased with the result. Hermione, amazingly was not sorted into either Slytherian or Ravenclaw, but Gryffindor.

Harry didn't really see it. She had always been more smarts than anything, and the timid way she looked away from her brother's shocked face wasn't exactly the bravest front she could have given. Draco went to Slytherin like all the Malfoy's before him, of course. And then it was his turn.

The hall got dead quiet, and Harry felt vaguely nauseous. But he remembered his father and his mother, thought of how proud they would be that he had gotten here at all, and held his head high as he marched towards the stool. McGonagall looked decidedly worried as she placed the hat on his head. The hat fell over his eyes and in the darkness he could hear the whispers of the other students.

“Hhhmmm...” said the hat. “What have we here. Oh this is going to be a difficult choice. You’ve got a decent mind... loyal... hard working... there’s definitely a lot of...unique talent in here. The most obvious choice would of course be Slytherin, but...”

“Please, not there,” Harry whispered. “I don’t want anything else in common with...”

He shut his mouth tight after that. He hadn’t told anyone about his wand being the brother’s of Voldemort. Not Hermione, not the Weasleys, and certainly not to a gossiping hat. Even if it read his mind and already knew.

“Oh, not Slytherin then? Well, then we might as well keep things interesting. I think I’ll put you in GRIFFINDOR!”

Most of the Gryffindors didn’t clap when Harry made his way over to his new house. Most of them didn’t. Percy clapped politely along with a few others. Clyde and Hermione both clapped more honestly. The Weasley twins made enough of a racket to embarrass him all over again. He took his seat between Clyde and Hermione, and struggled to sit up tall under the disgruntled looks his own house was giving him.

The sorting continued and Ron Weasley, the youngest son of a long line of brothers surprised everyone, including himself when the sorting hat sent him off to Slytherin. Although he felt sorry for Ron’s flabbergasted brothers, Harry wasn’t sorry he wouldn’t be sharing his House with the other boy. The redhead sat himself next to Draco, who didn’t look as though he was sure he wanted the other boy there.

Finally, the sorting concluded with Blaise Zabini being sorted into Slytherin. Voldemort gave another brief speech about pride and honor, fealty, and discipline. It would have been extremely boring if the threat of excruciating pain and death hadn’t lingered between each sentence should the man’s wisdom be ignored.

Then an enormous feast suddenly appeared before them all. It was more food than Harry had ever seen, and very impressively displayed. But watching all the other students suddenly scarfing it all down, made him feel even more nauseous and he pushed most of it away.

“Aren’t you going to eat?” asked Clyde, looking worried.

“He probably doesn’t feel very well after the Cruciatus curse. Do you, Harry?”

“No, I don’t” he agreed. “The Cruciatus curse, huh?”

“Yes. It’s also known as the pain curse, and I’m sure you can appreciate why. It’s a very dark curse. Only those with particularly high magical ability can perform it effectively.”

“Well, at least I know people won’t be throwing it around in the halls then,” he said.

“No worries there mate,” said one of the twins, coming up to stand behind. “You’ll only have to worry about tickle curses-”

“Jelly-legs-” suggested the other twin.

“The pinching curse-”

“Boils and blisters curse-”

“Lycanthropy during the full moon-”

“Vampire bites if you walk around after curfew-”

“Yes, yes, yes! We get it! Can’t you go embarrass someone else? You have an entire House to annoy!” Clyde said.

“Yeah, I suppose you’re right. Harry’s too easy a target right now.”

“Gee, thanks.”

“Come on, George-”

"I'm Fred, George,"

"Semantics, brother."

The two wandered off to make mayhem for a cluster of Gryffindor girls gossiping at the end of the table. No sooner had the boys gotten them to start screaming at the sight of their wart infested hands, then real screams started over at the Hufflepuff table. The Hufflepuffs students all clambered from their seats and a way from their table. This was followed by the Ravenclaws shouting in surprise and scrambling from theirs.

Through the din of panicked voices, Harry could hear another softer voice.

"Where is my little mousey? Bring it to me, now, now, now!"

"Oh, bloody hell, not her again," he moaned.

"Harry, what's going on?" Hermione asked. But there was no time for explanations. The crowds had parted to reveal Nagini, who had spotted him in an instant.

"You!"

"Geh."

The serpent rushed for him, and Harry made a split second decision. Leaping from his chair he sprinted towards Nagini as well. She reared up, expected an attack and prepared to face it with one of her own, but Harry turned sharply and just barely avoided her fangs. He ran for a side door, keeping Nagini as far from the other students as he could manage. She followed, slipping under tables and benches, brushing ankles as she slithered towards her intended prey.

He led her into a corridor. He could see students flooding out of the Great Hall further down and turned in the opposite direction. He jogged along, keeping Nagini in sight and just out of range. Once the other students were out of sight, he tried to lose her, but soon found himself out done.

Stairs and doors did nothing to keep her at bay. She followed him at a steady pace singing along the way 'Run, run, run, little man-child. Nagini knows every tunnel. Nagini knows every hole. Run, run, run, little man-child, because you can not hide'.

It didn't take long for Harry to become utterly lost. He had gotten stuck at the dead end of a corridor, and somehow managed to find a secret passageway. It had wound up and down narrow staircases, lefts, rights, forks and crossroads. When he had finally stumbled out of the dusty space he found himself in an empty classroom and no idea where he was. At least it appeared he had lost Nagini.

"Hello?!" he called, as he entered the hallway. "I'm really, really lost and could use some help"

It was dark here, with no torches lit. Harry wished he hadn't left his wand in his trunk. He didn't know if he could perform any spells, but a few sparks might have gone a long way helping him find his way back to the Great Hall.

He kept calling for help, staying close to the wall so he didn't get disoriented. He wasn't certain how long he groped blindly in the darkness, but he was starting to lose hope in a rescue. Frankly, he wasn't sure he wanted to be rescued. He was already in enough trouble as it was. Just as he had resolved to spend a long, uncomfortable night curled on the floor, he saw a pale white glow.

"Hello? Is anyone there?" he called, a bit nervously.

"Hello?" came a reply. "What have we here? Oh, my, you're that Potter boy. Everyone is looking for you. What are you doing all the way over here?"

Harry couldn't reply. As the white glow got closer, he could see that what he thought was a wand light was a man... or had been a man. Wearing a collar and tights, and literally transparent, he suddenly realized he was meeting his first ghost.

“You alright there, lad? Nagini didn’t get a bite out of you, did she? While we ghosts wouldn’t mind some new blood, it would put a bit of a damper on the festivities for the rest of the students.”

“I-I’m sorry, yes, I’m fine. But...um... who are you?”

“How terribly rude of me! I am Sir Nicholas de Mimsy, at your service! Just follow me! I’ll get you back to civilization!” he chuckled.

Relieved, Harry did follow Sir Nicholas. But they did not return to the Great Hall. Instead, he was led up several sets of staircases and through many corridors, until at last they stopped at a statue of a gargoyle.

“Er... where am I now, Sir Nicholas?”

“The headmistress’s office, of course. Have to sort all of this nonsense out, don’t we? Oh, don’t look so green. You’ll survive! Now up you go! Cecrops!”

A winding staircase appeared behind the gargoyle. Taking a deep breath, he lifted his head, and made his way up. He stepped off the stairs and found himself in a rather crowded circular office. All the Heads of House were present, McGonagal, Snape (Hermione later told him her godfather taught potions and was head of Slytherin), Flitwick, a dumpy looking woman he didn’t know, one he recognized from a chocolate frog card as Headmistress Bellatrix Lestrange, and of course to make his day complete- Lord Voldemort with Nagini curled quite happily around his armchair. The giant serpent looked at him, and Harry got the impression she was smirking.

The headmistress, staring over her locked fingers at him, was not looking pleased.

“I should expel you, Mr. Potter,” was the first thing out of her lips.

Harry felt his heart drop into his stomach.

“Couldn’t you just expel Nagini?” he said, and then slapped his hand over his mouth.

“Mr. Potter! This is not a joke! This is the first time in centuries the Welcoming Feast has been disturbed. Perhaps the very first time that it has been disturbed twice by the very same person!”

“Hey, I had nothing to do with the second one! They weren’t running and screaming from me!”

“Just keep talking, silly man-child. It will only make your punishment that much more amusing to watch,” hissed Nagini.

“Go choke on your rat!” he snarled back at her.

Suddenly, everyone was looking at him with even more interest. Even Voldemort, who had been ignoring him in favor of stroking the portion of Nagini’s tail resting in his lap, looked straight at him.

“What did you say?”

Harry froze. Oh, Bloody hell, he was such an idiot! As if he wasn’t in enough trouble with the most dangerous man in the entirety of Wizarding Britain, he had to go off and insult his familiar too!

“Er...”

“What you said, Mr. Potter, was most definitely not ‘er’.”

“Um...”

“Mr. Potter!”

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry! I didn’t mean it!”

A dead silence followed. And Harry who had been cringing, expecting to be cursed at any moment, opened his eyes to peek at what had stopped the man. The most dangerous man in all of Britain was regarding him with a clearly perplexed and -dare he even think it?-

awed expression. He glanced around at the other Hogwarts staff. They too looked completely stunned.

“Um... what did I say?”

Snape let out an amused huff of air, and muttered ‘idiot boy’. This seemed to snap everyone else out of their surprise as well.

“Mr. Potter... Harry, are you telling me it has never come to your attention that you are a Parselmouth?” Voldemort asked.

Harry just blinked at him and then frowned. “That’s impossible. Only a descendant of Slytherin can speak Parseltongue. You’re the only one in known existence right now.”

“It would seem I am the second one in existence now. You silly child. Don’t tell me you didn’t think it odd when my familiar began talking to you?”

Harry shrugged. “Until this spring a talking bathroom mirror was odd. Frankly, I just thought she was a talking snake, which was odd, and why I got distracted and separated from the other first years.”

“Hn.”

They held each other’s gaze, and Harry felt the other man searching him for the truth of the matter. It was an almost physical sensation and he abruptly turned away from the man on sheer instinct.

“Perhaps he should be sent to Slytherin, after all,” the headmistress suggested. “He must, as he pointed out, have descended from Salazar Slytherin.”

“And he just as likely has ancestry rooted with Gryffindor, Ravenclaw, or Hufflepuff. No, we will hold to tradition, and allow the sorting hat to determine the House he belongs to. If we do not uphold tradition, who will?”

“Of course, you’re right,” the headmistress conceded, and Harry realized despite her title it was Lord Voldemort who ran the school.

“Speaking of Houses, perhaps it is time for Harry to return to his? It has been a very trying evening, and classes start tomorrow,” said McGonagall.

“Yes, I suppose we can forego any further punishment, given the circumstances. Harry, one last word of advice?”

“Yes, sir-er, I mean, My Lord?”

“Break this bad habit of misplacing yourself?”

“Er... yes, My Lord.”

“Oh, yes. And leave the rat.”

Harry hesitated, but then reluctantly opened his robe and pulled his partner in crime for the evening out of his pocket. Impossibly, the little creature was curled up and was fast asleep. He shook his head and dutifully-gratefully- followed his Head of House out of the office and towards his new home.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Once Harry and most of the staff had left, Voldemort, Snape, Lestrage, and Nagini turned their attention to the perceived culprit of that evening’s events. The headmistress poked the furry lump with the end of her wand. It merely curled up tighter. Irritated, she emptied her cup of hot tea on it. It let out a pained squeak.

“Pettigrew, you idiot,” she hissed.

A moment later, where there was only a rat, now sat a very frightened and very damp man.

“Ouch! W-what was th-that f-for?” he sniveled, finding himself suddenly surrounded by three of the most frightening people he knew.

"You were suppose to keep Nagini entertained away from the feast, not in the middle of it!" Voldemort hissed. "There are half a dozen students sleeping in the infirmary because of your stupidity, you brainless twit!"

"I-I'm s-s-sorry, Master, but I-I-I w-was getting t-tired a-and she-she is so en-energetic! I'm n-not as-as y-young as I use-used t-to b-be."

"And I suppose hiding in the pocket of the James Potter-look-alike was an attempt to bring back your more youthful days?" Snape said.

At that Pettigrew's rat-like face became haunted as well as fearful. Oh, what would his old friend say now? Seeing him so reduced? And yet there he had been, appearing there to rescue him... eleven years too late.

"I should crucio you until your mind breaks and then hand you over to Knott for experimentation," Voldemort said. Pettigrew knew he would too, but he didn't think he could get anymore afraid without dropping over dead. "But since your bungling has brought forth some valuable information, I am feeling generous tonight. Check on McGonagall's office to make sure she's behaving herself, then return to your post in Gryffindor tower."

"Y-yes, M-master!" He bowed, unable to believe his good fortune.

"Nagini will accompany you along the way to make sure you don't find your way into anyone else's pocket tonight."

Pettigrew let out a little squeak as the serpent turned her shining yellow eyes towards him. He was a rat a second later, and flying down the staircase as fast as his little legs could carry him. Nagini slithered out of her master's lap and pursued at a leisurely pace, singing her silly hunting song as she went.

With the three Slytherins alone in the office, the atmosphere became a bit more relaxed. Lestrangle refilled her empty tea cup with sherry and offered the other two brandy. Snape declined, as was his custom during the school year. Voldemort accepted a glass and further relaxed into his chair. A slight smile found its way onto his face as he considered the events of that evening.

“This is... magnificently ironic,” Voldemort said. “To have a child of two of my more persistent enemies, and a Gryffindor on top of that, become my counterpart in magic.”

“Counterpart, my lord? I think you give him too much credit,” Snape said. “He may simply be an example of how your policies have allowed for a greater level of magical ability within the nation. I wouldn’t be surprised if other Parselmouths started showing up in the next fifty years.”

“I would have to agree with Severus on this one, my Lord. He’s a Gryffindor. His temperament and morality,” she said the second word as if it were a curse, “prevent him from being on par with you. He’s merely a curiosity.”

“Convenient logic,” he chided them both, smiling to let them know he wasn’t angered with them, “I don’t know if Severus told you, Bella, that in addition to speaking Parseltongue, young Harry also possesses the brother wand to my own? That is not the byproduct of increased magical ability.”

Bellatrix looked stunned all over again. Snape also looked surprised, and then quickly disguised it as outrage, turning to glare at the headmistress.

“You didn’t know? I put that information in my report for you to give to our lord.”

She turned an equally venomous glare back at him.

“That’s was Sunday. I was busy finalizing castle security. I haven’t gotten to them yet!”

“I have, though,” Voldemort admitted, surprising them both. Suddenly, Snape thought his plan to slip the information right under Bellatrix’s nose didn’t seem so clever. She was horribly neglectful of her paperwork, and she rarely checked his reports unless prompted. It would have been easy. He had done similar things several times before. Should anyone have learned of the truth, Snape would have had...did have his proof of loyalty and competency.

He hadn't taken into account that his Master ran the school like it were his own household. The man held little love for reports and paperwork, and delegated such tasks to trusty servants like himself and Lestrage. But Voldemort apparently hadn't trusted Lestrage to do her work, and Snape hadn't seen that coming. He was torn between feeling dread over his blunder and exhilaration over the waning faith he held in his nemesis.

Neither thought would have met with Voldemort's approval, so he merely continued to direct his accusing eyes on Bellatrix, hoping the other wizard didn't suspect anything.

Meanwhile, Voldemort was making a mental note to remind his faithful servant to stop being so obvious in her ignorance. It was an unSlytherin trait, and lately she hadn't been at the top of her game. All the teachers had made a very clear and professional report on all the muggleborn's excursion to Daigon Alley, and though Snape was perhaps a bit dismissive of Potter's wand as a product of chance (fifty years! Some one had to pick that wand eventually), it was curious enough that she should have been made aware of it. This sort of thing was why the muggleborns were all sent with their teachers after all.

"Regardless," Voldemort continued, "We share a gift, an ancestry. I feel it makes him partially my responsibility. I am certain I can make this turn of events work in my favor."

"Surely you're not suggesting adopting the boy?" Bellatrix exclaimed. Severus barely managed to keep from rolling his eyes. Voldemort fixed her with an irritated look, and she shrank back in her chair like a scolded first year.

"No. Not yet anyway. I will have to see if he shows any true potential first. But I was just thinking... the Wizarding World has its king... perhaps its time it had its prince, as well?"

I know some of you had your hearts set on Harry ending up in Slytherin, but to be honest I could never really picture Harry as one. So for kicks (not really, it's all part of constantly plotting mind) I threw the even less likely character, Ron, in there instead. Bwa ha ha.

Chapter 12: The Most Noble of Houses

McGonagall escorted Harry to Gryffindor Tower in utter silence. He got the distinct impression she was angry with him. But, he figured, everyone was angry at him, except probably the Weasley twins. They were probably laughing their asses off at him. They stopped before a portrait of a very fat woman sleeping in her chair.

“Wake up,” his Head of House commanded, and the fat woman stirred. She rubbed her eyes sleepily and watched them blearily.

“Bit late, isn’t it Professor?”

“I am aware of that,” McGonagall said primly, she turned back to Harry for the first time since leaving the headmistress’ office. “The password is Devil’s Snare.”

The portrait swung open to reveal a circular portal.

“I leave you here, Mr. Potter. The boy’s dorm is on the right, your room is in the highest part of the tower.” She turned to leave, but Harry called out to her.

“Professor!”

She paused, not looking back at him.

“I am really, really sorry that I got you in trouble,” he said, trying to convey how badly he felt about it. She stiffened, and he thought for a moment she would ignore him and walk away. She surprised him by turning around, her expression softened.

“I am sorry too. Lord Voldemort was right. You were my responsibility. I should have known immediately that you had fallen behind when everyone was lined up for the sorting, before that even... A great deal of trouble, and pain, might have been spared otherwise. We will both have to tread more carefully from now on. Well, it’s late Mr. Potter. I bid you goodnight.”

“Wait! One more thing!”

Now McGonagall looked curious. "Yes?"

"Um... could you... could you not mention my being a parselmouth to anyone?"

"I suppose. Why? Most would be rather proud to have such a gift."

"Well... I'd rather not have people making comparisons between me and... Him. Especially since I'm Gryffindor. They're mad enough with me as it is."

She gave him a wry smile. "Him and me, Harry. And I see where that might make some uncomfortable. On the bright side, you caused just enough chaos that no one remembered to dock Gryffindor points. That will go a long way in earning your House's forgiveness. I dare say by Christmas they'll be recalling it as something of an adventure."

"Thank you, Professor."

"You are welcome. Now off to bed with you."

She strode away, a little more spring to her step, and Harry climbed in through the portal. He was greeted by four very curious Gryffindors.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McGonagall went immediately to her rooms and prepared for bed, completely exhausted. What an evening it had been! She couldn't remember a Welcoming Feast this chaotic since James Potter and Sirius Black put blast-ended skrewts in the Slytherin's breadbaskets. She could just imagine James laughing hysterically when his son enticed a very large and venomous Nagini into the Great Hall and then left said Great Hall to lead the entirety of the teaching staff on a mad search through the castle.

She entertained the possibility of writing to Sirius and Remus about the night's events. She imagined they would be ecstatic to know James' legacy was turning out to be just as much of a troublemaker as the original. She dismissed the idea quickly. Who knew what those two would do if they learned their godson was in Britain? The one thing Harry James Potter did not need was his godparents violating probation to visit him right under Voldemort's nose.

Voldemort.

She shuddered. She didn't think she would ever forget the sight of him casting that awful curse on Lily's child. There had been instances before, much less often nowadays, where she had been called into his or the headmistress' office to collect a similarly punished child, but that was always after the fact. For a moment, she thought her heart had stopped when the boy had screamed.

To make matters worse Harry turned out to be a Parselmouth. A rare and coveted talent... for Slytherins. Not so much in Gryffindor. She thought it very prudent of him to want to keep it a secret, and she would help him keep it as best she could. However, this was Hogwarts. Secrets, especially the magical kind, rarely remained secrets for long. Most of the teaching staff knew already, and all it would take was a bit of overheard gossip for everyone of the student body to know as well.

Worst of all, Voldemort knew. And now the man had reason to take interest in the boy. No doubt he would find some way to take advantage of Harry's talent if given the chance. The only thing McGonagall could do was keep her young charge as sheltered from his attentions as possible. Given recent events, she wondered if she was up for the job.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Severus returned to his quarters just after midnight. He left Bellatrix slightly tipsy and alone with their Lord. He had no doubt by the time the dictator left, he would be questioning his previous judgement in allowing the woman to become headmistress. Perhaps the dark wizard was already doing so.

He grinned wickedly at the thought of the arrogant woman being brought to heel. She might have been a fine general during the war, but it took more than clever sadism and blind loyalty to run a school. What children lacked in ambition and viciousness, they more than made up for in free time and creativity.

The Weasley twins were a perfect example. Leave them alone in a room for an hour with only their wands, and the resulting mayhem would likely be recorded in legend. Hell, leave them alone in a room with only a pack of gum and the result would be the same.

Add to that the strange political nature of the separate Houses, bloodlines, the point system, and Quidditch matches and you have a recipe for adolescent intrigue. The castle's many secrets and curiosities only magnified the possibilities and dangers. It took constant vigilance, a keen intelligence, and a firm hand to maintain order at Hogwarts. LeStrange might have been suited to take on the position as she grew older, after several years of teaching and learning what to expect from students. However, she had taken the position and the lofty title immediately after the war as a reward, not as a job. She didn't seem to understand that running Hogwarts required a great deal of work on her part.

McGonagall would have been much better suited. He'd never say it to anyone, especially not the woman herself, but she was really the only logical choice. She had the dignity, discipline, and experience. Most of all she loved the school. She had loved it so much that even when her adored mentor and former headmaster Albus Dumbledore had fled, she remained behind.

And miraculously, she had been spared and her loyalty to the school, if not Voldemort himself, was rewarded with her continued position as Head of Gryffindor.

But she would never be headmistress. He doubted that any Gryffindor would as long as Voldemort ruled. Which left himself as the next best candidate. And he didn't think he would do that bad of a job either. He might not have Minerva's experience, but he shared her love for the school. To a certain extent, that extended to the students as well. Empty-headed imbeciles though they were.

Potter might just present the opportunities he needed to topple Bellatrix from her pedestal and place himself in the forefront of Voldemort's positive regard. He already had a leg up on her with their Master's newest orders to gather information on Potter. No one knew more about Harry Potter in the wizarding world than himself. He was there when the boy was taken from his relatives' home, he had all his muggle records, he has his magical aptitude results, and was there when he received his wand. Add to that his goddaughter was apparently his best friend, and there was no way Bellatrix could gather more intel than him.

On the off chance that Potter should gather Voldemort's favor (a very slim possibility, but his Master was often as unpredictable as the Hogwarts staircases), then a bit of placating on his part would put him in Potter's. After all, the only real point of contention between them was that silly sketchbook.

Returning it should settle things between them rather nicely.

Severus smirked, pulling said sketchbook from the bookshelf as he made his way to his private laboratory. He opened it at random and found himself looking at James leaning over a potter's wheel. Potter the potter. How deliciously absurd. He flipped it to another page, this time featuring an infant Harry sleeping in his mother's arms as she dozed in her rocking chair.

It was filled with drawings, mostly incomplete sketches, but they outlined his life as easily a diary would have. Harry loved his parents. Harry liked football (not American football, but football), animals, and art. There weren't many pictures of other people, and no one aside from the Potters ever appeared more than once, suggesting he didn't have friends. Either the boy was very shy or his parents were over protective... which means he might be shy as a result. A weakness he could so easily exploit to gain his confidence or tear him down.

There were a lot of possibilities here. He was likely getting ahead of himself. He needed some trusted advice on how to proceed.

Summoning a quill and parchment, he sat down at his work station and started to compose a letter.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“You appear to have all your parts,” said Clyde, surveying Harry critically. “But I don’t think I would be able to tell if you were missing your spleen.”

“What?”

“Oh, Harry, are you alright?” Hermione asked.

“He looks pretty good to me,” said Fred. “In fact, he looks bloody brilliant.”

“We do have to applaud you, old chap. Fred and I haven’t had this much fun since a Hufflepuff exploded the potion’s classroom.”

“For goodness’ sake, you both are incorrigible!” she sniffed.

Harry stared at the four other Gryffindors, and smiled tiredly.

“I’m fine. I kept well out of Nagini’s reach. What happened after I left? Was anyone hurt?”

They all settled into some comfortable armchairs in front of the fireplace and explained all that had happened. There had been some accidents, nothing more serious than a bump on the head, when everyone panicked and tried to leave the hall at once. After Harry led the snake away though, Voldemort and the teachers were quick to take the situation in hand. Injured students were escorted to the hospital wing for the night, and prefects escorted their own houses to their common rooms. Most of the House had waited up for a while to see if Harry turned up, but eventually went to bed.

Harry told them all about his first encounter with Nagini, about the second chase through the halls and into the secret corridors, his run in with Sir Nicholas, and visit to the headmistress’ office. He didn’t tell them about being a parselmouth or about Voldemort's pardon, but said after he explained things he had been let off with a scolding. Gryffindor, amazingly, hadn't lost a single point through the entire fiasco.

Everyone was quite entertained, except for Hermione who kept exclaiming 'you could have been killed!'. They all suffered a very long lecture on 'foolish risk-taking' until even she was yawning. Finally, they all made their way to their dormitories for sleep.

It was dark as Clyde and Harry entered their bedroom, and all the other boys were fast asleep. Clyde collapsed in the nearest empty bed, and Harry did likewise in the single one remaining.

What a way to start an education, he thought to himself. Despite all that had happened that night, he couldn't help but smile a bit. Aside from the embarrassing himself in the Great Hall and the consequent cursing immediately after, it had been rather magnificent day. His best friend and he turned out to be in the same house, made friends with the Weasley twins, met his first ghost, discovered a secret passageway (if he could only find it again!), outsmarted a giant cobra, and turned out to be a parselmouth!

Although whether being a parselmouth was a good thing or not was still up for debate. One day he might tell Hermione, and he was sure she could ramble off a list of good and bad things associated with that gift.

In the meantime, he just wanted to sleep.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry woke up late the next morning to a burning sensation on his hip. He bolted out of bed and pulled out his charmed pocket watch. He was already late for breakfast. All the other beds were empty, including Clyde's and he wondered why no one had bothered to wake him. Tiredly, he set about changing out of his sleep rumpled clothes, cleaned himself up, gathered his supplies for the day, and marched down to the Great Hall.

He yawned the entire way, feeling as if he hadn't slept at all the night before. His dreams had been restless, filled with secret corridors and snakes.

The Great Hall was full as he entered, but there was a distinct lessening of chatter as he walked through the door and a great deal of staring. He hesitated for a moment, then strode purposefully towards his table, forcing himself to keep his head high. But even his house's table wasn't very welcoming. Although already crowded, the few spaces left miraculously found themselves taken up when ever he drew near. Frustrated and a little hurt, he searched for some possible opening.

"Wot'cher there, Harry!" someone said. Harry turned to see the Weasley twins on either side of him. They quickly grabbed him by the arms and led him a section of the table particularly crowded with first years. Completely disregarding everyone else sitting, they made a bit of mayhem shoving everyone aside to make space for all three of them. Not a few students fell clean off their benches. Harry would have felt bad for them if they hadn't been able to so easily find new seats where he himself hadn't.

Harry found himself sitting across from Hermione and Clyde. Hermione had her nose buried in a book and hadn't noticed a thing (which Harry was glad for, as he didn't want her pity or for the twins to be lectured). Clyde was just about to fall asleep in his eggs.

"It's about time you got up," Hermione said, barely glancing up.

"Well, if someone had bothered to wake me..." he muttered, then gave Hermione a smile. "The watch works by the way. Although you might have gone a bit overboard on the heating charm."

"It's suppose to give you an incentive not to be late."

She didn't look up when she said it, but her wicked smile was a little hard to miss. Clyde's head finally slipped off his hand and landed in his eggs. They all had a good laugh at him, and Hermione gave him a strong cup of tea. Then she got out their schedules (all schedules were the same for first years in the same house), and gave them an outline of what their week would be like.

The twins quickly got involved, and started telling them about the teachers and each of their little quirks and who assigned the most homework and who was the most generous with points and whose detentions were the worst. How much of their information was reliable, Harry didn't know. While he could easily see McGonagall handing out the most homework, he couldn't see Snape handing out the most points (especially when the twins gave each other a rather curious look when they said it).

Hermione eventually dragged them off to History of Magic, Clyde's face flecked with eggs. Professor Toure was their teacher, and Harry got the impression she was a bit of a fanatic. She had a strange philosophy regarding the necessity of dark wizards and war and violence for the progress of wizarding culture. Anyone caught criticizing Grindlewald or Morgana got a week sitting in the corner. Anyone caught criticizing Voldemort got the corner, a week's worth of detention, and had to write a letter to the man apologizing for whatever they said (this was probably the most effective deterrent). She seemed to pay extra close attention to Harry, who made it a point to say nothing through her entire class lest he let something slip.

"I sort of wish they had kept the previous professor. Professor Toure is competent and all, but I think it would have been interesting to have been taught by a ghost!" Hermione said on the way to Charms.

Professor Flitwick taught Charms and had the greatest sense of humor of all their professors. He regaled the first years by levitating all sorts of things across the room, sometimes bouncing off people's heads as they went. This was the first class where wand-work was required, and the first time Harry had the opportunity to touch his wand since he bought it. Removing it from its case, he felt an instant surge of power. Clyde, who had been dozing next to him, started and turned to him as if he'd been poked.

They were asked to levitate a feather as an exercise. Hermione and a Hufflepuff boy were the only ones to really succeed. Dean Thomas, another Gryffindor, set his on fire. Clyde split his feather in two (not even Professor Flitwick could figure out how). Harry came close, causing his feather to skim the top of his desk but never take flight.

Next was Dark Arts and Defense, taught by Professor Quirrel. Everyone who had been looking forward to it, Harry in particular, was soon disappointed. While Quirrel seemed to know his material, the man was prone to stopping in the middle of what he was saying to sigh in the most depressing way. Clyde was caught sleeping in the middle of an explanation of the difference between hereditary curses and bloodline curses, and the only thing the other man did was look at him longingly, sigh, and continue with his lecture.

By the time lunch rolled around, Clyde finally woke up enough to ask what he had missed. Hermione proceeded to lecture him on the missed material, adding a great deal more information than was actually talked about, and scaring the poor boy rigid. She was just getting past the class material and getting into lecture mode over his irresponsibility when she spotted Draco waiting for her at the entryway to the Great Hall.

“Oh, I better got talk to him now,” she said. “I don’t want to have this conversation right in the middle of potion’s class.”

“Good luck,” said Harry. “Don’t let him make you feel bad about ending up in Gryffindor, either.”

She smiled weakly and left.

“Think he’ll eat her?” asked Clyde.

Harry shrugged and went to find a seat. This time no one attempted to crowd him out, although no one spoke to him either. The Weasley twins hadn’t arrived yet, and they both took the moment of peace to eat without fear of poisoning.

“Well, Potter, I’m surprised to see you here. I thought You-Know-Who would cursed you brain dead. Of course, no one would be able to tell the difference really.”

Harry glanced over his shoulder at Ron Weasley, sneering at him. He took a long measuring look, found the spiteful boy to not be worth risking house points over, and turned back to his soup.

"What's the matter, Potter? No witty come back? I guess your brain really did turn to mush."

Clyde was reaching for his wand, but Harry looked at him and shook his head.

"Don't bother," Harry said. "It's not like his opinion matters."

"What did you say, idiot?" snarled the boy.

"Harry, he's drawn his wand."

He didn't even bother turning to the redhead. He didn't even stop eating. Clyde was looking increasingly frantic. He kept reaching for his wand, but hesitated when he saw his friend's complete nonchalance. By now, much of Gryffindor table were turning to watch. Harry took a sip of his pumpkin juice.

"Put your wand away!" came a new voice, hissing angrily. "Do you want to lose Slytherin points on your very first day?"

"But he-"

"Is obviously above your juvenile behavior," Hermione said imperiously. Harry looked over his shoulder this time to see Draco holding Ron's wand hand down and Hermione hovering just behind them, looking furious.

"Who asked you, you filthy- ow!"

"For your sake, you better not finish that sentence," Draco snarled, his hand now crushing the redhead's wrist. "Now come on. I think you and I should have a discussion about the difference between Slytherin and Gryffindor conduct. Because right now, Potter is being more Slytherin than you."

At this the youngest Weasley brother turned pink around his freckles. Reluctantly, he put his wand away and settled for shooting Harry (who had already turned away) a venomous look.

"We'll settle this later," he said, and stormed off towards his own house' table. Harry waved goodbye without looking. He could just imagine the redhead turning purple like his uncle used to. Draco let out an exasperated sigh.

"Are you going to join us?"

"No," said Hermione. "I prefer more civilized company. Thank you."

"Suite yourself. After classes?"

"You're welcome to join me in the library."

"I'll see you then."

"Good luck, Draco."

A moment later Hermione settled in beside Harry.

"You handled that really well," she complimented. "I don't think I could have ignored someone pointing a wand at my back."

"What was he going to do? I doubt he knows many, if any more curses than I do. And definitely not something that would hurt me. A Finite Incantatem later and I would be fine, he'd have detention at the least and have lost his house points."

"Bloody hell, Malfoy was right, you are more Slytherin than Ron."

Harry frowned darkly at Clyde, but inside he was more than a little uncomfortable with the comparison. He was Gryffindor. The hat had put him in Gryffindor. So what if it had suggested Voldemort's house first?

Transfiguration turned out to be as difficult as Harry thought it would be. While the transfiguration of a desk into a pig was pretty funny, it was followed by copious amounts of note taking, and then a practice exercise. They were trying to turn matches into needles. Several matches simply caught fire. Harry's sprouted a silver leaf. Hermione came closest by making it silvery and pointy at the end.

Lunch and then Potions with Slytherins immediately afterwards. It was... interesting. Apparently, the Weasley twins hadn't lied. Snape really did hand out the most points... to his own house. He kept giving simple questions to his house and then impossible questions to Gryffindor (although Hermione managed to get hers right) and then railed at their stupidity. Harry wasn't sure if he was angry with the bias or amused by the ridiculously immature behavior. At least the man ignored him- much to Ron's disappointment. It wasn't until class was dismissed for the day that the man finally graced him with his unpleasant attention.

"Potter, stay behind."

Clyde gave him a sorrowful wave goodbye and Hermione rolled her eyes.

"He's talking to the teacher, not the grim reaper! We'll be in the library, Harry! Come join us when your done."

He said nothing, his attention on Snape. He hoped the man would reveal some sort of clue as to why he had been held, but his expression was completely passive as he looked over his lesson plans. Soon, they were alone, but neither said anything. When Snape looked him straight at him, Harry avoided his eyes. Snape smirked.

"I see you're not hopeless, Potter. You're obviously capable of learning from past experiences. Did my goddaughter inform you I was a legilimens?"

"No. But she said Voldemort was. He did it to me last night, and it felt sort of like what you did at the Dursley's."

Snape smirked. "Your memory is really rather remarkable. I bet you can still remember their first names as well. What they looked like, the sound of their voices, their habits, their many and varied abuses.

Most children who spend longer than a week at WYRA can't recall anything more than a few vague impressions."

“Er...well... I don’t either, it’s just... you left something of an impression.”

“You flatter me... or you lie horribly. Can you guess which one I’m leaning more towards?”

“ ”

■ ■ ■

“Now, Potter, I have the authority to send you back to WYRA until your past is appropriately meaningless. However, since I do not wish to erase the knowledge you have gained from your summer lessons or upset my goddaughter I am willing to overlook this little anomaly in exchange for your cooperation... and honesty.”

Emerald eyes flashed, coming dangerously direct with ebony.

“What do you want?”

[illegible]

Chapter 13: The Gathering of Serpents

“Let’s move somewhere a little more private, shall we?”

Snape rose from his chair and made his way to a door that none of the other students were allowed to enter. Hermione had told him that it was her godfather’s private laboratory, and filled with all his experiments.

“Are you coming, Potter?”

“... No way. You could be a child molester.”

The look on the man’s face was decidedly unamused. In fact, he looked downright livid at the suggestion.

“Ten points from Gryffindor for insulting a professor. Potter, I would thank you not to have such torrid thoughts about my character.”

“That’s not fair! How could I possibly trust you? Your blackmailing me! And so what if you’re not going to molest me? You could do anything else you wanted, like cut me open and drain my blood for your potion experiments.”

“You have a rather sick imagination, you know that?”

“This is kind of a sick world.”

“I beg your pardon?”

Harry said nothing, shuffling his feet and looking off at nothing. Snape made an irritated sound.

“You realize that teachers take an Unbreakable Vow not to intentionally harm their students upon accepting a Hogwart’s position?”

It was the first Harry had heard of it, but it did sound like the sort of thing the school would require. He merely shook his head.

“Well, they do. Now will you come or do you wish to further insult me and risk twenty more house points?”

“Why do we need to do this privately anyway,” Harry muttered, reluctantly following the man into his personal domain. The lab was even larger than the classroom, and several intricate pieces of equipment were set here and there. There were rows of locked cabinets. No doubt they stored the man’s many rare and expensive potions ingredients. It all made Harry feel very out of place. The doors slammed shut, making him jump.

“Because this is in regards to the events of last night. I believe since my goddaughter isn’t shooting a hundred questions at you a minute regarding your recently discovered talent and Draco isn’t pursuing your friendship like the politician he is, you have kept it to yourself? Look me in the eye when you answer.”

Moving to the other side of a work table, Harry finally looked straight at him. In the dark gloom of the laboratory, his black eyes looked unnatural and eerie.

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“What do you mean ‘why’?”

“Why have you not told them? It is a rare and precious gift. Anyone would be honored to have it.”

Harry snorted. “Anyone who doesn’t mind being compared with Voldemort, you mean.”

“That’s Lord Voldemort, and I suggest you not forget it. Are you suggesting being compared with the most powerful wizard in Britain is somehow a bad thing? Please help me here, Gryffindor logic escapes me.”

“Exactly. You’re a Slytherin. Voldemort’s a Slytherin. I’m a Gryffindor. I don’t want to spend my life with everyone saying I should have been put in Slytherin. I'm not in Slytherin. I'm never going to be in Slytherin. I don't want to be in Slytherin. I am where I'm suppose to be, and no one has the right to suggest otherwise. Would you want people saying you should have been in Ravenclaw because you're smart with potions?"

Snape seemed to consider that. While it irked him that the boy should be so completely ungrateful for his gift, he couldn't argue that the resulting attention might not be all positive. But that was not all Potter was thinking when he decided to keep his talent to himself. No, there was a definite sense of insecurity and self-loathing at the thought of being compared to Voldemort, if not Slytherins in general.

So the boy didn't like Voldemort. He certainly wouldn't be the first, but if his Master wished to use the boy in the future that information could prove invaluable. If Potter ever learned exactly what his parent's role in the war was before they fled Britain, that might further complicate matters.

"You do have a point, but you can not hope to keep this secret long. You seemed to have no control over when you speak parselmouth, and I dare say the school is riddled with snakes. Magical statues, care of magical creature's class, personal pets, and a very wild forest not a stones throw from the castle... it will only take one encounter. One slip of the tongue..."

"But until then..." Harry said, shrugging.

"Yes, until then you get to play the good little Gryffindor. You may go."

Harry quickly made his way to the door.

"But be prepared for additional questions later," Snape said, smirking. "My Master and I will likely have more."

A shiver ran up his spine as he walked away, his thoughts now clutching at dreadful images of Snape and Voldemort snickering over their afternoon tea while they discussed his downfall. His stomach lurched, and he rushed into the nearest bathroom. It was, unfortunately, the girl's lavatory. He didn't mind so much with his head half way in the toilet, but once his stomach was empty he was glad it appeared to be empty.

"I'm starting to hate my life," he mumbled to himself.

"Welcome to the club."

He let out a startled cry and stumbled out of the stall until he smack into one of the sinks. Floating above the stalls was a ghost of a rather geeky looking girl, her arms crossed as she looked imperiously down at him.

"You know this is the girl's bathroom."

"Er... yes, well... It was kind of an emergency."

"Of course it was. No one ever comes in to my bathroom unless they absolutely have to. No one wants to be bothered by plain, moping, Moaning Myrtle."

Seeing the ghost looked as if she were about to cry, he rushed to come up with words to placate her.

"Well-well, I don't usually make it a habit to visit girls' bathrooms, b-but I'm glad I did this time. I haven't met very many interesting ghosts, you know."

Immediately, her watery eyes seemed to dry and she threw him a rather odd looking smile. Much to Harry's horror, he realized she was trying to be coy.

"You think I'm interesting?"

"Er... oh, yeah, definitely. I mean, the only ghost I've met is Sir Nicholas. I've seen a few other ghosts from afar, but they're all... you know... old."

She let out a mousey little giggle.

"It's true... I'm the youngest, newest ghost in Hogwarts. Myrtle Tetherwood. Eleven years old, died 1948 in this very bathroom. And you are?"

"Harry Potter, at your service."

"Hee hee, nice to meet you. What brings you to my little purgatory? I hope you aren't seriously sick, but if something should happen you are welcome to share my toilet."

"Er... that's very...um, generous of you, but I'm not that sick. I just had a little chat with Snape is all."

"Oh him. Well, I guess that explains it. Every so often I get girls coming in here crying about 'that greasy, wretched man'. As if they know the meaning of wretched. If they had to put up with half of what I had to with Emily Hornby, then they wouldn't be such babies! I mean she the reason I died after all. But I got her back! I made sure her Hogwart years were the most miserable seven years of her life. Hee hee hee..."

"Er... that's...um... Good for you. If you don't mind my asking, how did you die? Did Emily Hornby kill you?"

"Oh, no. I could beat her down in a real fight," she said. Harry frankly didn't think she looked like she could fight off a determined toddler. "No, I ran to the bathroom after she made fun of my glasses. When I finally stepped out I ran into a set of big yellow eyes, and then... I died."

He couldn't help but gape. There were things in the school that could kill you like that? Actually, now that he thought about it, it wasn't that odd. Voldemort was said to have office in one of the towers after all.

"Oh, that's awful."

"Isn't it? Hee hee. You better clean yourself up and go. Snape patrols the corridors for stray students after he finishes grading papers. He likes to give Gryffindors and Hufflepuffs detentions for lolly-gagging."

Taking her advice, he went to the set of sinks to wash out his mouth and cleanse his hands. He was curious to note that one of the sinks had a faucet designed to look like a snake. Remembering what Snape had said about magic statues, Harry whispered a little hello to it while Myrtle was busy rambling on about how awful it was being dead. To his amusement, the faucet hissed back:

“Could you please shut her up? Hee hee?”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Saturday afternoon found Professor Snape climbing the stairs to the far Eastern tower. The first week of term, always one of the most stressful, had long worn away at his nerves. There would be so many detentions this week the Sleuw’s wouldn’t have to lifted a finger until the Monday after next.

He paused at one of the tower windows, looking out across the grounds to see a few of those students who had escaped punishment. Draco and Hermione were headed towards the lake, hand in hand. Following a ways behind was Potter. He was carrying a large basket with the help of one his new Slytherin girls, Natalie Cypher. Bringing up the rear was Clyde Houghton, sandwiched uncomfortable between Crabbe and Goyle, and Ron Weasley with a blanket under his arm trailing behind.

Gryffindors and Slytherins out having a picnic together. If violence didn’t break out, then Hogwarts would have one more miracle added to a long list of them. Shaking his head, Snape climbed the rest of the way up the tower until he came to a blank wall.

“Verdania,” he said, tapping on of the stones. Nothing seemed to happen, but he moved forward anyway, passing through the wall with all the ease of a ghost.

“Cutting it close, aren’t you, Professor?” Bellatrix chided, lounging comfortably on a chaise. Pettigew had pinioned himself almost out of view between a set of bookcases and tried to pretend he was invisible.

Their master sat behind a magnificent mahogany desk, scanning files while a quill hovered off to the side, making notes on the man's unspoken thoughts. He looked very much at ease in the school tower, and Snape couldn't help but think for the thousandth time that perhaps Voldemort had chosen Lestrage as headmistress because he knew he'd end up running the school anyway.

"The dungeons are a bit further away than your office, Headmistress," he said dismissively, taking a seat in one of the reading chairs. "Besides, I saw something interesting on the way here that I thought relevant to our meeting."

Voldemort looked up from his papers, to show the man he had his attention.

"Potter is out on by the lake having a picnic..."

Bellatrix let out a rude snort.

"...with some Slytherins."

Now the woman looked stunned. She stood from her seat and stalked over to a telescope by the open window. She looked through it silently for a long time.

"Is that Draco?" she asked finally.

"Yes, and your niece Hermione Granger. She is Potter's best friend since they met in summer lessons. They're quite close I hear, and since Hermione is inseparable from Draco..."

"Interesting," said Voldemort, and the quill beside him was suddenly writing very quickly. "So he has not been taken in by Gryffindor's anti-Slytherin sentiment?"

"I don't think Potter realizes he's supposed to dislike Slytherins," Pettigrew spoke, able to control his stutter with Nagini gone and Voldemort currently in a pleasant mood. "No one dares say anything bad about Slytherins in front of Granger, and even fewer talk to Potter... if he knows, he doesn't care."

"He's more interested with keeping peace with my goddaughter than proving he's another Gryffindor neophyte," Snape concluded.

"Draco encourages this?" Bellatrix asked, sounding disappointed.

"Draco is like Potter, he's only interested in keeping Hermione happy. He's already a Slytherin prince, he doesn't feel the need to prove it to anyone. He keeps the other first years in line and off both Gryffindor's backs. Whether they will become friends or not is anyone's guess. Again it probably depends on Hermione."

"When did that little mudblood become such a player?" she grumbled, stalking back to her spot on the chaise. Snape turned an icy glare at her.

"Your niece is not a player. Potter and her have a genuine friendship, and Draco and her have always been close. You, 'Cissa, and Lucius were the same way."

Bellatrix sneered at him, but said nothing more. Voldemort looked amused with them both.

"I want you to talk with Draco, Severus," he said, "Encourage him to get along with Potter. Keeping an eye on him will be easier if he has friends in Slytherin."

"I will, my Lord."

"Now, all of you, tell me what you have gathered on the boy."

Pettigrew went first, as he had the least to say. He confirmed mostly what they already knew. Potter's best friend was Granger. His second closest friend was Clyde Houghton. He was on the outs with most of his house because of the negative attention he'd brought to Gryffindor during the welcoming feast, but that was starting to die down. There were a few tidbits about his habits- the boy was almost miserly with his school supplies (although he spared up enough scrap paper to doodle rather unflattering pictures of Snape and Ronald Weasley), was usually quiet and reserved, and was the object of some affection for the Weasley twins (he suspected Fred had a thing for the younger boy). Nothing fantastical had happened in the first week, and any anti-Voldemort sentiments never went beyond vague grumblings. Once Pettigrew was done, he was allowed to leave, but with a newly assigned task and small bundle under his arm.

Bellatrix went next. Her information was limited to official documents, most of it involving Potter's life before he moved to England. He attended a German muggle primary school in Cologne, and received fair marks. He was not part of any teams, but there were several awards for art, including first place for a city wide competition. The Potters had settled as artists in a small studio apartment, and did fairly well for themselves. James Potter dealt mostly with clay sculpture and dabbled in glass and metalwork. Lily Potter was interested mostly in watercolors. There was no evidence of magic being used or even talked about in their house, although without access to German Wizarding records there was no way to be certain. There was nothing to suggest that Harry knew his parents were anything other than eccentric muggles. They were shot to death in their studio by a robber, who overdosed on heroine before he was ever caught. Their work had been auctioned off, and placed in their son's trust fund. It was all muggle money, but it put Harry in fairly good standing.

Or would have if the relatives he was living with hadn't been bleeding it out as fast as they could. Potter's relatives were as muggle as they came. His aunt was a housewife, his uncle sold drills, and his cousin was likely the biggest, stupidest boy in the county. There was no sign of a British education, although WYRA reports said he was fluent in English and competent in math and science.

"He was either home schooled, self-taught, or years ahead before he came to England. Despite his parents withholding his wizarding heritage, he did well in Timbal's summer lessons. He'll be no more handicapped than the other muggleborns, perhaps less with my niece lecturing in his ear twenty-four-seven."

“And how does Mr. Potter feel regarding his parent’s death? Is he angry? Depressed? Does he still grieve?” Voldemort asked, schemes and manipulations flying across the parchment beside him.

“I don’t know. There’s no psychological records. He never went to a counselor, WYRA never reported any behavioral abnormalities, and he seems well adjusted.”

“But one can’t forget coming home to find their parents with their brains splattered across the living room,” Snape said, his finger following the lip of his tea cup.

“What? Where did you find that information. It’s not in the reports.”

“I don’t put much faith in second hand information,” he said, looking up her with a rather wicked expression. “Neither should you. Your records are woefully incomplete and misleading.”

“Really, Severus?” asked the Dark Lord, looking intrigued and amused at once. “Why don’t you fill us in?”

Snape’s report was definitely more interesting. He had samples of Harry’s art work from WYRA, no masterpieces by any stretch of the imagination, but the talent was clearly there. He had his own first hand accounts of the boy’s relatives, his living conditions, the extent of his first outburst of accidental magic, his magical aptitude test, the presentation of his wand, glimpses and impressions from their brief connection through occlumency, and a myriad of other pieces of information with the promise of more to come.

“He may not be anti-Slytherin, but he holds no love for you, my Lord. He still retains his memories of his parents and his former life, and though he doesn’t object to being removed from the Dursely’s, he does seem to resent your policy of removing muggleborns from their families. He has a rather naive belief that muggles should be given a chance to care for their wizarding children.”

“Do you think removing these memories would help endear him to me?”

Snape thought for a moment, and was surprised at how quickly the answer came to him.

“No. He’s a Gryffindor. If he believes you or anyone has acted against him in such a manner, he’ll mark you as an enemy for the rest of his life. It’s better to work around his stigma, unsettle the foundations of his grudge. Show him a kindness and he will loath himself for having thought you incapable of it.”

“More flies with honey, is it? And how precisely would I show this... kindness?”

“As an opportunity presents itself. Doing it now would only make him wary.”

“So sit and wait. You know I am not a patient man, Severus.”

“He is not going anywhere, my Lord.”

Voldemort chuckled darkly. His grin was definitely predatory when he looked back at his servants. Lestrage had come up short. No surprise really. Her position allowed her access to many records, but limited her exposure to the students themselves. Severus, on the other hand, had exceeded his expectations. His duties as both a Hogwarts teacher and a WYRA official had placed him in a very convenient position to gather intelligence on his target. That the man was on good terms with some of Potter’s closest associates was just icing on the cake.

Plans were starting to take shape in his mind, possibilities unraveling. The quill beside him went about like maddened humming bird, flicking spots of green ink as it went. He could imagine his enemies rolling in their graves as Harry fell into his grasp, molded into something dark and beautiful and owned.

“You have done well, both of you,” he said, mostly to ease the headmistress’ obvious resentment at having been so clearly outdone. “But as Severus is in the best position to watch Potter, I will charge him with keeping me informed of his activities. I’ll expect a report at least once every two weeks. You may both go.”

Severus hesitated a moment, and Voldemort gestured for him to speak his mind.

“Potter doesn’t know about his parents yet, but it’s only a matter of time before someone lets the truth slip despite the Taboo on their names. How do you wish to handle the matter when it arises?”

Voldemort thought for a moment.

"I will trust your judgement and cunning in this matter, Severus. Handle it in a matter that curve in rebellious actions on his part," he said, then paused as another thought came to him. "Restrict access to his family vault. The financial hold Hogwarts has over him may prove useful in the future. You have my permission to use whatever means you deem necessary."

Severus bowed in acknowledgment. The two servants exited the room together..

On the stairs, Bellatrix whirled around to snarl at the other man.

“Who do you think you are, showing me up like that? Know your place.”

Severus merely smirked.

“My place, dear Bella, has always been by our master’s side, serving him in every capacity I can... Even those that you can not.”

She hissed at him like a savage cat, whirling around to stalk down the stairs. He watched her go, pondering his own foolishness for provoking her. She was still the headmistress after all and in a position to make his life... difficult. He gave a mental shrug. Oh well. Even potion masters needed to find a little fun where they could.

[illegible]

Sorry, not a lot happened in this chapter. More happens next chapter and I hoped to have it posted earlier next week.

Chapter 14: The Prince's Choice of Steed

The week past as a flurry of exciting new experiences and unrealized fears.

His first experiences with spell casting had been discouraging, but he soon got over it when it became apparent that he was still doing better than a lot of his classmates, even the Pure Blooded ones. Professor Flitwick had even commented that he seemed to have a rather high magic level (this after he tried to charm a tea cup to keep tea warm and melted the cup).

Homework was an unpleasant necessity, but it usually went quickly with Hermione's guidance. They spent their afternoons just after class in the library with Draco and his three little goons (who remained blessedly quiet- even if Ron gave everyone dirty looks), Natalie, and Clyde. If they got done early enough they'd find an empty classroom and work in secret on spell casting- mostly charms and transfigurations. There the boys let their competitive sides come out, and levitation practice quickly turned into a game of keep away of Crabbe's quill.

Harry wasn't sure still if he liked Hermione's brother. He always seemed to be testing Harry to see if he was good enough to hang out with. Draco's friends, with the exception of Natalie, were a bit dim in his opinion as well. The blond only seemed to tolerate them for his own benefit. But occasionally, Draco would do or say something clever or playful or daring, and he could see what Hermione admired in him.

It wasn't as if he had a lot of alternatives in friends either. While Gryffindor's hostility had definitely mellowed through the week, his association with Slytherin seemed to ruffle a few feathers. Hermione had an excuse, since Draco was her brother, but Clyde and he were seen as conspiring with the enemy it seemed. No one was blatantly rude about it (yet) but no one seemed inclined to invite either boys in some house activities. That some of these people were friends with Clyde during summer lessons, seemed to really hurt the boy but he said nothing about it.

Fred and George Weasley had tried and failed to get Harry to accompany them on some pranking excursions. They seemed to think he'd derive some satisfaction from turning people's hair green for their less than fair treatment of him. Harry didn't give a damn. As far as he was concerned he had at least two good friends who stood by him and enough to do to occupy his time.

Although, the offer to help hex Snape was tempting.

Aside from the absurd deduction of points from Snape (he had to do two extra credit assignments and stay after in Charms to help clean up the piles of charmed feathers floating about to earn back said points), Snape had returned to ignoring him in class and had asked no more questions. But every so often he'd get this strange feeling the man was watching him.

Things had started to settle into a routine, until the following Thursday when Clyde woke him up ridiculously early by stampeding around the room.

"Clyde, what are you doing?" he grumbled, rubbing his eyes sleepily.

"Oh, sorry, Harry," the other boy said, but continued to run around in circles. "I've lost my other sock."

"Then wear a different pair," he suggested, and tried to lay back down for another hour's worth of sleep.

"No, I've lost my lucky pair of socks. I'm going to need them today."

"Hm? Why?" he asked, without opening his eyes.

"Harry, don't you remember? It's Thursday. Flying lessons!"

Now that woke him up. How could he have forgotten? It had been the only thing the first years had been able to talk about since they were announced on Monday.

Not that he wasn't excited either, of course.

The only one who didn't seem to be looking forward to it all was Hermione. From the manner Draco smirked and Hermione blushed when the topic was brought up, he rather thought Hermione must have finally found a subject she couldn't learn from a book.

Reluctantly, Harry got out of bed and prepared for the day. He found Clyde's sock under his bed, where Bilgerat (as he was dubbed by Clyde) had dragged it to insulate his rat nest. The rodent had popped up shortly after the first day of classes, and seemed quite intent on keeping close to his rescuer. Harry wasn't certain if he was flattered or irritated.

"Hey, what's that?"

Harry turned to see what had Clyde's attention. Sitting on Harry's trunk was a small leather bound book. He couldn't recall ever seeing it before, and it certainly hadn't been there the night before.

"I don't know. Someone must have forgotten it or put it there thinking it was mine."

Vaguely curious, he picked up the book. There was no title on the cover, and when he opened it to the cover page, it read "Diary of-". Where a name should have been was a water damaged smear of red ink. He could just make out an 'o' and an 'R', but the rest was illegible.

"Ooohhh! Let's take a peek," Clyde said, reaching for the book. Harry immediately moved it out of his friend's reach.

"No. It's someone's private thoughts. If it were me, I would kill anyone who made fun at them."

"If it such a big deal, then he shouldn't have left it out where anyone could find it."

"No."

Clyde pouted and glared and whined, and Harry thoroughly ignored him. As the other boys rose misty eyed from their beds, he asked if any of them owned a journal. No one fessed up to it, and seemed rather irritated with him for thinking they'd have something so 'girly'. Mystified and now suspecting someone was playing a prank on him, Harry resolved to give the journal to McGonagall. There was probably some sort of spell she knew that would reveal the owner and if anyone had tried to prank him then they would soon regret it.

He stuck the book in his pocket and headed down with Clyde to breakfast. Hermione was also up early, her nose buried in 'Quidditch Through the Ages', trying to find any tips she could. Just watching her stress gave Harry a headache. The constant, nervous babble about brooms and Quidditch and magical travel she poured out didn't make him feel any better. In fact, his headache only grew worse as classes began, and he began to wonder if he hadn't caught a cold. When it was finally time for flying lessons, Harry emptied his pockets and set them on his bag so they wouldn't be damaged in case he fell off a broom and then went to line up with the rest of the first year Gryffindors and Slytherins. With fresh air in his lungs and sun warm on his skin, Harry felt his headache recede a bit, but he still wanted to go and take a nap somewhere.

Professor Gimms regarded them all with piercing blue eyes, looking with a practiced gaze for the troublemakers and the slackers. In addition to being their flying coach and official referee for Hogwarts Quidditch matches, Gimms coordinated several clubs including a Riding Club (which usually involved a lot more than just horses) and Fencing club, and assisted Quirrell in some of his more 'physical' lessons. There were rumors running around the school that he had once been an Auror, and others that he had been a Death Eater. Harry thought about asking Hermione about him, but settling his curiosity wasn't worth the rambling monologue she'd end up spewing at him.

"Now," Professor Gimms began, "before we get started, let me set down some ground rules. Firstly, I don't care how good of a flyer you think you are. You will not ride your broom any higher or faster than I allow, and you will certainly never ride your broom when I am not present. If you're stupid enough to disobey me, then you will suffer the greatest degree of punishment I am able to legally inflict upon you... if you don't break your stupid neck first."

Harry wondered why all the teachers here were so grouchy. Only Flitwick seemed to have any sense of humor. They lived in an enchanted castle for goodness sake, not an orc fortress. While he was busy thinking these morose thoughts and ignoring his throbbing head, Gimms was rearranging the students. He suddenly found himself surrounded by Draco's goons, the surliest of them being Ron who was directly to his right. The redhead gave him a mutinous look.

"Careful," Harry said, sounding bored, "Your face might stick like that."

If anything the look grew even angrier.

"Now, hold out your wand hand towards your broom- like so, and command your broom firmly and confidently. Up!" Immediately, the professor's broom leapt into his hand. "Well, what are you waiting for?"

Harry watched as the other students commanded their brooms. He was vaguely amused to see Hermione's merely rolled over and seemed to fall asleep. Draco's broom found his hand immediately, but his was about the only one that did. The rest of the brooms hobbled or bounced a bit, but didn't rise. Harry, after seeing there was no way he could actually embarrass himself, held out his hand.

"Up," he said evenly. The broom sprung immediately into his grasp. A strange sensation ran through him, very similar to the one he felt the day he received his wand. It was a sense of rightness. A spontaneous understanding that no ill could ever find him when it was in his hands.

"Impossible," Ron muttered, "You cheated somehow. No way a filthy mudblood-

"Could ever succeed where a pureblood failed?"

"Why you son of a-

"Malfoy, Potter, well done," called Gimms, looking suddenly in a much better mood. "Five points to Slytherin and Gryffindor each. The rest of you, don't get discouraged. Confidence is key. If you don't believe the broom will come to you, then it won't. Continue practicing, and then I'll show you all how to mount your brooms."

While Harry waited for the others to catch up, he repeated the same exercise until he was quickly bored. Soon he began testing to see if he could make the broom rise part of the way or make it hover. Meanwhile, Ron grew increasingly red as his broom simply flopped about, until with a particularly frustrated 'UP!' his broom leapt up- and missed his hand altogether to conk him in the nose.

Harry pretended he hadn't noticed, but it was hard to keep a straight face with everyone else snickering. Ron didn't remain the center of their amusement for long. Just as everyone was starting to get the hang of summoning their brooms, the class was interrupted by a sixth year Ravenclaw in Quidditch robes running up to Professor Gimms.

"Sir! Someone's bewitched the quidditch equipment! The snitch is smashing into people like a bludger and the quaffles are flying all over the place," the boy exclaimed, looking very unsettled. "It's those Weasley twins, I know it! Who else would pull such a ridiculous prank? And on school property no less!"

Harry felt his lips twitch into a smile, but quickly hid it when he saw Professor Grimms good mood vanish as quickly as it had come.

"You all remain where you are! Under no circumstances are you to attempt to fly. I will be back momentarily."

With that, Professor Gimms disappeared with the Ravenclaw boy to the other side of the castle. No sooner than the man was out of sight, did Draco mount his broom and hover comfortably just above the ground. Hermione told him to get down, but the more she complain the higher he seemed to go until she decided to completely ignore him.

"What about you, Potter? You seem to have some talent with a broom. Care to come up and enjoy the view?"

If his head wasn't throbbing and he were in a better mood, Harry would have been very tempted. Instead he favored Draco a bored glance and merely shrugged.

"I'll wait."

Draco gave a mocking pout, but quickly returned to hovering in slow circles around the other students, preening under their fascinated stares. Hermione grew considerably more huffy, but said nothing. Gradually, even Draco seemed to grow bored (or perhaps he was beginning to worry about Gimms catching him) and began to descend when something behind Harry and Hermione caught his attention. Harry followed the other boy's gaze and found Ron standing next to his book bag, holding the mysterious journal.

"Hey! What are you doing in my bag?"

When the redhead looked towards him, he felt his insides squirm as he was stared at with such a twisted look of glee.

"You know," Ron said, "this isn't the sort of thing you should just leave lying around. You're just begging to have someone read it."

Harry began stalking towards Ron.

"It's not mine. I'm turning it in to McGonagall. Now hand it over."

"Why? If it's not yours, then I'm sure you won't mind me borrowing it. I promise I'll hand it over to a teacher later. You know...like Snape."

"Ron," snapped Natalie, "Don't be such a dick. Just give it back to him."

"You had no right snooping in Harry's bag! If we told a teacher, you'd really get it! Even your Head of House wouldn't approve of you stealing!"

"Who asked you, you mudblood harpies?!"

“That’s it!” Harry snarled, rushing at the redhead who panicked and started to run away. “Come back here, you little weasel.”

Ron spun around, wand in hand. His broom still clutched in his hand, Harry swung it and knocked the wand from his hand and into the lake. Ron stumbled back, nearly falling over, and snatched up a broom. Despite his miserable performance thus far, the redhead managed to mount his broom and lift himself shakily into the air. He wobbled a bit and looked extremely uncomfortable without his feet on the ground, but still managed to keep his hold on the diary and sneer down mockingly at Harry.

But only for a moment.

Harry was on his broom and hovering right beside him, staring him dead even in the eye. The broom rested calmly under his grip, neither wobbling nor wavering. Harry took it all for granted, trusting his broom and his body to know how to keep him levitating. His opponent looked barely able to hold onto his broom and remain aloft at the same time. Yet their brooms continue to hover, and as Ron instinctively moved away from Harry they were soon almost fifty feet up and over the lake.

“Give me the book and apologize to Hermione and Natalie,” he said, “Or I’ll knock you off your broom and you can swim back to Hogwarts.”

“Harry, get down from there! It’s dangerous and the professor will catch you any minute! Hurry up or you’re going to get expelled,” Hermione pleaded.

Draco, who had been silently watching the conflict unravel, also spoke up.

“You heard her, Weasley. Fight it out if you want, but do it on the ground.”

Ron looked decidedly unsure. Harry thought him even dimmer than before. It should have been obvious that he couldn’t win this fight... at least not in the air. Ron finally seemed to come to that conclusion as well. He glowered at Harry.

“We’ll continue this later,” he snarled.

In a final act of vindictiveness, he hurled the diary in his hand as hard as he could out onto the lake. Harry watched it arch through the air and time seemed to slow. In his hands, his broom suddenly felt alive, and he could feel its will and desire like a physical sensation. And he was suddenly streaking past a startled Ron.

The diary began to fall and Harry instinctively angled the broom towards the water. He could see his own dark shadow grow as he reached the water’s surface, halloed in the glittering reflection of the sun. Her drew closer and closer, until he could see beyond his shadow to the strange shapes of plant life and giant fish (mermaids?) and then leveled out. He clung tight to his broom, tucking in his arms and legs to increase his control. So close the water’s surface he was, that if he had unwrapped his leg from the wood it would surely have hit the water and sent him crashing. But his leg didn’t drop down. Instead his arm reached out, and with perfect ease he snatched the falling diary right out of the air.

His goal achieved, he felt himself slow and carefully rose a little higher and made a slow turn back towards the shore. The sight that met him nearly made him loose hold of his broom. Professor Gimms stood stony faced with Ron’s ear twisted in his grip, but he had eyes only for Harry. He hovered for a long moment, uncertainty and the first inklings of fear seeping into his psyche. Finally, knowing that prolonging the inevitable wouldn’t make it any better, he steadily flew to eventually stand beside the professor.

“The both of you will return to your dormitories immediately, while I finish the rest of the lesson. I will have a word with both of your Heads of House to work out a thorough and suitable punishment for your stupidity,” Professor Gimms said, scowling darkly at both of them.

Both boys stared guiltily at the ground and said nothing. He released Ron, who immediately went to collect his things and disappeared into the castle. Harry shuffled passed, but not before the man snatched up the diary and gave his hearty slap upside the head with it.

“Dunderhead!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The wait for Professor Gimms punishment was perhaps the second most nerve-wracking wait of his young life. The first had been his trip to the Headmistress’ office, but the longer the time dragged on the more intense his nervousness became. His imagination provided all sorts of cruel acts and bizarre punishments that might be inflicted on him.

Perhaps they would forbid him from flying ever again. Or lock him in the dungeons for a month. With the Nagini incident not even two weeks old, they might decide he was too much of a troublemaker and expel him.

These were the tamer punishments.

The more severe ones involved Voldemort and the cruciatus curse. Professor Snape and a cane or whip or a potion so vile it couldn’t be taught in school. And worse of all was the thought that they might snap his wand. He didn’t know if he’d be able to survive that.

To make matters worse, it would all be for nothing.

His irritation so great for the blasted journal had motivated him to opening it and discerning its owner so he could wail at him or even her. It was empty. Aside from the ruined cover page there wasn’t even a smidgen of ink or pencil anywhere inside it. One of the other boys probably got it as gift from a relative and decided they didn’t want it, tossing it on his trunk and refusing to claim it. He was so tempted to throw it in the fireplace.

However, he decided to hold onto it when he finally made his case to McGonagall. He doubt he’d get out of punishment, but proof that he hadn’t actually started the trouble might go a long way. He could just imagine Ron attempting to explain himself to Snape, and result was rather amusing in his own head. Of course, Snape wouldn’t deduct points like McGonagall might. Everyone new the man would sooner assign a detention than deduct a single point from his own House.

“Hey, Harry,” came a voice behind him, followed by a another very similar.

“We heard that you-”

Fred and George were suddenly sitting on either side of him.

“Our bright and shining hero-”

“Had a delightful adventure-”

“With our prat of a younger brother-”

“And are now awaiting your execution.”

Harry ignored them, in no mood to be teased. Instead of being dissuaded, they crowded in closer until they were practically snuggling with him.

“We heard you performed brilliantly on your broom. Like a professional instead of a first timer,” said Fred, putting his arm around Harry’s shoulder.

“Any thought to joining the quidditch team? Our last real Seeker left last year, and this year we had to put Angelina in that position. She’s normally a Chaser, but no one else is small enough for the position,” said George, putting his arm around Harry’s other shoulder.

“She’s alright, mind you, but we need some real talent this year if we’re going to finally beat Slytherin in the championship.”

Despite himself, Harry felt his curiosity rise.

“Does Slytherin win often then?”

The twins shared a rare disgruntled look.

“Try every year. At least since Voldemort took the school. He comes to almost all of the games where Slytherin play,” said Fred. “I think his presence intimidates the rival players into losing. Especially the Seekers.”

“And I suppose you want me to be a Seeker?”

“Well, you are the right build,” said George.

“And have good speed, or so I’ve heard,” continued Fred.

“Plus you must have had good eye and hand coordination to catch that book while flying that close to the water.”

“And of course, Voldemort already hates you, so... Hey, no loss there.”

“Oh thanks! Why don’t you just stamp ‘Please Cruciatus Me’ on my forehead?”

“And mar that beautiful soft skin of yours?”

“Never!”

With that, the twins really did snuggle up to Harry, pressing their freckled cheeks to his. Harry let out a frustrate sound and shoved them both off and away from him, snagged a pillow and smacked them both upside the head with it. His mistake was soon apparent when both twins shared a grin and took up their own fluffy weapons. The pillow fight that resulted soon grew beyond just the three and quickly involved anyone unfortunate enough inside or passing through the commons room.

When Professor McGonagall and Professor Glimps finally arrived to discuss Harry’s punishment, they were immediately coated in a fine cloud of feathers and a suddenly tense silence. Harry quickly tossed his half ruined pillow behind the sofa and hoped neither had noticed. Judging by the slight twitch in the corner of their Head of House’s eye, it seemed a futile hope.

“Weasleys, I want this room cleaned up and the pillows repaired by the time I return or you’ll be cleaning more than just feathers out of the owlry this weekend. Potter, follow us.”

Sheepishly, but considerably calmer than he had been, Harry jogged after the retreating professors. They said nothing to him, and thinking they might need time to reign in their anger, he did not disturb them. Instead of going to either McGonagall’s office or the headmistress’s like he had thought they would, they made their way instead outside the castle and towards the quidditch pitch.

It was lunch time and the grounds and pitch were almost empty. None of the first years or the Ravenclaw quidditch team remained. The only person present was a sixth year boy he recognized as a Gryffindor with large chest set beside him. He regarded Harry intently and (was it his imagination?) hopefully.

“So this is him?” the older boy said.

“Yes, this is Harry Potter,” replied McGonagall, “Professor Gimms believes he is just what you need.”

“Huh?” Harry said stupidly, now thoroughly confused. Was this other boy going to be in charge of his punishment somehow?

“Mister Potter,” the stern witch said, finally turning to regard him fully, “this is Oliver Wood. He’s going to help us perform a few tests involving your maneuvering skills on a broom. How well you perform will determine the shape of your punishment. I recommend you do your very best.”

“Huh?”

Professor Gimms took his hand and shoved a broom into it. “Don’t think about it. Just get on your broom. We’re going to release the snitch. The faster you catch it the less trouble you’ll be in. Understand?”

“No!”

“Go!” shouted Wood. The wooden trunk was now open and something shiny and golden flew out. Harry leapt onto his broom and was immediately after it. Again the feeling of rightness returned as his feet left the ground. Fears and anxieties were blown away in the cool autumn wind. His usual tumult of feelings were simplified into a singular sensation of freedom and his only thought lay in catching the Snitch.

It was much harder than his first flight across the lake. The lake had been open and flat and relatively safe. The journal had flown in an easily calculated trajectory. The quidditch pitch was a myriad of obstacles: the stands, the stadium walls, the goal posts. And the Snitch flew like a living thing, weaving about these obstacles, diving up and down, pausing, turning right back around, spirals, and loopy-loops and always at the speed of a hummingbird.

Twice he had brushed ever so lightly against the stadium walls as he pursued, and once just a foot above the ground. He followed the snitch between and around the goal posts, quickly learned the futility of it and tried short cuts and prediction of the golden ball's path but failed more often than not. A surprising series of twists, turns, and whirls and snitch disappeared.

Frantically, he searched the pitch, but it could have been anywhere. Above, below, behind him, behind the stands or hovering momentarily in the shadow of a goal post, anywhere. He forced himself to remain still, searching for even the slightest glimmer. The time stretched to a minute, then two, then three, and Harry felt anxiety return to him.

It was taking too much time. He wasn't doing well at all. He was going to be punished more severely for wasting everyone's time now. Perhaps they'd expel-

THERE!

He dropped like a rock- no, even faster than gravity would allow on its own, speeding straight down. His arm shot out, wrapping around something hard and round. But he was going too fast to stop his descent and the ground was coming on fast. He kicked the back of the broom so it angled directly up and willed it to rise. It was futile to think he could stop himself completely with so little time, but he tightened his grip and the handle and braced himself.

As the ground became a scant four feet and him still falling, he released his legs from the broom and landed heavily on his feet. He stumbled, but held his balance. Only now with his feet on the ground did he realize what he had just done. His first day of flying and he'd been zooming about like a lunatic. He was sweaty and breathing quickly, both his broom and the Snitch felt as if they would fly out of his weakening grip at any moment.

"Yes, yes, YES!" he heard Wood cry. "He's perfect! We have to have him now."

Harry turned around. The other Gryffindor was jumping up and down with excitement, practically dancing around their Head of House. She looked positively stunned, and her glasses had slipped clean off her nose. Gimms remained calm and composed, but the thin line of his mouth curved up just a little. McGonagall suddenly came back to herself.

She strode over to Harry and held out her hand. Uncertainly, he handed her the Snitch. She look at it closely, a smile of satisfaction reaching her lips. The smile remained as she looked down at her pupil.

"Congratulations, Mr. Potter. You are now Gryffindor's new Seeker."

"Huh?"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry is in quidditch again, Ron's in trouble, the Weasley twins may or may not be gay, and a mysterious diary appears... well, mysteriously. I rather enjoyed this chapter.

Chapter 15: Crowning of the Prince

Harry couldn't help but wonder if the Weasley twins hadn't known he was going to be drafted as their new Seeker. He had returned to Gryffindor tower (feather free no less) and found the twins still there, looking rather smugly between themselves. Clyde and Hermione made a show of doing their homework- or at least Hermione did- but were by his side the moment he'd entered the door.

"You haven't been suspended, have you?" she asked immediately.

He just barely managed a reassuring smile for her. He felt strangely disoriented and wondered if he'd actually taken a hit to the head during McGonagall's 'test'.

"I'm fine... I guess."

"Was it really awful, Harry?" asked Clyde, who looked him over critically for signs of injury. "What did they do to you?"

"Do to me? They didn't beat me with a cane if that's what you're wondering. I just... got scolded a bit. And detention... lots of detention. I'm basically the Quidditch team's towel boy for the season. I've got to attend all their practices and clean up after them and assist Wood in drills."

Now this statement was not entirely true and not entirely false. McGonagall had given him a choice. He could either spend Quidditch practice actually practicing with the team or he could spend it in real detention. The Weasley twin's talk of possibly angering Voldemort by actually winning (and if he was going to play he would never intentionally lose), made the second option tempting. The fact that Wood, McGonagall, and Grimms said he would be their secret weapon in the upcoming match (Youngest Seeker in a century! Wood had said ecstatically) made him that much more nervous.

But he couldn't backout. Not really.

McGonagall, in addition to threatening to put a dent in his free time for several months with detention, had also deducted fifty points from Gryffindor for his behavior. They both knew he'd feel obligated to earn them back, and the only way to do that was win at least one Quidditch match. He wondered if the sorting hat hadn't suggested Slytherin to his Head of House when she first came to Hogwarts as well.

Until his first match, however, everyone except his teammates, Head of House, and Professor Glimps would believe he was being punished in the more traditional manner.

Hermione naturally cringed when he told her of the loss of points. Clyde wasn't much better. He actually looked pale.

"Well, you're going to be real popular now, Harry," he snipped. Harry could only stare as the other boy stalked out of the common room.

"What'd I do?"

"That's rhetorical, I hope," she said, raising an eyebrow. "I could make quite a list."

"It's not my fault Ron is a thieving prat!" he defended, then quickly turned to the Weasley twins. "Nothing personal."

They both shrugged.

"But you certainly didn't have to rise to the bait!"

"What was I suppose to do? He stole out of my bag, insulted me, insulted you and Natalie, and then tried to destroy my property-."

"I thought you said it wasn't your diary?"

"That makes it so much better! Was I suppose to let him get away with all of that?"

"You could have told a teacher! Now instead of just him being punished, you and the rest of us is going to have to pay for it as well."

"I won't be bullied by that stupid bigot," Harry growled, stalking towards his dorm room.

"No matter who else has to pay the price for your pride?!" she snapped back, just as angrily.

"I will take responsibility for myself, pride and all. Don't worry, I'll earn back your precious points!"

She called after him as he rushed up the stairs, but he ignored her. He half expected her to run up after him and apologize, but she didn't. Now he was stuck in his dorm when he should have been at dinner, too prideful to sulk down to the Great Hall and endure not only Gryffindor's scorn but his supposed friends as well.

"You are going to be popular after all this, aren't you," said Fred, popping down beside him on his bed. George sat across from them on Clyde's bed. "You being such a charmer and all."

"Shut up," Harry snapped, frustrated with the entire day and everyone it involved. Double Potions with Slytherin was tomorrow as well, making everything seem that much more wretched. "I'm not in the mood to amuse you."

"Jeepers, he's swell, don't you think Fred?"

"So fun and cuddly. I wish we could keep him."

Harry turned away from them, his 'go away' muffled by his pillow.

"If it's any consolation, Ronnykins got off a lot worse than you did. He has to clean the dungeons every Friday and Saturday evening for a month. No magic. The mildew has been building up for years."

He couldn't help but smile at the mental image of Moaning Myrtle screeching at Ron Weasley while he scrubbed out toilets. With that thought, perhaps he had gotten off light. It wasn't like he didn't love flying, and Quidditch seemed like a lot of fun. If somehow he did manage to win more than one game then he would more than make up for the points lost. Ron would be livid with jealousy. Draco wouldn't be able to question his worthiness of Hermione's friendship. His fellow Gryffindors might actually forget about his earlier mistakes. McGonagall would be proud to have him in her House.

Youngest Seeker in a century, echoed in his head, finally sinking in.

Yes, he could do it. He would do it. Sitting up, he looked to both the twins, his green eyes shining brilliantly with determination.

"Tell me about Quidditch."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Predictably, the other Gryffindors were not happy about the loss of points. It was so early in the year they hadn't had a lot to begin with, and Harry's misadventure set them back to almost zero. Their irritation with the first year was made painfully clear everyday and with every opportunity.

Things that Harry left out unattended had a tendency to disappear. He had to constantly watch out for feet or objects suddenly appearing to trip him up. McGonagall had taken to informing Harry when the password to the common room changed since the prefects neglected to mention it to him. Unflattering nicknames like 'the Black Cat of Gryffindor' and 'Little Miserable' started finding their way into meal-time conversations and hallway gossip.

There were even rumors going around that his 'Slytherin friends' were somehow paying him to sabotage Gryffindor's chances at the House Cup. Which was a bit conceited, Harry thought, since Gryffindor hadn't won the House Cup in over a decade.

If it weren't for the Weasley twins, who were both well liked and very feared (they were equal opportunity pranksters, but woe to those who earned their vexation), and their obvious fondness towards him, Harry suspected it would have been much worse. At least he received some reprieve with the other Gryffindor quidditch players who seemed to agree with Wood that he had the skills to win their next match and were willing to set aside their misgivings. At least on the field anyway.

Hermione was more stressed than ever about her academics, now frantic to return Gryffindor to the lead. She never directly blamed Harry for the loss of points again, but he couldn't help but feel a flush of guilt any time he missed a single opportunity to regain house points while she worked herself to exhaustion. This was made especially difficult since now McGonagall was strangely frugal with points, Snape was forever a point miser to Gryffindor, Quirrel hadn't bothered with points for over two weeks, and he wasn't particularly strong in any of his other subjects.

Clyde hadn't continued his snappish attitude either, but he was spending more time with his other friends now than with Hermione and him. Harry didn't blame him. Who would give up all their Gryffindor friends- and Clyde had several now that he had apparently given up on 'the Black Cat'- just for one particularly difficult one?

Harry dealt with it all as stoically as he could. He kept to himself during classes and meals, studied as much as he could tolerate in his free time with Hermione, and pretended Ronald Weasley didn't exist even when they were sat next to each other in Potions.

Quidditch season couldn't have come soon enough. The weather turned cool and frosty as autumn set in, and morning practice were done in robes charmed against the nipping cold. Harry took to coming to the field early, just so he could be alone, hovering high over the pitch and looking out over the fiery colored forest and golden fields of the Scottish countryside.

The first Saturday of November was just as chilly and beautiful, but Harry did not go out to admire the view. Today was the first match of the season. Gryffindor versus Slytherin. He was up just before dawn to grab some breakfast and then went straight to the Quidditch pitch. The rest of the team arrived soon after.

"Alright gentlemen-" Wood began, as they all gathered around him.

A polite cough.

“And ladies,” he correct himself, “This is it. First game of the season. I know we haven’t had much luck over the years-”

A not so polite snort.

“-but we’ve got the advantage now. The Slytherins are going to come in cocky and sure, ready to take on Angelina, whose abilities they’re already familiar with. They’re going to get the shock of their life when they spot Potter instead, and you can bet they’re going to under estimate him. Our best chance is to keep them distracted and disoriented until Harry catches the Snitch.”

Wood turned to Harry.

“You just concentrate on catching the Snitch, got it Potter? Your only concern is that.”

“And not getting knocked off your broom,” said one of the Chasers.

“Just the snitch.”

“Or smashed into a wall. Those Slytherins are a nasty lot,” Angelina pointed out.

“SNITCH ONLY!”

Harry swallowed thickly and nodded.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry and the other Gryffindors kept their hoods up as they entered the field. Wood was bound and determined to keep their surprise until the last possible moment. Judging by the confused whispering as they marched out, it certainly seemed to be working on the crowd. Everyone had assumed Angelina was going to be Seeker, but even with the hoods up it was apparent that the current Seeker was a little too short.

It wasn't until they were lined up face to face with the Slytherin team that they all finally drew back their hoods. A stunned gasp and intense discussion swept through the crowd. The Slytherins up in the stands were hissing out 'foul' before the game even started. The Gryffindors didn't look much happier, and most seemed convinced the game was already lost. Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw looked more intrigued than anything and were eagerly calling for the match to start.

Looking directly at the Slytherin Seeker- a fifth year boy who looked better built to be a Beater than a Seeker- Harry couldn't help but notice he didn't look as surprised as Wood had suggested. In fact, the boy was looking down right smug.

It seemed a bad premonition for the match to come.

"Players!" called Professor Gimms, dressed in his referee robes. "Mount your brooms!"

The crowd hushed, understanding that the game was about to start and they could only sit back and watch it unfold. Harry had to consciously force himself not to shoot up the moment his feet began to hover above the ground. He rose slowly and gradually with the other players until they were even with the stands. From here he could look directly into the 'Emperor's box', and see a gathering of some of his least favorite people. Voldemort sat in what could only be described as a throne, flanked on either side by teachers and his personal guard in less obsequious chairs. The Dark Lord looked curious, but not surprised, and perhaps a touch amused. To his right sat Headmistress Lestrage, looking extremely unhappy, and to his left was Professor Snape who looked as smug as his House's Seeker. A bit behind them was McGonagall. She looked worried.

Harry did his damndest to feel nothing but the unbridled thrill of flying. Somewhere in the crowd were his friends, but he had no time to look for them.

The Snitch had been released, and instead of immediately searching for it, Harry was forced to shoot upwards to avoid the Slytherin Seeker as he made a rush for him. Once the boy had passed, he made for the direction he had seen the Snitch go, but again had to drop suddenly and then turn right sharply as two other Slytherin players came at him.

“Foul! Three fouls!” shouted Gimms, “Three penalty shots to Gryffindor!”

“Not half a minutes into the game and three fouls already!” came the voice of the student announcer. “That has to be a record! It looks like it’s going to be one intense match today! Captain Oliver Wood has unleashed a secret weapon, a new Seeker who looks to be holding his own. Will the ‘Black Cat of Gryffindor’ pull through or will bad luck follow him to his team’s defeat?”

Ferguson, the most experienced of Gryffindor’s Chasers, took all three penalty shots with ease but didn’t look at all pleased. It was apparent to him and everyone else on the team that their surprise was anything but, and Slytherin had just adopted the strategy they had hoped to use.

Harry didn’t linger on the unfairness of it, but took the time to assess everyone’s positions and locate the Snitch. The Slytherin team had him surrounded, but hadn’t taken into account above or below him which he thought careless of them. Additionally, their Seeker seemed more intent on watching Harry get pummeled by his teammates than actually looking for the Snitch. The Weasley twins seemed to have sorted out a strategy of their own and nodded to Harry when he briefly caught their eye.

The moment all three penalty shots were taken, Gimms blew the whistle to resume the match. The Slytherins descended on Harry like a pack of wolves. But Harry was no deer and he was no boar. His world did not exist on a single plain or on base thought. He dropped quickly, using his descent to quickly gain speed as he passed under a Beater. The opposing players made to chase him, but they were heavier and slower and the Seeker suddenly didn’t look so smug.

“And Potter’s avoided the Slytherin’s tackle- ouch! And Slytherin Chaser Morgenson takes a hit with a Bludger! Stay alert there boys! Potter seems to have spotted the Snitch! Slytherin Seeker Andrew Whitehall is too far behind to catch up! Is this match already coming to an end?!"

The Snitch shot down and for the stands, and Harry pursued heedless of the danger. The golden ball sudden leapt away from the wall, angling off and downwards. Coming in too fast to avoid collision with the wall, he turned his broom sharply and turned his body on his side so that he hit the wooden platform with his feet and kicked off back into the field. A Slytherin smashed into the arena wall where Harry had just been and fell off her broom. Stunned, Harry watched as the girl fell to the ground below her.

So that's what those sand pits were for.

"And Casteel is down! But she's climbing to her feet! What an athlete! And the new Gryffindor Seeker is proving to be harder to pin down than anyone had thought! What a match!"

Seeing she wasn't hurt too grievously, he turned his attention back to finding the Snitch, but in his momentary distraction it had disappeared from his sight. But he was given no reprieve to look for it. He barely managed to avoid a Bludger an opposing Beater hit his way, and was side swiped a moment later by said Beater. The Weasley twins were rallying though and between the two of them, they managed to hit a Slytherin with both Bludgers at once.

"And Westbanks is hit with a double whammy! He's managed to stay on his broom but you can tell the breath's been knocked out of him!"

The Quidditch field was quickly descending into a battle field, and so many fouls and penalties were being called that the players were soon starting to ignore the referee altogether. Angelina was intentionally run into a goal post and had to be replaced by a very reluctant spare. One of the twins was bleeding from the head, but showed no signs of slowing, although he seemed a bit confused and hit a Quaffle at the Slytherin captain. The crowd was on the edge of their seats, gasping and cheering and booing in a cacophony of noise. Harry tried to keep out of the madness as much as possible and search for the Snitch, but the Slytherins were making it difficult. He was forced to keep moving, faster than the other players and in erratic patterns, and the few times he spotted the Snitch he had to look away to avoid an oncoming Bludger or Slytherin or goal post or wall.

Westbanks, the Slytherin Seeker, had given up on watching Harry and was actually trying to find the Snitch as well. Harry had managed to distract him twice by pretending to see the Snitch, but the boy had soon caught on.

The match quickly began to tire Harry, and his bruised arm was starting to ache terrible. If he didn't find and catch the Snitch soon, then someone was probably going to get seriously hurt. That someone was most likely him.

He ducked under Wood while trying to throw off one of his pursuers and as he glanced up to make sure the two didn't collide, he saw something shiny above the other players. Unwilling to lose sight of it yet again, he shot upwards, nearly knocking his captain off his broom. The Slytherin Seeker followed, but it was clearly too late for him.

His broom angled straight up, he reached out with his hand to wrap his hand around the tiny metal ball. It shone like a second sun, blinding in its brilliance, and everything slowed into a singularly perfect moment. He could see and feel it in his hands, felt a joyous triumph as the delicate wings stilled, and the golden ball rested serenely in his grasp.

And then the world shatter.

Something fast and hard smashed into his back, between his shoulder blades. Broom and rider were torn apart. For a moment, both seemed to hover as if suspended. And then Harry began to fall.

He was too stunned to panic, and that was ironically what saved him. His thoughts were simple, ordered, and to the point.

I'm falling, was his first thought. I'm falling without my broom. I need my broom.

And very calmly, he called upon that instinct that had been present that fateful Thursday last September. It was the very same instinct that compelled his broom to leap into his hand with a simple 'UP!'. He reached out his hand, the one not clutching to the Snitch, to his hovering broom and released a command.

"Come!"

And it obeyed. In a flash the broom flew the fifty feet that had separated them to smack painfully into his hand. He gripping it as tightly as he could and felt his descent begin to slow. Too weak to climb back onto his broom and still too stunned to consider relinquishing the snitch, Harry hung helplessly by one hand as he made his gradual descent.

The entire arena was deathly still. Harry continued to float down, past the other players who all stared stunned as he went passed. Still a bit dazed, he looked one Slytherin in the eye as he passed and said simply:

"Bludger."

The boy blinked. "What?"

A malevolent black ball smashed into his side a moment later and unseated him. The broken tableau seemed to bring everyone back to their senses.

"Harry Potter's caught the Snitch! Gryffindor WINS!"

A deafening cheer rose up all around. Harry's feet had barely touched the ground, legs unable to support him, and Weasley's arms were suddenly around him. They were soon followed by the rest of the Gryffindor team who surrounded and praised and shook and thumped his bruised back.

"You did it, Harry! You did it! You did it!"

And Harry nodded and grinned and ignored the painful throb of his body. Beyond the circle of Gryffindors, the Slytherins were only now descending. Though he was no stranger to hatred, he couldn't help but be a bit shocked at the sheer malevolence they exuded in his direction. If he weren't surrounded by his own teammates he had no doubt he would not have left the pitch on his feet.

Suddenly, his teammates fell silent and pulled away from him in order to watch the Dark Lord stride towards them. His expression was completely neutral, as was Snape's, but Lestrangle looked positively livid. Again, he felt as if his legs were going to give out underneath him.

It wasn't until Voldemort stood directly in front of him that Harry realized the other players had all fallen behind him to form perfect triangle, and bowed down on one knee in reverence. Harry was about to follow their example, but an outraged cry made him hesitate.

"He cheated!"

Everyone turned their attention to Morgenson, who stood next to a very red faced Whitehall. Snape lifted a brow.

"Care to expand on that?"

"He obviously has extra spells on his broom!" the dark boy groused, "There's no other way he could have summoned his broom like that without additional charms. He's a cheater."

With that, the boy pointed his broom at him like a giant accusing finger.

"It is rather suspicious," the Headmistress said offhandedly.

Harry felt himself flush at the accusation, glaring at the other boy.

"Do you have anything to say in your defense, Mr. Potter?" Voldemort asked, his tone more curious than accusatory. His indifference eased much of Harry's anxiety for what he was about to do.

"Yes. Up!"

Morgenson's broom leapt clean out of his hands and right into Harry's. The boy was jerked forward by the move, lost his balance, and fell flat on his face.

"MR. POTTER!" Lestrage snapped in outrage, snapping out her wand. Harry stepped back, but before she utter the curse on the tip of her tongue, Voldemort placed his hand on her wand and lowered it.

"I believe Mr. Potter has vindicated himself of wrong doing. I will not have him punished for an exceptional display of wandless magic or flying skill," Voldemort said pleasantly, although his eyes glinted harshly as he spoke to her. They softened, or at least lost their crimson glow, when he turned back to Harry. "In fact, it is deserving of recognition. Kneel down, Mr. Potter."

Cautiously, he did as he was told, bowing as the others did on one knee but never taking his eyes off the man. With twirl of his wand and a wordless incantation, a crown of golden laurels appeared in mid-air, and hovered there until Voldemort took it in both hands.

"To the victor," Voldemort said, and his voice echoed through the entire arena, "Glory and Honor everlasting."

And silence that enveloped the arena shattered into another riot of noise and jubilee. When the man spoke again, it was no longer amplified.

"You may rise." And Harry did, looking at the man questioningly. Voldemort merely smiled, a strange secret smile and leaned close to whisper in his ear. "It suits you."

And with that the Dark Lord strode away, leaving Harry terrible confused and blushing horribly. Bellatrix remained where her master had left her, her wand pointed towards the ground and looking as if she had somehow been betrayed. A twitch started under her eye, and she abruptly turned and stormed off the field, snapping something at the cluster of sulking Slytherins. Snape favored him an amused look.

"As interesting as today's match was," the dark man began, "Mr. Potter, I do hope you'll be exercising a bit more caution in the following matches. I rather don't fancy the other players attempting to mimic you. I'm in charge of stocking the infirmary after all."

Harry for the life of him couldn't tell if he was joking with him, complimenting him, insulting him, or just making a suggestion. So he just sniffed at him. Once the Slytherins had all left the field, he was embraced by his teammates once again who still couldn't seem to believe that they had not only won, but survived to celebrate it.

"Oh wait until tonight, Harry!" one of the twins said.

"There's going to be such a party!" said the other.

"AND YOU'RE THE GUEST OF HONOR!" they shouted together.

All Harry could do was grin and let them all carry him to the showers.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It wasn't until much later that Harry actually got the opportunity to shower. No sooner than he reached the locker room, than it seemed that every Gryffindor in school, and not a few Ravenclaws and Hufflepuffs as well, was dropping by to congratulate him. Classmates who had ignored or even down right antagonized him were suddenly shaking his hand and saying things like 'I knew you were something special' and 'Can I have your autograph?'. It was all very baffling to him.

Even more baffling was that Hermione didn't seem at all pleased.

"You could have died!" she shouted at him, shoving aside several of his admirers in order to speak to him.

"It's only a game," Harry shouted back in order to be heard. "I did it to regain those points I lost. It was McGonagall's idea! Aren't you happy? If I win the next match, Gryffindor will be in the lead!"

A triumphant cheer rose from the crowded locker room at the mention of a another victory to come. Hermione attempted to shout something in response but her voice was lost amongst everyone else's. Eventually, she gave up and stocked off. He tried to follow after her, but was distracted when Clyde was suddenly in front of him.

"You did it mate! You actually did it. I can't believe I ever doubted you!"

But you did. The bitter thought rose up, seemingly out of no where, and Harry forced it away. Clyde might have been upset lately, but he hadn't stopped being his friend. If it just so happened that it was easier now to be more of friend, well then... he'd remember it in the future.

Finally, the rest of his team locked everyone out of the locker room so that they could all clean up and get ready. Still a bit shy about showers, he let the other boys go first as he checked and put away equipment. When everyone else had left, he took an extra long, hot shower. The hot water soothed his bruised and aching body, until he felt loose and relaxed. He switched into a clean, comfortable set of clothes and headed towards the castle to join in the revelry.

He never made it.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

A bit of danger in the next chapter and a familiar face makes an appearance.

Chapter 16- The Prince and the Grey Wolf

Harry knew he was being carried. He knew that whoever was carrying him was not being at all careful or gentle with the task. He knew it was starting to get dark.

Aside from that, he didn't have much clue as to what was happening. Any attempt to follow a single line of thought was thwarted by the twenty other unrelated thoughts that popped up to lead him astray. The world tilted and twirled, and he was powerless to right it, to even close his eyes to the madness of it.

And then suddenly, someone spoke and his mind cleared.

Ruthlessly, he was dropped to the ground and kicked in the side. He let out a cry and tried roll away, but someone else came from the other side smashed a boot between his shoulders. His two attackers continued kicking and stomping him mercilessly for a while longer, until Harry was certain they intended to kill him like that. But they stopped abruptly, and dragged him to his feet.

His body screamed in protest and he screamed along with it, but even that was too painful. He could barely breath, his lungs pressed against his injured ribs and collarbone, but he tried to beg them to stop. All he could manage was a gaspy sound, and his captors ignored him.

He was dragged to a tree and thrown against it. Here he must have blacked out for a moment, for when he opened his eyes again his hands were around the tree and he was facing two very angry looking Slytherins. Whitehall stood shoulder to shoulder with Morgenson, sneering down at him, their wands poised.

"I can't believe this little shit beat us," Whitehall sneered.

"Beat you, you mean," Morgenson said, although he looked just as displeased. "We would have won if you'd been doing your job and actually looked for the stupid Snitch."

The Slytherin Seeker shoved the other boy harshly.

“You were suppose to have taken care of him during the match. That was your job! Then you had to make everything worse and embarrass the team in front of the Dark Lord!”

Morgenson shoved the other boy back, knocking him to the ground and pointing his wand at him.

“At least I tried to defend our honor. You all just stood there like nitwits, while our Lord payed homage to that mudblooded GRYFFINDOR!”

The two boys were quickly trading blows, temporarily forgetting Harry for which he was grateful. Despite the lifting of the charm, a stunning hex he believed, he was still a bit unclear about what was happening. He had been kidnaped by these boys and taken to what appeared to be a clearing in a very large expanse of forest.

It wasn't the Forbidden Forest, that much Harry knew. The trees were younger and darkness within them was more natural. However, the cold autumn night was fast approaching and the rising dark was quickly becoming ominous. As distracting as the pain and cold was, Harry could figure out that this strange place meant something bad was in store for him. Little boys found dead in the woods wasn't such rare tale after all, and it seemed the humiliated Slytherins had been inspired.

As if to confirm his sense of dread, a long mournful howl fell over the woods. The Slytherin boys, who were both sporting bloody noses now, suddenly stopped their squabbling to listen. Forgetting their argument for the moment, Whitehall swallowed thickly and turned to his co-conspirator.

“We should go.”

Morgenson nodded in agreement. Together they turned and hurried further into the clearing. The Slytherin Beater suddenly stopped though and turned back to their victim. He stalked towards him, digging in his pockets until he found a pocket knife. Harry stiffened and tried to move away, but his bonds held tight.

“What are you doing?” asked Whitehall nervously as several howls joined the first.

Morgenson drew close, his dagger now drawn, his face inches from his victim's. Harry could neither move nor breathe, and fear rose up and flowed out of his eyes in desperate tears. The older boy merely looked down at him, his expression superior and merciless.

“Just making sure they find him.”

Harry let out a soft, pained cry as the blade was dragged across his hand. He could feel the warm blood welling up to flow down his chilled fingers and soak into the ropes around his wrist. Morgenson smirked in satisfaction, then turned to rejoin Whitehall.

There was a loud pop and then Harry was alone.

He was alone and he knew he was going to die. Horribly.

Whether by wild animals, cold, his injuries, or a combination of these, it didn't matter. He would never be found. Hermione would cry. Natalie would cry. Would the twins cry? They'd all cry their share of tears, wonder at what had happened to him, and then they would move on with their lives and he would be forgotten. His parents would be forgotten.

And all because Slytherins were sore losers.

The howls were getting louder and closer, as the night grew deeper. Through the break in the clearing he could see the moon rising up from the horizon, round and yellow. Well, bloody hell. Of course it was a full moon. Letting him be killed by any means other than magic or magical beast was obviously too muggle for the bloody pieces of dragon excrement.

Steadily the howling drew closer and closer, and he couldn't help but think that the creatures coming his way already knew he was there. Surely they could smell it? Even in the cold air, Harry could smell the sickly-sweet scent of his own blood. His body trembled from cold and fear, and the pains in his body combined into one massive ache.

He wanted to scream. He wanted to cry. He wanted to curl up into warm ball and just let it end. But he remained silent. Futilely he tugged and twisted his bonds, fighting off the numbness and increasing his own pain.

There was suddenly a shuffling sound behind him, a disturbance of dry leaves. Harry froze. A twig snapped. His chest began to heave quickly, disregarding the pain in his ribs.

He expected the werewolf to immediately lung out and bite him, but it didn't. He could hear it sniffing about, making distinctive 'wuffing' noises, and pacing just behind the tree. It defied what Harry had heard of werewolves. Werewolves were not like real wolves. They feared nothing but silver, and would attack an entire band of armed wizards without a second thought or run head first into a speeding carriage.

Harry was under no illusions. This particular werewolf might be timid, but it was still going to kill him.

Finally, the beast moved from around the tree to investigate its meal-to-come. Or at least, that was what Harry thought it was doing. When the beast's golden eyes met his, Harry had a sudden feeling that he was going to be alright. He had seen documentaries on werewolves in DA&D, and seen their eternal bloodlust, but the eyes that stared back at him were calm and curious and a bit confused.

"Help."

He hadn't even meant to speak, and he was almost as stunned as the werewolf by his plea. Nevertheless, it moved around the other end of the tree and after a few scratching sounds, the ropes gave and Harry collapsed forward. He hissed, grinding his teeth. It hurt.

A cold, wet nose prodded him, urging him to his feet. Out of fear of refusal and fear of being found, he obeyed and stumbled forward. The werewolf hovered close, pressing its massive, warm body gently against his, for support and guidance. The longer Harry spent with the creature the more comfortable and relieved he felt, and the more certain he became that it couldn't really be a werewolf. A shapeshifter of some kind, a sentient magical creature that resembled a werewolf, or a frolicking animagus of sorts (Clyde said he was going to try to get a licence when he turned sixteen).

Quietly and as quickly as they could, they made their way deeper into the forest. They stopped frequently to listen to the approaching howls, trying to gage distance and time before they were found. His guide was soon quickening his pace. Harry struggled to keep up, but he was injured, cold, tired, and had only two feet compared to his companion's four. The pseudo-werewolf whined, encouraging him, but he just couldn't push himself any faster.

"I need somewhere to hide," he explained. "In a tree or a hole."

The other seemed to consider this, then lead him in another direction. Harry hobbled as quickly as he could beside him, although it was excruciating and made breathing almost impossible. He was lead into a bramble, and to a small dark hole. Harry didn't think he could fit. He wasn't even sure he wanted to risk the cramped space even if he could. The decision was taken from him, when a series of ear-splitting howls broke out mere fifty yards away. He scrambled into the hole, head first and started to crawl.

There was snarl and an angry growl, followed by several more. Panicking, Harry moved forward blindly, convinced at any moment he would become stuck or something would grab his foot and drag him out. For a few moments the earth seemed to tighten around him, making it impossible to breath, and pain became secondary to the need for air as he scrambled forward blindly. The tunnel suddenly widened into a tiny chamber. The ground was damp, covered with leaves, and smelled strongly of animals. If he kept his head down, he could sit up. He searched the darkness with his hands, but the only exit was the tunnel he'd come down.

The sound of fighting and howling echoed into his sanctuary, and he felt no inclination to leave. Instead, he laid himself down and curled up tightly. Finally able to rest, he kept himself alert by listening to the fighting outside. He wondered if his friend had gotten away safely, if the werewolves knew he was in the hole and would attempt to dig him out, and what Hermione was doing right at that moment.

How long the fight above him lasted, he didn't know. He woke up, not realizing he had fallen asleep, and everything was quiet. The danger had passed and his burrow was now warm from his body heat and decaying leaves, and he fell asleep again.

When he awoke a second time, a faint glow of sunlight seeped into his sanctuary. He was still tired, but hunger and a full bladder were now a bigger concern than sleep. Stiffly, painfully, he crawled outside.

The day was still young and there was a thick frost on the ground. The flattened bramble and splatters of blood around the hole's entrance told the tale of a violent battle during the night. Although Harry wasn't particularly religious, he spared a quick, sincere 'thank you' to the Heavens that he had been safely out of the way of the carnage.

"Hello?" The call echoed through the forest, and the air rang with a resonance of isolation and emptiness. Where were the werewolves? Harry wondered. They should be human by now, and ready to yell at me for trespassing.

Harry was quite willing to be yelled at (even by werewolves) if it meant he would be returned to Wizarding World. Everyone would be worrying about him by now. If he wasn't so relieved to have survived the night, he would probably still be worrying about himself too.

After a brief pit stop, he went out to explore the forest and hopefully find a way out of it. Defying his natural revulsion, he followed the trail of blood in hopes of finding the human form of a werewolf. He didn't have to travel far.

"Bloody hell."

Although he should have expected it, the sight of the very naked man was startling. More startling than the strips of torn flesh and glaze of blood- although not nearly as disturbing. The man lay face down in a patch of long, frosted grass. For a mind numbing moment, Harry thought he was dead.

Then a slight puff of fog escaped from his nose, followed after a moment by another. Panicked, Harry quickly tore off his outer robe, ignoring the pain it caused him and the nippy bite of the air.

“Sir, wake up,” he begged, draping his robe over him, and finding it much too small. “Please, wake up. You’ll die if you stay here like this.”

He touched his shoulder timidly, and snatched it back when the werewolf jerked and turned his head. His large brown eyes were frightened and dazed. As they settled and focus on Harry, however, he seemed to immediately relax.

“James?” he rasped. “Have I... have I finally died?”

Harry’s heart nearly stopped. James? Could he possibly be mistaken as his father or was this man delusional and speaking to a different, unrelated James? Either possibility seemed too much of a coincidence, but he pushed his confusion aside for later.

“No, Sir, but we have to get you some help or you might. Can you stand?”

The man didn’t reply, lost in thought, then shifted about experimentally. A muffled hiss and groan, and he resettled back down. “No. I am too weak from the change.”

“Are there others nearby? Perhaps your pack?”

“No, no...” the werewolf sighed, “They will have traveled back to the homestead twenty miles from here... and in little better shape... than I... right now.”

The man’s voice began to drift off and his eyes droop. Harry shook him, trying to avoid his injuries. He grimaced and opened his eyes again.

“Is there anyone out here who can help us? Any thing? A house or communication fire?”

“A cabin,” the man said, his eyes beginning to clear. “There is an outpost cabin about half a mile from here. There’s a stable attached, with a horse and a cart inside. Just go to the southern end of the clearing and you’ll find a path that takes you there. The password is ‘Aechyron’.”

“I will be back as quickly as I can!” he promised and sprang to his feet. As he dashed away, he thought he heard the man say ‘be careful James’, but it might have been his imagination.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The cabin was a cheery little place, surrounded by small trees and overrun with vines. The shutters and doors were cast iron, but an inlay of wolves and stags and wild beasts added charm to an otherwise ominously practical feature. Connected to the house was a tiny stable, more fortified than the house with only a few narrow slots for windows. There were dents and scratch marks where werewolves and possibly bears had attempted to get in, but the sturdy construction held them all at bay.

Harry went to the stable first. The stable doors were held closed by a strange locking mechanism, that looked like a silver bust of a wolf placed over the door. When he had first reached for it, the wolf head snarled and snapped at him, nearly taking a few fingers.

“Aechyron,” he yelped. The guardian bust immediately went still and lifeless, and he heard a faint click. Cautiously, he reached for the door again. The silver wolf didn’t move and the door opened to his touch.

Inside was a small cart and a large horse. The dappled grey mare shifted nervously, as Harry gathered up a harness and opened her stall. For nearly fifteen minutes, Harry struggled to suppress his own fears of the big animal and slip on a harness. It was hard. His collarbone felt screamed in protest every time he moved his arms, limiting how much he could move them. The mare danced around him as if afraid to be touched. Finally, he let out a growl of frustration.

“Do you want your master to die out there, you silly nag?”

The horse suddenly stopped shying away and held perfectly still. Harry felt just as surprised as she did. After a moment though, his sense of urgency returned and he moved cautiously forward. The horse didn't move as the boy gently touched and patted her neck, nor when he slipped on his harness and lead her to stand in front of the little grey cart. She remained perfectly stoic as Harry fussed and fumbled his way through attaching the tackle and cart.

Finally, Harry lead the mare outside and secured her to the cabin. He slipped inside (it was amazingly unlocked and unsecured!) and gathered up anything he thought might be useful. He loaded his supplies on to the cart and lead the mare as quickly as he could back to the wounded man.

He was still conscious and now shivering. Harry laid a large bear skin rug beside the man.

“Can you roll over onto it, Sir?”

The man grunted and after a moment did manage to roll over. Harry flinched at the sight of the claw marks across his chest and neck, and quickly covered them with the many blankets and furs he'd gathered from the cabin. He tucked him in snugly and gave him some water from a canteen.

“Better, Sir?”

“Call me Remus. And yes, this is much better,” he said, and looked ready to fall right back to sleep. Before he did, however, he looked Harry directly in the eye.

“You're James' son, aren't you? Harry? You look just like him. Except for the eyes of course-”

“I have Lily’s eyes. Everyone says that,” he said exasperated, and yet strangely thrilled. How many times had he heard that? Hold on. Remus. That name was familiar. “You’re not Uncle Mooney?”

But Remus had already drifted asleep. Reluctantly, Harry let him be. As he began unloading the cart and making a sort of camp, his thoughts became fixed on their mutual recognition. The name Moony was infamous in the Potter house hold as one of James friends during his adventurous school days, sneaking out late night to run wild on the grounds. Harry had always assumed it was at a prestigious boarding school of the... well, normal variety. Not a Wizarding school. And not with a werewolf. What were the chances that he’d run into his second godfather in the middle of the wilderness?

Well... considering his recent luck, rather high.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Remus woke early that evening, as the sun began to set. He was warm and comfy (vague stinging sensation in his chest aside) and lonely. Normally, during this time he would be at the homestead, enjoying a post transformation lethargy with the rest of his pack. His pack mates would all huddle close, patching each others wounds and talking of simple things. Their alpha, Fenrir, would stalk between them and over them and against them, counting and assessing each one. When he was finally satisfied, he flop down in the middle of them and soak up their affection for the rest of the night. For the next two or three days everything would be peaceful and everyone would be content.

Now, though, Remus was alone. His family and friends were far away and they could not reach each other for several days, if they even knew to search for him.

“Are you hungry, Sir?”

He opened his eyes and met brilliant green and a familiar face.

“James?”

“We’ve been over this before, sir,” came an amused reply.

“Harry.”

The boy smiled. “How do you feel? I tried to patch you up a little while you slept, but I don’t think I helped much.”

“I feel much better, don’t worry. The Wolfsbane should have been broken down by now, so my regenerative abilities should be kicking in. I’ll be healed, if a bit more scarred, by the end of the week.”

“Wolfsbane? That sounds familiar, but...?”

“It’s a potion that allows a werewolf to maintain its human mind after transformation. My pack always has at least one who takes it, just in case something like what happened last night occurs. What did happen by the way?”

“Oh! So that was you. Thank you. You saved my life... and got hurt because of it.”

“Nonsense. I am glad I was able to save a human life, particularly a son of James-”

“You are Uncle Mooney, aren’t you? You have to tell me. Were my parents Why wouldn’t they tell me? Why hasn’t anyone else told me?” Harry said excitedly. Then his expression turned funny. “What an awful nickname! Mom always did say Dad had no tact.”

Remus burst out laughing, winced, and then started laughing again. The boy had moved to sit beside him, and the light pressure against his side and the half familiar scent did much to relax the werewolf.

“What are you doing here, Harry? The last I had heard James and Lily had...they... in Germany somewhere almost four years ago. I thought for sure you’d be safe learning wizardry at Swarzekeinen by now. You’d be eleven now right? How on earth did you end up tied to a tree here?”

Harry gave Remus some canned stew he had heated in the fire to eat while he explained the last six months (had it only been that long? It felt like years) of his life; his abduction by WYRA and Snape, being a ward of Hogwarts, Hermione, Nagini (not about being a Parselmouth though), Voldemort, Ron, the broomstick incident, being the youngest Hogwarts Seeker in a century, his victory, Whitehall and Morgenson, and finally the attempt on his life. When he was done explaining, Remus could only blink at him.

“And I thought your father had a knack for trouble. Dear Lord...”

“Professor McGonagall and Hermione say the same thing. Come to think of it, I think Snape said something similar. Except of course he was utter git about it. My classmates call me the ‘Black Cat of Gryffindor’, you know.”

“And you thought my nickname was tacky? That’s awful. And to be murdered by fellow students? Over a Quidditch match? If only Dumbledore were still here... he never would have allowed such a thing to happen.”

“Remus, tell me why my parents left Britain. Why did ever tell me about magic? Why no one told me the truth about them.”

The werewolf seemed to consider his question a long time, then eventually sighed.

“I don’t know everything. I know that they were very frightened for you, especially when the war seemed to turn irrevocably in the Dark Lord’s favor. Your father was an Auror, and a damn good one. He brought down many of the Dark wizards, but when he needed protection the Ministry copped out, and he had to go into hiding instead with you and your mother. Dumbledore did his best to protect them.”

Harry remained silent. He had heard of Dumbledore, of course. Professor Toure had mentioned him. She had described him as a stubborn, psuedo-plebian politician and anarchist. A man who endeared the lower classes with temporary and cheap platitudes, while steadily degrading the foundation of their society and culture.

Harry just thought she didn't like him because he'd stood against Voldemort during the war.

Perhaps she didn't like him because, apparently, he wasn't a dark wizard either.

"He even set up a secret keeper so their house could never be found, but they must have panicked and run. I don't blame them. If they hadn't gotten out when they did, there would have been no escaping to the continent. The Dark Lord managed to seal off the country shortly after and then everything was lost. Even Dumbledore had to flee."

"He was your headmaster when you and my dad went to school, right? What was it like?"

Finishing the last of his meal, Remus set it aside and thought carefully for a moment.

"It was, by far, the most wonderful place I have ever been. What made it even more so, was the fact that I shouldn't have been allowed to attend. I had been bitten when I was still very young, and lycanthropy had been apart of my life for years. By all law I shouldn't have been allowed anywhere near other children. By law I shouldn't have been allowed to exist," he spat bitterly.

"...I don't understand," Harry said, "Why wouldn't you be allowed to go to school? You're only dangerous a couple hours out of the month... it's not like it's your fault."

Remus smiled a bit at him, lifted his hand to rest it on Harry's cheek.

"So like your father. So ambivalent towards danger, towards social expectation. You have no idea, do you? You are one of the very few wizards who would willingly sit next to a werewolf, regardless of form. You are of the even fewer who would do so, completely without fear."

Despite his words, Harry did not feel the slightest bit afraid. Remus was a man, one his father had trusted as a friend for life. He had been a wolf the night before, and had still honored his father's trust and protected his son. How could he possibly turn away from him?

"Did my father sit by you without fear?"

Remus chuckled a bit. "Yes. Yes, he was the first to figure it out in Hogwarts... and he never turned me away, he never ignored what I was either, or made me feel ashamed of it. He and Sirius were the best friends any man could hope for."

"Sirius? You mean Uncle Padfoot?... Where do you come up with these names?"

"Simple, your first Godfather was an animagus... more specifically a dog animagus."

"Oh!... Wait then, my dad's old school name... Antlers or something..."

"Prongs. And yes, he was an animagus too. A stag."

"... my dad sometimes called my mom 'my little vixen'..."

Remus laughed loudly at that.

"So totally unrelated?"

"Your mother wasn't an animagus, unfortunately. She and your father didn't really get together until their last year at school together, and he never told her about me until shortly after graduation. Your father became an animagus in order to keep me company during the full moon, so she didn't have a reason to learn. She had figured it out before, of course. She was even smarter than James, but she never mentioned it to anyone. I think she understood perhaps better than even your father or Sirius did. Women are more empathetic than men after all."

He silent for a moment.

"I don't know why they never told you the truth or decided to live as muggles. They might feared the Dark Lord would send assassins after them. Perhaps they had come to despise their world and magic in general, as so many of us have after witnessing how destructive it can be. I just don't know. But I hope you they were happy. I hope you all were happy."

They continued to talk long into the night, until the night grew too cold and Harry grew too sleepy. A bit timidly, the boy climbed under the furs to lay next Remus. The werewolf didn't seem to think it odd at all, and continued telling him stories of his father and mother and Sirius and Snape (he was going to dump verisaterum in his tea at every opportunity for having kept his origins a secret for so long) until Harry drifted off. Remus remained awake for a long time afterwards, staring down at him and wondering what life would have been like if Lily and James hadn't fled.

Would they have died by Voldemort's hand? Would Harry? Or would Harry have been spared? Raised in England by a pureblood family? Perhaps they all would have been spared, taken in by Fenrir as he and Sirius had been. Harry would have grown up a werewolf pup, no doubt with several more siblings (no werewolf female seemed to be able to stop at one), hunting and playing in the forest with Sirius and him and the pack and Greyback.

A werewolf's life was not a bad life. Sometimes it was actually quite wonderful. At least, nowadays.

Those futile, painfully beautiful dreams began to give way to dangerous, selfish thoughts. How easy it would be to make at least part of those dreams true. Harry had nearly been murdered, sacrificed for the hurt pride of wretched dark wizard spawn. How could he send his and Sirius' godson back to that? Wouldn't it be better to simply keep Harry here with him and Sirius, his rightful family? Harry, James' cub, now his and Sirius', to complete the family they never could on their own.

Mentally, Remus recoiled at his own thoughts. How utterly conceited and selfish they were, he realized. Harry was a wizard with his whole life ahead of him. His family may have been lost to him, but he had not let it hold him down or back. It would be unforgivable to take away those secret dreams that must have sustained the orphaned boy. For certainly, being a werewolf likely wasn't one of them.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Remus was strong enough to climb into the cart the next morning, and out of it again when they reached the cabin. With a little bit of help from Harry, he managed to hobble to his bed and then collapse. He slept through most of the day, waking up occasionally when his godson brought him food, water, or checked his wounds. When he fully awoke that evening, Harry was napping beside him.

The boy had changed out of his ruined school robes and into a set of clothes he must have found in the werewolf's trunk. Harry was practically swimming in his wool sweater, and a pair of suspenders were all that kept his pants up. He looked like James after a shrinking hex. He also looked extremely comfortable.

Reluctantly, he nudged Harry awake. The boy blinked owlishly at him and sat up.

"What is it?"

"I think I should take you back to Hogwarts tomorrow," Remus said.

"Hm, what? Why? You're still weak from your injuries, and I'm not much better."

"If I don't take you back tomorrow, you may never leave. My pack will come looking for me tomorrow, and it wouldn't be a good thing if Greyback is with them."

"Why not?"

"Because Greyback is territorial. You're too young for him to consider a real threat, but old enough he'll hold you accountable for your 'folly'."

"Folly? I was kidnaped and thrown in his territory!"

“He won’t care. The Wolf and Snake Treaty states very clearly that he’s within his rights to kill or turn any muggle or wizard, regardless of age, status, or circumstance found within his designated territories. You’re a healthy, adolescent male. He’d turn you for sure, just as he did me.”

Harry remind very silent for a moment.

“Will I... I wanted... Do you suppose... we’ll meet again? You and I... and maybe Uncle Padfoot too?”

Remus smiled at him wistfully.

“I don’t know. It seems unlikely, but then so is the chance that we would ever meet at all. Perhaps this is fate, and if that’s the case, then we’ll definitely meet again. Sirius too.”

Harry searched his face, searching for a lie, but found only a hopefulness that he couldn’t bring himself to question. Instead, he moved a bit closer to Remus and laid back down, his forehead pressed lightly against his guardian’s shoulder.

“Goodnight, Uncle Moony.”

“Goodnight, Harry.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

So Harry finally learned the truth, or at least part of it. Sirius is a werewolf, but he won’t make an appearance for some time. Go ahead and ask me some questions. I’m sure this chapter has left you with a lot of them.

Chapter 17: The King's Justice

Remus woke Harry before dawn the next morning. Silently and a bit stiffly, they made a breakfast of porridge, tidied up the cottage, got dressed, and went to the stable. With some difficulty, they both managed to mount Helga and headed out at a leisurely pace.

"Normally, I would simply apparate us both to Hogsmeade," the werewolf said. "But neither of us is in any condition to do that without getting splinced."

The ride was a very quiet, tense affair. Harry was still sore from his injuries, and despite his companion's regenerative abilities, he seemed just as fragile. Holding on to Remus' waist as they rode, Harry could feel the tension through his entire body. As dawn finally came, Remus had broken out into a sweat.

"We should go back," Harry said, "You're not in any condition to travel, Moony."

The werewolf gave him a pained, but genuine smile.

"No worries, lad. Just a hundred yards or so and we'll be out of the Pack Lands. We can hail a bus from there."

"A bus?"

"A sort of bus."

"Way out here?"

"It's only five miles from Norrington."

"What? How do you keep the muggles away?"

"Disillusionment charms. Temporary ones anyway. There's been discussion about putting up ward posts. Our alpha doesn't like the idea of a magical boundary, but it's really the most practical solution to all these trespassing issues. If anyone gets a little lax maintaining their section of the boundary, then muggles tend to wander in. Plus witches and wizards don't always take their own laws seriously. They don't seem to realize their lives are forfeit once they stepped into our realm."

"Are many people killed?"

Remus remained silent for a bit. "They were in the beginning. Many werewolves too. Everyone was an enemy it seemed. Danger everywhere. Too many people running scared, wands always drawn and teeth always bared. Now... well, the danger is still there of course, but the boundaries have been set."

"Do the werewolves and wizards never see each other anymore?"

"Oh, we do business and occasionally enjoy the company of wizarding kind... but we're like two different countries with separate customs and philosophies. Some people accept it, some people are prejudice, and other completely over romanticize the other's lifestyles. As it is, our alpha is pro-segregation, but when he's finally overthrown? Who can say? Depending on the new alpha's position, we may become more open to our wizarding heritage or we might completely cut ourselves off. Then of course, there's Voldemort."

"Because of the Snake and Wolf Treaty?"

"Partially, yes. This truce only works because Voldemort enforces his end of the treaty, and Greyback enforces his own. They're powerful allies, with a wary respect for each other. If someone were to overthrow Greyback, Voldemort is in a position to rescind his end of the treaty. A civil war could break out."

"He wouldn't do that, would he? I mean, he's trying to make Britain stronger, isn't he?"

"Yes, and what better way to do that than to unite all of wizarding Britain in a common cause? Defending their children and loved ones from the evil lycanthropic threat?"

Harry had nothing to say to that. It seemed horrible to contemplate, and the twisted logic behind it made him feel physically ill. He hadn't ever thought of himself as naive, but the ease with which Remus was able to lay down political intrigue, war, and hatred was startling. His guardian must have sensed his unease because his next words were comforting.

“Don’t worry so much, Harry. Voldemort gains more from peace at the moment than war. He has more than enough on his plate without adding werewolves as a side dish.”

Their conversation turned to lighter topics, about life as a werewolf and life as a Hogwarts student. Remus seemed to find his life even more peculiar than Harry found his, which was a bit ironic. Hermione, Draco, Professor Snape, and Headmaster Lestrage were all subjects of considerable interest to Remus, each for different reasons. Fenrir Greyback, Sirius Black, the pack commune, and the forest dwelling races sparked Harry’s imagination like a wildfire, and despite never having seen any of them, he longed to imprint their images to paper by whatever medium he could find.

They came to a simple barb wire fence and dismounted. Helga was unbridled and set loose, but she lingered at the fence for their company. Remus pulled a wand from his robes that Harry hadn’t seen before, and after a couple flicks he put it away.

“It may be a few minutes,” he said. “Knight buses are a bit hazy first thing in the morning.”

“Night buses?”

“You’ll see.”

And indeed, Harry did see. Not five minutes later a terrible smashing sound could be heard, and then suddenly there was a bus stopped not two feet from them. It was scratched and covered in leaves and twigs, but Harry still could not fathom how a bus had managed to get through all the trees. The two boarded the bus, and were greeted by a rather grouchy driver and a ticket master fast asleep. The driver nudged the ticket master roughly.

“Oi! Leave off, mum,” the pimply faced man groused. He stretched and let out an enormous yawn.

“Who you call’n, mum? I ain’t that ugly! Now sell them their bloody tickets, you boob!”

“It’s Bob! Not boob. And I’m getting to it. What can I do for you gents? I got tickets to St. Mungo’s for a good price this week. You both look like it might do you a spot of good.”

Remus graced him with a regretful smile.

“Hogsmeade, if you would. I fear my young friend here is a bit late for class.”

Oh, bollocks. Harry had completely forgotten about classes. He’d missed that quiz in potions, he was suppose to study for his Transfigurations practical this weekend, and he hadn’t finished either his Charms or Herbology homework!

“I ‘m going to get so much detention,” he lamented once they were both seated on what appeared to be beds. Weird.

“It could be a lot worse, you realize?” Remus said, chuckling.

“That’s easy for you to say. My innards have only been saved so that Snape can use them for potions ingredients.”

The werewolf barked out a laugh.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

They reached the castle just as third period was starting, and the halls were deserted. Now that he was standing safe and sound in Hogwarts, Harry felt at a distinct loss about what to do. Did he go to the headmistress’ office and report what had happened? Did he go to the infirmary (where ever that was) to get patched up and then go back to classes? What about Whitehall and Morgenson? What about the other Slytherins? He doubted Draco would have condoned their actions, but that didn't mean others weren't capable of similar acts, especially if it was to maintain their House's honor.

"Let's go to the infirmary," Remus suggested. "Once you're fixed up, the nurse can alert Minerva of your return. She'll have a better idea of what to do than I would."

It sounded like the perfect plan to Harry, and he followed Remus who knew exactly where he was going. They were just climbing an unfamiliar staircase when they ran into their first castle occupant. Or rather, said castle occupant ran after them.

"You!" came the scandalized voice. "What are you doing here? You're violating your probation!"

Remus looked down at the harried potions master, his expression completely benign and perhaps a bit condescending. Calmly, the werewolf descended a step and placed a hand on Harry's shoulder. The young Seeker, who had never seen Snape so out of sorts, looked between them with obvious curiosity. Suddenly, Snape turned to Harry, and looked positively stunned. If he weren't so confused, he would probably have enjoyed causing the dark man all this strife.

"Potter, where have you been? And what are you doing with this... this..."

"Why, Severus, I've never known you to be at a loss for words," Remus said.

"Mangy vagabond!" Snape snarled.

The werewolf wasn't the least bit phased, but Harry scowled at his insult.

"Why don't you ask Morgenson and Whitehal? They knew exactly where I was and the company I was keeping."

Snape stared at Harry intensely, raking his form for clues to his whereabouts. The boy was still dressed in his school robes, which were dirty and torn in places and he held his left arm close to his body. The presence of one of his old school nemeses sparked his memory of the current lunar cycles and the date of Harry's disappearance. He looked rather troubled by his conclusion.

"Are you bitten?" the dark man asked softly.

"No," Harry replied, and then crossed his arms. "But only thanks to Remus. He saved my life."

"A werewolf saved you on a full moon, Potter? I find it unlikely."

"What's the matter, Severus? Have you no faith in your own potions? The Wolfsbane you provide my pack with every month has been of use to us for some time. A clear minded lycanthrope does wonders for diverting... accidents?... as it were."

If Harry didn't know any better he would have thought Remus was trying to goad the other man into an argument. He felt more than a bit of envy at the man's audacity. But Snape was a man better versed in the game of wit and intrigue, and his expression quickly turned cool and reserved.

"I am... glad to know that my potions have been of some assistance to you Lupin. Now that I know whom is benefitting directly from them, I feel more inclined than ever to improve the formula."

"My alpha will be glad to hear it. He doesn't put much faith in potions, but even he is ... impressed... with your work."

Both men regarded each other darkly for several moments, until Harry got bored of watching them and started his way up the stairs again.

"Where are you going, Potter?" Snape snarled, drawn unwillingly away from his staring match his old rival.

"The infirmary, sir," Harry replied, not bothering to stop his slow ascent. "I think, anyway. I'm not entirely sure where it is. Remus was escorting me."

“And now I will,” Snape said coolly, stalking up the stairs, past Remus (never turning his back to him). “Since you’ve already pulled me from my class with your impromptu return, I may as well see it through.”

“How did you know we were here anyway?” Remus asked, fighting off a growl as the dark man stopped beside his godson. Snape graced him with a malevolent smirk, and placed a possessive hand on Harry’s shoulder. The boy flinched at the contact.

“You should know this already, old friend. Your present form may not have been enough to set off the castle’s defenses, but it was more than enough to set off the wards for an intruder.”

Moony looked stunned for a moment, then openly angry. Harry watched awed as the werewolf’s eyes turned amber and a hint of fangs peeked out over his grimacing lips.

“You’re a liar, Snape. Hogwarts never forgets its own. And even if I somehow did manage to set off the wards, they’re tied to the headmaster or headmistress, not Slytherin’s head peon.”

“Very good... for a mongrel, but you forget. The wards will alert the deputy headmaster or headmistress in their superior’s absence. Headmistress Lestrangle left... or rather, was sent to find the student she somehow managed to misplace.”

Snape’s wicked expression became even more sinister, as he turned his gaze to the student in his grasp. “How unfortunate for her to have just missed you, Mr. Potter. Incompetence and bad luck are a dangerous combination when in the direct employ of the Dark Lord.”

Remus merely shrugged, his anger dissipating with the simple gesture. Sensing their time was now at its end, Harry carefully maneuvered himself out of Snape’s grasp to bid his guardian goodbye. Remus returned the hug, just as delicately as Harry gave it, and ruffled the boy’s messy hair affectionately.

“Try to stay out of trouble?”

“For all the good it does me? Be safe, Remus, and take it easy once you get back.”

“The sooner the better,” Snape sneered. They both ignored him.

“The same goes for you. Sirius would kill me if something happened to you, when I...” Remus trailed off, realizing he had almost let loose his secret heart’s desire.

“When you, what? Could have taken the opportunity to eat him? Must you Gryffindors turn everything into a melodrama? Just go, Lupin, before the castle vomits you out.”

Said Gryffindors spared him mutual glares of distaste, before turning back to each other.

“Tell Uncle Sirius hello for me?”

“I will. I’ll ask for permission to write, but it’s an unlikely we’ll be allowed. So just in case... Goodbye, Harry.”

Harry smiled, trying to keep it as real as he could even though he felt all wrong and it made his face ache. “I’ll see you later, Remus.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was escorted by Snape to the infirmary in complete silence. Snape asked no questions about where he had been or what he had done over the last three days. Snape also said nothing about what had happened in the time he had been gone. What did people think had happened to him? Were his friends worried? Why had the Headmistress been sent to look for him?

He was bursting with questions, but every time he looked to Snape to ask, he quickly changed his mind. The potion’s master expression was so openly hostile, Harry feared what he might say or do if he were to actually gain his attention. The only thing keeping the young Gryffindor from inexplicably disappearing was the oath Snape had told him about that prevented a teacher from harming a student.

As they entered the infirmary (Harry thought it a bit silly to put the hospital wing on the third floor), they were greeted by very plump, middle aged woman with a nurses habit. She took one look at Harry, look positively indignant about his physical state, and quickly rushed him behind a screen for examination.

“My word, are you Harry Potter?” she asked, as she helped remove his soiled clothes and clean him up a bit using her wand. “The whole school has been in an uproar since your disappearance, and I am quite glad to see the morbid speculations floating about turned out to be false. This is a nasty looking bruise, dear. Does it hurt to breath deeply?”

“A bit. It feels better than it did yesterday,” he replied. “So no one realizes that I was-”

“Lord Voldemort,” Snape hissed. The nurse actually flinched at the name. “Has asked that the events that led to your disappearance first be relayed through him, and him first. The one thing this school doesn’t need is another one of your overblown stories stirring up the students.”

Harry let out a huff, but didn’t ask anymore questions. So Snape wasn’t keeping silent of his own accord? Did this mean he was going to have to tell Voldemort his tale directly? Shouldn’t law enforcement handle this sort of thing? Did Voldemort intend to cover up the debacle to preserve his House’s honor? What would happen to him? Would they threaten him or use memory charms or magical confidentiality contracts on him? Would Whitehall and Morgenson remain at Hogwarts and go unpunished?

As he was cleaned up, patched up, and given a clean set of hospital pajamas, his thoughts began to turn increasingly distressing and it didn’t take long for the nurse (Madam Pomfrey she had said) to notice.

“Here you go, Mr. Potter,” she said, offering a vial of blue liquid. “Something to ease those frazzled nerves of yours.”

Harry excepted it reluctantly, distrustful of potions in general, and swallowed it down. It didn't taste too bad, and within moments he was feeling rather relaxed. He was lead to a bed and curled up to take a nap without a second thought. Sleep was almost upon him when he overheard Pomfrey and Snape talking in quiet voices to each other.

"Any serious injuries or toxins?" came a silky voice.

"I am not sure I should be discussing this with you, Professor," she said. "You are not his Head of House, and given You-Know-Who's orders for secrecy... Well, lets just say his injuries are rather telling."

"I will be informing Our Lord of Mr. Potter's return. It would be best if I were able to give him a general description of his health. He will be eager to talk to him, after all."

There was a tense silence for a moment.

"Let him have a bit of sleep first," she said finally, "All he needs is that few hours rest to heal the worst of it... and then he should be up and ready to return to classes. Although I'd prefer he slept here tonight."

There was an irritated snort. "You say that to everyone who walks through your door."

An equally irritated 'humph!'. "Not everyone. You are more than welcome to spend your night and day elsewhere!"

If Snape replied, Harry didn't hear. Too quickly, his mind descended into a dark and dreamless sleep.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Potter, wake up."

Harry rolled over onto his back and opened his eyes to a very blurry black head. He sat up, rubbed his eyes, and then patting the air around his bed in search of his glasses. Snape's rough, callused fingers grabbed his chin, and a moment later he could see the dark man scowling down at him.

“Get dressed. Lord Voldemort has requested our presence in his study.”

A set of clothes was placed at the corner of his bed, and Snape shut the privacy screen now surrounding his bed. Through the white sheet, Harry could make out his distinctive profile. The potion's master looked decidedly impatient.

Quickly dressing, he joined Snape and they made their way quickly from the infirmary. Madam Pomfrey, who was shooting the older man a disapproving glare, managed to spit out an order for Harry to return should start feeling tired or sore again. The young Gryffindor wasn't planning on it. He was feeling refreshed and energized, with only the barest of aches where previously there had been stabbing pains. Briefly he examined his wrist and found them a bit red, but otherwise unmarked.

They entered a tower not unlike the Headmistress's own, but when they entered the Dark Lord's office Harry was rather amazed by the difference. Lestrangle's office was cluttered, ancient room with too many portraits of dead men and women, stacks of paperwork, and strange assortment of baubles. Voldemort's office was the picture of elegant sophistication. The circular room was lined in bookshelves, laden with tomes and occasionally a well placed instrument. There were only an office desk, a few sitting chairs, a chaise, and a telescope by the window by way of furniture, and large painting of Salazar Slytherin with a feathered serpent of some kind draped around his shoulders.

Headmistress Lestrangle occupied the chaise, and would have looked beautifully elegant herself if her body language weren't so tense. She scowled darkly as they entered the room, and Harry hesitated.

“Have a seat, Mr. Potter.”

Voldemort's smooth, confident voice moved him out of his surprise, and he quickly took the chair indicated. He looked directly at the Dark Lord, and was relieved to see the other looked genuinely pleased to see him. His red eyes weren't exactly friendly, but they were bright with a sort of curiosity.

"Professor Snape was telling me that you showed up in the castle early this morning, escorted by a werewolf no less. Considering your abrupt disappearance after your Quidditch victory and the rising of the full moon that night, I think it would be safe to assume that you didn't go gallivanting off into the forest on your own."

Harry merely nodded, waiting for an actual question. He didn't have to wait long. Lestrangle was on her feet and stalking towards him suddenly. He nearly bolted from chair to keep his distance from her, but Snape (who had been leaning by the door) was suddenly between them, his wand in his right hand and Harry's shoulder in his left. Lestrangle spoke as if the man wasn't even there, but she did stop her forward assault.

"And I suppose we're to believe Slytherins were the ones to have taken you?" she hissed. "A convenient explanation. But it doesn't explain how you came to be in the company of your godfather's lover."

Now that was news to him! Remus and Sirius were... what? A couple? Mates? His father hadn't mentioned his best friends being gay (was his dad bi then?), and Remus sure as hell hadn't said anything about it!

"Lestrangle, control yourself," Voldemort commanded, although he looked even more intrigued than before. "Let's not jump to more than the truly obvious conclusions. Why don't you give us a rendition of the events that have transpired, starting from the moment you left the Quidditch pitch."

Harry wasn't sure what information he should withhold, if any, and so told the events of the last several days as sparsely as he could without actually hiding anything. Even with all three person's occasional questions (or accusation on Lestrangle's part) it took less than five minutes. When it was all done, Snape looked disturbed, the headmistress looked furious, and Voldemort just sat back in his chair and stared at him curiously.

“A rather amazing adventure, Mr. Potter,” the Dark Lord began, rising slowly from his chair. “Indeed, it is a miracle that you survived.”

Harry tensed as the man strode around his desk, took a sitting chair and placed it directly across from him. When Voldemort sat down, the boy involuntarily stopped breathing. Serpentine eyes regarded him calmly, in mock compassion.

“A miracle, but... I’m not a religious man.”

As quick as a snake, Voldemort moved forward, his hands gripping tightly on either side of Harry’s head as he forced the boy to look directly into his brilliant red eyes.

“Relax, Mr. Potter,” he hissed, parseltongue slipping out like a whisper, “It only hurts if you struggle.”

But Harry did struggle. He struggled with his swinging fists and kicking legs. He struggled with his mind, creeping away and lashing out blindly at the invading pressure inside his head.

His fight lasted only for the briefest of moments, before a searing pain lanced through brain. He froze, gave a single violent shake, then went limp in the man’s grasp. In his stunned state, his thoughts scattered and resistance crumbled until the world became insensible.

The only thing he was aware of was the shifting of his thoughts by an alien presence and Voldemort’s eyes staring directly into his.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was brought back to his senses, and wished taste hadn’t been one of them. The salty, sour taste of a potion seemed to cling to crevasses of his lips and mouth, and not even the water Snape offered him immediately after seemed to help much.

As his thoughts cleared, he pulled away quickly from the man, clambering to his feet and stumbling away until he was at the far end of the room. Using the bookshelf to support his jelly legs, he turned a heated glare to the occupants of the room. Snape stood with his arms crossed beside the chaise, where Harry had apparently been laying, an empty vile in one hand and a shattered glass at his feet. Lestrangle was sulking by the telescope, endeavoring to ignore everyone and failing miserably. Voldemort was once again behind his desk, scribbling away on some parchment.

"What did you do to me?" he asked shakily.

Lestrangle and Snape offered only condescending sneers, and the Dark Lord's reply was flippant.

"Legilimency."

"Bullshit," Harry spat out automatically. All three looked at him, startled. "I've been under legilimency before. That was infinitely worse."

"Potter, watch yourself," Snape hissed in warning.

"Are you implying that I am lying?"

Harry tensed, swallowed at the sudden thickness in his throat, but didn't look away.

"I don't think I implied anything. There's no way that was just legilimency."

The Dark Lord smirked, but said nothing to confirm or dissuade his conclusion.

"I had to make certain you were not attempting to deceive me. Coincidence is one thing, an opportune moment is another thing altogether. It seems you've managed to obtain both. There is now no reason to perform any further investigation by the Court- which I guarantee is great deal more bothersome than a brief headache and a nasty potion."

Harry wasn't certain he agreed. The idea of that man skipping through his brain was extremely distressing, and if he thought on it too long he knew he was going to need a calming draught pretty soon as well.

"Justice will be carried out swiftly. Your assailants are on their way up now."

"What? Just like that?!"

"Just like what?" Voldemort said, starting to become annoyed. "Your innocence has been proved, as has their guilt. Why prolong the matter? I for one would like to get back to other matters, wouldn't you?"

Frankly, yes he would. Harry could think of a hundred things he wanted to do right now that didn't involve worrying about Morgenson or Whitehall sulking behind every corner. But it all seemed too fast. He'd spent three long days away from the world, and suddenly he was back in it and it was spinning too fast.

But it was out of his hand. And he was glad for it. He couldn't imagine what punishment attempted murder of a classmate was awarded, especially not by the Dark Lord himself. Suddenly, he didn't want to know.

"Can I go then?" Harry asked.

"And miss the best part of the trial?" Voldemort asked, looking genuinely surprised.

"Somehow I don't think it's going to be a PG-13 show."

Lestrangle and Snape didn't seem to understand the reference, but Voldemort smirked wickedly.

"Nevertheless, it will certainly be educational. Sit down before you fall down. This won't take long."

Harry reluctantly obeyed, taking up the one end of the chaise and staring resolutely out the window. Time passed and no one spoke, enveloping the entire tower in a tense silence. A knock on the door made more than just Harry jump.

“Enter.”

Morgenson strode into the tower confidently, his school robes so perfectly pressed and presented that Harry just knew a spell was involved. The older boy looked as smug and conceited as Harry remembered him. It made him want to chuck something heavy at him.

Behind him, Whitehall slunk in. Unlike his accomplice, the Slytherin Seeker looked exhausted and nervous in the way that chronic worriers are. Neither boy noticed Harry sitting by the window, their gazes focused either on the Dark Lord or their feet. Morgenson tried to meet Voldemort’s eyes directly, as Harry often did, but they inevitably ended up focusing above or to the left of the intimidating man’s head. If Harry weren’t so worried that both boys were going to become nothing more than bloody stains on the carpet in the next few minutes, he would have mocked them for their cowardice.

“Do you know why you are here?” Voldemort asked, looking completely nonchalant as he started pulling out forms from his desk.

Both boys shook their heads. The Dark Lord raised a regal brow.

“Really? Absolutely no idea?”

Whitehall shifted a bit behind Morgenson, while the other started to shift a bit uncomfortably from foot to foot. “I suppose you want to question us about the Gryffindor Seeker,” Morgenson said, not hinting at the slightest bit of guilt. “But we’ve told the headmistress and our Head of House everything we know already.”

Morgenson turned to Lestrage, who wasn’t looking at him, and then to Snape who was looking at them a bit too keenly. Harry was surprised when he didn’t seem to notice him sitting right behind the Potion’s master. Instead, the boy looked over him as if he wasn’t even there and returned his attention to Voldemort.

“Yes, I have looked over their reports of the matter and found nothing amiss,” Voldemort said, amicably. “Young Mr. Potter’s disappearance is indeed very mysterious. Whether by Potter’s own will or someone else’s, the plan was quite clever...”

Whitehall’s frown deepened, and Morgenson practically puffing up like a blowfish and still trying to appear unaffected.

“...but sloppily executed. Wouldn’t you agree, Mr. Potter?”

Voldemort made a gesture towards him, not exactly like pointing, and Harry felt the magic that he hadn’t been aware of slipping away from him. The two Slytherin boys turned to him, their expression of horror identical.

“Im-impossible! You’re dead.”

Harry gave him an angry scowl. “If that’s the case. Perhaps you’re dead too.”

Morgenson turned white and Whitehall look just barely above fainting.

“Now, Mr. Potter, that’s not a very nice thing to say,” chided Voldemort, “Although, I do understand your ire. I am rather upset myself.”

Harry turned away from his would-be murders and from the Dark Lord. He looked out the window, curled up a bit, and mentally curled up on himself. There was nothing he would have liked better than to be somewhere, anywhere, else. Yet, he couldn’t help but hear, and every swish of clothing, every footstep, and every labored breath unfolded the scene of two lives at their possible end.

“It’s not so much that you should wish to vindicate yourselves,” Voldemort continued, “It is perfectly natural to wish to maintain one’s supremacy, more so with Slytherin’s than most. A few hexes... some form of public humiliation... a curse, at the very worst. Any of these would have sufficed on any regular student over a schoolyard grudge.”

Harry felt his insides twist in horror at the man's words. Was the leader of Wizarding Britain really condoning such wretched behavior? He wanted to cover his ears and stop listening, but he didn't dare. Voldemort had wanted witnesses, sadist that he was, and apparently his two cronies weren't going to cut it.

"However, your actions went far beyond acceptable bounds. Not only did you select for your victim a person whom I, your sovereign and patriarch, have shown personal favor to with the intent to murder, but you violated the Snake and Wolf Treaty, adding treason to your list of crimes. Have you any idea the damage you could have caused?! Our peace with the lycantropes is tenuous at best without fools like you making it worse!"

As the Dark Lord spoke, his once calm voice began to increase in pace and volume, his anger rising like an unstoppable tide.

"I tell you now if Greyback demands restitution for this trespass, I will not hesitate to throw you both to the wolves. Pun intended. Crucio!"

Harry bolted out of his seat as two tortured screams pierce the room. Instinctively, he turned towards the source and found the older boys withering on the ground under the same spell. Briefly, his eyes found the Headmistress, who was sneering down at them from her chair and found an instant hatred for her. Beside him, Snape watched with a silent intensity. What he was feeling, Harry couldn't decipher, but what ever it was it didn't seem to be pity.

The cursed dragged on, as did the screaming, and with each passing second he felt his mind and soul twist into a painful state as if he were under some strange curse himself. Finally, he could stand it no more and covering his ears to block out the sound, he let out a scream of his own.

"IT'S ENOUGH!"

His concentration broken, Voldemort turned sharply to the shivering Gryffindor, his anger still hot and shining through his eyes like embers. Whitehall and Morgenson laid on the floor at his feet whimpering, crying, and curling in on themselves. Harry could barely stand to look at them.

“What did you say, Potter?” Voldemort hissed in what may or may not have been parseltongue. The young Gryffindor felt suddenly thick, and his throat tightened as if in some phantom’s grasp, but couldn’t not speak. The consequences of not speaking seemed worse than facing the Dark Lord.

“It’s enough,” he said, his voice barely above a whisper. He swallowed thickly, and spoke again, louder this time. “I’m satisfied. They’ve been punished enough for their crime against me. Their crime against Greyback will be dealt with by Greyback himself. It’s enough. There’s no need to keep... to keep hurting them.”

The tightening around his throat became very real as Voldemort’s cold hand was suddenly around his throat, his crimson eyes glaring down at him angrily. Harry could only stare up at him, wide-eyed and terrified.

“I decide when enough is enough, you silly whelp,” he hissed, throwing him to the floor. Harry instinctively curled up, expecting to be kicked or cursed. Instead, the Dark Lord stalked back to his desk and reseated himself. “It is enough,” he said once he was seated. “For now. I must begin explanations and negotiations with Greyback before I decide the rest of your punishment. But just so we understand one another, this is the last day you will ever step foot in Hogwarts. Should you violate this condition, your lives will be forfeit. If you should ever approach Mr. Potter again, in malice or contrition, your lives are likewise forfeit. Headmistress, take them to the dungeons while they await the proper authorities. Professor, escort Mr. Potter to his dormitory, and explain to him the need for discretion on this matter.”

Harry didn’t wait. He was out of the office before Whitehall or Morgeson to climb to their feet. He paced back and forth at the bottom of the stairs, until he was finally joined by considerably more composed potion’s master. The man’s expression was no different than before, and the nerve wracked Gryffindor found it more disturbing that if the other had been scowling at him.

“When you are asked what happened to you after the match,” Snape began, his tone the same as with any lecture he thought of particular importance. “You will tell them that Whitehall and Morgenson did in fact kidnap you.”

Harry blinked owlishly. Certainly, Snape wasn’t going to instruct him to tell the truth. He wasn’t much of a politician, but Harry knew the situation was delicate and could hurt a lot of reputations, Slytherian House’s not being the least among them.

“Their sudden disappearance from classes upon your return would never go unnoticed,” the professor explained. “However, you will tell no one about them attempting to kill you or about the werewolves or Lupin’s impromptu rescue. Instead, you will say you were ‘confounded’ and abandoned in muggle London. The Vanguard tracked you down yesterday evening at British social services, completely unharmed, and you were detained at the Court for questioning and returned to Hogwarts this morning. Don’t get clever. Keep everything as vague as you can, and let the public make up the rest.”

Harry nodded. While he didn’t like the idea of lying just to benefit Voldemort’s grand scheme, he couldn’t deny that he was relieved he wouldn’t have to recount those awful moments before Remus’ rescue when he was certain he was going to die. Also, on some level, he wanted to keep his new friendship with Remus a secret. It wasn’t that he felt ashamed to have a werewolf for a godfather (two of them in fact), but he didn’t think he could stand anyone criticizing the kind, gentle man who had saved his life and happened to turn furry once a month.

“Will Remus get in trouble for this?” he asked timidly.

“Yes,” Snape said waspishly, though he wasn’t looking at Harry.

The young Gryffindor wanted to protest, point out that the man had done nothing wrong, but had been very brave and selfless. His platitudes filled his chest, waiting to be expelled in one long testament, but he swallowed them instead. It was useless to say anything.

Snape wouldn't care, and even if he did he wouldn't be able to do anything. Remus' fate lay with Fenrir Greyback.

With Snape's quickening stride, it wasn't long before Gryffindor Tower was in reach. Before they reached the portrait of the Fat Lady, his guide grabbed him by his shoulder and spun him around to face him. Harry, having already been grabbed by the neck that day, slapped the hand off sharply and jumped out of his reach. They eyed each other cautiously, mutual animosity and distrust flowing between them like a palpable heat.

"You will tell absolutely no one of what transpired during your disappearance. That includes my goddaughter. If you drag her into this mess, the Dark Lord will be the least of your worries."

Harry glowered hatefully at the man, then spun away from him to stalk to the portrait.

"And Potter."

Reluctantly, he looked back over his shoulder.

"Congratulations on not doing something cliché, like dying. Hogwarts hasn't had this much entertainment in years."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. I don't know the English rating system for movies and television, so if you know just mentally insert the appropriate term.
2. The 'Vanguard' is Voldemort's equivalent to Aurors, just as the 'Court' is the equivalent to the Ministry.

Author's note: Wow, that's my longest chapter so far. So it took so long to get to you, but I got a new job this week so it's been tough finding the time to write. I hope you enjoyed it!

Chapter 18: Return of the Prince

The password, surprisingly, hadn't been changed over the weekend as per the usual custom. Harry wondered if they hadn't changed it because of him, like a porch light left on to welcome home a prodigal son. Perhaps he was just being overly sentimental.

No one was in the commons room when he entered, and likewise, the first year dormitory was empty. The first thing he did was open his trunk and quickly locate those previous items he hadn't risked carrying during the Quidditch match. His wand, warm and magnificent in his grasp, and his watch which was scorching hot.

"It's not my fault I'm late," he said, "I ran in to a couple of... problems."

After a moment, the watch seemed pacified and cooled to his touch. Checking the time, he was unsurprised to find it dinner time. Not wanting to cause yet another scene in the Great Hall, he found his usual cubby corner in the common room and started to draw sketches in the troublesome diary. It was a strange little thing. Whatever he drew in there disappeared shortly after, but if he requested it back, it would appear again. Occasionally, the diary actually put in little comments or doodles of its own.

Today, it seemed particularly chatty.

Where have you been? And what have you been doing? The subject matter is very different from your usual.

Harry took a moment from his sketch of Remus, in werewolf form, staring up close at the observer. He was having difficulty translating the lycanthropes' bright and curious eyes in ink alone, and welcomed the distraction.

You wouldn't believe the last couple of days I had. I've won a Quidditch match, been kidnaped and nearly murdered, and met one of my father's old friends who happens to be a werewolf and my godfather's mate. He's a werewolf too. And it turns out my parents were wizards after all. Seems they forgot to mention it to me.

He went back to his sketch, practicing the eyes with some quick doodles on the edge of the diary. It was several minutes later before the diary finally made a response.

And I thought drawing was your only outlet for creativity. I see you're trying your pen at fiction as well.

Go suck an egg, was Harry's tart reply.

The diary's clever retort was to make the half completed sketch of Remus suddenly disappear.

"Hey!" he said, indignantly. Irritated, and now developing a slight headache, he shoved the diary into his bag and felt distinctly better. He had started to theorize that the charmed journal drew on the magic of the writer to perform its clever tricks, and handling it too long caused his frequent headaches. It was such a neat little book though, and having so little that was really his, Harry couldn't bring himself to get rid of it or tell anyone who might take it away. This included Hermione, for though she was a very good friend, she was a bit of a worry wort. Any thing with even the most slim possibility of being cursed was a reason for days of endless and tireless research.

And that was why it was a stroke of luck that he got rid of it when he did, because not half a minute later Hermione came stalking through the door looking the most worried Harry had ever seen her... and angriest too.

"Of all the pig-headed, stupid, insensitive, load of swill..," she seethed, stomping noisily through the portrait hole. She was followed closely by Clyde, who was still scarfing down a piece of bread from dinner. "As if Harry would just run away! He was just so bloody miserable after his incredible Quidditch victory and all his adoring fans, and then saying he'd explain everything later, that he just decided to take a jog through the Forbidden Forest! Honestly, does Draco think I'm that naive? That I'm stupid?!"

"Hermione," Clyde protested, his mouth still full of bread, "he was probably just trying to make you feel better. You prophesizing Harry's gloom and doom wasn't exactly helping matters."

"If he wanted to make me feel better, he could start by investigating some of those Slytherin housemates of his. If anyone had motive and opportunity, it was them. They've been acting suspicious for days now, and did you see that Morgenson and Whitehall were absent during dinner? Do you think the Court finally suspects they have something to do with Harry's disappearance?"

"Well, I'm certain they do now," Harry said, finally choosing to reveal himself as he stepped out of the hidden cubby. Both his friends let out a startled shriek at his sudden appearance, staring at him as if he were a ghost... well, a ghost other than usual wandering Hogwarts. He gave them both an amused grin.

"Not exactly the warm welcome I was hoping for, but-"

Before he could say anything further, he found himself with an armful of sobbing female.

"Thank God," Hermione cried, "I thought for certain something awful had happened to you..." And then, conceiving that something awful still could have happened, she pulled away to give him a very thorough inspection.

"Harry, mate!" Clyde said, "Don't scare us like that!"

"Well, I didn't want you to choke on your dinner, so I waited a moment at least. And Hermione! Stop it! The school nurse gave me a very thorough check up already. I'm fine," he assured them. Hermione didn't look convinced.

"What happened, Harry? When you didn't show up in the Tower, Fred and George went looking for you, but couldn't find you. We had to tell McGonagall, and she alerted the entire school and we still couldn't find you. The Court even got involved the next morning, and searched the entire castle and even some of the Forbidden Forest. There were rumors that they found some of your clothing or your equipment in there."

Wrong forest, he wanted to say, but checked himself. It was so tempting to just spill the last several days he'd had, and the visit with Voldemort as well. Instead his mind scurried to pull together the story he had been told to give.

"Just rumors, I'm sure," he said, "Though you were right about Whitehall and Morgenson. They ambushed me outside of the locker room."

"I knew it!" Clyde announced, looking thoroughly indignant, "I knew it had to have been one of those bloody Slytherins!"

"Oh really?" Hermione said, her expression blank. The boy looked a bit sheepish.

"Well, I never disagreed with you."

"Anyway," Harry continued. He went on to give them the contrived story about being confunded and abandoned in the muggle world, WYRA's rescue, and his return early that morning. He tried to play it off as a bad prank, keeping the telling light and even humorous. Clyde listened rapt with his tale, but the more he talked the more angry Hermione seemed to become.

"Of all the wretched..." she fumed, "You could have been killed! You could have been mugged, beaten, kidnaped, or even raped! I can't believe those two would do something so horribly irresponsible and petty over a silly game!"

"Hey!" both boys protested on behalf of their 'silly game'.

"Well, really!" Hermione huffed.

Before an argument could breakout over the merits of Quidditch, the portrait opened to let in a couple of third years. Their reaction, like Hermione's and Clyde's, was to let out shrieks of surprise and then stare stupidly for several moments. Feeling a bit awkward under their awed study, Harry forced a smile and a little wave.

"Hello."

“No way!” cried a tawny haired girl. “You’re alive!”

“I think so,” Harry agreed, and then took his pulse to make sure. “Yep, still here.”

“Oh my God, no one’s going to believe this!” said her companion, a lightly freckled boy., and then an instant later disappeared back through the portrait hole. The girl looked suddenly flustered with being alone with the now infamous, Harry Potter. She opened her mouth as if to ask something, shut it, opened it again, changed her mind and ran after her escaping companion.

The trio stared at the portrait hole for a moment, then looked to each other.

“What was that?” asked Clyde.

“I dunno,” offered Harry, “but I hope everyone doesn’t react that way. It was funny the first time, but it gets old fast.”

Hermione looked a bit amused, her previous worry dissipating with the realization that he really was here and he was safe, unharmed, and in good spirits. With her good mood restored, her next words were a bit teasing.

“What do you expect? It’s not every day one of your housemates wins a Quidditch match against Slytherin, is kidnaped, presumed dead, and then returns. You can bet this is going to be in the Wizard Weekly too.”

Harry groaned at the thought. He, like most people, had his fair share of daydreams about being famous, but it had never occurred to him that it would be quite this... embarrassing.

“And then of course, there’ll be interviews,” Hermione continued. “There’s already been several reporters following this story who visited the school, and interviewed the students and teachers, so you can bet there will be at least three times as many as before.”

Clyde made a grimace.

“Bloody nuisance they made of themselves too. They must of heard we were good mates, ‘cause they seem to follow me and Hermione like puppies... creepy puppies with cameras and notebooks and no respect for privacy. One bloke followed me into the bathroom! Can you believe it?”

Harry wished he didn’t.

“I know!” Hermione said, her teasing tone now indignant. “I think the same fellow tried to follow me up into the girl’s dormitory! He set the wards off and McGonagall came storming in. I’ve never seen her look so mad! She transfigured his notebook into a bird and threw it out the window. Then, he actually had the gall to yell at her about freedom of the press and the right to free speech!”

“What happened?” Harry asked.

“She transfigured his camera into a fish and threw out the window and into the lake! Then she said if she ever found him in the tower again she’d turn him into a pig and let him loose in the Forbidden Forest,” Clyde said, and then let out a long hooting laugh.

“But it’s going to be ten times worse for you, Harry,” she said, looking sympathetic. “Not only are the reporters going to come after you for the story, so is every other over curious classmate and teacher. And they can follow you anywhere in the school.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry had hoped Hermione was exaggerating, but it was less than an hour before her prediction came true. The two third years had rushed off to immediately tell their entire house that the Black Cat of Gryffindor apparently still had an extra seven or eight lives. The other tables near by quickly learned of what was happening, and dinner wasn’t even half over when half the student body got out of their seats in order to storm Gryffindor tower. A few reporters who had lingered for the day managed to slip into the crowd with them.

Harry and his friends were soon cornered in the common's room, and no amount of verbal or physical aversion could get them away or around the curious horde. A continuous stream of questions was poured out, most of which Harry couldn't answer and the rest he had to lie about if he said anything at all.

Some of the questions were obvious: Where have you been? Why did you disappear? Who was responsible?

Other questions were just bizarre: Were you influenced by the alignment of the planets? Do you have any injuries now of a magical nature? Have your eyes always been that bright?

And some were just plain inappropriate: Did any of those London Muggles touch you, Harry? If you could take revenge on your abductors, what punishment would you choose? Do you think the love of your girlfriend ('I beg your pardon!' Hermione snapped.) guided you home?

To everything Harry replied either, 'I'm not allowed to say, it's under investigation,' or 'I don't know. I was confused most of the time,'. After half an hour of this, several repeats of the same questions and answers, and no end in sight, Harry said nothing and settled himself in for a long night.

It was almost midnight, when McGonagall finally arrived at the commons room and sent everyone to bed. Their own beds, and that included the other houses and the reporters who had invaded her domain. She spared a clearly exhausted Harry a pat on the shoulder, and sent him on his way. Even here his dorm mates tried to question him, until a rather protective Clyde told them all to leave Harry the bloody hell alone for eight bloody hours.

The next day wasn't much better, and Harry had to use every bit of his (and Hermione's and the Weasley twin's) wits to get to his classes without being cornered, questioned, and made tardy. Classes were a welcome reprieve, as none of the reporters dared interrupt a professor's class- they were all extremely short tempered it seemed and with collections of hexes that only the most deviant intellectuals might acquire- and they were all being extra firm on the 'no talking in class' rule. Harry had actually been relieved when Professor Snape had informed him he would be making up his lab practicals that Saturday. The prospect of that weekend without any privacy was bleak enough without the benefits of his professor's protection..

Meals were taken in the kitchens with the house elves, who cooed and clucked over him, but didn't ask any questions beyond 'how many lumps of sugar would Mr. Potter like in his tea?' Studying was the trickiest venture, since regular trips to the library were required and reporters liked to hang outside and wait for him or one of his friends to come through. Removing his glasses and transfiguring his tie and badge different House's colors worked twice, but they quickly caught on. Luckily, the twins thought it hilarious fun to help their 'idol', and they were a treasure trove of disguises, pranks, and distractions.

By Friday, Harry was on the verge of hexing someone.

"Bloody hell, when will this end?"

Clyde shrugged, his demeanor almost as sullen as Harry. Constantly being questioned when Harry wasn't around, and then completely ignored when he was, was a blow to his pride as well as his patience. Hermione was also irritable, but she had experience dealing with reporters because of her father's activity in politics and could see the end in sight.

"The Dark Lord has been gone for most of the week," she said, "And the Headmistress has been too busy trying to salvage the situation regarding her failure to protect a student to deal with it all properly. That's the only reason this nonsense has been allowed to continue. When he gets back, those reporters won't be allowed anywhere closer than Hogsmeade."

He didn't think it possible, but Harry was actually looking forward to Voldemort's return. A return which would be the Saturday after next at the latest, when Slytherin and Ravenclaw Quidditch teams would face off.

That weekend Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw were playing. Harry wished he could go and watch them, but with the enormous amount of overdue homework and the castle mostly empty, Hermione had succeeded in convincing him to spend the morning in the library. They were unexpectedly joined there by Draco and Natalie. Both complained it was too cold to watch a bunch of Powderpuffs and Bookworms fumble around on broomsticks. Ron, who was sulking over Potion's essay, didn't look like he agreed, but had tagged along anyway.

Their whispered discussions over alchemy, aconite, and the Elven-Orcan War of 1222 gradually lapsed into more casual matters in more casual tones.

"Where's your other fellow today? What's his name? Claude or something," asked Draco, not looking up from his DADA textbook.

"Clyde? Unlike me, he's actually had all week to do his homework," Harry said, not bothering to look up from his Astronomy text book either.

"So what's your excuse, Hermione?" asked Natalie, who did look up and rather slyly at that.

"I don't much care for Quidditch," she replied and made it an actual point to not look up.

"Then why were you at the Gryffindor-Slytherin game if you don't like Quidditch?" the blonde witch inquired. At this Draco glanced surreptitiously up at her.

"Harry asked me, of course."

"Really?" This time, Natalie's curious gaze turned to Harry. It felt strangely accusatory, though Harry couldn't fathom why she be imply he'd done something devious.

“She wouldn’t have come otherwise,” he explained defensively, “I was sworn to secrecy, and couldn’t tell her beforehand. I figured she’d be mad at me afterwards if I didn’t ask her to come see for herself.”

“How in the name of Merlin did you get on the team in the first place?” Ron blurted out, as it was clearly something that had bothered him for a while now. Harry couldn’t help but feel a bit smug with his answer.

“Punishment,” he said.

“Punishment?” asked the three Slytherins. Hermione, who had learned of it all from the twins and then from Harry directly, shared an amused look with her troublesome friend.

“Yes. I was forced to play Quidditch,” Harry explained, “As punishment for disobeying the professor during flying lessons.”

Ron had gone completely white.

“B-b-but... I had to scrub out cauldrons! Why aren’t I playing Quidditch?”

Harry thought it perfectly obvious, but the boy looked so disturbed that he didn’t have the heart to be bluntly honest about the matter.

“Well, I suppose the Head of our Houses chooses punishments that best help the school, and preferably their own houses. Professor Snape must have felt their was a greater need for clean cauldrons than for a new Slytherin Seeker.”

“Amen to that,” said Draco, “Father took me to a Gryffindor-Slytherin match last year. Gryffindor got creamed. I was almost embarrassed to watch. But still... Quidditch as punishment?”

“Were you watching the match out there? I thought I was going to die. Your team is evil.”

Draco’s looked backed to his book. None of his Slytherin friends, or Ron, had questioned him about the events of his disappearance, more out of lack of opportunity than anything else. The other three houses had been pretty protective of him, and he had not been alone with a Slytherin since his return. So Harry was unsurprised when the Malfoy heir used the conversational opening to ask in the most disinterested tone the matter that was most definitely of interest to him.

“Yes, well, you would know. I heard a Whitehall and Morgenson have been suspended because of their involvement in your disappearance. I trust they didn’t rough you up too badly?”

“I don’t know. I was confounded, remember?” was Harry’s automatic reply.

A look of annoyance passed over Draco’s face briefly, but it quickly turned neutral again. Ron who was slightly appeased by Harry’s earlier response, had returned to sulking over his essay. Natalie didn’t bother hiding her skepticism, her brow arched elegantly at him.

“Surely, you remember something,” she asked.

“Nothing I haven’t told half the reporters in Britain at least twenty times. I don’t know why everyone keeps asking me. WYRA probably knows more about what happened than I do. Ask Snape about it, he probably knows quite a bit. I wish everyone would just shut up about the matter and leave me alone.”

The opportunity for interrogation having passed, Draco slid easily onto other subjects. This time it was a matter so non sequitur , it threw off both Harry and Hermione.

“Father wished me to invite you to our family Christmas Party.”

“What?!”

Madam Pince, Hogwart’s rather strict librarian, sent a warning glare from the check out desk..

Amazingly, it was the adopted Malfoy and not the invited who had shouted out in surprise. Her expression was so horrified, Harry couldn't help but wonder if Malfoy Christmas parties were a code word for 'apocalypse'. Draco rolled his eyes.

"You can't be that surprised?" he said, "After all, he's on good terms with the Dark Lord, and appeared in the papers on two separate occasions. And he isn't even twelve yet."

"Draco Narsissio Malfoy, my friends are not father's toys! I won't have him playing his deranged political games with him!"

Draco ignored his sister's outburst, turning a conspiratory look towards Harry and grinning wickedly. "If Father invites you for a private talk, run. He'll probably try to arrange a betrothal between you and Hermione... or me. Which ever he thinks will most appeal to you."

Harry just blinked stupidly at him, unsure if he was joking or not, while Hermione sputtered and blushed.

"Oh, and of course, you two are invited as well," Draco said, waving dismissively at his companions.

"Jeepers," Natalie said sarcastically, "Thanks for remembering us non-celebutantes."

"Yes, well, one must acknowledge the little people from time to time."

"Brother!"

Madam Pince slammed down one of her ancient books.

"WILL YOU ALL BE QUIET?! THIS IS A LIBRARY NOT A GOSSIP HALL!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

That afternoon found Harry descending the stairs to the lower dungeons. He had two potions he was expected to brew, and according to Clyde they were lengthy. He'd need at least, three hours to finish them, and he couldn't have been happier.

"Potter," Snape growled, taking in the boy's dusty, cobweb ridden clothes with irritation. "I know this is a Saturday, but a little effort towards your appearance is still warranted."

Harry blushed, pausing a moment to pat some of the dust off. He only succeeded in making himself sneeze, and making Snape look even more irritated.

"Sorry, Professor. Some reporters tried to corner me outside the library and I had to duck into a secret passage."

The dour potion's master said nothing to that, and merely swished his wand at him. Instantly, the dust and cobwebs disappeared and his robe look freshly laundered and pressed.

"Thanks," Harry offered reluctantly.

"Don't bother. Cobwebs are a potent potion's ingredient and I don't want to spend all day here because they keep falling into your work," he sneered, pointing towards the only work station with a burner already set up.

"Well, then thanks for nothing," Harry muttered and stomped over his station. Skimming over the directions on the board, he filled his cauldron a third of the way full with water and set it to boil, then went to gather his ingredients. As he was sorting through the various containers, Snape settle behind his desk with stack of essays in front of him, but favored watching the boy like a hawk over his grading.

"Are you finished with your essay on aging botanicals and their affects on Sleeping Draughts, yet?" the man queried, looking like he already suspected the answer as unsatisfactory.

"Almost," Harry responded. "Speaking of which, your wormwood is starting to mold."

"That's for sixth year potions. Fresh wood is just to the left. I suppose my Goddaughter warned you about that?"

Harry left the storage closet, and returned to his work station, separating each ingredient in the order he would have to add them to the cauldron.

“No, why?”

“You’re only the third or fourth Gryffindor to notice. And exactly how complete is ‘almost’. I expect it by Monday, along with the essay on Pepper-up.”

“I just need to write the conclusion and revise it. I’d be done by now, but Hermione got us kicked out of the library for yelling.” Looking over the directions again, the young Gryffindor began pulling the seeds out of the milkweed pods and separating them from the down. It was a bit tricky, as a lapse in concentration would cause the feathery material to fly into the air and drift dangerously close to his cauldron.

“Hermione? Yell in a library? I imagine Draco was involved in some capacity,” the dark man said, mostly to himself.

“Well, yes. And Malfoy Sr. too, I suppose. I’ve been invited to their Christmas party. Draco says his father’s going to suggest a betrothal, but I think he was just playing.”

The older man snorted.

“Don’t be so sure. Draco’s already gone through two betrothals, and Hermione’s likely to be engaged before graduation.”

“What?! That’s... that’s... gross!”

Snape rolled his eyes. “I know, imagine all those nasty cooties they got!” he said sarcastically.

“That’s not what I meant and you know it!” he huffed, turning down the heat to his now boiling cauldron and stirring the water twelve times with the piece of wormwood. There was a long silence, before questions started popping up in his head. “Would he really try to set up a betrothal with me?”

“To you? Perhaps. With you? No. You’re still a minor and a ward of the school. If he were to ask anyone it would be the Headmistress or even Voldemort.”

“What? Why would they have any say in the matter?!”

Snape gave him an irritated look.

“Are you or are you not a ward of the school?”

“... Voldemort, though?”

“No authority technically, but do you think the headmistress would defy him in any manner whatsoever?”

Harry said nothing to a perfectly obvious answer. For nearly half an hour he worked on his potion and pondered what he should do. He certainly didn’t want anyone marrying him off, but his presence at the Christmas party didn’t seem like it would prevent it if that was what the Malfoy patriarch wanted.

“What do you think I should do?” he asked finally.

Snape, who had been quietly occupied with his grading said nothing and Harry thought he was either being ignored or hadn’t been heard. Heaving a heavy sigh, he turned back to his potion and nearly dropped his ladle when the man spoke.

“Why ask me?”

“Er...well, you’re friends with the Malfoys so... I figured... Slytherins and all...um..”

“I’m sorry I don’t speak in fragmented sentences. Shall we bring in someone to translate?”

“Well, do you want me as your other godson...er, godson-in-law?”

The man gave him a long, considering look, and the longer he looked the more his considerations seemed to disturb him. Harry gave him his nastiest scowl.

"I doubt it's something you... we... need to worry about. You might have gained some attention, but that may fall on either side of the fence or fade away altogether. Lucius Malfoy won't make such a gamble so early in the game."

"So I should go?"

"If only so as not to insult the Malfoys, yes."

Harry nodded, feeling relieved that a course of action was decided upon. Unfortunately, his relief was short lived as he realized his potions had turned from the correct blue green to dark green. Letting out a startled yelp, he quickly removed the overheating potions from the fire.

"Of course," Snape said, watching smugly as Harry pattered about trying to save his brew, "Advice from Slytherin is always self-serving. I recommend taking it in small doses."

Chapter 19: Ballrooms and Backrooms

Time passed, Voldemort returned, the reporters left, the Weasley twins released a clutch of Gurgleburks (a sort of small pixy with beak like a humming bird, which it used to collect earwax to build their nests) in the middle of the Halloween feast, and Harry's grand, albeit vague, adventure was gradually forgotten.

Despite speculation on possible trauma resulting from his kidnaping, Harry went on to win both his matches against Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw and was looking forward to facing off against Slytherin for the Quidditch Cup. The closer the final match drew, the more apt his potion's professor was to giving him detentions.

This should have been extremely irritating, but it was quickly becoming an anticipated reprieve from his housemates. Hermione, who had not given up on the belief that Harry should not attend the Malfoy Christmas party, had unwittingly enlisted the help of just about every Gryffindor in school to back her up. Malfoy's were Slytherins (Hermione being adopted Malfoy made it forgivable for her associate with them). Malfoy's were evil. Malfoy's would trick him into betraying his House. Malfoy's would make him do bad things. Malfoy's would cut him open and give his blood to Snape (that particular one was a favorite of the Weasley twins, and was soon elaborated upon with rituals of virgin sacrifice and monsters composed entirely of tentacles). Snape, being a Gryffindor-hating bastard, kept things nice and balanced with his snarky comments and favoritism.

"I trust you have something appropriate to wear?" Snape asked off-handedly, peering over at Harry who was hunched over a growing pile of beetle eyes. Harry was serving his fourth detention that month for ... he couldn't remember what, and tearing apart fragile beetle bodies for second year potions.

"A friend is lending me some dress robes. He promised to re-size them to fit me properly."

"You could always re-size the clothes yourself."

“If I weren’t serving so many detentions with you I might actually have the time to learn spells outside of homework,” Harry said, looking expectantly at his potion’s professor.

Snape merely smirked.

“I will be escorting you to and from the party, so don’t expect to be there long. You will arrive here appropriately attired at seven-fifteen sharp, or I’ll leave without you.”

Harry said nothing and continued working on his beetles until Snape finally released him to wash up before dinner. He couldn’t say that he was displeased with his escort’s decision to make their visit brief, as he wasn’t really looking forward to the party despite his insistence on going. He was going on principle, but pragmatically thinking he doubted he’d enjoy it much.

Christmas time in Germany had always been spent with family, playing out long standing family traditions from both sides and creating new ones every year. Parties were very few and only with their closest friends and their families in attendance.

Christmas at the Dursley’s had been a farce in comparison. A time of gaudy decorations, Dudley being even more horrendously spoiled than usual, and constant cleaning and baking of sugary treats. The least favorite part of the season by far, however, was the ostentatious parties where in Harry was dressed up in his only nice set of clothes and an ugly green tie with red Santas on it. Mr. and Mrs. Dursley would parade Dudley around to all their associates with a beaming pride matched only by Dudley’s own conceit. Harry would be forced to follow as he was introduced as their adopted ward of some war torn nation in Eastern Europe. And he would be forced to stand there under the pitying and condescending gazes of strangers and endure listening to them wax on and on about how kind and generous the Dursley’s were for taking him in.

He hated them in those moments.

He imagined the Malfoy’s party would more closely resembled the later than the former, although he had to admit he was curious to see more wizarding traditions. The decorations around Hogwarts were breath taking, and he couldn't imagine a family that had sired Draco Malfoy would allow anything less. What he worried about most was the people. What sort of people attended a party held by Voldemort's right hand man?

Fred and George Weasley gave a rather colorful list, on the top of which was Voldemort himself, followed shortly after by the Seeker of the Chudley Canons, and Satan.

Would they ignore him? Would they pity him? Would they sneer? Would they stare?

What would they see when they looked at him? The orphan of two of Voldemort's most hated enemies? The lucky Gryffindor who survived an attempted murder by his school mates?

"Harry? Are you just getting back?"

Looking back from the portrait of the Fat Lady, Harry saw Hermione coming up the stairs with two large books in her arms and her school bag at her side.

"Yeah. Snape gave me beetles this time. How did the study session go? Gobbledegook."

The portrait swung open and they both climbed inside. Hermione let out an exasperated sigh.

"You didn't miss out on anything important. Everyone was too distracted talking out their holiday plans to get much studying in."

Harry smiled.

"Can you blame them? Two weeks without classes and only a few essays for homework? Besides, I'm sure they're excited to be going home for the holidays. Aren't you?"

Hermione smiled back weakly. Harry gave her a weird look.

“You really don’t want to go home for Christmas?”

She sighed, and pulled him into a little nook in the corner of the common room. They sat across from each other, and Harry only now realized how miserable she looked.

“Go home to what, Harry? My foster father barely looks at me at the best of times, and curses my birth at the worst. Narcissa pretends nothing’s wrong, convinced hiding me under pretty bows and good manners will make everything fine and wipe away the supposed blemish of my dirty blood. My house is a museum and death trap rolled into one, and I’m not even allowed in the library!”

Harry wasn't sure what he should say to that. He had known Hermione didn't get along well with her foster father, but he hadn't realized it was so bad that she would shun her own home rather than face him, and he had never heard her utter a complaint about her foster mother before.

“Is that why you don’t want me to come to the party, Hermione? Because you think your foster family will look down on me too?”

“Yes...no... sort of.”

“Thank’s for clearing that up.”

“Harry, it’s not that I care what they thinks of you. You’re a wonderful friend and wonderful person, nothing they think or say will convince me other wise, but Harry... if they choose to... if they wanted... they could... they could...”

“Hermione, what could they do?”

She wiped the corner of her eyes and sniffed.

“They could... forbid me from being your friend.”

[illegible]

Harry looked in the mirror critically as Clyde bustled around him, straightening up his robes and making sure they fit properly. They were blue with silver clasps and bangles, and made him look unusually pale.

"Not to sound too much like a girl, mate," Clyde said, "But you'd look way better in green."

"Professor McGonagal would have a heart attack."

"Snape too, if we were lucky."

They both laughed.

A familiar warmth in his pocket alerted him to the fact he was running late. He pulled out his watch and cursed.

"Too late to do anything about it now. Thanks for letting me borrow this, Clyde."

The other boy shrugged dismissively. "Not like I'll need it. Me and my 'uncles' won't be going home till the night before Christmas."

"Yeah, I'm sorry that your Grandmother hasn't been feeling well."

"Don't worry about it. This happens every year. She'll be fine once the stores stop selling eggnog. Now go on before the greasy git leaves without you!"

Harry hurried down into the dungeons alone. Hermione, Draco, and most of the other students who were going to attend the party had left several days before to spend the holidays at home. Despite his friend's reluctance to return home, once there the letters she sent suggested she was having some fun. Mr. Malfoy was even busier than usual at Court, and the result was the rest of the family was left to enjoy their holidays with each other. Harry didn't begrudge her happiness, but couldn't help but feel lonelier than usual.

While there were only a few students left behind during the holidays, and that number kept decreasing the closer it came to Christmas, those that stayed were intent on enjoying themselves. The remaining students all sat at one large table now, allowing the otherwise segregated houses to mingle freely with each other and their older and younger companions. Harry tried to be sociable, but there was this barrier of infamy between them, one he had gotten during the Welcoming Feast and strengthened with his Quidditch victories and kidnapping. Every time he spoke to someone unfamiliar he felt their unspoken expectation.

Clyde was by far the most enjoyable company, but he also craved large groups of people and wasn't above leaving Harry alone for hours to go out and have a snow ball fight. The Weasley twins... well, they were really only safe in small quantities. Like alcohol, too much and you found yourself either embarrassed, injured, or in trouble with authority. All his Slytherin friends had left about the same time as Hermione.

Well, at least he'd get to see them he thought.

Harry arrived at the potions lab just in time to catch up with Snape.

"Cutting it close aren't you? And what a horrid color," the greasy git said by way of greeting.

"There's nothing wrong with blue, and beggars can't be choosers."

"What a perfectly muggle sentiment. Cambi rosso."

His robes suddenly turned Gryffindor red. The boy looked himself over and regarded Snape skeptically. "What? No white fur trim?"

"I could just as easily turn them pink if the color is not to your liking."

"Ho ho ho."

Snape rolled his eyes and led Harry further into the dungeons. They entered the Slytherin dorms. Harry had visited once or twice with Hermione, but hadn't stayed long in the gloomy place. This was first time he'd seen the Slytherin common room decorated, and it looked very pretty and very cold with its Christmas tree laden with silver ornaments and pure white furniture.

They walked to a narrow door and Snape pulled a key from his pocket. Using the key on the door, a glimmering light seeped through the cracks of the door before fading away. As they stepped through, Harry knew they had just warped to Malfoy Manor. They were deposited into what appeared to be a cloak room. They were immediately greeted by a rather ugly little creature dressed in what appeared to be a pillow case. It looked around the at the rows of hanging cloaks, gloves, and scarves with barely concealed terror.

"My Masters bid you welcome, my Lords," it, she?, said, bowing so low its floppy ears brushed the ground, eyes flitting about from side to side. "Gigi is escorting you to the ballroom, now."

She practically ran from the room.

"What on earth is that?"

"Boggart," Snape informed him. "The only way you can catch them by locking them in a closet. Their quite terrified of them."

"Oh."

Harry was so distracted by the funny little creature skittering about, he failed to notice Snape's dark eyes glowing with humor.

They were led down a very long corridor lined with portraits that followed their progress with calculating grey eyes. Between the portraits were display cases, filled with many strange items and books that turned their own pages every so often. Harry was hard pressed not to stop and study them all more closely, but Snape's insistent hand pressing on his shoulder kept them moving forward.

"Hermione was right," he said, "This place is a museum."

"Not a sentiment I recommend repeating to the rest of the Malfoy family, Mr. Potter."

“It’s not the first time we’ve heard it said.”

Draco Malfoy was leaning behind a marble pillars. He slunk from his hiding spot, smiling mischievously. He was richly dressed in dark blue and silver, and on him it looked quite flattering. “Father sent me to wait for you. Our Lord is holding a private discussion with some of the inner circle.”

Snape nodded. Draco turned to Harry.

“Just go through that door. Hermione’s probably sulking in a corner somewhere. Nice robes, by the way.”

With that, Harry was left to his own devices. He was seriously tempted to go back the way they’d come and get a better look at some of those display cases. Then he remembered Hermione had described the house as not only a museum, but a death trap as well. With a deep breath and a conscious effort to maintain his posture, he opened the door.

A waltz was playing, but from where he couldn’t see. There had to have easily been over three hundred witches and wizards filling the room, all dressed beautifully in their finest. Harry felt distinctly underdressed, but no one paid him any attention as he made his way through the- good god was that a diamond or a crystal ball?

“Harry!”

He turned to see Hermione, Natalie, Ron, and several of Draco’s other friends clustered together in a corner. As he made his way over, he couldn’t help but notice Ron standing awfully close to Hermione and looked rather pink in the ears. She was dressed in a satin white gown, embroidered with crystal snow flakes that flickered different colors every time she moved. Her hair had been curled into ringlets that escaped from her silver hairpin to cascade down her naked shoulders. Combined with the glowing smile escaping her pink painted lips, he could sympathize with Ron for the first time ever.

Hermione was gorgeous.

“About time you showed up, Harry,” Natalie greeted, looking mysterious and beautiful in black silk and white gloves. “Hermione was starting to develop a twitch.”

“Natalie!”

“Don’t melt your snowflakes, Princess, I was only teasing. Come on, Zabini, lets squeeze in a dance before everyone starts getting drunk.”

“Natalie!”

The blond bombshell was already off, leading her rather flustered date away. Harry just smiled as she disappeared, then turned to his friend.

“You look nice.” She just shrugged and looked him over. Her expression turned quizzical.

“You look...ah..”

“Like a prepubescent Santa,” Ron offered, smirking.

“I was going to say ‘festive’, but...”

“It used to be blue, but you know ... your godfather’s Christmas spirit and all.”

That earned him several snickers, and a sympathetic look from Hermione. From somewhere in the folds of her dress she pulled out a wand.

“Cambi verde.”

His robes turned green.

“What am I? A mood ring?” Harry lamented. “Think Snape will cry ‘blasphemy!’ if he sees me like this?”

“No, but he might turn you pink.”

“Who has he done that to?”

“Lucius for one.”

From there they fell into casual conversation, laughter, and the occasional interruption of an adult dropping by to extend their greetings to their host's daughter. Draco eventually showed up, shoved Ron onto Parkinson for a dance, and then made an escape before they got back. The other Slytherins eventually wandered off to get something to drink or mingle with their dates, leaving them to wander by themselves out onto the balcony. Aside from a few wizards enjoying a smoke, the large balcony was practically empty. Although the area was covered in a layer of snow, they left no foot prints and it was only slightly cooler outside than in.

“Didn't you want to dance, Hermione?” he asked, realizing they were probably the only two who hadn't yet.

“Is that your way of inviting me to?”

Harry blushed. “I don't really know much about dancing. I think the last time I tried was when my mom taught me to waltz at her friend's wedding. I was only seven, so...”

“Well, come on... show me what you remember, I'll fill you in on the rest.”

“Oh...um...okay.”

He stepped up to her, feeling awkward and clumsy before they had even started. It was a lot different dancing with someone about the same size than it had been with his mother. Hermione had to correct the position of his hand on her hip and remind him not to keep looking at his toes. His face was on fire and Hermione was on the verge of laughing.

“Okay, I think we're ready to start,” she said, “Let's just keep to the basic steps, then we'll try something adventurous like twirling.”

“Oh, ha ha.”

“And one, two, three, and one, two, three, and- Ouch!”

One moment Harry was fumbling through his dance steps, stepping on Hermione’s toes no doubt, and the next he found himself face down in a snow drift. Lifting his head, it took him a moment to spot a large mansion almost half a mile away, and then realize it was Malfoy Manor. No sooner had he realized this, than he was landing heavily on his back and looking up at Hermione’s concerned face.

“... Okay...”

“Are you alright, Harry?”

He considered the question. “I hope so. Tell me, did something odd just happen a moment ago?”

She smiled and helped him climb back to his feet. Now at a proper angle, Harry could see that they had company in the form a ‘bogart’, a different one than before, wearing a flour sack. It was peeking at Harry rather guiltily.

“I’m sorry about that, Harry. You stepped on my toe and Dobby overreacted a bit.”

“Dobby?”

The ‘bogart’ let out a mournful wail.

“Dobby has disgraced his mistress and attacked a wizard! Oh, Dobby is the most awfulest of House Elves. Dobby must punish himself!”

“Oh, Dobby! Don’t-”

In a rather alarming display, the strange creature picked up a flower pot and smashed it over its own head. Harry watched stunned as Dobby snapped his fingers, and the pot fixed itself, and he smashed the pot on his head yet again.

“Dob-”

Smash.

“No, stop-”

Smash.

“Immobilis corpus!”

Dobby stopped mid-self-punishment. Hermione let out an exasperated sigh.

“Now I command you stop that. It was an honest mistake, and you know I dislike it when you decide to punish yourself,” she chided, then turned to Harry. “This is my personal house elf, Dobby. He can be a bit... overzealous, but he’s really a very good elf.”

“I thought he was a boggart?”

Dobby let out a horrendous wail.

“Oh, Dobby is a boggart! How he has shamed his mistress!”

“What is all the racket about?!”

Draco came storming out to the balcony, took one look at Dobby and rolled his eyes.

“I should have known. I thought you were told to stay out of the way tonight?”

“Oh, Dobby is the worstest elf ever!”

“Draco, you’re not helping!”

“Dobby, go do dishes in the kitchen. I’m sure there’s plenty of sharp pointy things still in the sink for you to punish yourself with.”

Dobby bulbous eyes widen, look far to pleased at the prospect of pain to be healthy. Hermione sighed and released him for her spell, allowing him to disappear with a loud 'pop'.

"Blimey," Harry said. Draco smirked.

"Takes a bit of getting used to. Dobby's been Hermione's elf since she was five and she still doesn't know how to deal with him."

She scowled darkly at her brother, who smiled sweetly and draped an arm around Harry.

"Sister dear, mother was looking for you. She wants you to meet her in the powder room."

Hermione sighed, then looked apologetically at Harry.

"She probably wants me to meet all her society friends again. I'll try to keep things brief."

Once she was gone, Harry found himself alone with Draco. He expected the other boy to return to the party, but instead he pulled Harry off to the side. The pale boy regarded him coolly and Harry was suddenly reminded of that moment on the train where Draco had threatened him.

"I like you Harry," the Malfoy heir said finally, "You make school... interesting. And you're a fairly descent fellow, for a Gryffindor of course."

"Of course," he conceded.

"I can appreciate that my sister likes you, but I have to wonder... why do you like my sister?"

Harry frowned. "I don't know what you mean. Why wouldn't I like Hermione? She's clever, funny, and a good friend."

"Yes, yes she is. She is also bossy, condescending, and a spoil sport."

Yes, Harry admitted to himself, that was true, but that wasn't all Hermione was.

"She's... I dunno. She's Hermione. Sometimes she's a bit too smart for her own good, but... she's... well, she's like me."

"Like you?" Draco asked skeptically.

"I don't think it's something you could really understand. We're both trying to make the very best out of what happened to us."

"Happened to you? Nothing happened to Hermione. I never would have allowed it. Our family never would have let anything hurt her."

"But she's still hurting, isn't she, Draco?"

The other boy looked ready to snap at him, but hesitated, then looked away. When Draco looked back at him, his expression was mutinous.

"You sure you just don't think she's cute?"

Harry rolled his eyes. Draco made a frustrated gesture.

"Well, damn. Why couldn't you be shallow? This would be so much easier if I could just shove Natalie off onto you."

"What are you babbling about Draco?"

"You know my parents are going to arrange a marriage for my sister, don't you?"

"..."

"Despite what I said, I doubt they'll arrange it with you. So listen, don't go making her fall in love with you, ok?"

"Er..."

Draco shook his head, looking at Harry like he was imbecile. "Gryffindors!"

"Yes, well, Slytherins!" Harry said, pointing towards the ballroom dance floor. From amongst the many twirling couples, a rather flushed Hermione and Ron were dancing. Draco gaped.

"I leave him alone for five minutes!"

Harry laughed at his retreating back. A familiar warmth drew his hand to his pocket, and he pulled out his watch. He had been at the party almost three hours now, longer than he had anticipated. Was his watch telling him Snape wanted to leave now? Deciding he should find the potion's master before the man found him, he went back inside. As he suspected, Snape was nowhere in the ballroom. Natalie tried to coax him to dance, but he made his excuses and kept looking. Hermione, Draco, and Ron had all disappeared into the crowd. Harry had almost despaired of finding the bastard, wondered why he would even want to find him, and then spotted someone who could help him.

"Gigi!"

The saggy eared house elf turned curiously to him, and gave him her usual bow.

"Mister Potter honors Gigi by remembering her name. How may Gigi help young Mister Potter?"

"Er... yes, I'm looking for Professor Snape. You know, the man I arrived with."

"Professor Snape is in the drawing room with Master and Master's Master. Gigi will take you there!"

"Master's Master? You mean-"

Before Harry could protest, Gigi had taken hold of his robe and with a loud 'pop' was transported into the drawing room. Instantly, there were at least a dozen wands pointed directly at him. Blinking owlshly, Harry slowly lifted his empty hands.

“Potter?!”

Harry turned his head towards the fireplace where three very familiar Slytherins were seated and one man who could only be Malfoy Sr. with his hand entwined intimately with beautiful, haughty woman that had to have been Narcissa. His eyes skimmed them briefly, and something about their stances suggested he had interrupted something. When his gaze found Voldemort's, he tensed.

“I didn't do it!” he blurted, then slapped his hand over his mouth.

Voldemort let out a bark of laughter. The room was suddenly less tense. The other witches and wizards in the room put their wands away, and set their expression to something other than vacant surprise.

“Oh, Mr. Potter, what does such a reflexive statement say about our relationship?” Voldemort asked rhetorically, striding towards the young wizard. He stopped just before him, raising his hand to touch Harry's cheek, tilting his face for gentle inspection. Harry remained tense and quiet, feeling more than just the Dark Lord's gaze on him. Finally, the elder wizard released him. “What brings you to our little corner of the world, Mr. Potter?”

“... I've misplaced myself again, My Lord.”

Voldemort smirked, turning away to take up his position by the fireplace again. “I believe we had a discussion about that at the start of term.”

“Yes, sir.”

“No luck?”

“It's one of my New Year's resolutions, sir.”

Voldemort chuckled, and several others did as well, though Harry doubted they knew why. Lucius Malfoy was watching their interaction with intense curiosity, his grey eyes alight with thoughts Harry could not possibly dream of. Beside him, Lestrage, dressed in a green gown so dark it was almost black, was fixing him with a stare that rivaled Nagini's. Snape... Snape was expressionless, which Harry knew meant something. If the bastard was content he'd be smirking.

"Do tell how you ended up here. I trust vampires weren't involved?"

"Er... no, no vampires," Harry stammered, then turned a rather dark look on Snape. "Though there might have been a boggart."

Snape's stoic expression cracked, just bit. It was enough that Harry felt some of his confidence return to him.

"I'm sorry if I interrupted your gathering, My Lord. I was merely looking for Professor Snape, when one of the house elves sought to... assist me."

"And why were you looking for him?"

Harry shrugged. "He might not have to abide by a curfew, but I do."

Voldemort looked to the clock resting on the mantle, and then back at Snape.

"I must apologize my friend, it seems we have impeded your responsibilities with all this idle conversation."

Snape inclined his head. "Not at all. You are always my highest priority, My Lord."

"Then I release you for the night. Go, take your young charge home and enjoy the rest of the holidays."

The potion's master stood, bowing respectfully to the Dark Lord and then to Lord and Lady Malfoy, his hosts. He strode towards the door, snagging Harry who was caught again in Voldemort's crimson gaze.

The connection broken, Harry's stride easily matched Snape's toward the exit, his hand the first to reach the door nob.

"Oh, and Mister Potter."

Harry stopped, peering hesitantly over his shoulder at Voldemort, looking like the devil in the fire light.

"Merry Christmas."

oo
oo

Lord and Lady Malfoy retired to their bedroom at three o'clock, leaving the clean up for the party to the already weary house elves and the few caterers they'd hired for the party. This being the first time they had been alone in days, they were both desiring the other's company. So while Narcissa sat on the bed, and her husband worked to remove her shoes, they began their first and only honest discussion of the entire day.

"A rather eventful party wasn't it?" Narcissa began.

"Indeed, if Potter hadn't shown up when he had, your sister and Severus might have crossed wands," he agreed, his hands sliding up her leg to unclip her pantyhose from her garter. He graced her with a mischievous smirk and kiss to her ankle as he exposed her naked skin. She smiled back, reaching to unfasten the silver clasps of his robe.

"She was being extremely antagonistic tonight, wasn't she? I know Severus has been especially competitive with her recently, but I hadn't realized she was feeling so defensive. I would never have allowed so many of her cronies into the private party if I had thought she was going to gang up on him. We'll have to write Severus an apology letter."

"Hmmm... I don't know... Potter showed up at a very convenient time for him. He completely ruined her flow of innuendo about his professionalism as an unbiased teacher, hah!, and rather discredited her by actively seeking Severus out. What Gryffindor would seek out the cruel, tormenting Head of their rival house? I can't help but wonder if he didn't somehow signal Potter to come and save him. Do you need assistance with your jewelry?"

"Just my necklace if you would. Severus conspiring with a Gryffindor? James Potter's son, no less? I can't see it. Besides, his arrival was too perfect. There was no way Severus could have planned for that specific situation nor Potter's specific method of entrance. It was a fluke. Gryffindors have a knack for them."

Lucius conceded to her logic with a tilt of his head. She took his wrists to remove his cuff links.

"Speaking of Potter... what do you make of him?" Narcissa asked. Lucius scowled.

"I wanted to throttle him."

She laughed and moved to unbutton his shirt underneath his robes.

"He wasn't that bad. I found him quite endearing. And such pretty eyes, he had. Even from across the room you could see how green they were."

"Yes, our Lord seemed to think the same thing. They couldn't look away from each other."

Narcissa paused, thinking back on the encounter. She hadn't realized it at the time, but the boy had not looked away from Voldemort. Not once. When was the last time anyone had held the Dark Lord's gaze for so long without look away or dying? Perhaps not since Dumbledore had been forced to retreat across the Channel.

"Do you suppose the boy is love with our Lord?"

"Well, it would explain Bella's hatred for him, wouldn't it? But it's Voldemort's reaction that concerns me I've never known him to entertain the affections of others, especially not children. There's something going on, and I'm sure Severus and Bella know what it is."

Helping Narcissa to her feet and allowing her dress slide to the floor, he stood behind her and began untying her bodice. They stood quietly until the contraption fell away and left her completely naked. Lucius' warm hands ran the contours of her natural form, massaging light indentations the bodice had left on her pale skin.

"Perhaps we should ask Hermione," Narcissa suggested offhandedly. "Draco mentioned that they were quite close."

Lucius grunted, and hid his scowl in her hair.

"Please don't mention that little mudblood while we're doing this. It's rather a turn off."

A rather nasty retort was on the tip of her tongue, but the argument was old and led nowhere, and she was much too tired to start it up again now. She took up a wandering hand and kissed it affectionately.

"Then we'll just have to wait to see how things unfold. Perhaps in the end, you'll have your chance to wrap these beautiful, strong hands around that boy's little neck, but for now they belong to me."

Chapter 20: The King and His Prince

Harry's Christmas came and went quietly. Hermione and all his friends returned to the castle refreshed from their break. He wasn't sure who was happier. Him for being reunited with his friends or Hermione for being reunited with the library.

Classes continued, tests were taken, points were gained and lost, detentions were served, and nothing crazy ... crazier than the usual school related accident happened. Voldemort came and went from the castle, rarely seen except at Quidditch matches and the occasional dinner. If he showed Harry any special interest, the boy didn't know as he made it a point never to look in his direction.

The highlight of Harry's second semester was definitely Quidditch. Transfiguring pens into forks and creating potions that equaled a visit to the dentist was great and all, but Harry had yet to find any sort of magic that rivaled the feeling of flight. In the air he felt powerful, like he could go straight into battle with only his broom and still come out the victor.

It was a very good feeling to have, especially as the final game of the season was once again between Gryffindors and Slytherins. They may have been short a Seeker and a Chaser, but Slytherin's strength had always lay with its Beaters. Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw had grown bolder since Gryffindor's first victory, but they lacked the blind aggressiveness that was Slytherin and the intense competitiveness of Harry's house.

Walking to the Quidditch pitch, his team encircling him like an armed guard, the young Seeker was practically shaking with excitement. He had been to almost every match, as participant or spectator, and his knowledge of the game and of Slytherin's tactics had grown immensely. With every flying maneuver, every point earned, and every foul called Harry imagined using what he learned against his most dangerous rivals.

And today he would have his chance.

"Alright there, Harry?" asked George... Fred?

He gave him a grin.

“Oh I like that look!” laughed the other Weasley twin. “Makes me thinks there’ll be an explosion at some point in the match.”

“Yeah,” Harry said, “Lestrangle’s temper when Slytherin loses.”

The team laughed, but quickly sobered as they neared the pitch. Even from the outside, it was obvious the stadium was packed. He suppose he should have figured that the championship game would have more spectators than usual, but the audience wasn’t something he spent much time considering in Quidditch.

“Who are all the extra people?”

“Well, in addition to the entire school,” began team captain Oliver Wood, “There are mostly other parents. No one aside from students and their guardians are allowed to attend... security issues, you know? We usually get at least one player who goes off to the national league after graduation, so people like to come and guess who.”

Harry felt himself relax. Perhaps it was a bit egotistical, but after the year he’d had he was worried they were there to gawk at him. The team quickly prepped for the game, joking around to settle everyone’s nerves as they waited. Finally they were called to the field.

They were greeted with thunderous applause from one side of stadium and resounding ‘boos’ from the other. Harry tried to find Hermione in the crowd, but realized it was hopeless. He didn’t even know what side of the stadium she was on, as she might very well have sat with her brother amongst the Slytherins.

The only people he could recognize right away were Voldemort and the Hogwarts staff seated in the VIP section, but he avoided looking. Too many Slytherins with too much power over him to settle his nerves any. Instead, he focused on the Slytherin team.

They looked as ogre-ish as he remembered, although they had gotten a smaller and swifter Seeker. Franklin Borgish was a thin boy with exceptionally long limbs and fingers. Harry had seen him play a few times, and that extra reach was a definite strength when catching the snitch but his balance was compromised as a result. He wondered if he couldn't make that work to his favor.

Professor Gimms stalked onto the field.

"Players, mount your brooms!"

The stadium fell into a hushed silence.

The whistle shrieked.

The balls were released.

And the players were off.

"And Potter doesn't waste any time!" cried the announcer, "He's got the Snitch in his sights from the get go, and Borgish is just starting after him. Oh-no, they've both lost sight of it!"

Harry had not, in fact, lost sight of the Snitch, but it had suddenly changed directions and headed directly towards the Slytherin Seeker. He had looked in the opposite direction, and predictably, so did Borgish. The other Slytherin players had opted for a new strategy, and were not focusing on destroying Harry first. No, they seemed quite intent on destroying everyone else.

They were aggressively circling and obstructing the Gryffindors, not so much to gain or lose points, but to disrupt their movements in such a way that left them confused about their next move. The Weasley's soon figured it out and were using the same tactic against one of the Slytherin's Beaters. The others were having a harder time discerning their intentions, and Angelina nearly fell off her broom twice trying to avoid a collision with a player who just barely managed to change direction.

Harry could only partially follow his team's movements, aided mostly by the announcer's commentary, as a majority of his attention was focused on the snitch and keeping Borgish (who was still much closer to it than he was) from spotting it. The snitch flew downwards, finally away from the other seeker.

If it hadn't moved so close to the ground, Harry never would have seen the shadow streaking towards his own. More on instinct than in thought, he angled his broom downward and shot towards the ground. He wasn't aiming for the snitch, just avoiding that incoming shadow, but Borgish must have interpreted it like that and followed suit. Harry risked a glance back to see Slytherin beater, Marcus Flint, speeding after him. Above them, he could see the rest of his team preoccupied with battles of their own, and understood the Slytherin's plan at once.

Keep the rest of the team busy, wait till Harry was distracted, then take him out long enough for their own seeker to catch the snitch.

A good plan, but Harry had no intention in letting them carry it out.

He leveled out at about six feet from the ground and angled his broom into the distance, encouraging Borgish to look that way as well. Once the Slytherin seeker was busy looking for the supposed location of the snitch, Harry slowed and descended even further so that his feet were brushing the grass. Quietly, almost sedately, Harry changed directions.

"Slytherin Chaser Corvis barely avoids two bludgers sent at him by both Weasley twin beaters, and Chaser Jones takes advantage by scoring a goal. Twenty points Gryffindor! And what the heck is Potter doing?"

By now Harry had practically stopped and Flint was coming at him full speed. He watched his progress by following the shadows on the ground, counting down until the moment of impact. Above him he could hear his teammates calling for him to look out.

"Five...Four..."

The shadow was too close now. He'd never be able to avoid a collision on his broom.

"Three...Two..."

His feet were suddenly solidly on the ground.

“One.”

He jumped-not flew or levitated or floated, but jumped to his left. Flint flew by him, unable to stop and expecting resistance, he had too much speed and too much of an angle. The nose of his broom hit the ground first, and the larger boy flipped clean off of it and smashed into the turf. No sooner had Flint’ face connected with the grass, then Harry was in the air again.

“Oh my God! I can’t believe he fell for that! I mean, Ouch! And Slytherin Captain Marcus Flint looks to be out of it for the game! But what’s this? Potter’s changed directions! Has he found the snitch?!”

He had never lost sight of the snitch, Borgish was on the wrong end of the field, the rest of the Slytherin team was distracted, and Flint wasn’t in any condition to stop anyone. All he had to do was reach out and-

“And Potter’s caught the snitch! Gryffindor wins the Quidditch Cup!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Headmistress Lestrage had waited until she was in her office to explode. The endless number of portraits all looked down with either amusement or disgust, as she screamed and stomped and broke things in a mad fit. And from her perfectly white teeth and rosy red lips fell the blackest words of her black heart.

Like the jealous Queen cursing the fair and innocent Snow White, she thought only of the supposed wrongs against her. Her dearest and most precious Dark Lord, like a proud and solemn father he had presented yet another golden crown of laurels to that scruffy vagabond and his Gryffidork horde, while Slytherin House, his real family stood shocked and shamed from the side lines.

And while she could only stand there, and consciously fight to keep her hand from her wand, Snape had left her to talk to his House team. She had expected him to feel the same way, they were both Slytherins after all, and they all know exactly how badly they had failed their House, their families, and their Lord. As the Headmistress she had to appear impartial, but she itched to curse Borgish and Flint as much as she did Potter. But again, though it really shouldn't have surprised her, Snape had disappointed her.

He quite solemnly gathered the players around him, handed Flint a healing potions from his robe, and spoke to them quite calmly.

“This is an unfortunate outcome,” Snape said, and the Slytherins looked dejectedly at their shoes, “But do not let this be viewed as a shame. Lift your heads and keep your eyes forward. You are Slytherins.”

They followed his instructions, the older ones quickly finding a way to stand on their injured pride. When they could all look their Head of House in the eye again, he continued.

“This was a very well played game. I have not seen our Lord so enraptured for many years. The Black Cat’s,” he sneered the nick name, “silly antics caught us off guard. Unlike the other Houses we learn far faster from our mistakes. We will have victory again soon.”

And it was a lie, a lie, a lie! But those stupid fools had seemed so satisfied with that insipid notion! To Hufflepuff with entire lot of them! You could never, ever fail. To fail was a weakness, and the weak died or lived wishing they had! Look at how quickly their Lord had turned from them for this small fallacy after ten years of perfection? Glory and Honor for Gryffindor?! Glory for the Mudblooded, useless, little Potter?

“AAAAAAaaaaahhhhhhhh!!!”

[illegible]

In Voldemort's office, Snape broke with his usual tradition to enjoy a bit of brandy with the Dark Lord. He was truthfully disappointed in his little Snake's failure at the match that day, but in the scheme of things it was small loss. Their futures would not suffer for it. They would still graduate to become the leaders of Wizarding Britain, and two of his players had already received scholarships to play at wizarding universities. They would all get over it, and play even better next year.

Having consoled himself, he took the time to instead consider how he might take advantage of the situation. On a purely vindictive level, he took great enjoyment from the fact that he could practically feel Lestrage's insane rage vibrating through the castle stones. On a more pragmatic one, he knew Lord Voldemort could feel it as well and that reduced her once again in his eyes.

It was clear the elder wizard was quite taken with Lily's boy. Studying the Dark Lord during the match, he had eyes only for Potter, and that was a bit frightening. It wasn't exactly affection he had seen, but a look he had seen men of very specialized profession get when they find an extremely valuable tool. The wizard's dark mind had been spinning with possible uses for the child.

A Prince. He had said the wizarding world should have a prince, but what did that mean?

Voldemort hadn't meant an heir. The potion master knew he was practically immortal and had no need of one, particularly a Gryffindor even if he was of Slytherin descent.

A vague idea of what the man might want, flitted in and out of Snape's mind, tangible as spider silk. He gave up on the speculation quickly. If he couldn't think of it with a clear head, he certainly wasn't going to find the answer while drinking.

"You look pleased, Severus," Voldemort said, looking quite content sitting across from him. They were placed by the warm fire, Nagini dozing around her master's shoulder. It was rather intimate, and without Lestrage demanding the Dark Lord's attention like a spoiled child it felt doubly so. "Especially considering Slytherin's loss today."

Ugh. So maybe he hadn't consoled himself completely of that fact.

"Yes, well... their first loss in ten years. Gryffindor have been more like mewling kittens than lions since your rise to power, so I'm not surprised they were caught off guard. Potter turned out to be quite the trickster. Perhaps he should have gone to my House after all."

He quickly shielded his mind, keeping the Dark Lord from detecting the lie. Potter was as Gryffindor as James Potter and...Lily... ever were.

Voldemort seemed pleased with the comment though, just as Snape thought he would.

"Yes, he was a little imp today, wasn't he? I trust Slytherin wasn't too devastated?"

"Disappointed of course, but they'll recover. There's still the House Cup, of course."

"Of course," Voldemort conceded and took a drink of his brandy. "I do hope Bella keeps that in mind before she starts breaking things. I do keep my Founder's Collection in her office after all."

Inside, Snape was practically singing! Voldemort, alone with him, openly mocking the headmistress lack of self control. If he weren't afraid of Potter cooties, he would go and kiss the little waif right now! Outwardly, he kept his expression neutral, although his voice was vaguely condescending.

"She's always been very... passionate about House pride."

Voldemort looked amused.

"And you are not 'passionate', Severus?"

Snape smirked. "I am proud, my Lord, and I am dedicated. But passionate... I have always viewed passion as more of a Gryffindor trait than a Slytherin one."

Voldemort just smiled and lifted his glass.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry spent the remaining weeks before the end of term trying to hide his silly grin from every Slytherin he encountered, especially Snape. The first week after the Quidditch Cup, it had been difficult with all the other Gryffindors smiling and congratulating him. Even many of the Hufflepuffs and the Ravenclaws had been impressed with him. And truth be told, he was rather impressed with himself, as well. The three detentions he had received from Snape and the exploding inkwell in his bag had gone a long way in curbing his enthusiasm.

Now with only a week remaining until the end of term, his enthusiasm had all but disappeared. Soon the castle would be empty, and without Wizarding Culture classes that summer he would not see any of his friends or teachers until September. While the rest of his classmates would be returning to their families, he would be spending his summer alone at the Sleuw's. It would be an improvement over the Dursley's, but it still seemed a sad option when he could think of so many others he wanted to spend time with.

Hermione.

Clyde.

His Slytherin friends... acquaintances?

Remus and Sirius, the Godfather he hadn't seen since he was an infant.

"A knut for your thoughts?"

Harry turned to see Natalie, strolling across the green. Classes had ended for the day, but Hermione had insisted on a trip to the library and all he had wanted was wide open spaces and fresh air. With the charmed journal in hand, he had found a grassy knoll outside from which he began sketches of the Whomping Willow, and hadn't been expecting company.

The Slytherin girl had forgone her school robes, opting instead for a green summer dress with matching lace up sandals that wound up to her knees. A gentle breeze danced with her hair, her dress, the free ends of her sandal ribbons and not for the first time Harry thought her quite beautiful.

“Do you really have a knut?” he asked.

“In this dress? Heavens no. It took be half an hour to figure out where to put my wand. What are you doing?”

He lifted the journal, showing her some of his pencil sketches. She ‘oohed’ at the drawings and then grinned. She walked a little past Harry to a small outcropping of rocks between him and the tree, and sat herself primly down.

“Draw me?” she asked.

Harry turned thoughtful. He had been drawing for over an hour already, and he was already experiencing a faint headache from touching the book for so long. “I don’t know. People are harder to draw.”

“Oh, come on Harry! Consider it a birthday present.”

“It’s your birthday?”

She grinned. “Will you draw me if I say yes?”

“I’ll promise to draw you for your birthday if you tell me the truth.”

“I’ll give you a clue. It falls on a Sunday this year.”

“That’s not a clue!”

“Well, then I guess you’ll just have to draw me every Sunday until January.”

It was such a Natalie thing to say that Harry couldn’t help but laugh.

“So what are you doing out here Natalie? And without Draco or your usual girly-ish friends for that matter.”

“Girly-ish friends?”

“Parkinson.”

She snorted. “I suppose she does only rank as ‘girly-ish’ with that unibrow. And she’s not a friend. Frankly, we can’t stand each other.”

“Then why are you always sitting by each other?”

“Because Draco likes to be seen sitting next to the prettiest girl in Slytherin, and Parkinson isn’t that girl. Poor thing, she’s insanely jealous.”

Harry shook his head. “I’ll never understand Slytherins. So why are you here instead of making all the other Slytherin girls jealous?”

“I wanted to talk with you before the term ended, and since Hermione has buried her brain in a book somewhere that doesn’t resemble ‘here’, I thought now would be the perfect time. Won’t you miss me when I leave for the summer?”

“Of course I will,” he said honestly. “I’ll miss everyone. Well... I’ll miss everyone except Ron and Snape anyway.”

“Will you write me?”

“If you write me first. I don’t have an owl, and the school’s owlry is off limits in the summer.”

“Well, then I’ll write you every week. And you better have my pictures ready or I’ll be very cross with you, Mr. Potter!”

From the tallest tower in the school, a silent observer couldn’t hear the boy’s ringing laughter through the gentle roar of the wind, but peering through his telescope his crimson eyes followed the movement of his throat and crinkling of his eyes. Adjusting the instrument just the tiniest bit, he could just barely recognize his journal set in the boy's lap, forgotten but not discarded.

Back on the school grounds, with no viewing mechanism of his own, Harry could neither see nor hear Voldemort's dark laughter. But he felt it as a chill running down his spine and a strange ache where his fingers touched the journal.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"...And with six-hundred and twenty-five points, the House Cup once again goes to Slytherin!" the Headmistress declared, and with a swish of her wand all the banners in the Great Hall turned green and silver.

"Blah, not again," Fred groused, "I was so sure we'd win this year after we won the Quidditch Cup."

"What do you expect with Snape handing out points to his House like it was candy?" Clyde pointed out.

"... You might want to use a different analogy, mate. Who the heck would accept candy from Snape?"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Stop groping my sister in public!" Draco snapped irritably, scanning the platform for gawkers. Hermione released Harry from her rather overzealous hug to glare at her brother. Harry grinned at the blond boy.

"Tell her to stop groping me first! Ouch! Don't poke me so hard, Hermione. Your nails are sharp!"

"Boys, ugh!" she huffed. "Now, when I get back you better not have burned the Forbidden Forest down or flooded Hogsmeade or something. And get your homework done early this summer. If you do, you can send it to me and I'll check it for errors. Did you remember to pack everything? It's so silly with you living right next to the castle, but they won't let you back in-

"Hermione, come on! The good seats are going to be taken if you don't hurry, and I'm not sitting next to a Hufflepuff. I've accepted that you're a Gryffindor, but a man has to draw the line somewhere!"

The two best friends shared a grin, and reluctantly parted company. Harry remained on the train platform until all the other students were on board. Though he would be taking the Hogwarts Express to the school every year, he wouldn't be taking it away from there. It was awfully tempting though.

He waved goodbye to his friends and fellow classmates until the train was so far away he could only make out its location by the trail of white steam, until finally even that was gone. Turning back towards the platform, he made his way over to the cluster of teachers standing a ways back in the shade of the station awning. The four Heads of House had accompanied each of their students there to make sure everything ran smoothly, but now with only him left he turned to McGonagall for instruction.

"Will I have time to gather my things or have they already been sent to the Slews?"

There was a hesitance in the old witch's response, and Flitwick and Sprout gave each other a rather obvious look. When Snape's mouth curved in a strange mockery of a smile Harry knew he was in trouble. McGonagall gave him what she must have thought was a comforting pat on the shoulder.

"They've been sent on ahead, but Our Lord has requested to speak to you."

"... About what?"

Another hand replaced McGonagall's, this one making no attempt at comfort. Snape peered down at him.

“That is between the two of you, Mr. Potter. Come along. It’s best not to keep him waiting.”

McGonagall glared daggers at Snape’s back as he lead one of her Gryffindors towards the castle. All year the man had been taking liberties with Harry, and the more it happened the more Harry seemed to take it for granted. And she hated that. She hadn’t thought of herself as bias when it came to each of the Houses, but watching Lily’s son finding his company with snakes left her skin crawling.

But what could she do? Snape’s interest in Potter was a reflection of the Dark Lord’s interest, and how could she fight against that now? That same reckless and proud nature that defined Gryffindors had drawn the King of Serpent’s cool regard.

Her only consolation was Harry had not yet suffered any permanent damage...yet.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It was his first time completely alone with the Dark Lord. Snape had not lingered, though for moment Harry thought he might have, and disappeared to places unknown. Lestrangle was gone, for which he was thankful, as was Nagini. He should have felt better about his enemy number being reduced to one, but this one was more dangerous than them all combined and he felt like that eight year old child again, being lead from a life he knew into some unknown danger.

He lingered by the door.

Behind his desk, Voldemort regarded him with his usual amused expression.

“Tell me, Harry,” he said, his voice serpentine, “What do you think of being a wizard?”

It wasn't a question Harry had been prepared for. The man may as well have asked him the meaning of life. But his mouth opened, and as usual, he spoke without thinking.

"I don't think about being a wizard anymore than I think about breathing," he said, and with a conscious effort, continued in English. "I am what I am."

The Dark Lord let out a soft laugh, and gestured for Harry to sit in one of the chairs across from him. Reluctantly, he obeyed.

"A simple answer followed by a vague one. Who do you suppose you are, Harry?"

This gave the boy pause. Did he really know who he was? Until last year he hadn't known he was a wizard. Until a few months ago he hadn't known his parents were either, that he had a living Godfather, or that he had a history still far beyond his grasp. And even if he did, how could he answer a question like that?

"..."

"Shall I tell you who you could be?" Voldemort offered, leaning back in his chair. "You could be great. You've already accomplished great things."

"..."

"Is that modesty or fear that keeps your tongue?"

"What do you want from me?"

At this, Voldemort's snorted and turned away, irritated.

"Gryffindor."

Harry's mouth twitched. "Guilty as charged."

"I suppose these are matters that require more forethought. Perhaps you'll have better answers by the end of summer?"

“...I’ll think them over.”

They fell silent, both regarding the other cautiously. Harry having no clue why he was there to begin with and Voldemort having found his bait ignored, neither were familiar enough with the other to fall into a conversation easily. When the silence stretched into awkwardness, the young Gryffindor tried his best.

“...so... Where’s Nagini?”

Voldemort considered ignoring the asinine question, but decided to encourage the child’s confidence. It was part of the reason he was here after all.

“I’ve sent her ahead to my summer home. I thought it best, since I brought a gift for you. She’s rather jealous, after all.”

That seems a common trait among Slytherins, Harry thought to himself. Aloud he said, “A gift? What for?”

Voldemort stood, striding towards an oddly shaped item with a black cloth draped over it. He set his hand on it and turned back to Harry.

“Consider it a ‘thank you for amusing me’ present.”

Removing the cloth, he revealed a large gilded birdcage, in which was perched a beautiful white owl. It blinked sleepily, and turned its bright yellow eyes to study Harry. Despite his wariness, Harry couldn’t help but be drawn from his chair to get a better look at it. So enraptured he was by the owl, he completely overlooked Voldemort’s pleased smile.

“I had heard that you have no familiar, and when I saw her I thought her perfect for you. She got in a fight with Nagini the moment they met.”

Harry chuckled, but did not look away.

"Here, let me introduced you properly." Tapping the very top of the cage with his wand, Voldemort hissed an unfamiliar spell and the gold wires pulled away from each other, curling out from the base of the cage like flower petals. Without a barrier, the white owl stretched her wings and hopped onto Harry's outstretched arm. Her black talons, which could have ripped him to shreds, pinched his skin beneath his shirt but he ignored the pain.

"Oh, My Lord... she is beautiful."

"I am glad you like her. You will be keeping each other company for many years to come."

He ran his fingers through her white feathers, and she puffed up proudly under his adolescent adoration. Turning a timid, questioning gaze towards the elder wizard, he asked, "What is her name?"

"A good question. What is her name? She's your owl."

His mind filled with name after possible name. Bianca... no, too snobbish. Whitey...too lame. Hedwig... cute, but not quite right.

"Elsbeth," he decided.

"Elsbeth, the White Witch of Ireland?" Voldemort asked, considering it. "A fine name, although I would like to point out she killed and ate her husband's mistress."

Harry shrugged. "No one's perfect."

Voldemort just grinned and stood back, admiring his work. Snape appeared to have been right. A small bit of kindness at the right time went a long way with the child. Already the Gryffindor was more at ease being alone with him. It was a frail sort of trust, but it was a start. In time, he fully intended Harry to associate their private time together as something positive.

Just like all his servants did.

Snape had been so pleased with their private audience after the Quidditch Cup. Bellatrix used to be the same way, back when he actually allowed such meetings to occur. They, like all his former Death Eaters, knew that while alone together he was pleased with them, and while in company he either wasn't or was on neutral standing.

It was only a matter of time before Harry was counted among them..

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

In case you're not sure, Elsbeth is Hedwig, just with a different name. I never cared for the name Hedwig.

And that is the last chapter of Harry's first year. Next week will Harry's summer followed by his second year. It should be even more exciting than his first year. I hope you all enjoyed it! Reviews (and critiques) welcome!

Book II:

Chapter 1: The Prince and the Wolf Lords

When Harry had thought about his second summer with the Sleuw's, he had pictured a very lonely couple of months doing chores for his care takers, a little bit of homework, writing a lot of letters, and a bit of drawing now and then. And his time was spent doing those things... and quite a bit more.

He owed Professor McGonagall a very nice thank you letter for making it possible. The day after the end of term, she had come down to the cottage to visit with the Sleuw's before she went on her summer holiday. They had all been sitting around the kitchen table enjoying a tea, scones, and conversation, when McGonagall had turned her attention to him.

"So, Mr. Potter. Have you any plans for the summer?"

Harry had shrugged, looking more depressed than he meant to and said, "Nothing special. Just homework and chores."

She had regarded him curiously for a moment and then smiled.

"Homework and chores won't fill all your time. Have you considered finding a job? A little spending money of your own will help decrease your student debt after you graduate, after all."

"A job? I can get a job?" he asked, surprised. "Doing what?"

At this Mrs. Sleuw let out a bubbly little laugh.

"All sorts of things, dearie! The Wizing Weekly has an entire section of jobs for minors in the employment section."

"There's a lot of summer positions opening up now," McGonagall said, "If you find one you're interested in, then write me letter and send the ad with it. As your Head of House and one of your legal guardians, I have the authority to approve or disapprove it. I'll set up an account at Gringotts for you as well, if you like."

And Harry did like. His pride was practically demanded he do such an adult thing. A job. What a perfectly marvelous idea!

A week later, Harry found himself working for Wibble's Wards and Boundaries Inc. as a 'post setter'. All he was required to do was follow a boundary line (this was very easy given the line was three inches thick and glowing bright orange) already made by the 'line maker', and place a spelled post the size of a golf tee in the ground every five feet. He would then utter two simple spells and the posts would grow to normal size, firmly planted in the earth. The posts would each have identical runes burned into it. Later, a 'ward setter' would come by and activate the runes and the wards would be set to perform various functions, like anti-apparition or silent alarms or dispelling garden gnomes.

It was pretty tedious, but Harry didn't mind. It was a job with real money (not a lot mind you, but still more than he had), and it allowed him to get away from Hogwarts and seeing different areas of Britain. There were many different places that required warding posts; farms, ranches, private properties, large gardens, and even animal sanctuaries.

His co-workers were all older men and women, but friendly enough. Commutes and lunch breaks were lively affairs, with a lot of teasing and dirty jokes flying around. Harry rarely had much to say, but he liked listening to them talk. Having so little experience with the wizarding world it was interesting to see what adult wizards and witches thought of it. There was a lot of grumbling about taxes, mortgages, and inflation. Plenty of debate about Quidditch, foreign affairs (Harry knew Britain was pretty much cut off from the rest of the Wizarding World, but hadn't realized how angry British wizards were about it), and the newest magical discoveries. Laughter and sorrow with families growing, shrinking, arguing, and reconciling. Teasing involving someone's latest girlfriend or boyfriend or both.

When ever their conversations delved into something confusing to him, Harry would write Hermione a letter. He sent a lot of letters. Two or three a week to Hermione alone, and at least once a week to Natalie who always demanded her portraits. Occasionally, he sent one to Clyde, but he was much less reliable about sending one back. Elsbeth was quite busy, and Harry used his first payment to buy her lots of owl treats and nice owl stand to make up for it.

Early July found Harry laying posts for an animal sanctuary. At least that was what the Foreman, Mr. Wumbs had told him. He was rather suspicious. The pudgy little man had been anxious that morning, and his usual warnings about staying on the right side of the fence had been particularly earnest. Harry had even been given a safety portkey, a little stick that hung around his neck, that he was to snap in half if he thought himself in trouble or if he got lost. The other workers had said it was standard procedure when working around such a large area because they wouldn't see each other for several hours at a time. Having done similar jobs before, Harry didn't entirely believe them, but he didn't want to lose his job by refusing to go.

The first day, he had been nervous, but nothing had happened. The only thing remotely dangerous he had seen was a wild boar and a large stag, and both had run away from him very quickly. By the second day, Harry was starting to enjoy his surroundings. It was hot out, but the trees were thick and shading, and all around him the forest smelled richly of an earthy perfume. When he worked quietly enough he was able to see all sorts of animals, some he had only learned about that year. Wood sprites, so easily mistaken for dragon flies if you weren't paying attention, and a Popcrit, a sparrow-shaped bird that could change colors like a chameleon. He very much wished he could have brought his sketchbook.

On the third day, he was feeling perfectly at ease and having worked steadily through the morning, he decided to stop for a bit and enjoy an early lunch. No sooner than he had sat down and started digging through his satchel for a sandwich, than he became aware that the forest had gone silent. Slowly, he removed his satchel, and taking the safety portkey in hand, stood up again to look around.

There was a man standing on the wrong side of the fence. Immediately, Harry could tell he wasn't a muggle, but his manner of dress was strange even for a wizard. He wore black leather britches and matching arm guards, but no shirt or shoes. His exposed skin was tanned and muscular, but heavily scarred with both claw marks and small burn patches. To add to his savage appearance, he wore a necklace of large claws and teeth and a small braid inlaid with bone beads hung down the side of his face.

Harry's hand tightened around the portkey, but did not immediately break it. The man was still almost fifty feet away, and had not moved towards him. Although how he had gotten even that close without Harry noticing was a bit of a mystery.

They eyed each other curiously for a minute, before Harry spoke.

"Are you a werewolf?"

The man looked surprised by the question, but then grinned. When he smiled, his whole intimidating demeanor seemed to fade, so that even the deep scar across his nose looked no more malign than a freckle.

"Are you Harry?"

The young wizard gave him an equally surprised look, but couldn't call up the good humor. He was just plain unnerved.

"Uh...I...um..."

The man started to meander towards him, and he took an instinctive step backward. The man hesitated, crossed his arms, but didn't stop grinning.

"Oh, come now pup, Moony got a better reception than this. Doesn't your own Godfather warrant at least a hug?"

A spark of recollection. An evening spent with his father looking through old photo albums, and his finger pointing at a picture of man no older than eighteen with his arm wrapped around his father's neck. Black hair, black eyes, and grin like a wolf. That's your godfather, Harry. If anything happens to us, there no one I'd trust with your safety more than him.

"U-Uncle Padfoot?"

If possible the grin grew even wider and he continued his confident stride forward. Harry released the portkey, and moved forward to meet him. There's was a brief hesitation on both their parts as they reached the boundary line, but they both disregarded it so that Harry moved over it and into his godfather's arms. The hug was strong, like being hugged by a bear, leaving Harry breathless.

Padfoot let out a joyous laugh and then released him, holding him at arm's length to get a better look at his godson.

"Just like Moony said alright, James' face and Lily's eyes. The papers don't do you justice."

"Papers?" he asked, confused and more than little overwhelmed with this sudden reunion.

"Of course. Werewolves might be a bit isolated from the rest of the world, but we still get the news papers. You were in them for most of November. Fenrir was so mad at Moony that you got away... Damn pervert that he is... Uh... you probably didn't need to hear that."

No, Harry thought, he probably didn't.

"Is Moony alright? Greyback didn't hurt him, did he?"

"More than he already was? No. The dumb beast might be leader of the pack, but he knows better than to go messing with what's mine. Especially not without Lord Moldy-wart still holding his leash."

Harry blinked owlshly at his Godfather's total lack of respect for his alpha and the leader of the wizarding world. Fenrir might have been a real son-of-a-bitch (no pun intended), but Harry knew very well that no werewolf would insult an alpha unless they were one too. And no one insulted Voldemort... period.

"But enough talk of unpleasant people, we'd do much better talking about ourselves," Sirius continued, moving Harry to sit on a fallen log before joining him. "So how on Earth did you find this place?"

"I didn't. I just wanted a job for the summer. I had no idea I'd be helping to ward werewolf territory..." Suddenly, the boy looked rather vexed. "They said this was an animal sanctuary."

Sirius mirrored his expression and pulled off something much more intimidating. "Well, I'm sure that the description was accurate enough to them."

They each glowered at their internal musing, until they muttered out simultaneously, "Bastards."

They both laughed, and quickly fell into conversation as if they had known each other for years. Sirius' description of Hogwarts, particularly the Hogwarts that he and James experienced, was very different from how Remus' description. For one thing, Sirius and his father seemed rather like Fred and George, and wasn't that a scary thought? His description of an adolescent Snape were funny at times and rather offensive at others, and he sensed a lot of bad blood between them.

Sirius was delighted to hear that he'd help win the Quidditch Cup, rather amused when he described his Slytherin friends, and down right disturbed to learn Voldemort personally gave him an owl.

"I'd have her tested for spells as soon as possible," he said. "She might have reconnaissance spells on her."

Harry had thought of that already, but as the only thing he had been sending were simple letters to his friends he hadn't worried about it. It wasn't like he was plotting to overthrow the government or anything.

"You know," Harry said between a lull in their conversation, "Moony said it was so unlikely that we'd ever meet again, that if we did, it would have to be due to fate. Do you suppose that's true? That we were fated to meet again?"

Sirius seemed to consider.

"I used to think that Prongs and I meeting was fate," he said finally, "If it weren't for him, I know I would have turned out as Dark as the rest of my family. Moony too. Who knows what would have happened to him without us there? So yes, I don't think it unreasonable that us reuniting would be fated too."

"...Do you think Fate would mind letting us borrow one of her owls? I'd rather like to keep in contact this time around."

Sirius snorted.

"No, owls wouldn't be a good idea. Too conspicuous and easy to tamper with. Don't you worry about it Prongslet. Me and Moony will figure something out. We're still the Marauders after all. Here, give me something of yours."

Harry didn't have much on him that he could give up without being noticed. His watch was absolutely out of the question, so they settled on one of his socks.

"And this I'll give to you," the werewolf said, handing him his claw and tooth necklace. Harry thought it much too nice, but Sirius waved it off. "I can make a dozen or more in a week. And you're not getting my pants. I'm fond of this pair. Ok, now we each have focus for a location spell. Now when you get back I want you to hide it somewhere you don't store anything that belongs to you. It's important that it never absorb your or anyone else's magical signature or the spell won't work."

Harry grinned, feeling a rush of happiness, sharing a secret with someone he wanted to have a secret with. Sirius was his family, and these desperate measures were his way of saying he wanted to keep it that way just like Harry did.

Their time together was cut short by a burning sensation coming from his pocket.

"Ouch... dammit!" Harry cursed, pulling the hot watch from his pocket by the chain. It popped open on its own to reveal the time to him. "I'm late. They'll start looking for me soon."

They shared a disappointed look, but Harry managed to smile.

"I didn't get very far today. I'll tell them I tripped and lost some of my posts, and fell behind looking for them. I should be back tomorrow."

Sirius managed to grin as well.

"I think Moony and I should be able to get away for the day. You know, go out to make sure you interlopers haven't been fiddling with the boundary lines and all."

"Naturally," Harry agreed, climbing off the log and walking back towards the boundary. He stood on the other side, and turned back to wave his Godfather goodbye, but the man was already gone.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Not that I'm complaining," Sirius began, sticking one of the posts in the ground. "But why did you pick such a boring job? Why are you working at all for that matter?"

"I get to travel around and stay outdoors. As for why...student debt," Harry said simply. "And a little extra spending money is always good. It would be nice to get Hermione something for her birthday for once. Cambia."

The post sprouted up, full sized .

"Well, I hope she's cute," Sirius muttered, setting another tiny post.

"Sirius, don't be a wretch," Remus scolded, setting down a post of his own. "This was very mature of him."

"I know," the darker werewolf lamented. Harry giggled at their antics. It was only the third day of working on the fence, and Sirius and Remus had both come to visit for the last two. He got a pretty good idea of their personalities. Sirius seemed to be an overgrown teenager most of the time, taking very little seriously and always finding mischief where he could. Yet whenever Fenrir Greyback or Voldemort were mentioned he would become grave and rather scary, his powerful, scarred body tensing with unspoken (and occasionally spoken) hatred. He also lived up to lupine blood, running about only half clothes and perfectly at ease in the forest. He'd even seen him eat a grasshopper without a second thought once.

Remus was his opposite, but complimentary half. He was playful to an extent, but more mature and thoughtful. He didn't seem to hold any particular hatred for Greyback, perhaps he was even strangely fond of him in a weird werewolfy way and mentions of Voldemort just left him depressed and a little fearful. No one would have expected him to be anything other than a wizard, he was so normal. He was probably the only reason Sirius wasn't running around naked and eating rabbits raw.

"Just the same, he shouldn't have to be doing this," growled Sirius, "The Potter vaults should still be intact. As long as there's a Potter heir, that snake-tongued bastard and his little toadies shouldn't be able to get to it."

"Cambia. I have money?" Harry asked, looking at them both curiously. The two shared a look.

"Yes," Sirius said, his lips twisting. "You have quite a lot, actually."

"But don't expect to have access to it any time soon." Remus threw his friend a reprimanding glare. "If no one has told you about your parents, it's because they were hoping you'd never find out. If you confront someone about having access to your vault, they'll just tie it all up in legalities for years. It's a common problem with families who lost their patriarchs fighting for the Light during the war."

"Yeah," Sirius grumbled. "I don't have access to my vault supposedly because I'm a werewolf. That's a load of dragon shit. The goblins would let me in and out of the Black family vault if I showed up, but those damn Death Eaters pigeon-holed me here. I could have done a lot of good for the pack with that money. Probably still could if I could get a bloody lawyer."

Remus gently patted Sirius on the shoulder, but the other just glowered off into the distance. Harry on the other hand had remembered something.

"I know a lawyer," he said.

Sirius was startled out of his glum thoughts, and looked curiously at his godson.

"How do you know a lawyer?"

"His partner wanted to adopt me last year," he said, looking a bit embarrassed as he remembered that day. "I still have his card. I could write a letter and ask for some advice for you. Perhaps he can get me into my vaults as well."

Sirius looked like he was considering, but Remus shook his head.

"No, you don't want to start a conflict with the government right now, Harry. Especially when you're still a ward of a government institution. They could assign you a guardian, and that guardian would have full access to your vaults until you were of the age of majority. They'd be free to 'donate' as much of it as they wanted to whatever cause they saw fit."

"But what about you and Sirius?"

This time his godfather seemed to find the problem. "If you found us a lawyer, someone might investigate and find out about us cavorting out here, and then we'd all be in a lot of trouble. We've been officially warned off contact with minors. I imagine you've been given similar orders regarding werewolves."

Harry nodded sadly, knowing they were both right. But then he managed a smile.

"But when I'm seventeen... I'll be an adult. I can hire a lawyer then and visit you openly at the trading posts when ever I want. That's only... five years and a couple months away."

This time both werewolf's considered longer. Sirius just shrugged and ruffled Harry's hair.

"You're a delightful little scamp, you know that? Let's just see what happens over the next couple years. Five years might not sound like a lot of time now, but believe me a lot can happen."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

On the fifth day it rained, and Harry wasn't able to make it to the meeting point until almost two hours later than usual. It made him irritable and anxious, and the few co-workers foolish enough to remark on it to him, were met with dirtiest looks ever seen in a pre-teen. With a charm to water-proof his cloak, he was finally allowed to go.

He jogged the entire way, tripping occasionally in the slick mud, until he finally reached the end of the line of posts. Pausing, he looked around for his godfather and friend.

"Padfoot? Moony?" he called out when he couldn't immediately spot either of them.

There was no response. Miserably, he wondered if they'd been waiting in the rain and finally got fed up enough to leave. Were they as irritated with him as he was with his boss? He sighed heavily, and got to work setting posts. He couldn't ignore his responsibility, and perhaps when the rain stopped they would come back and he could apologize.

It didn't take him long to feel something was amiss. It wasn't quite like when Sirius had first appeared. The silence now could easily be attributed to the rain, but that eerie feeling he felt could not. He saw nothing, but he felt something. He felt like he was being watched.

"Padfoot? Moony?" he tried again. "If this is you getting back at me for being late, it wasn't my fault. The foreman wouldn't let be come until the rain let up a bit. Guys?"

Around him the forest was wet, shiny, and empty. Harry tightened his cloak around his shoulders and listened. He only heard the rain and his own breathing, but he knew he wasn't alone. His eyes fell to the forest beyond the boundary, searching for the eyes he could feel on him. Again there was no one, but this time something white caught his attention.

It was a necklace. Made of teeth and bone and raven feathers.

Just like the ones Sirius wore.

He moved towards it instinctively, but then stopped abruptly at the border line. It was suddenly very clear to him that he didn't appear to have Sirius or Remus to protect him in that forbidden territory, and without them it felt... well... forbidden. But he still wanted to investigate.

"Wingardium leviosa necklace!" he summoned, swinging his wand about as he had been taught just last semester. The necklace rose obediently, but when it started to move towards him it appeared to get snagged. Confused, Harry repeated the spell, using more force. The necklace lurched forward, snapping the tether it had been bound to. A resounding snap echoed through the wood, and the trap beneath the necklace was suddenly released; a mass of netted canvas camouflaged with dirt and leaves.

Dumbly, Harry looked up at the contraption.

"Well, damn," he heard, and spun around to stare to his left at a man who was also looking at the contraption, although with a bit more contempt. "I forgot they taught that spell in first year."

This stranger was a werewolf, but not like Remus or Sirius. He was tall and wiry, and he kept his reddish-brown eyes wide and unblinking. He reminded Harry of a jackal. The stranger shook his head at the ill-planned trap and over at Harry, leering wickedly.

"Oh, well. There's still the old-fashioned way."

And then he was surrounded. Five people, four males and a female, formed a loose circle around him. They were dressed like Sirius, or even more scantily, and looked even more savage with ropes and knives in their hands rather than wands.

He bolted, breaking for the largest gap in their ranks, but that was their intention from the beginning. No sooner than he'd broken through their ranks than yet another werewolf sprung, seeming from the earth itself.

This one was the largest by far and even more scarred than Sirius. His hair was grayish and cropped short, the beginnings of a peppered beard at his chin and side burns. He seized Harry by the arms, inhuman claws digging into the fabric of his cloak and eyes like the wolf on the full moon.

Harry froze, too shocked, too frightened perhaps, to move. It was amazing he simply hadn't fallen over dead.

"Ah, and here we have it lads," Fenrir practically purred, "Blackbone's pup."

Blackbone was Sirius' pack name, Harry knew. But how had they found out about their connection? How had they known he was even here? Where were Sirius and Remus?

The alpha werewolf eyed him critically, and he could only stare back dumbly.

"You're a bit skinnier than I'd thought you'd be. But I bet you're fast. Let's find out."

Fenrir threw Harry away from him, towards the border. The boy kept his balance and ran, but fear hadn't taken all his senses yet and he curved away from the borderline. Harry was fast for his age, always had been, but the werewolves were just plain fast. They had surrounded him again within seconds. One of them lunged for him, but Harry managed to dodge him and spun around with his wand waving.

“Colpo vento!”

A sudden, intense wind caught the unbalanced wolf, knocking him into one of his pack mates. Harry was ready with another spell, but another attack smashed into his side. He was thrown into a puddle of mud, and held there by a heavier body. He struggled blindly, unable to breath, until he was jerked on to his back and held there. Above him, the female werewolf looked down at him, her brown eyes pitying. The other wolves crowded round. The jackal-like one retrieved his wand from the muck, grinning wickedly down at him with the rest.

Fenrir crouched down directly over his face, looking smug.

“You are fast. Nimble too, with a little bit’o bite to ya. I like that. I guess we’ll keep you.”

Lovely.

“You -you didn’t catch me on your territory,” he tried weakly.

“Perhaps, but who other than you knows that?” the alpha chuckled, but then sobered. “You’ve been play’in a dangerous game, pup. You ‘ave none to blame for this but yourself.”

Fenrir looked to the female restraining him. “Bring him, Athena, before someone comes looking for him.”

As one, the pack stood and turned back towards their land, Athena dragging Harry with them. For all the pity in her eyes, there was none in her grip, but he struggled as much as he could anyway. He dug his heels. He flailed about. He called for help. He snarled and clawed, and kicked, and if he weren’t afraid of infection he would have bitten too.

She merely growled and tightened her hold, until Harry thought his arm would break.

And then he started to cry. In pain. In fear. In sorrow for those he’d leave behind.

The she-wolf hesitated, adjusting her hold, so that her arm rested around his small shoulders and held him close to her body. He was wet and very cold, but her skin felt hot against his cheek.

"Hush," she said, "Don't be afraid."

But he was afraid, and he continued to sob quietly.

"Please let me go."

"No."

She pulled him forward again, and they now stood in Fenrir's territory. The alpha led the way, the jackal walking beside him as they talked quietly. Frequently the two werewolves looked back at Harry. The other werewolves dispersed into a haphazard ring around them, flitting in and out of sight, but never truly gone. They walked for almost half an hour before Harry was calm enough to speak again.

"Where's Siri- I mean... Blackbone and Slivermoon?" he asked quietly.

Athena looked to her alpha, but he didn't appear to have heard him.

"...They are being punished for their treachery as we speak."

Harry's eyes widen. Sensing his alarm, she tried to pacify him.

"Do not worry about them. Blackbone is very strong and Slivermoon has a temperament suited for hardship. The Goddess Moon ascends in only a few days, and all will be forgiven. She will heal their bodies and their hearts, and embrace you as another of her children then."

As romantic as she made it sound, Harry was under no illusion about what would happen. There would be blood and pain. Death on one side of the knife and a curse on the other. Either way, Sirius and Remus would never forgive themselves even if the Goddess Moon and Greyback did. He asked nothing else, but followed along meekly.

Outwardly, he appeared sad and submissive. Inwardly, he was frantically looking for the first opportunity to escape. As long as Athena held him so closely, he knew it would be impossible, but if he could just get her to let go of him...

Half an hour later he could feel his window of opportunity closing. He couldn't let them reach their settlement with him. Lycanthropy was a method of punishment, and as such it followed certain protocols. He remembered Hermione lecturing him about it during the summer before. Once a witch or wizard was handed over to the werewolves, they would immediately be taken to their settlement, stripped naked of all their possessions, and confined to a cave or hut to await the next full moon. The rituals held during and afterward were sacred and therefore secret to all but other lycanthrope.

Harry wasn't worried about the rituals just yet. There was still the possibility of escape.

He just had to keep them from stripping him...

"Little one," Athena said, eyeing him worriedly. "You're shaking. Are you cold?"

Fenrir paused, turning an irritated look back at them both.

"Hurry it up. He can warm up when we get there."

She averted her eyes under his scowl, but the look she gave him when his back turned was twice as mean. She rubbed Harry's arms as if to warm him, and urged him to hurry.

They came to a ridge over which a creek, fat with the morning rain, fell into a shallow pool some fifty feet below them. The only means to cross over the creek was a large tree, which appeared to have been cut down for that purpose. One by one the pack emerged from the forest, jogging across the makeshift bridge before disappearing again, until only Fenrir, the jackal, Athena, and Harry remained.

"I'll go first," Fenrir said to his subordinates, "Send the boy over after me. Athena, you'll follow behind. Grindel bring up the rear. And don't think of trying to swim away, pup. If the waterfall doesn't kill you, I sure as hell will."

Harry flinched and looked away, keeping up the appearance of submission. They all moved to follow the alpha's command, but the moment Athena released him, Harry jumped into the creek. He heard her cry of alarm, followed by Fenrir's cursing, and then he was underwater.

It was cold, and having already been cold to begin with, it felt almost unbearable. With blind, trembling fingers he tore at his cloak, letting the increasingly rapid current carry it away. He struggled to the surface, swallowing air, before he was dragged under again.

And then he was falling instead of drowning.

With the shallow pool rushing up to splatter him and only a few seconds to save himself, he fumbled at the tie around his neck, following the leather string to the little wooden stick, and taking it in both hands-

Snap!

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry landed in the mud. That was probably a good thing, otherwise he might have broken something. But Harry was unable to appreciate that fact at the moment. All he was able to appreciate was that he wasn't dead and he had escaped.

Barely.

Miraculously.

In either hand was half of the emergency portkey. Too weak to carry more than one person and only usable once, he had been forced to wait until no one was attached to him to activate it. So he was alive. He had escaped.

He thought he should be happier. Relieved at least.

But all he felt was cold.

Chapter 22: The Serpent King and the Wolf King

Harry did not care much for St. Mungo's. Being of a magical nature, he had thought he would be more accepting of it than a muggle hospital, but he was quickly corrected. Hospitals of any kind were no fun at all.

Or perhaps he just missed his wand.

Since it's loss in the werewolves' forest, he had not felt quite himself. He felt listless most of the time, anxious occasionally. His sleep was poor and he had a small but persistent headache.

One of the nurses had called it 'magical withdrawal'. Ironical given his magic wasn't any less, merely unreachable without his wand. The nurse had said keeping occupied or getting another wand was the only way to get over it. Which was bloody useless advice considering that the doctors wouldn't allow either to happen.

His only real malady when he'd been admitted to St. Mungo's were bruises and small cuts. A light healing potion later and he was cured, but they had wanted to keep him for a few days for 'observation'. Harry had thought them rather stupid. McGonagall had given her authorization though. She wouldn't tell him why, but then again he hadn't told her about his run-in with Greyback and his pack or about Sirius and Remus. He wasn't sure what he should say.

Everyone suspected he'd encountered werewolves. His silence on the matter did nothing to dissuade that thinking, but telling the truth would be self-incriminating and lying could only make the situation worse.

So all he could do now was wait for someone to punish him for violating Voldemort's treaty. He was rather surprised that it took them three days to send someone, and that someone would be none other than Snape.

"Good day, Mr. Potter," the potion's master sneered as he entered the hospital room. "Judging by your vacant expression you were not expecting me."

Harry, who had been laying in bed reading a novel, graced him with an irritated look.

“Sorry, sir. I’d have had tea and cakes ready if I’d known you were coming.”

“You have a lot of sass for someone in your position,” Snape growled.

Cowed, Harry looked away. “And what position is that?”

“Don’t play stupid boy. You might not have contracted Lycanthrosis, but the Dark Lord and I both know you’ve been in contact with Black and Lupin.”

Oh, so that’s why they wanted to keep him in observation in his own room. They were waiting for the full moon to see if he went mad.

“Greyback’s been demanding your head,” Snape continued, “and I dare say he just might get it.”

This was nothing Harry hadn’t thought about before. He had half resigned himself to that very outcome, trying to comfort himself with thoughts of being reunited with his Godfather and separated from the inherit dangers and corruption of wizarding life. For a little while, he could convince himself that it wouldn’t be a bad life and he could learn to enjoy it even. Then he would remember Greyback, that mad, hungry look in his eye and enough power in his hands to snap him in half and he was afraid.

The door opened again, and a toady looking woman entered. She was dressed garishly in a bright pink sweater with fuzzy trim, smiled widely, and blinked too often. Harry didn’t recognize her, but judging by the distinct loathing in Snape’s expression he guess the other man did. Harry gave the man a questioning look.

“Madam Umbridge,” Snape drawled, “this is the victim, Harry Potter. Potter, this is Court Representative Dolores Umbridge. She will be acting as a witness to this interview. I remind you that everything you say and do now will be recorded for purposes of review by officials of the Court. Not that knowing makes any difference, as you won't be able to control a thing you say under veritaserum."

Harry swallowed thickly.

"Eh-hem," the woman coughed...croaked? "Court policy dictates that a witness should be given all courtesy-"

"Oh, do be quiet. I know Court policies very well. I helped write almost a quarter of them," Snape hissed. The woman blinked rapidly, her expression fixed in that weird simpering look. He ignored her. "Now then, Potter, once I administer the potion, I will need you to keep eye contact with me so that I may monitor your reaction to the potion. Five points if you can tell me why."

Harry wasn't sure if he should laugh or gape. Had his Professor just made a joke? Well, since the man appeared to be expecting an answer he hadn't.

"Um... It can cause paralysis of the optic nerves, spasms in the facial muscles, and... and... spontaneously shouting out random things."

"Correct, Mr. Potter. Five points to Slytherin."

"What? But I-"

"Yes, you did get it right. No doubt due to my excellence as your instructor. Open your mouth and stick out your tongue."

Harry stuck out his tongue alright, but it wasn't to obey the man's order. Pulling a vial from his robes, Snape placed two drops of the truth potion on the boy's ornery appendage. It tasted of vinegar and alcohol. He cringed at the taste, but as it faded away a strange detached feeling fell over him. His eyes wandered about the room until they fixed on the only bright spot.

"My god, you're an ugly toad of a woman," he said, smiling pleasantly. Umbridge said nothing, but her eye twitched visibly. A hand on his chin guided his gaze back to Snape, where he immediately found himself stuck even after he was released. The man was smirking, but didn't really seem amused.

"We will take that as a sign the potion is working. Now keep your eyes on me. Madam Umbridge's presence in the room is irrelevant."

"You're funny," Harry said, smiling rapidly to prove his point. He didn't look away though. Not even when the man gave a very tasty glare.

"Now Mr. Potter, explain to me the set of events that lead you to the boundaries of the werewolf territory, Brittlewood Forest."

The story he told fell out his mouth before he could even think to edit it, telling of not only actual events but the feelings and motivations he'd experienced. There was a vague sense of embarrassment when told of the pride he had felt at having his first job and the loneliness of the summer, but he was still feeling mostly detached and Snape didn't take the time to sneer at him.

"Just to be absolutely clear," Snape said, as Harry finished his first answer, "You did not take the job at Wibble's Wards and Boundaries, Inc. with the intent to reach the werewolf boundary?"

"No. I didn't know I'd end up there."

"And you were not made aware by Mr. Wibble or any of your supervisors that you were working along a werewolf territory?"

"Nope."

"Were you ever in contact with a werewolf while you worked there?"

Now Harry tried to stop speaking, to hold back the answer that would doom him and possibly his godfather and Remus as well. He tried to hold it back with all his might, but it was pulled from him as easily as if he hadn't resisted at all.

"Yes."

Snape's eyes suddenly became more intense, a strange feeling wormed its way through the detachment. It wasn't fear or hatred, but something alien ... and yet familiar.

"Describe to me the circumstances of the encounter and the encounter itself," the man commanded. Again, words were pulled from him without his consent, but this time they were not his words, not his tale, not his truth.

"I was working alone, laying down warding posts... I think it was late morning. I was approached by a man I didn't recognize. He startled me, I was afraid, but he never came too close to me. He said he lived on the property I was helping to ward, and that he wanted to observe to make sure the company was doing a proper job of it. He never said his name."

Snape spoke again, "Did you tell anyone you saw this man?"

"No. I was afraid if I told them one of the clients was skeptical of the company's work, they'd get an adult to lay down the posts and send me home."

"Did you ever see this nameless man again?"

"Yes. I came back the next day and he was there again. He came and went throughout the day, but never said a thing. He was kind of frightening. It was the same everyday until the fifth day."

"What happened on the fifth day?"

"I came to the spot I'd left the day before, and one of the warding posts had been pulled up and was lying on the other side of the boundary. The man was there and said I had laid it wrong, and expected me to replace it 'properly'. The foreman had said I wasn't to step onto the land no matter what, so I thought I'd just lay another one, but the man became agitated and demanded I pick up the fallen post and lay that one. I got frightened, and I started to walk away.'

'He followed me. He kept yelling at me to pick up the post. Over and over he kept yelling that. I started to run. He chased me. He caught my cloak, and jerked me onto his side of the property. I slipped out of my cloak and started running again. I tried to grab hold of my emergency portkey, but I tripped and fell in some mud. He jumped on top of me and held me down by my arms, said if I tried to run away again he was going to break my legs.”

“How did you escape?”

“Another man came,” Harry continued, his voice steady while his mind was reeling, wondering what was going on. This wasn’t a tale he had conceived, or even could have conceived, but it flowed out in a perfectly believable lie. All the while that alien sensation seemed to wiggle and squirm just behind his forehead. “He was bigger than the first man, stronger. He grabbed him and pulled him off me. He started yelling at the smaller man, calling him all sort of names and then ordering him to go home. The smaller man left. The larger man grabbed me by my arm and dragged me back to the other side of the boundary. He told me not to tell anyone about what had happened. He said if he anyone knew, then I would have to come back and become a werewolf. I didn’t ask any questions, I just activated my portkey and got out of there. I ended up just outside the office building. One of the other employees found me, and the foreman took me to the hospital.”

For the first time since the interrogation started, Snape looked away and the alien sensation retreated. Without the older wizard demanding his eyes and his thought on him, Harry could think clearly enough to realize he was the source of the lies. But why? Why would Snape be...helping him?

“I believe that is all we require,” Snape said, looking back at Umbridge, who had been taking notes through the entire ordeal. “A clear case of child endangerment on the part of Wibbler’s. I trust this interview will be forwarded to the appropriate authorities?”

The woman smiled condescendingly. Quite a feat considering she was dressed like a demented Barbie.

“Just a moment professor. I have a few questions of my own, if you don’t mind. , why didn’t-”

Whatever she asked, Harry couldn't hear. Snape's hands were suddenly over his ears. Harry gave the man a questioning look, but he was glaring at Umbridge. The woman herself looked startled by his action. When it was apparent she wasn't going to finish her question, Snape removed his hands.

"Madam Umbridge, you have been sent to this interview to act as a non-partial witness to ensure the rights of Mr. Potter are not violated while under verisaterum and that all proper protocol is upheld for when his testimony is submitted to the Court," the man lectured, as if to a very dim student, "As I recall, third party members questioning a witness are strictly prohibited. This should not have to be explained to you."

Harry slapped his hand over his mouth to hide a very obvious giggle.

Umbridge's eye twitched.

"You are correct, of course," she said, "But given your presence here, a WYRA executive rather than a Court legal official, I thought this interrogation would be a bit more... ah... informal."

Okay, now Harry knew something funny was going on. Even Umbridge seemed to know it. In fact, she seemed to think it was something underhanded. Snape did not appear unnerved by her insinuation. He actually looked rather offended.

"Madam, Court business is never informal.. My presence here is because I am a WYRA executive as well as a Hogwarts teacher, and Mr. Potter is still the responsibility of both these institutions until such time as he is adopted or reaches the age of majority. This incident which resulted in his hospitalization is of great concern to us. So much so that Lord Voldemort has personally granted my request for full authority in investigating this matter. And I take personal offense that you believe I would conduct my investigation in anything other than a formal and proper manner."

Harry's giggling, which had died off, returned with full on laughter to the point he was starting to tear up. Snape shot him a venomous look, and quickly gave him the antidote. It tasted like fish. He sobered up instantly, and made it a point to look at his toes.

“Now Professor,” the woman simpered, still smiling, “I meant no offense-”

“Well, I do when I tell you that your business is done here and that you are going to leave now.”

Harry peeked beyond the length of his toes at the woman who looked on the verge of doing something... dangerous. Like imploding. Good thing they were in a hospital.

Her entire head was starting to twitch now, but still she smiled cheerily.

“I suppose its best to get the paperwork started as soon as possible. Better Mr. Potter had this matter wrapped up before the beginning of the school year after all,” she said, and stiffly walked out of the room. She closed the door with exaggerated care, and they could hear her shoes tapping in a slow rhythm until it faded into the distance.

“Friend of yours?” Harry asked, turning to the older man.

“Legilimens!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort liked Fenrir in the same way a person might like dangerous but beautiful animals. He liked watching the man pace and growl and flex his powerful, clawed hands. He liked watching him bully his pack into submission, hunt in the forest, and take his mate, Athena, where and when ever the hell he felt like it. He liked watching him transform, crying to the moon and raging at the world. But most of all, he liked watching Fenrir think.

The werewolf was different from everyone he knew in his manner of thinking, for his thinking was not that of man’s but that of beast’s made eloquent through human speech. That which motivated him was not what motivated men, except at the most primal level. Fenrir, like any animal, wanted to live and knew living need not involve 'higher concepts' like love, honor, or justice. At the same time, being a social animal, he appreciated such things as sharing, forgiveness, and protection. Voldemort understood this on an intellectual level, but seeing it played out on practical one through Fenrir was always... stimulating.

At the moment, he was having a splendid time watching the man-beast thinking over the latest events revolving around Harry Potter and his own unexpected reluctance in handing the boy over. Just last year he had easily and willingly handed over two Slytherin students violating their treaty. What made the Gryffindor child a special case? It was not the normal state of things for Fenrir or Voldemort to question each other. Their motivations, if not their methods, were similar, their circle of influence separate, and rarely did they cross or conflict. However, Fenrir was interested enough in Potter, and more importantly his hold over Blackbone, that he was willing to have a meeting with the Dark Lord in order to settle the matter.

The lodge house, normally filled with pack members, was empty and freshly cleaned for their meeting. It was still very crude and rustic, but Voldemort was quite comfortable lounging in his fur laden chair and sipping on strong herbal tea. Around the wizard's feet, Nagini looked rather happy as well, rolling about on the many fur rugs and leisurely hunting the nooks and crannies for rodents. Fenrir's own chair across from the wizard, was empty, as he had taken to standing near the window in order to watch some of the pack's youngsters play football (English version). Such things were calming for him.

"This shouldn't be an issue," the werewolf growled out, finally looking towards the wizard. "He violated both our laws. He trespassed into my lands and his life belongs to me."

Voldemort took a sip of his tea, looking considerate.

"No, he never did," he said finally. "I had one of my people perform legilimency on the boy this morning. He did indeed meet with Blackbone and Slivermoon, but he never crossed the barrier until you and your men dragged him into it. It would seem to me, you are in violation of the treaty more so than Mr. Potter.”

“They’re liars!” Fenrir snarled, “I could smell that boy all over Blackbone’s and Slivermoon’s clothes, and they would not dare break their probation by stepping out of the boundary. He was inside my territory. I don’t care what your people say.”

“Are you saying then, that you did not step out of your territory in an attempt to collect the boy?”

Fenrir merely let out an angry growl, showing neither guilt or regret. Voldemort let out a sigh.

“I’m afraid I can not let you have this one, my friend. I have great plans for him.”

“I have plans as well!” he snarled, punching the wall angrily and cracking the wood. His eyes had gone yellow when he turned to the Dark Lord, but the other was not intimidated.

“Oh, yes,” Voldemort said, “You wish to use him to keep Blackbone in line. If such extreme measures are needed to ensure his obedience, wouldn’t it just be better to kill him? I know you have this strange desire to see him inherit the packs after you, but with his seditious attitude towards me I will be forced to kill him anyway.”

Fenrir grunted in acknowledgment and finally took the chair across from him.

“He is the only one with the balls for the job,” Fenrir said. “Everyone else is either too weak in will or too weak in body. He’s an alpha by nature, by the will of the Goddess, and my bad fucking luck. Anyone else and the packs will fall into disorganized factions again. His hatred for the both of us does nothing to change that.”

“Hhmm... that is quite the conundrum.”

He took another sip of his tea, and looked thoughtful. Fenrir let him have his moment to think. The wizard was better at plotting, and he was not above letting him find a solution for the both of them. The Dark Lord lifted his cup, but stopped abruptly, and the werewolf knew he had an idea.

“Perhaps Mr. Potter might still be of use to both of us,” he said slowly, thoughts still flying about in his head, this time with a definite goal in mind. “After all, if I should retain direct power and influence over the child, Blackbone will be forced to make concessions to me and you in order to remain in contact with him. Yes... I think that might work. Even after you pass on, he will still be forced to behave himself so as not to endanger or make an enemy of his Godson.”

He took one last sip of his tea and then stood, beginning to pace the breadth of the room. Fenrir watched him curiously, almost amused. He knew Voldemort never indulged in pacing while amongst wizards. Such a thing would be considered a lack of self control and dignity. Whilst visiting the werewolves (he did so once or twice a year, supposedly on diplomatic visits, but really because it was a vacation to him) he tended to care very little about appearances.

He slept late. He didn't bother shaving or brushing his hair. He ate with his fingers and drank too much. He swore. He kept his shirt untucked and walked around barefoot. He flirted with everyone. In general, he acted as young as he looked, and as uncouth as his muggle upbringing inclined him to be. The only reason he wasn't degenerating at the moment was he would have to return to his usual duties within the hour and it took time to fall back and forth between behaviors.

"It will be tricky of course," Voldemort continued, "I will have to make sure their interactions do not result in the boy adopting Blackbone's traitorous thoughts, while at the same time ensuring that they don't become resentful of the other... But it could work in my favor... a kindness in its own right... How troublesome... Nevertheless..."

Fenrir grinned.

[illegible]

Professor McGonagall picked Harry up from the hospital later that day. She looked very worried when she saw his pale, tired complexion, but he managed a smile for her. There were no questions when she brought him back to Hogwarts, and he offered no explanations. He wondered if she didn't know that anything he told her would once again be a lie. And that really was a pity. Of all the adults he knew including his Godfather and Remus (and he loved them dearly already), he thought McGonagall the most reliable.

But she couldn't have saved him. Strong and noble woman though she was, it was Snape's underhanded tactics that had him safely returned to Hogwarts and not Fenrir Greyback's clutches. It was also Snape's underhanded tactics and his skills in legilimency that tore the truth from his very mind, and left him feeling sicker than he had upon entering the hospital.

Harry still didn't know why the man had done it.

He suspected Voldemort put him up to it. While he didn't believe it was beyond Snape to do something altruistic, he didn't think he would do something that would risk himself in the process. But then why would Voldemort save him? Did them both being parselmouths make the Dark Lord somehow protective of him? Was this the evidence of a bond he believed the two shared? This wouldn't be the first instance where Voldemort had shown him extra attention. He had occasionally talked to Harry in a casual manner and even given him Elsbeth as a gift.

It wasn't something he wanted to think too hard about.

He just wanted to go back to the Sleuw's house, sit down at his desk, write a letter to Hermione about their arithmancy homework, and not think about Voldemort, Snape, Greyback, or Sirius and Remus possibly being tortured (since the full moon had come and gone, hopefully Athena had told the truth and their punishment was over by now).

Harry and McGonagall arrived at the Sleuw's shortly after sunset, and her good bye was the first thing she had said to him since she'd checked him out of the hospital. Mrs. Sleuw clucked and fuddled about the kitchen, while Harry sat numbly beside Mr. Sleuw and thought them quite a pair at the moment. After dinner, despite what Harry had thought he wanted, he pulled out the charmed journal and quill.

He sat by the window, and lighted more by the light of the nearly full moon than by his single candle, he wrote his first real entry.

He wrote about his Godfather and Remus, his job, his near capture, the hospital, Snape, Umbridge, his suspicions, his fears, and his frustration about not being able to entrust the entire truth of his life with anyone. He wrote for several hours, long after the headache had settled in and his fingers had started to cramp. He wrote until finally, magically and emotionally drained he collapsed out of his chair and fell unconscious.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Lycanthrosis is related to lycanthropy. It's caused by being bitten, having sex, or exchanging blood with a werewolf who wasn't transformed at the time. Symptoms include growth of fangs and/or claws, increased aggression and strength, affinity for raw meat, and strange behavior centered around the cycles of the moon. A person won't transform during the full moon, but they're still considered dangerous to uninfected people. In Voldemort's society, anyone who gets it is sent to live with werewolves and usually turned into a full werewolf eventually.

Chapter 23: Tribute to the Prince

Harry did not go back to work at Wibble's Wards and Boundaries, Inc. In fact, no one went back. According to the Wizard Weekly, Mr. John Wibble was being cited for child endangerment and exploitation as well as other shady business practices, and had been suspended from business until the investigation was over. Harry assumed they were referring to him, but since no one ever questioned him about the werewolf incident again, he was never completely sure. He felt rather bad for the other employees losing their jobs, but knew if it hadn't been him it would have been some other child who was lied to, and the law still would have been broken even if the Court never learned of it. After all, it was common knowledge that minors were not allowed within half a mile of werewolf territories.

The entire fiasco had left him frustrated, anxious, and feeling lonelier than before. No one brought up the incident, but Harry felt it marked everything he did and said. His thoughts often wandered to Sirius and Remus, wondering if they were ok and if they missed him or felt guilty for what almost happened. His dreams were filled with nightmares, some about werewolves, but mostly about Snape or Voldemort or even Umbridge coming to punish him. He did not attempt to find another job. He had a strange fear that McGonagall would refuse him. He hadn't told his friend about being fired either, and hoped they didn't read the business section of the newspaper. He didn't want to have to lie to them. Again.

And if all that wasn't bad enough, his diary, one of the few magical items he owned, was broken. He had woken up late the next evening in his bed, with Mrs. Sleuw chiding him for getting sick after he left the hospital. She had said she couldn't wake him that morning and he looked so ill, she let him sleep. Once she had left him alone, he had found the book in his desk, his writing still clear as day in it. After testing it with a few scribbles, the writing didn't disappear and he could feel no magic from it. He suspected he had over used it the night before and somehow short-circuited it as well as himself. He didn't remember what happened after that, but he must have woken up briefly to change and get into bed.

Days passed uneventfully, marked only by his chores, his school work, and his letters until August 1st. His birthday arrived on a sunny Thursday, and the first to greet him were a motley flock of owls outside his room. As soon as he opened his window for them, Elsbeth charged in and dumped a parcel on his bed and quickly claimed her rightful perch. She was followed by six other owls who behaved similarly, dumping their parcels and letters before finding various places to land in his room.

It was probably the most birthday presents he had ever received in his life (his parents usually only gave him one present each and he didn't have many friends in Germany), and his only regret was that the givers couldn't have been there in person. He opened the parcel Elsbeth had been carrying first, knowing she was returning from Hermione's. Inside was a small book of spells titled, 'One Hundred Spells They Should, But Don't, Teach You In School' and a dark red card with a golden Snitch zooming about the outside.

Dear Harry

Happy Birthday. I wish I could be there to give this to you in person. I know you're not exactly bookish, but you'll love this one, I promise. There's even a spell in there for animating drawings. Since the school year is coming up soon, I wanted to know if you'd like to try to come to Diagon Alley with me and Draco. We said we'd show you around last year, and I think you'd have a grand time. I know you're probably still busy with work, but if you could write any convenient dates or times that we can try and set something up. Can't wait to see you!

Sincerely,

Hermione

Ah, he'd almost forgotten about their promise to show him around. It sounded like a wonderful idea. The first thing other than the start of term he had to look forward to in a while.

The next one he opened was a small package, but when he took off the postage wrap, a large sketch pad and colored pencils grew out of it. On it was a very short note in Natalie's elegant silver script on green paper.

Your pictures of me are much too small to hang on my wall, and black and white hardly does me justice. These should work much better. Oh, and Happy Birthday.

He chuckled in amusement, although he was rather touched that she had thought to get him anything. Next was Clyde's present, involving a lot of junk food and a catalogue of quidditch supplies. His card had an entire quidditch team fighting it out, and inside he wrote about seeing him in Daigon Alley before the start of term as well. With those three out of the way, he was completely uncertain about who else may have sent him something and he didn't recognize the owls either.

He opened the one with only a letter first, which turned out to be his school supply list. The next one gave him pause. There was an address on it, but he couldn't believe that it was correct, so he reluctantly set it aside for a moment. He didn't recognize the address on the other letter either, but he did recognize the seal. A skull with a snake slithering through the eye sockets.

And this man lived nine months out of the year surrounded by school children. Geh.

He opened it to reveal a plain black card, with a golden 'V' on the outside. When he opened it a small gold band fell out. Gold script was also on the inside.

Dear Harry,

Once again you have misplaced yourself. As I am rather fond of you, I have enclosed a device to help keep you on the proper course. Simply insert the ring into your pocket watch, say the name of the location you wish to go, and the hands of your watch will point you in the right direction. I hope this helps you with your New Year's resolution. Happy Birthday.

V.

“Well,” Harry said to Elsbeth, “At least he doesn’t seem to be mad at me.”

The last item was a package, the sender listed as a catalogue company in Sussex he had never heard of. He opened it, and inside found a letter and a wooden box. He tried opening the box, but the latch wouldn’t budge so he went back to the letter.

Dear Harry

I apologize in advance for the deception. Smuggling letters, let alone packages, from outside of Britian is a tricky business these days, but I think this worth the risk.”

Uh-oh. At this point, Harry knew he should stop reading and hand everything over to the proper authorities. He was in enough trouble as it was without excepting contraband from strangers in other countries.

At the same time, it couldn’t hurt just to read the letter.

Right?

I am an old acquaintance of your father and mother, and James left in my charge something very valuable. Your family fled Britian before I could return it and then disappeared completely. I have just recently received news of your return to Britian and Hogwarts itself. My condolences on your loss, they were both some of finest people I ever had the privilege of meeting. I know that they would be very proud of you. That being said, I return this to its rightful owner and apologize for not getting it to you sooner. It is a one of kind item, so I recommend being discreet in whom you tell about it and when and how you use it. Happy Birthday.

Sincerely,

A family friend.

P.S. The password is Lily’s favorite flower.

“Smashing,” Harry said to his feathery contingent. “Yet another secret.”

Any plans he had made of turning the package over to someone had left his mind as easily as if it had never been there. Whatever it was, it apparently belonged to his father, and thus him. With his access to his family vault questionable, he decided that risking another family treasure was not in his best interest. Looking at the plain wooden box, he wondered what was inside and tried to recall his mother’s favorite flower. It had been four years since he’d last seen her, and of all the things he tended to recall, flowers were not one of them. Nothing came to mind. It was very possible the memory spells at WYRA had taken the knowledge from him.

“Well, bloody, fucking hell...”

Frustrated, he set the box aside for later. He picked up the package with the impossible address. Since he had already opened a package he shouldn’t have, he was feeling pretty rebellious at the moment. He was still a bit cautious though.

Getting mail from a werewolf territory may or may not be illegal.

Not knowing if the package might contain a dead rabbit or Sirius’ ear or something equally horrible, he opened the letter first.

Hey, Prongslet

Well, that was a promising start.

You have the damndest luck. I heard from Athena what happened. There’s nothing I can say that would tell you how truly sorry we both are. We were careless, and you suffered for that. If you don’t wish to speak to us anymore, we would understand. Having said that, you’re James and Lily’s son so it probably never crossed mind.

Harry rolled his eyes.

Slivermoon and I are both fine, so we don’t want you worrying about that. We’ve also been given permission to write supervised letters if we behave ourselves. Don't be surprised if there's long silences between letters. We're not exactly known for our 'good behavior'. Anyway, when you write back, you're suppose to give your letters to Snape (insert gagging sounds here), and be aware he'll be reading them first. Takes the fun out of a lot of it, but it's a lot more than I thought possible without breaking at least half a dozen laws (perhaps that's why it's not as fun?). They gave me a whole bunch of rules, but I don't remember half of them. Snape will likely have twenty more, so good luck with that.

Oh, and we made you something. Nothing fancy I'm afraid. We keep things simple around here. No magic either. Remus had his wand taken away for a month and I haven't seen mine in years. I think you'll find use of it regardless.

Happy Birthday, Harry. We're so proud of you.

Yucky hugs and kisses from your overly affectionate extended family,

Sirius Blackbone & Remus Slivermoon

Harry felt a rush a warm as he finished his letter. This was something good, no something wonderful. He had a family that he didn't have to hide. Ok, it was sort of like having a family stuck in prison for life, but it was still something precious. He could finally tell Hermione and Clyde and perhaps even Natalie and Draco.

It was suspicious as hell, he knew, that after all that had happened they would be rewarded like this, but Harry didn't care. If after first nearly being killed by werewolves and then abducted to be turned into one, he was finally going keep them in his life than he would hold no regrets.

The gift they had made him was set of leather arm guards with strips of bronze plating on the outside. The inside of the leather had Sirius and Remus' mark, a crescent moon resting over crossbones. The right guard had a trip spring so if he bent his wrist just right, his wand could pop out into his hand. It was just what he needed. Elsbeth, gentle though she was, had already scratched the hell out of his arms.

From down the hall he could make out the sounds of Mr. and Mrs. Sleuw rising for the morning. Feeling strangely paranoid (and with some of his gifts he had very good reason to be), he quickly gathered up all his presents and cards and hid them in his trunk, then gave all the delivery owls treats or their pay and hurried them out the window (except for Elsbeth of course).

When everything was as it was before, and not a suspicious item in sight, he got dressed and headed down stairs to help with breakfast as if it nothing unusual had occurred.

This was all just another day in the life of the infamous Harry Potter, after all.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry met with Hermione, Draco, Natalie, Pansy Parkinson, and Blaise Zabini a week before the start of term to visit Daigon Alley for school supplies. Clyde and the Weasley twins had said they were going on the same day with their grandparents, and said they'd keep an eye out for them. Having seen hardly anyone but the Sleuw's for weeks, he was ecstatic to be among other students again, and not even Snape glowering at them could dampen his enthusiasm.

The potion's master, being Hermione's and Draco's godfather, had been roped into escorting them all by Mrs. Malfoy. He had already completed his first trip to Diagon alley with Hogwarts new muggleborns, and was not looking at all pleased to be going again. Neither of the young Malfoy children looked particularly concerned, so Harry just took it in stride.

He'd met with Snape in Hogsmeade, portkeyed to Malfoy Manor to pick up everyone else, and then taken their floo to a dingy little pub in Daigon Alley. The man stepped out onto the street, pointed to the bookstore and told them to meet him there at an appointed time, then stalked off towards a rather shady looking street. Harry blinked stupidly at the man's back.

"I thought he was our escort?" he asked, turning to the others. The Slytherins chuckled.

"As if we need someone holding our hand," Draco sneered. "It's not like it's dangerous around here. This entire street has enough protection spells and Court sentries to give Hogwarts a run for its money."

Harry shrugged. It was for the best, he supposed. He didn't want this trip to be as rushed and uneventful as his first one was. He caught Hermione giving him a meaningful look, and intentionally fell behind their little group to talk to her in relative privacy.

"Your last couple of letters have been kind of mysterious, Harry. You keep saying something wonderful happened, but you don't go into it. What's the big secret?"

Harry glanced around to make sure no one was paying them any attention.

"Well... I learned my parents were both wizards," he said. Even though he had learned this last year, it was Sirius and Remus who had told him so he had not been able to tell her at the time. Now that he could tell her about them, it freed up this information as well. "And my godfather is also a wizard, and he lives here in Britain. I got a letter from him on my birthday."

"Oh, Harry that's wonderful! I'm so happy for you! Where did they live? Did either of them go to Hogwarts? Have you met your godfather in person yet? Do you think he'll adopt you? Why have you been secretive about all this?"

"Shhh! It's not as simple as it sounds. My parents fought against Voldemort during the war. Their names have a Taboo on them in Britain," he explained, and Hermione instantly paled. Taboos were no laughing matter. Speaking a Taboo name could have you sent to the Court prison for days or even weeks of interrogation, and if found guilty of treason it was Azkaban, lycanthropy, or death for the charged. "And my godfather is a werewolf. He was convicted of treason just after the war, and Greyback took him in. It's taken him over a year to get through all the red tape just to be able to send me letters.”

All Hermione could do was gape, and then shake her head.

“Only you, Harry,” she sighed. He grinned at her.

“Well I can’t have you getting bored now can I? I’ll tell you more about it when term starts. Lets just pretend I’m normal for once, and see how it goes. If we’re not invaded by a goblin army by tea time, I think the day will have turned out quite well.”

With their Slytherin company, they went from shop to shop, starting with ‘Gamblers and Gook’s Game Shop’, on to ‘Manatoba’s Magical Menagerie’, then an apothecary called simply ‘Apothecary’. They stopped at almost a dozen shops, most of which were only visited briefly to explain to Harry what they sold or just to pick up school supplies, but others everyone lingered in to admire the merchandise for a long time. Harry, Draco, and Blaise all crowded around the sporting goods store, admiring the latest edition of Cleansweep brooms and the many varieties of swords for fencing clubs. Hermione, Natalie, and Pansy let them be to wander about ‘Lord Burkland’s’, a high-end jewelry store. They all had a great time, showing everyone else what they got (Harry got very little compared to everyone else, but what he did get he had to hide away from Hermione for her birthday). When there was only forty-five minutes left before they had to meet up with Snape and Hermione became absolutely insistent, they headed to the bookstore, Borgen’s and Blott’s, for their text books.

Hogwart’s new textbooks are bundled together by year, and the others merely had to select the appropriate bundle and then wandered off to browse. Harry wanted second hand books to save money, so was forced to head from isle to isle searching for them. While looking for Philip Tulip’s ‘A Practical Guide to Impractical Plants’, he bumped into a girl he vaguely recognized as the youngest of the Weasley clan. She was a little elfin creature, with soft features and large eyes, and spattering of freckles across her nose that made her look like a child’s doll. She was glowering at an arithmancy book like it had wronged her some how.

"It's not as hard as it looks," Harry said, startling her a bit, "Professor Vector shows us all the cheats after every section."

"Oh! Hello," she said, blushing a bit. "Do you go to Hogwarts too? This is going to be my first year."

He smiled at her reassuringly. "Yep, this will be my second year. I'm in Gryffindor with some of your brothers, and I play on the quidditch with Fred and George. You're Ginny, right?"

"Oh! You're Harry Potter. They wrote about you in a couple of their letters. They said you were their god. You don't have pockets full of Zonko's trick toys do you?"

Now it was Harry's turn to blush a bit.

"No, no, I leave the pranking to them. I get in enough trouble without looking for it. Speaking of the twins, they're not around here are they?"

"No," she said, "They shouldn't be around until about noon. Why?"

"Last year they said they'd have to beat the boys off you with a broom when you got to Hogwarts. I just want to make sure they aren't coming up behind me with it."

She giggled at that and turned even more pink. Soon they fell into a discussion about Hogwarts, as Harry explained to her some of the ins and outs of the school and helped her find her books while he looked for his own. She asked him all sorts of questions, about the school, about him, her brothers, and finally in the most timid of voices she asked about Voldemort.

"Does he really live at the school?"

Harry wondered that sometimes himself.

"I don't really know. He probably has a room there somewhere, but I don't think he lives there all year. He comes to dinner a couple times a week and he has an office in the highest tower of the school. It's a nice office, but I don't think he could run the entirety of Britain from there."

"You've been in his office?"

"Well, yes..."

She gaped at him. "Wow."

He chuckled at her. "I've been crucio-ed by him too, but we've been getting along much better since then."

If her mouth hadn't been hanging open already, her jaw surely would have dropped. He laughed.

"Oh, you're teasing me!" she grumped. "You'd think I wouldn't be that gullible with brothers like mine, but you really had me going. Now I see why Fred and George like you so much."

He decided not to correct her. When she got to Hogwarts she would hear all sorts of rumors about him, and it would be funny to see her surprised all over again.

"Harry, do you have all your books yet?"

He turned around to see Natalie striding towards them. He couldn't help but notice that her relaxed manner had receded into something predatory, a measuring look in her eyes. She came to stand right next to him and took his arm in hers. She smiled sweetly at him and it looked all wrong.

"If you don't hurry we'll be late and Snape will throw a fit," she said, and then glanced over at Ginny who was looking at her rather nervously. "Why Ginerva, I haven't seen you in a while. So you managed to get into Hogwarts after all."

There was something not at all friendly about her words, though she kept smiling pleasantly. The youngest Weasley didn't look happy. Harry decided to spare her the discomfort by taking Natalie's advice.

"You're right," he said, "we better hurry. It was nice meeting you, Ginny. I'll look for you at the start of term!"

The girl made a odd hand gesture that might have been a wave, and Harry walked with Natalie to the checkout counter.

"Old acquaintance?" he asked when they were out of ear shot.

Natalie snorted.

"We were in the same primary school. Draco used to have the silliest crush on her, but thank God he grew out of it. They were a lousy match. Prim and proper Draco wouldn't even stoop to finger painting, and she was practically rolling in the mud on most days." She glanced over at the redhead now looking for the remainder of her books, sneering. "I see not much has changed."

Harry peeked over as well. Her clothes definitely weren't the finest, being a little faded and of a style favored by the less ostentatious ranks of Wizarding Britain, but she looked tidy and clean enough to him. She was pretty, in a different way than Hermione and Natalie. A warm and homey way that made you unafraid to approach her in ways you never would upper crust girls like them.

"You know, I am even poorer than she is, don't you?" he said, lifting an eyebrow. She grinned, squeezing his arm affectionately.

"That maybe so, but you have something that she doesn't."

"What's that? An excess of lives?"

"No, darling. You've got class."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Ginny Weasley watched Natalie Cypher with a familiar loathing. The blond witch (and she didn't mean 'witch' in the literal sense) was just as she remembered her. Beautiful, cold, and a complete snob.

What a boy as nice as Harry Potter saw in her, she had no idea. She could see Natalie whispering things in his ear, and had no doubt about her subject. Still, when the boy at her arm caught Ginny's eye, he smiled at her the same way he had before. She had to duct her head so he wouldn't see her blush. Fred and George had written that, in addition to being their god, Harry was the cutest boy they had ever met. She thought that meant he'd be short and girly, but he wasn't.

He was slim and a little shorter than most boys, but he held himself in a way that made you over look that. He was friendly, but not presumptuously so. His appearance was neat and tidy, but his messy hair kept him from looking overly prim like her brother Percy, and instead made him look both dignified and approachable. And he had the most incredible green eyes she had ever seen.

Oh, this was bad, she knew. When she started fixating on the eyes, she knew she was already knee deep in a crush and sinking fast. What chance did a poor little nobody like her have with someone like him? He was handsome, the youngest Hogwarts Seeker in a century, hung out with some of the richest kids in school, and had Natalie Cypher as a girlfriend.

It was impossible.

And yet... he was still smiling at her.

[illegible]

Chapter 24: The Serpent Prince

Harry boarded the train quickly in order to avoid the crowds and their pointing. He hadn't thought about his short stint through the newspapers last November, but apparently it hadn't been completely forgotten. Wherever he went a least a few of his fellow students would point him out to their parents or younger siblings and say something like 'That's Harry Potter. He got kidnaped last year. He's in my arithmancy class' or 'That's the kid who broke Slytherin's winning streak in Quidditch. I heard he's got two girlfriends and two boyfriends'.

It was ridiculous.

If anyone had heard even half the story of what had happened to him this summer, he imagined they'd have just about mobbed him. Well, thank God for small miracles. His wand, although promised back to him shortly after his return from the hospital, had not reached his person until the day before. He was almost giddy to have it back and unharmed, but the crowded station was not the place to ogle his magical conduit so he kept it tucked safely in his robe.

The train was not yet over run with students so most of the compartments were empty. He ambled along until he came to a door that for one reason or another felt right to him. Opening it, he found himself face to face with a boy who could have been his older brother. He had black hair, a slender build, and the same amazing green eyes. There was something vaguely familiar about him, yet Harry couldn't recall ever seeing him before. Perhaps he was from another House?

"Why, hello," the boy said, setting down the book he had been reading, "Are you looking for somewhere to sit? I could use some company and you have a friendly face."

Harry felt himself blush, but moved into the compartment. He hadn't been looking for a stranger's company, but this boy seemed friendly enough with his charming little smile and curious eyes.

"Thanks," he said, taking a seat across from him and reaching out his hand. "I'm Harry Potter, but just Harry is fine."

The boy shook it and said, "Thomas Matthew Rook, but you may call me Tom."

Harry's face became even warmer.

"You don't have any luggage," the boy pointed out. "But you are wearing your school robes."

"Oh, that. Well, I live at the school year around. They have me take the train to school for tradition's sake, you know," Harry said, "What about you? If you went Hogwarts you would have recognized me, and you're too old to be a first year."

Tom chuckled. "Both of our circumstances are unusual then. I will be attending Hogwarts as a fifth year student, even though this will be my first year going there. I was home schooled due to a childhood ailment that I have only recently overcome. I must say I am rather looking forward to it."

At that Harry couldn't help but grin.

"You'll love it. Everyone does."

Tom invited Harry to tell him about Hogwarts, which Harry did with just as much enthusiasm as he had with Ginny Weasley. The older boy was an attentive audience, laughing at the right moments and asking many curious questions, and never taking his eyes off the second year. Fifteen minutes passed before their conversation was once again disturbed. Natalie peeked in, took one look at them and grinned.

"Oh, Harry, you've grown an older brother over the summer. Now I know what I want for Christmas."

"Natalie! Don't be rude, he's a new student."

She glided in, and held out her hand to the older boy with perfect confidence. "Natalie Cypher, second year Slytherin."

Tom accepted her hand and kissed it. "Thomas Rook, man of mystery."

"Oh, that's smooth. You'll be Slytherin for sure," she said, giggling a bit. "I see you've already found, Harry. Don't let the Gryffindork badge fool you, he's got enough Slytherin in him it's a miracle his tongue hasn't forked yet."

"Hey! It took a lot of Gryffindorkishness to sow that fork closed, I'll have you know!"

"Mind if we join you?" came Draco's 'friendly' sneer, "The Humfmumper's tears of friendship are getting my shoes wet out here."

He stomped in, followed by Hermione and Blaise. He ordered his two goons, Crabbe and Goyle (Ron was absent, likely sitting with his brothers), to stand watch outside the door. To guard against what, Harry had no idea. Harry introduced Tom to them, and soon after Hermione began shooting questions at him about his education. The elder boy took it in stride, listing off the many subjects he had been tutored and self studied in, and assured her his scores on his placement exams more than qualified him to attend Hogwarts even so late in his schooling. Draco, who had been rather reserved, seemed to lighten up a bit when it became apparent that Tom was from a wealthy if not well known family, but only a little.

Finally, Hermione settled back and they moved on to more casual affairs.

"I'll be trying out for Quidditch this year," Draco said. "The Seeker position opened up again since Harry off'ed the last one."

"He off'ed himself. Not my fault your house picks blind goons for their Seekers."

"You won't be so cocky when I'm flying circles around you, Potter."

"Bring it on, Malfoy."

Natalies and Hermione rolled their eyes at each other.

“Boys and their games,” Hermione lamented. “It could be worse, I suppose. They could have joined Fencing club. Bravado and pointy objects.”

“Oh, that reminds me, Ginerva is coming this year, can you believe it? Finally, the last Weasley. I thought I’d never see the end of the line,” Natalies said.

“How did bravado and pointy things remind you of Ginny?” Harry asked.

“A Slytherin’s mind is a twisted maze, Harry. You can’t go in too deep without getting lost and possibly eaten by something,” Hermione said, and moved the conversation on to other things.

They kept the conversation going for several hours, until after they’d gotten lunch from the trolley car and fallen into an easy silence. As they neared the last leg of their journey, the sky turned grey and it started to rain.

“Bother, I hope you don’t have to take boat with the other first years,” Harry said. Tom just smiled faintly, and it suddenly occurred to Harry that the boy hadn’t looked away from him for the entire length of their journey. He felt himself blush yet again and hastily looked out the window.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom did have to take the boat. Harry gave him an apologetic look, but the older boy just shrugged and headed towards the lake. When Harry saw what was to take the rest of them to the castle, he wished he could have gone with him.

Thestrals shifted anxiously in their harnesses, their leathery wings secured uncomfortably to their sides. They huffed and snorted, their seemingly skinless bodies trembling in the rain. Most of the students didn’t seem to mind, and others seemed completely unaware of them.

He briefly recalled what Kyle, the lawyers assistant he'd met at the first adoption party, had said about only those who had seen death would be able to see them.

"Come on, Harry. You're going to catch a cold," Hermione said, leading him reluctantly to their coach, where Draco and Natalie waited.

"So what do you think of Tom?" Harry asked, once the carriage started moving.

"He seems quite knowledgeable," Hermione said, "Although his arrival is a bit suspicious. I've never heard of a late transfer before."

"He'll definitely be Slytherin," Natalie said, "I bet he charmed and possibly bribed the school board."

"He's a pedophile," Draco stated with a dead expression. "I'm amazed he didn't rip off Harry's clothes and molest him in front of us."

"Draco!"

All three of them yelled it at the same time and with the same amount of outrage. Hermione crossed her arms and scowled at her brother.

"Jealousy is very unflattering on you, Draco."

The blond boy merely sniffed and looked away.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry made it a point to stay extra close to Hermione on their way to the Great Hall. He didn't fancy a repeat of last year's incident, however unlikely. They found their seats and were soon joined by Clyde and the Weasley twins. Fred and George, ignoring the social pecking order as usual, looked rather like giants among the second years but no one questioned it. They'd likely move three or four times during the feast anyway.

“Good evening, our most High and Divine Lord of Chaos,” Fred said by way of greeting, “Was the rain your idea or did Snape’s foul disposition moved ahead of you?”

Harry rolled his eyes. “Must have been Snape. I would have thrown in lightening and a thestral stampede.”

“Well, there’s always next year, your Lordship,” George suggested.

“Don’t encourage them, Harry,” Hermione pleaded. “And don’t insult my godfather. I’m sure you wouldn’t like me insulting yours.”

Harry smiled, showing her he understood her hidden message. When the feast was over, they would find a nice quiet place and Harry would explain everything he had discovered ‘that summer’. Undoubtably, she had been dying to ask him the moment they saw each other.

The hall slowly filled until everyone but the nervous first years and a curious looking Tom were seated. Headmistress Lestrangle took the podium, which struck Harry as kind of odd. Wasn’t Voldemort the one who usually addressed the students first? It wasn’t as if he could remember much from his first welcoming feast, being cursed and all. He turned to Hermione to ask.

“Oh, yes,” she agreed, not taking her eyes off the stage, “He enjoys playing Headmaster quite a bit. I truly believe he thinks the only wizards worth his time come through Hogwarts so he takes a lot of initiative with the students. But I overheard mother talking about her, and that Voldemort was displeased with her recent running of the school so she’s taking on the full responsibility of it now to show she’s fit for the job. If she blows it, Professor Snape will have her job for sure.”

“Welcome,” Lestrangle began, “to the beginning of another school year. As always, I and all those present here expect great things from each of you, as befitting of the most prestigious Wizarding School in the world-”

“And I thought the Dark Lord was pretentious,” Fred muttered. Hermione hushed him.

“- and remind all returning students, the Forbidden Forest is strictly off limits. If you are lost in there, there will be no search party to retrieve you-”

George grinned. “Good, we’ll know where to escape to when she finds that nest of Skitzles we put in her-”

“Sshh!”

“And I have some unfortunate news. Professor Quirrel, our Dark Arts and Defense teacher for several years now, was injured while researching acumantulas and will not be returning to teach this year. Your new teacher, however, is more than qualified. May I introduce Professor Anthony MacNair.”

Beside him, Harry heard Hermione gasp and it wasn’t in pleasant surprise. She looked positively pale when she spotted the man, who had been slinking in a shadowy corner in a black cloak. He was a gaunt and wicked looking man, and did not smile or acknowledge the polite applause in any way.

“Now, because this is Professor MacNair’s first year as a teacher, Professor Snape has graciously offered up his time and expertise to start a Dueling Club to help practice DA&D’s practical applications.”

“We’re going to die.”

If the twins had said it, Harry would have taken it in stride, but coming from Hermione it was a tad bit worrying.

“In addition to our usual contingent of first years, we will be having a fifth year transfer. Mr. Rook is attending public school for the first time so I expect you all to be helpful and studious-”

The twins grinned at each other.

“-let the sorting begin.”

McGonagall brought out a stool and a hat and set them at the front of the hall. The hat immediately burst out into song. Harry thought it one of the most ridiculous things he'd ever seen that didn't involve the Dursley's laughable attempts at being 'classy'. It was over soon enough, and McGonagall started to call first years to be sorted. Every table greeted their new additions enthusiastically, quickly making room for them.

Harry felt suddenly deprived. His own sorting had gone all wrong, and it had taken months and a great deal of luck for him to be welcomed anywhere at his own table. Even now, he realized, he didn't have the same attachment to his own house that all the other students seemed to possess. He likely never would either, and that was so utterly unfair.

"Rook, Thomas!"

Harry returned to the present to watch his new acquaintance stride forward confidently. The Sorting hat barely touched his head before shouting out a resounding 'Slytherin!'. Harry bit back at the feeling of disappointment, reminding himself that half his friends were Slytherin anyway. As if hearing his thoughts, Tom caught his eye on his way to the Slytherin table and gave him a mischievous wink.

Harry wasn't the only one to notice it, for Fred and George each put their arms protectively around him.

"No way!" cried George, "He'll have to get his own adorable Master of Mischief. Harry's ours!"

"Here, here!" agreed Fred. Harry rolled his eyes.

It wasn't until almost the very end that another familiar name was called.

"Weasley, Ginerva!"

Her name immediately perked Harry's attention, and he gave the nervous girl a friendly wave as she made her way to the front. She smiled timidly back. In a matter of seconds, the hat called out her house and she practically skipped over to Gryffindor table. She paused briefly before sitting to wave to Ron, who managed a little smile and wave. Beside him, Draco gave him a pat on the back as if to say 'I know exactly how you feel'.

She ended up sitting between George and Harry, looking the happiest girl in the world.

"Oh, I was nervous!" she said, "But you all were right. Gryffindor all the way!"

"Told you," Clyde said, as if the outcome was obvious. Hermione elbowed him in the ribs.

"Welcome to Gryffindor, Ginny. It's been a while."

"Only a year! How is Draco, by the way?"

"He's now the official overlord of the first and second year Slytherins. By Christmas he'll have completed his coup d'etat against Avery and taken the third years as well."

Ginny laughed, not realizing Hermione wasn't actually joking.

"Congratulations," Percy said, wandering over, "Mom will be so pleased. Sorry, I can't stay long. Prefect responsibilities, you know."

"Thanks, Percy," Ginny said, even as the older boy was wandering off again, pulling out and discarding the dung bombs the twins had snuck into his pockets.

"Prefect duties, my arse. He's going to flirt with Clearwater," said Fred.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"So, what is this about your parents being wizards and your godfather is a werewolf?" Hermione finally asked, once they'd finally found a moment alone after the Welcoming Feast. They'd found a quiet little nook in the common room, both dressed comfortably in their nightclothes, to speak.

“His name is Sirius Black. He was my father’s best friend. They went to this very school together. His mate is Remus Lupin, who also a good friend of my father’s in school, but he was a werewolf already by then. My father and Sirius both figured it out, and helped him get through his time at school. All three were the very best of friends. My mother was also Gryffindor and attended the same years as them, though I don’t think she hooked up with my father until their last year together.”

Hermione blinked. “But how would Remus have gone to school? It would have been illegal at the time...”

Harry shrugged. “The Headmaster at the time was rather... open-minded? Only he, McGonagall, my father, and godfather knew... and maybe my mom figured it out later, I’m still a bit unclear on that.”

She sat back and considered what he had told her and several questions seemed to come to her, but she held her tongue. Finally, she spoke again.

“So your parents have a taboo on their names? What did they do to get those?”

“I don’t know yet. I know they fought against Voldemort during the war, and left shortly before he took control of Britain. They must have really pissed him off, because after they reached Germany they withdrew from the wizarding world completely.”

He ran a hand through his hair in frustration.

“They never told me any of it. I don’t know why they kept it from me. It’s not like I wouldn’t have found out eventually. It’s kind of hard not to notice once you start setting things on fire and levitating the family pet across the room.”

Hermione nodded.

“It must have been really difficult for them. By then, they were probably so sick of the war and magic in general, they just left it all behind to start over. I’m sure they would have told you once you started performing accidental magic.”

Harry shrugged. “We’ll never know will we? But you know what really gets me? What really pisses me off?”

“Harry, language.”

“Everyone knows. Voldemort sure as hell knows. McGonagall... god, I don’t know how I missed it. She practically blurted it out to my face when she first saw me. She called me ‘Harry’. Not ‘Harold’ or ‘Mr. Potter’, but Harry. Snape knew the instant he saw me, and he’s in WYRA so he had to have reported it. Everyone at WYRA must have known. All the teachers here must too. But they all just pretend I fell out of the damn sky. Like none of it matters.”

It was clear Hermione didn’t know how to respond to that. She had no idea what he must be feeling. Any similarity between their circumstance was made moot by the fact that everyone knew her origins and they really didn’t matter, except in the context of her adoption and eventual marriage.

When no words of wisdom were forthcoming, Harry just shrugged.

“At least I have Sirius and Remus. I know I won’t actually be able to meet them until I’m seventeen, but at least I can write them and get some honest answers.”

“Harry, you have to be careful. I know they’re your family, and precious to you, but they’re also known traitors to the state. If people were to learn that you’re in contact with them, it could seriously damage your reputation. If they expressed anti-government sentiments in their letters, there would be physical evidence for a treason charge against you. You have to be very, very careful.”

Harry just rolled his eyes. “Why do you think I only told you? I thought about telling Clyde or even Draco and Natalie, but I don’t think I could trust them that much. Voldemort gave the go ahead, and Snape already knows and has to proofread my letters, but I'm not going to go blabbing about it to everyone. Hufflepuff is known more for its loyalty than Gryffindor, if you haven't noticed."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"How is the brandy, Tom?" Voldemort asked, taking a sip from his own glass.

"Smokier than I remember, Brother, but still good," the boy replied, stroking the head of his much grown familiar. Nagini was large enough now to smother him easily, but her coils remained comfortably snug around his arms and shoulders as she practically purred under his fingers.

"Enjoy it while you can. After tonight, you'll have to do without till the end of term. Your new Head of House is considerably more competent than your last, and he despises rule breaking."

"You couldn't have a word with him?"

"I could" Voldemort agreed, "But I wouldn't over something so trivial. Plus it will arouse his suspicions, and he's already suspicious enough as it is. Your role here requires discretion."

Tom tilted his head in acknowledgment, and took another, slower, sip.

"I met him," he said, once the flavor had faded, "He found me on the train almost immediately. I wonder if he sensed his own magic in me."

"I hope not. With a body of your own to anchor your magic, his should have faded until only yours remained." Then the elder wizard smirked. "Unless you're keeping some? A little memento from your 'mother'."

Tom gave him a smirk of his own.

"Why not? 'Mother's milk' made me grow tall and strong. His drawings provided me the comfort of the world that his juvenile thoughts could not, until his passion finally gave his words enough power to give me form. He has the length and breadth of my affections, and the depth of my gratitude.”

This sentiment seemed to irritate the Dark Lord. It was no wonder, he thought to himself, that I would splice this particular section of my soul into something as sentimental as a diary.

“Do not get too attached. Young Mr. Potter’s future will take him beyond the walls of Hogwarts, and out of your reach. I have great plans for him.”

“And who am I to get in the way of such plans?”

The irony of that statement was not lost on Voldemort.

“Don’t get cheeky, little brother. I freed you for a purpose. One which you have already agreed to fulfill. With Britain’s government stabilized and measures for expansion under way, I will not be able to oversee Hogwarts to the extent I would like. Lestranger’s absolute loyalty is the only thing that makes her increasing incompetence tolerable, and Snape’s great competence is the only reason I allow him authority which requires absolute loyalty. Only you can I entrust to watch the school and its occupants in my absence. And I am willing to grant you those positions you desire in exchange for your assistance...and your compliance.”

And what if I want more? Tom thought, but did not say. He had tried his counterpart's patience far enough. If he were to ask for more now, then the man would kill him. It was as simple or not so simple as that.

[illegible]

Chapter 25: The Ogre

Second year started in a manner exactly the opposite of the way first year had started for Harry. For one thing, everyone seemed quite glad to see him. For another, Harry had a family again, albeit an odd one in the form of two werewolf godfathers who were convicted of treason. And lastly, Hermione Granger of the Malfoy's was actually dreading a class.

"You don't understand," Hermione tried to explain at Monday breakfast, "He's a monster. He shouldn't be allowed anywhere near children, women, animals, or anyone without advanced knowledge of defensive magic."

"So then how'd he get hired?" Clyde asked, looking less than impressed with Hermione's description so far. "There's got to be some sort of standard."

She shook her head.

"Most of the truly awful things he done were under the authorization of the Court, so he doesn't have a criminal record. Plus, he's a former Death Eater. That gives him a lot of push and shove in the system. Chances are he bribed Lestrangle and together they bullied the school board to hiring him."

Harry was only half listening. He had the feeling he was being watched. This wasn't an unusual feeling lately, but the uneasy tingle at the base of his neck was. Discreetly, he tried to determine the source. Ron was his first suspect, but the redhead was too busy shoving eggs into his mouth to bother with Harry. Following the line of Slytherins, he inevitably found Tom. The older boy seemed to be doing well for himself, chatting up several other fifth years as if he'd known them since their first. After a moment, Tom glanced his way as if sensing him, and he moved along to study the teacher's table. Voldemort was absent, as was Lestrangle. Snape was glowering at a couple of Hufflepuffs. Beside him, however, was McNair.

And he was looking right at him.

Geh.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

They had all of first period Herbology to prepare themselves for DA&D, but it wasn't enough. When they got to the second period class, they found the room transformed. All the windows had been closed, and the only light was a series of faerie lights floating about the room. There weren't enough, and the entire room was thrown into shadows and strange looming shapes. More than one student had to cast a Lumos charm to find a seat without hurting themselves.

Despite the gloom, those Gryffindors who hadn't been warned seemed positively chipper, hoping for a teacher with a little more passion for the subject than their last. Most of the Slytherins seemed to know better. They didn't appear as apprehensive as Hermione, but they were tense and Draco favored sitting beside Hermione for once instead of with his House mates. Harry took up her other side and kept his wand in his lap, wishing he's worn the arm guards with the pop latch for his wand Sirius had given him.

The time for classes came and went, but their teacher did not appear. Hermione didn't looked relieved at all, and when Harry turned to her she hushed him with her finger and shook her head. Minutes passed and the students became increasingly restless. The more time that passed the more impatient they became, until they were muttering mutiny.

"This is bullocks," muttered Seamus Finnigan. "If he's not going to show, why do we have to stay? I'm going to fall asleep soon if someone doesn't turn the bloody lights on."

"If he's not here in five minutes I'm going to leave," bragged Ron Weasley.

This was the general talk for the next five minutes, after which everyone looked towards Ron expectantly. The redhead shifted uncomfortably under their combined expectation, and finally stood and made his way to the door.

He gave them all a contemptuous sneer and grabbed the door nob. Then he stopped. Slowly, he let go of the door and lifted his hand to look at it. He stared at it, seemingly mesmerized, for a moment before he started to scream.

“Get them off! Get them off!”

Ron was now smacking his hand against his robes, becoming increasingly frantic. Hermione and Draco came to his side. Calling forth a Lumos charm, they inspected his trembling hand but there was nothing there but clean flesh over bone.

“Get them off!” Ron kept crying, “Bloody hell, they’re climbing up my arm!”

“There’s nothing there,” Draco insisted.

“I can feel them!”

“It’s only a spell, you need to calm down,” Hermione said, her mind reeling with possible curses and counter curses.

“Fuck you, you bloody cow! Just get them OFF!”

“What do you see, Weasley? What’s crawling up your arm?” Draco demanded.

“Spiders! Hundred and thousands of spiders.”

“Aracnisortia?” Draco suggested to Hermione.

“No, that summons actual spiders. He’s only hallucinating them. It’s an illusion spell, I think... I don’t know. I don’t know!”

“Well, there’s a first time for everything,” Natalie said at her desk, looking vaguely amused. It was no secret that she loathed Ron Weasley (the feeling was mutual), and a little freak out was no reason for alarm in her opinion.

Draco suddenly looked thoughtful. "I wonder... Crabbe, go look for a teacher."

The beefy Slytherins who had been chuckling stupidly during the entire event, did as he was told. Hermione was about to protest, but Draco covered her mouth with his hand. The moment Crabbe touched the door, he let out a surprised yelp that soon became full out screaming.

"Stop looking at me! Go away!"

He kicked and stomped at the floor.

"Is it spiders?" Draco asked, finally releasing Hermione.

"No, it's eyes! Eyeballs everywhere!"

"Draco, come on! They're starting to spread!" Ron pleaded, nearing hysterics.

"Keep your mouth shut, Weasley," the blonde Slytherin hissed, "Or they'll get in your mouth. It's a type of fear curse, not a illusion curse. Phobius Nostica!"

Ron stopped flailing and Crabbe followed soon after, looking around themselves in growing relief.

Someone started clapping from the other side of the room. The windows suddenly burst open, flooding the room in light and blinding everyone. The clapping continued, moving about the room until it was at the very front. A deep, gravelly voice began to speak.

"Well done, Mr. Malfoy. Not only were you able to determine the sort of curse, you knew the counter curse while under pressure. Twenty points to Slytherins. And you, Ms. Granger..." His voice was suddenly contemptuous. "Flailing about like a fool and throwing out random assumptions. You're counter curses for hallucination curses or Aracnisortia would have only made things worse. Thirty points from Gryffindor!"

Harry could still only see vague shapes, but it was enough to see his friend was ashamed. He seriously wanted to point out that Draco's first suggestion had been wrong and only Hermione's correction had prevented him from casting the wrong counter-curse. Additionally, Crabbe was beyond stupid to touch the door and Ron hadn't exactly been helping himself. No one else in the entirety of the room (and reluctantly he admitted that included himself) had any idea what to do, so why was he picking on her for trying? What was the point of this whole fiasco?

"Now get back to your seats, I have a lecture to give. Not there, Granger! You obviously need extra attention. You're sitting up front."

The students started to return to their seats and rearrange themselves, and Harry used the confusion to move his seat beside her again. His vision was now mostly clear and he could get a better look at Hermione. She was sitting stiffly, focused on not crying or ducking her head in humiliation. He wanted so badly to comfort her, but he didn't dare bring down another wave of McNair's scorn.

It was all for not.

"Potter! What is the name of the curse I placed on the door?"

"I do not know, professor."

"I thought you were the school's shining new star? Surely, you know something so simple?"

The man's mouth was filled with sarcasm, and as he leaned in close to sneer, Harry could see it was full of rotten teeth as well. Harry eyed him cautiously, his hand tightening on his wand.

"No, I'm afraid not, professor."

The man gave him a rotten grin.

“Well, we can’t have that, now can we? A two foot long essay on The Phobia Curse due by Wednesday, Potter.”

The man turned stalked back to the front of the classroom, and Harry hoped that the worst was over. No such luck. There was very brief, very rude introduction by McNair, who basically stated he was the government’s torture expert and if they didn’t do well in the class they were soon going to understand what that meant. There was no syllabus or assigned reading. If you came to class and didn’t automatically know what he wanted than it was going to be on your head. The one foolish Slytherin who said it was unfair got detention for a week.

And then there was the lecture. The very least that could be said was that the man knew his material. He went into curses in great detail. He seemed particularly fond of the Bludgeoning curse (self explanatory) and the Internal Fire curse (which melted one’s insides without touching the skin), and had a whole series of visual aids to demonstrate to the entire class. When everyone was finally released, it was with no homework, but a promise of practical application that Wednesday.

In a very subdued manner, everyone made their way to the dungeons for third period Potions. Snape’s usually intimidating presence was positively tame in comparison with McNair’s, and he seemed none too pleased with their lack of fear. He was even less pleased when the blubber worms they were to be slicing for their potions resulted in over half the class vomiting into their cauldrons (if they were lucky) and the other half unable to even attempt to poke at the slimy creatures that rather resembled one of the illustrations of McNair’s lecture.

Harry (who had removed his glasses during DA&D to avoid traumatizing himself after the first three or four illustrations), Hermione, and Draco (who had both wisely avoided eating at breakfast) were of the few the had managed not to vomit and at least attempted to dice their worms. They were held in class after the Potion’s Master banished everyone from the room to complete the class on Saturday morning.

“What is going on? Is there some sort of contagion going around? Have the Weasley’s been giving you candy?” the man demanded.

The three students shared an uneasy look. None of them were certain if they should say anything. McNair was a teacher and a former Slytherin, and Snape hardly seemed the type to hold terrorizing students against someone. But Harry was feeling bad for not being able to help Hermione, and if there was anyone who might actually have the compulsion and the power to protect her than it would be her godfather. He looked the man directly in the eye... an invitation that would not force him to reaccount Hermione’s humiliation in front of her.

Snape took him up on the offer, and Harry felt his presence slither around his mind. He tried to call up the events of a mere two hours before, but his thoughts jumped about randomly until the master legilimens managed to pin down the ones he wanted.

His expression turned positively evil.

The Potion’s Master stalked away from them, Hermione and Draco baffled over what had overcome their godfather. The man stalked into on the of the back rooms and a moment later he returned, wearing a completely different set. Unlike his crisply pressed teaching robes, these new robes were layered in plates of stiff leather similar to protective gear under Harry’s Quidditch robes. Somehow Harry didn’t think the man was going to go play Quidditch.

“The three of you return to your common rooms until lunch,” he commanded, and then disappeared again.

“What’s happening?” Harry asked, looking to the two siblings. They were sharing a worried, although hopeful look. Then Draco actually smirked.

“I think our godfather’s gone to straighten out McNair, personally.”

“Oh, no, this is bad. He could get fired for this!” she said, beginning to pace. “Lestrangle will use this as an excuse to sack him for sure!”

“Don’t get your knickers in a twist,” Draco said, still smirking. “There’s no way she can fire Severus with out You-Know-Who’s go ahead, and there’s no way he’ll side against Severus over McNair. He’s been on the outs with the Dark Lord since he started questioning his muggleborn policies. Father says its only a matter of time before McNair’s given to the werewolves, and Greyback will kill him for sure. They’ve been trying to kill each other for decades.”

“That’s all well and good, Draco, but Voldemort’s not here. He’s organizing some new project down in Bristol.”

Draco just shrugged, unconcerned.

Harry placed a comforting hand on her shoulder.

“Hey, don’t worry about it. Snape’s a Slytherin. He wouldn’t do something rash. I bet he’s come up with at least half a dozen ways to blame the whole thing on Lestrage, McNair, or me.”

She smiled a little at that, but soon went back to fretting.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McNair and Snape were absent from lunch. So were many of the first year Ravenclaws and Hufflepuffs who took DA&D first period, and the second year Slytherins and Gryffindors. Those third year students who had the already infamous class reported it as extremely boring, as they’d been forced to read their books through the entire period while their teacher sat glowering at everything from his desk.

“What do you think Snape did to him?” Harry wondered out loud. “Do you think it’s Imperius?”

Hermione shook her head. “Who knows? Regardless, this can’t go on forever. We won’t learn anything.”

“At least we’ll still be alive. Besides, Snape’s starting that Dueling Club, remember? I bet we’ll learn lots of stuff... lots of painful, humiliating fun will be had by all... all Slytherins at least. Cheer up.”

He went on to distract her with absurd speculations about their other classes. Would McGonagall teach them how to transfigure people into furniture? Would Toure make them read Merlin's chronicles... all two thousand pages of it? Could Snape brew a potion that let him go without sleeping for a week? It wasn't long before she was pointing out the implausibility of such things and then going to full out lecture mode. The more she talked the less she worried and the less depressed she seemed. It was what Harry wanted; for Hermione to realize that, despite McNair's hurtful words and her own moment of ignorance, she was smart and competent and a good witch.

He was even willing to sit through her endless monologues to achieve that.

"Excuse me."

They both turned to see Tom standing behind them, a book in one hand.

"I apologize for the interruption, but I was wondering if I might borrow Potter for a moment?"

"Oh, of course," Hermione said, and turning back to her friend she smiled, "Thanks Harry. I needed that."

He blushed, knowing she'd seen right through him. Escaping to the corridor just outside the Great Hall, he and Tom found a place to speak in relative privacy. Harry had to admit he was surprised the Slytherin had sought him out. Even though Slytherins tended to overlook him being a Gryffindor (except during Quidditch matches of course), they rarely overlooked that he was still a kid. Aside from Morgenson and Whitehall's attempted murder, few of the older students wanted anything to do with him, and was Tom already becoming so popular he had assumed he would follow that trend. After all, what could he possibly have in common with a muggle-raised Gryffindor three years his junior?

"I heard some of the second years talking about your Dark Arts class this morning," Tom said, "They said he took a lot of points from the other Gryffindors, but only assigned you an essay."

Harry frowned.

"Yeah, a two foot essay due on Wednesday."

"Do you know why he did that?" It didn't sound like a question, but an expectation. Harry wasn't sure what he wanted, so he just shook his head.

"Students receive a tally in their school records for the number of points earned and lost and from what classes. He didn't deduct points because he knows you have the Dark Lord's favor, and if he deducts too many points than he will be seen as tormenting you. Essays won't go into your record and he can assign as many of those as he wants, tormenting you that way."

Harry hadn't thought of that. It actually seemed pretty absurd. Why would the Dark Lord be interested in his student file? Of course, logically, the man shouldn't have any interest in him at all. Damn parselmouth ability. Damn Nagini.

He sighed.

"It doesn't matter. House points or essays or detentions, the man is a sadist and he'll find a way to torment me along with everyone else."

"You could always tell the Dark Lord," Tom pointed out.

"No way. I'm not going to go running to the dictator of Wizarding Britain every time someone is mean to me. Half the school will be dead by the end of term. I can handle this on my own."

The elder boy smirked and handed him a book.

"This is from my personal library. I book marked the section on the Phobia Curse. It should help you on your essay."

“Oh, thank you, but... Isn't it valuable? It looks really old.”

“Don't worry, I have plenty of protection and preservation spells on it. It was just sitting in my trunk getting dusty anyway.”

Harry ran his fingers over the aged leather binding, feeling and smelling the age of it. It was well over three hundred years old. He looked up to find Tom smiling at him with some amusement, and he was struck with this intense feeling of déjà vu. He had seen that exact expression somewhere before, and though he couldn't remember where exactly he knew it hadn't been from someone he trusted.

“Tom, why are you being so nice to me? I don't have anything against Slytherins in particular, but I know their relationships outside of family are always more practical than friendly.”

Tom blink, then smiled sheepishly. It was cute, and Harry knew it was fake, but couldn't help but be charmed nonetheless.

“You're right, Harry, I am very much a Slytherin. I do not befriend just anyone, and having said that I think you should understand that you are not just anyone. You have a destiny. I have one too. When our fates intertwine, and they inevitably will, I would not have it be as enemies. I rather like you after all.”

With that, Tom gave him a friendly pat on the shoulder and wandered back to the Great Hall. Harry stood in the corridor, staring dumbly at the door. He looked down at the book, opening it to the marked page. Sure enough there was six pages worth of material on the Phobia Curse. More than enough to complete his essay. He shook his head and smiled.

“Slytherins.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

That evening, Severus was just freshening up for dinner in his private quarters when Bellatrix showed up at his door. The tone of the wards she set off suggested she was irritated. He took his time answering the door, noting with some amusement that the longer he delayed the more beautifully the flutish sound became.

He finally allowed her entrance, and she stormed in. She was ready to rage at him and threaten him and tell him he was fired, but the tea set placed on the coffee table made her pause. There were two cups set out.

She gave her rival an assessing glare, but he ignored her in favor of making himself comfortable in one of the sitting chairs.

"Would you like some tea, Bella? It's almost as black as your heart, just how you like it," he offered. She sneered, but took a seat across from him. For all her anger at him, she had not come here to cross wands, and when it came to wit he would always outmatch her. The pretense of civility was necessary for the games they played.

"No thank you, Severus. I do not intend to stay long. I trust you know why I am here?"

"I imagine it has something to do with McNair's brief stint through the hospital wing. How's his kidney, by the way? I admit I got carried away with that particular curse."

"Still turned to stone last I checked. That silly medi-witch is such a fool when it comes to such curses. He managed to finish the school day, though he wasn't much use to the students."

"Madam, his deficits as a teacher ensured that before I ever sent a curse at him. Are you aware of his curriculum?"

"Of course, I am. I reviewed his syllabus myself. It was perhaps a little ambitious, but after Quirrel I thought that would be a welcome change of pace. Why, Severus? Have our little darlings come whining to you about their big mean teacher? How dare he make them think?! How dare he make them work?!"

"How dare he send them on to my class incapable of brewing a simple potion without vomiting? Either you're as inept at judging suitable class subjects as you are teachers or the old ghoul lied to you. Regardless, once again you've left me to handle your mess."

Bellatrix stared at him, stunned. Never before had he dared to talk to her in such a blatantly disrespectful manner. Not since she'd become headmistress at least.

"Why you impudent little grease spot. I should have you flogged and thrown into the moat," she hissed. Severus lifted an amused brow.

"No doubt you'll join me there shortly after. Oh, Bella, I don't know what McNair gave you or what he promised or what he has on you, but you never should have let him into the school. After all your mistakes with Potter last year, our Lord already sees you as a fool and now in your incompetence you hire a man not only unsuited to the position, but also in disfavor."

"McNair was a loyal and dedicated warrior during the war-"

Severus knew he had just won the battle. The moment she had gone on the defense, she had lost perspective on his mistakes. He could easily have been reported and punished for attacking McNair, even temporarily suspended from the school with Voldemort's approval. The Dark Lord may hate McNair, but he deplored lack of self control even more. And that was what had happened with Severus.

He had seen in Potter's mind the emotional violation of his goddaughter and then the unforgivable mutilation of knowledge. The disgusting neophyte introduced the Dark Arts as some sort of torture device, required only for the suffering and pain it inflicted. He neglected totally the discipline, the medical benefits, the protection, and the beauty of the material. If the man continued to infect the students with his notion of the subject they would grow up with a deep spiritual aversion to or twisted concept of it.

And in his anger and indignation, he had adorned his battle robes, unused since the war and had gone to teach him what a man with the true understanding of Dark Arts could do. He had succeeded too. McNair had sworn, under the extreme throws of pain and the promise of worse, to change his teaching technique and he would not so much as glare at his goddaughter again.

He held little hope for the class, but that was why he was holding Dueling Club. Listed as a club, he could not force the students to attend and being who he was he knew he could not compel them with his personality either. But if he could gather enough of them, endue them with the knowledge and appreciation that McNair never could, there would still be some hope for the future of the art at and beyond Hogwarts.

“- and he has extensive practical experience-”

“Bella, just stop. I’m more than willing to overlook McNair’s many failings, if in exchange you allow me some leniency in... mentoring him. He’s a new teacher after all. A few mistakes in the beginning is perfectly understandable.”

She wanted to say no. McNair was her responsibility and she wanted to handle the matter as was her right as headmistress, but in doing so she would have to admit her knowledge of his lack of qualifications. That would give weight to Severus’ accusation of bribery and blackmail. If Voldemort learned of Severus’ increased responsibility with both potions, the Dueling club, and the dark arts class, that would count once again in his favor and in her disfavor. But it was the only option. At least if she gave him what he wanted, Severus was in a position to make a mistake and ruin himself. If she had to help him along with one, she wasn’t going to object.

“Fine. Do what you want, but be discreet. I will not have the students believing their teachers are not united, and attempting to play them against each other. Who told you about McNair in the first place?”

“Someone I know that has experience with discretion. You needn’t know their name. Cheers.”

He relaxed back into his chair, taking a sip of his tea to hide his smile as Bellatrix stormed out of his quarters. He would have to be extra careful from now on, he knew. He was in open war with the headmistress, and though he knew himself her superior in wit and planning, she had the benefit of power and position and popularity. She would try something before the year was through.

There was a familiar and thrilling sense of danger lingering about.

Someone might very well die.

It made him nostalgic.

Chapter 26: The Duel

Wednesday came too soon it seemed. Though none of the other classes spoke of anything more horrifying than some snappish reprimands by McNair and eye strain from reading for too long, Harry and his friends had been promised a practical. Given the curses they'd been studying there was no way the day was going to end well.

"Hurry up and sit down, all of ya ninnies," Professor McNair growled as everyone started crowding in. His beady eyes lingered on Harry and Hermione as they walked in and followed them to their seats. Once everyone was seated and waiting in a tense quiet for the horror to begin, McNair spoke again. "Potter, do you have that essay?"

"Yes, sir."

"And did you understand the material?"

"I think so, sir."

"You think so? Why don't you know so?"

Harry hesitated. "It wasn't something I could practice."

"Not practice? Of course you can practice. This is a wizarding school, you don't learn nothing worth knowing without trying it out. Get up here."

Reluctantly, Harry stood and moved to the front of the class. McNair sneered down at him and then turned back towards the class.

"I'll award ten points to whomever volunteers, regardless of how well the curse is performed."

No one moved.

"Come on, then, fifteen points," McNair said. "Either someone volunteers or I pick someone and they don't get any points."

Hermione shifted in her seat. Draco saw her and stood.

"I'll do it. It's a pretty pathetic curse, as such things go," he said, smirking arrogantly at the rest of the class.

"Good lad, Malfoy. Fifteen points to Slytherin. Stand in front of the door. Now, Potter, show us what you learned."

Harry looked at Draco, asking permission with his eyes. The blond boy's arrogant expression didn't falter, but as Harry raised his wand he did tense. It was enough for Harry.

"I'm sorry, Professor, I can't seem to remember the wand movement."

McNair smiled nastily, and Harry knew he was in for it now. His only consolation was that what ever happened to him wasn't going to hurt Gryffindor. Tom had already explained that the foul man wouldn't have house points from him (at least not a significant amount at once). For someone with only a vague sense of loyalty to his own House, this was a very small comfort.

"I'll demonstrate it to you, Potter. Via phobius!"

Harry tensed, but nothing seemed to happen. Nothing jumped out at him. There were not creepy-crawlies or monsters stalking towards him. He wondered if the man had been playing a trick on him or even managed to fail his own spell. He turned a questioning glance towards Hermione.

She was gone.

Confused, he searched the room. She was not there. And neither were the others.

Natalie and Clyde were no where to be seen. He turned to the door, but Draco was gone too. The class was now dappled with empty seats where once his friends had sat. They were gone and all that was left was room of full of cold stares and malicious delight.

He was alone.

Again.

His breathing became rapid. He searched the tables where he'd seen them last, looking for evidence of their existence, but their bags and their books and pens were all gone. Or perhaps they'd never been there? Had he made them up? Had they all been the dream of a lonely mind?

"He asked you a question," McNair said, his voice mocking. His presence brought Harry back to the solidity of the moment.

"Who?"

"Malfoy, you clod. Pay attention when someone is speaking to you!"

The moment was solid, and McNair's mockery had inadvertently made the past solid as well. Malfoy existed. Everyone else had to have existed as well. This was only a curse. A pathetic curse. Isn't that what Draco had said? Speaking of what Draco had said-

"Phobius nistica!"

Before his eyes, his friends reappeared, staring anxiously at him. He wondered what he looked like to them. His breath still wasn't quite normal and his hands felt clammy. A chill lingered in his arms and spine. He wonder if this was what it felt like to stand before a dementor.

"Good to see you remembered something, Potter."

And McNair seemed pretty disgruntled over that.

He was still a bit disconcerted, so Draco grabbing him firmly by the arm and totting him back towards his chair was more helpful than annoying at the moment.

"Bloody hell, what did you see? Most people freak out like Weasley. You just stood there like your soul had been sucked out of you."

Again Harry was reminded of dementors. Perhaps that's what he should say he saw. The truth... the truth was not his friend in this room. From the corner of his eye he could make out their grungy professor glowering at him. He tilted his head a bit so the man could see his mouth moving, even if he couldn't hear his words.

"Snakes."

Draco gave him a disbelieving look. Then rolled his eyes.

"So that's why you're not really in Slytherin," he muttered. "God, that's just pathetic."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

After that, the class became exceptionally boring and no one could have been happier (except perhaps McNair). They spent the rest of the class reading out of their books. They were expected to write a twelve foot mid term paper on some aspect of the Dark Arts and their first proposal was due Friday. Hermione managed to spark a bit of her old enthusiasm and was already writing down ideas. Still feeling a bit depressed from the curse, Harry flipped through the pages and stared at the pictures (considerably less graphic than McNair's private collection).

After class, Draco gave him a chocolate frog.

"What? No flowers?"

"Stuff it, Potter. It will help with the curse's after affects. A sulky Gryffindor is almost as bad as a lovesick Hufflepuff."

It did help. Draco's solid punch to his arm, a powerful (albeit painful) proof of his existence, helped more. Hermione watched the exchange closely, but let him finish his chocolate in peace.

No one got sick in potions, although Nott spilled his hair growth potion on Crabbe and made his feet look like an angora rabbits. They were once again reminded they still had a class to make up that Saturday morning as well as a potion's essay. So groaning and muttering, they made their way up to lunch. Snape caught his attention on the way out, interrogating him with his dark eyes alone. Harry avoided his gaze, shrugged and walked off. Let the man interpret that as he would. He wasn't going to let him stalk around his head like it was his classroom.

He might have been safely out of Snape's reach, but Hermione was a different matter. As soon as her brother and their class mates were ahead of them, she pulled him quietly into an empty classroom and cast a silencing charm on the door.

She held him with a dark look and demanded, "Spill it."

Harry just blinked at her stupidly.

"The truth, Harry. For once, just tell me the truth."

"Um... I don't..."

"Stop. You've been keeping secrets since we've known each other. I can tell, you know. You get this flippant attitude whenever you're lying."

Oops. He dropped his gaze. He had many, many secrets. As time passed he had collected more and more, an ever growing collection. There was no doubt in his mind that it would only continue to grow.

He wanted to tell her so many of them. But she had said it herself:

"For both our sakes, be careful what you say."

Now Hermione was caught off guard. "What?"

"Don't you remember? On my eleventh birthday, when I carelessly said things you told me that."

"I... yes, I remember."

He looked her squarely in the eye.

“Every lie I ever told you was to protect you. I swear.”

She was quiet for a moment.

“Even about what you saw today?”

“Oh, that. I didn’t lie to you, I lied to Draco. A completely different matter, altogether.”

She rolled her eyes.

“I figured. So what did you really see?”

“...Do I really have to tell you that? I mean... it’s kind of personal.”

“Well, it felt kind of personal when you kept looking at me during that spell as if I had somehow betrayed you.”

“What? No, no that wasn’t what I saw. I’ve never even considered that you’d betray me.”

“Then what was it, Harry? Please, tell me. I don’t ever want to see that look on your face again.”

“... You were gone.”

She looked confused.

“You had disappeared. Well, not just you. Clyde. Natalie. Draco. You all just vanished as if you’d never been there. For a moment, I thought you really hadn’t ever existed. I thought I was alone again.”

He’d been looking at his shoes as he explained, feeling so stupid but unwilling to give her yet another lie. Her arms were around him suddenly, hugging him tightly.

“I keep forgetting,” she said softly. “You’re always so brave, I keep forgetting how alike we are.”

His eyes felt suddenly wet, so before he made a total fool of himself he pulled away from her. He shuffled around a bit, mentally searching for something to distract them both from his sudden vulnerability.

"There's something else. Something I've never willingly told anyone."

"Is this about your kidnapping?" she asked, her look knowing. "If it is, I know that you were threatened to keep silent about the truth."

"What? How did you-?"

"Well, aside from being entirely too flippant about being kidnapped and probably beaten, there were some inconsistencies with your story."

"Inconsistencies? All I ever said was 'I don't know, I was confused' or 'It's still under investigation'. Where did you find inconsistencies in that?"

"Well the first clue didn't come from you, but from my godfather. I heard from some Hufflepuffs that he stormed out of class for seemingly no reason and then didn't return until the next period. What could have possibly sent him off in such a hurry that day except for your return? And then, if you'd been found the night before and scheduled to return like you said later, why was he acting as if you'd come so unexpectedly? Why didn't he tell Draco or me about you being found before?"

"The next clues came when we spoke before the rest of the school knew you were back. You told me that Madam Pomfrey had given you a very thorough check-up already, but then told the reporters that you'd been taken to St. Mungo's just before being brought back to Hogwarts. Why would you have gone to Madam Pomfrey if you'd already been to St. Mungo's? For that matter, if you had been to either Madam Pomfrey or St. Mungo's, why would you have a bruise around your neck when we spoke to you?"

"What bruise? I didn't have-"

Oh. Voldemort had grabbed his neck after he'd tried to get the dark wizard to stop torturing Whitehall and Morgenson. He hadn't even thought about. It probably wouldn't even have shown up until after he'd left the office so no one else had thought to hide it. His shirt collar would have covered it most of the time, except of course during study hall when he loosened his tie to get more comfortable. A study hall where he sat directly across from the most observant girl in the school.

"I figured something happened and Lestrage or Voldemort didn't want any one to know the truth so they came up with that little fairy tale and threatened you to keep quiet."

Harry let out a huff.

"Yes, you're right about all of that. And I still can't tell you what really happened. If Voldemort didn't kill you, Snape would kill me. I'm rather fond of the both of us, so I hope you don't mind?"

She made a dismissive gesture.

"Good, because that wasn't the secret I was talking about. I'm a parselmouth."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Hermione snapped her third quill that day. Beside her, Harry glanced cautiously in her direction. She ignored him in favor of looking for another quill. If she had looked at him, he might have spontaneously combusted.

Never had she been so angry with him.

This said quite a bit about how angry she was, for despite her usual calm reserve she was angry with him a lot. He was brave and kind and she loved him like a second brother, but he was also secretive, stubbornly proud, and short tempered. She had many of the same short comings, so bickering wasn't uncommon. They had their fair share of spats, and even more arguments left unsaid. Affection and friendship endured through a mutual understanding of their pasts, a deep love of magic, and an implicit trust of the other.

But he hadn't trusted her.

For over a year he had been keeping this incredible secret, one that so easily could have been shared and explored together. Why? She still didn't understand. He hadn't been able to explain. He seemed ashamed some how. Was it because he had lied to her, even if it was merely a lie of omission?

Or perhaps he thought she would feel ashamed?

Did he think that because he had this prestigious talent that she wouldn't think herself good enough to hang out with him?

Alright, that sounded a bit convoluted, even to her. The chances were she was angry at him for entirely the wrong reasons. It was his secret, and it was not imperative that she know it immediately. One day or one year, he had still told her when he didn't have to.

She tried to tell herself to just let it drop. He hadn't really done anything wrong.

She made a cursory glance at her lying friend, muttering under his breath the charm of the day and wondered if that wasn't a little bit of hissing she heard...

Hermione snapped her fourth quill that day.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom discretely cast his gaze across the Great Hall to the Gryffindor table. He found Harry almost immediately, and was pleased to note that the earlier gossip seemed accurate. Harry was still fighting with Granger. The boy was sulking over lunch, while the girl resolutely ignored him and everyone else.

That was good.

Let her withdraw from Harry on her own, and perhaps he wouldn't have to do anything too... drastic. Once she left him, her brother and his friends would soon follow suit. Harry should never have been associating with such filth to begin with. Malfoy was tolerable, but his weakness for his mudblooded sister and friends made him unsuitable company. No, the only company Harry would require was his. Without the others, the boy would inevitably turn to him- they always did, after all- and he would guide him to more appropriate company and activities..

Voldemort had been right. He was the only one who could be entrusted to safe guard the school, and protect the child who had become his 'mother'. He knew so little about Harry, but he knew he was destined for great things. There was just something about him. A mysterious intensity to the way he lived. A resolve directed at the world he only half understood. It was everything that had been absent in what he knew of Merope, that stupid weak cow who had sullied him since his conception with her love of a disgusting muggle.

He hadn't lied to his counterpart. He felt both deep affection and gratitude towards Harry. The child, though of mixed origins, was pure in the way of magic, allowing for Tom's own rebirth to be what it never was with Europa.

Beautiful.

Joyous.

Blessed.

So he would protect Harry. He would make him great. He would love him as best he knew how, like any grateful son should. And if those around the child had to suffer to make it so, well... no one could say he had any aversion to the suffering of others.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

By Thursday, Hermione was actually looking at him. This was an improvement from Wednesday, when she not. Harry took it as a sign that she was coming around, but he did wish she would come around a bit faster. Draco kept giving him the evil eye and Natalie was teasing them both horribly. Clyde didn't seem to notice, but he had developed a sudden crush on Catherine Wicket, a new first year Hufflepuff, and wasn't noticing much of anything.

When it was finally time to attend Snape's Dueling Club, he felt like he was going to battle without a single ally in sight.

The Dueling Club was held in a large chamber that took up a quarter of the third floor of the Western wing. There were windows on either side, and most of the place was illuminated with natural afternoon light. One end of the chamber was taken up by a large 'I' shaped platform from which individual duels and demonstrations would be held. The other end on the west side held a series of human shaped dummies, standing straight and ready for hexes and curses. The east side was covered in mats, some were shaped like the 'I' platform, but mostly a wide range of sizes and shapes.

By the dueling platform, Professor Snape stood waiting for all the perspective students to arrive. His dark robes closely resembled the set Harry had seen the man wear just before he'd gone to face McNair, but there was less armoring and the leather looked less stiff. Still, he made for an intimidating sight. If everyone else weren't similarly dressed as Harry, the young Gryffindor would have thought himself rather silly looking in comparison.

There were not many students. This was the junior Dueling Club so only first through fourth years attended on Thursday, but with only thirty members out of more than two hundred and fifty students it clearly wasn't going to be the most popular place to be after classes. Almost half the members were Slytherins, another quarter being Ravensclaws, and the rest were Hufflepuffs and Harry, Hermione, a very reluctant looking Clyde, and Ginny who was looking as if she expected to be thrown out at any moment.

Swell.

Snape didn't look pleased with the turnout, but neither did he look surprised. He didn't bother waiting past the appointed meeting time for stragglers.

"Welcome to Dueling Club, ladies and gentlemen. Let me take a moment to applaud your decision to supplement your education. You will find in due time that it was a wise and lucrative choice."

Harry assumed Snape was addressing his Slytherins when he said this, possibly Hermione too, and didn't put much weight in the wizard's assurance. But he wouldn't quit. Not yet anyway. Snape was offering something he had been unable to find in the apathetic Quirrel, and perhaps too much of in McNair.

He offered power.

Now Harry never thought of himself as power-hungry person. He was more than content to live his life without lording over others, but at the same time he could not tolerate the idea of anyone lording over him. And too many people were deciding his actions against his will. Voldemort. Snape. McNair. WYRA. Whitehall and Morgenson. There were others, less dangerous at the moment or perhaps not yet introduced, that would attempt to hurt him or manipulate him.

He would never be able to defeat them all. He would likely bend long before he broke. Or perhaps he would just die. However, the more powerful he became the fewer there would be who could hurt or control him, and the less twisted he would become.

He hoped so anyway.

His parents hadn't held much respect for power. Having survived a war with one of the most powerful wizards in the world, Harry supposed they had good reasons for this.

"I will not only be supplementing your knowledge of DA&D, but will also provide you with basic medical skills to assist you or your comrades after an attack. These skills will likely prove more value than any hex or curse, as they are applicable to both peaceful and dangerous situations."

From there, Snape went on to outline what exactly they would be doing. It was a lot more than Harry had counted on. It turned out hexing and cursing made up only about half of what they would actually be practicing. There would be the medical training Snape mentioned, but also basic training with traditional styles of weaponry (a sort of pre-fencing club since you had to be at least a fourth year to join), basic occlumency (although not legilimency), form and decorum, and equipment design and maintenance. Then Snape led them around the training area, pointing out the purposes of oddly shaped mats, the dummies, and the large storage closet they hadn't noticed. He laid down safety procedures, the consequences of ignoring these procedures, rules, responsibilities, and chores.

Then things started to get fun. He had them each pick out a dummy and inscribe their names on it. He introduced a set of spells to protect the dummy, to strengthen it, to keep others from touching it, and to repair the slight damages it would accumulate over repeated use. They would each be held responsible for the care of their own dummy, and if it was damaged because of neglect they would have to make a new one from scratch to replace it. Harry named his Rolf.

Then they were marched to the supply closet where they set about putting together their dueling uniforms. They all came in a range of styles and colors and sizes, and they all had a heck of a time figuring out what would fit, what one was willing to wear (Draco was the perfect fit for canary yellow padding but traded it for a slightly oversized dark blue to go with his dark grey leather armor), and how to put it all on.

Harry got through it with beige padding and dark brown armor, and considered himself lucky. Hermione in a black and red checkered padding and black armor, looking rather devilish. Ron was stuck in the yellow padding with white armor and looked completely absurd. Ginny, being the smallest one there, was stuck with the pink armor and white padding. She looked about as threatening as the Easter bunny.

“You may, and likely will, purchase or create your own dueling robes, but you must have them approved by me first. Shoddy workmanship will cost you more than a split seam here.”

Harry thought immediately of his arm guards in his trunk. They were softer, stronger, and a better fit than the ones he had on and had the added bonus of a wand holder. Could he perhaps convince his godfather to make him a complete set of armor?

There were some additional instructions on the care of their armor and more spells for their upkeep. By the time they were done with the orientation almost two hours had passed.

“That will be all for today,” Snape said finally, “Place your armor on your dummies before you go and cast a cleaning charm on them. Next Thursday, I will introduce you to dueling etiquette, basic dueling form, and some common disarming spells. I expect you all to be dressed and ready before we begin. Dismissed.”

As they did as they were instructed, all of them chatted excitedly. Even the Gryffindors and Hufflepuffs who had only reluctantly decided to accept more of Snape in their lives were delightfully surprised. The man hadn’t snapped or insulted them once, and seemed genuinely interested in them learning what he was teaching.

“I’m so glad I decided to come,” Ginny said, placing her robes on her dummy beside Harry and ‘Rolf’. “Everyone was saying Snape would be just like he was in potions and we’d only be learning those awful things Professor McNair teaches, but it’s really different, isn’t it? Professor Snape wasn’t that bad at all.”

Harry grinned. “If that was all that you heard about it, then why did you come? It wasn’t exactly a rousing endorsement.”

She blushed and floundered a bit for a reply.

“Oh, just... well, you know... all my brothers are joining, I didn’t want to be the only one who chickened out.”

“Well, I’m glad you came. We’ll need as many Gryffindors as we can get to keep the Slytherins in line. I’m told they were insufferably arrogant before they started losing Quidditch matches. I can’t imagine this will be any different.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Next Thursday, Hermione was talking to him again, albeit in monosyllables. Of course, by that point Harry was irritated enough with her not to care. So he hadn’t told her all his secrets. They were his secrets, after all. He doubted she told him everything about herself either.

They went through the usual motions of their friendship, keeping each other company during classes and study periods, but their usual warmth was cooled and people noticed. There were suddenly a lot more boys flirting with Hermione. If Harry weren’t so irritated with her, he might have noticed a lot more girls (and quite a few boys) were flirting with him as well. He was snappish with anyone who pointed this out to him and scared more than a few students with sudden outburst of German swear words.

He wanted nothing more than to vent his frustrations in a letter to Sirius and Remus, but the realization that he hadn’t told them he was a parselmouth made that impossible. He wasn’t quite ready to tell them that their best friend’s son was anything less than the model Gryffindor his father had been. There was no way he could withstand their rejection like he did Hermione’s. He knew her well enough to know she’d get over it eventually, after all.

After the final class of the day, he dropped off his school things and went to the Dueling Hall with the hope that he would be able to vent his frustrations there. Snape was there alone, vanishing dummies. There were more than there had been last week and some of the extra were clothed in armor, and Harry realized they must have been for the Varsity Dueling Club. Harry counted twenty two and wondered which ones were George and Fred’s.

Snape glanced over at him.

"If you're expecting extra points for being early, I'm pleased to disappoint you. As this is a club and an extracurricular activity, you will not receive any additional points unless it's in a competition."

"And will there be competitions?" Harry asked curiously. He doubted he would do as well in Dueling as he did in Quidditch, but it was worth a shot.

"Maybe," Snape said dismissively, "Why are you here, Potter? We don't start for another half an hour."

"I have nowhere better to be."

"How flattering."

"Hermione's mad at me."

He didn't know why he said it. Snape was not someone he should be laying out his problems to. The man was involved with at least half his problems to begin with. But, perhaps that's why he could say it, for as much as he disliked the older man, he knew almost all his secrets.

Snape snorted. "If she were mad at you, your hair would be falling out and your toenails would have grown through your shoes. Miss Cypher can attest. Likely, she's just irritated."

"Well, she's been irritated for over a week."

"She might just be menstruating. She should be about the right age for that to start."

Harry gave him the most horrified look. He never ever wanted to think about his best friend in those terms. Emphasis on 'NEVER'.

"So what perceived slight have you committed to irritate her?"

More than happy to move on to a subject that didn't point out to him that his best friend was one hundred percent female, he told the truth.

"I told her I was a parselmouth."

"Told her, or she figured it out and you confessed?"

"I told her. I could have said nothing at all, but..."

Snape snorted. "You dug your own hole, you can lay in it."

Typical.

He started to change into his dueling uniform. Snape continued to dismiss the unclothed dummies.

"What if someone else wants to join today?" Harry asked, quickly bored of the silence.

"Then they're out of luck. I will not repeat last Thursday's orientation every time some bored little fool wanders in. They all had their chance and they let it slip by. I will not reward their laziness and cowardice by allowing them to join late and thus hold up the rest of the members. They'll have to wait until next semester."

"That's harsh."

"You should be pleased, Potter. You and your friends have a distinct advantage now. By next semester all of you will far surpass them in knowledge and skill, and it will take them years to catch up if they ever do. You will be among the elite."

Harry rolled his eyes. "I'm not an elitist."

"And yet, it is amongst the elite that you find your company," Snape said, smirking wickedly. Harry wanted to refute that statement, but couldn't. It was true after all. It might not have been intentional, but somehow he had ended up among the creme de la creme of Wizarding Britain. Hogwarts, the finest wizarding school in Britain. Hermione and Draco, children of the Dark Lord's right hand man. And Voldemort himself, peeking over his shoulder and into his head whenever the opportunity arose.

Ugh.

He was spared attempting to find a paltry defense by the arrival of some club members. He finished getting ready, and started chatting with some of the others until Hermione, Draco, and his Slytherin cohorts finally arrived. She favored Harry with an irritated look, and he gave her with one of his own.

Practice started and Snape began by having Draco, who had attended a few dueling tournaments, climb onto the platform and to help demonstrate proper form and etiquette. The rituals were stylized, but Snape explained their very pragmatic origins.

A duelist kept their wandless hand behind their back at all times, unless to catch their balance. Originally, the free hand was tied there to keep a wizard from using an alternative weapon, an extra wand, or even wandless magic.

You saluted, only bowed slightly, and turned your body sideways before facing your opponent, careful to minimize the area of exposure and maintain eye contact for an incoming attack.

The victor never aided the defeated in standing after a match, and always allowed them to walk or be carried off by their second. The second was not allowed to carry a wand onto the platform. Deceit and vengeance were prevented in this manner.

“Many of these rules were re-introduced after the overthrow of the Ministry,” Snape informed them, pacing the length of the platform and watching his students eyes follow him raptly. It had been years since he held such sway over his students. Potions was a delicate and subtle art, unsuited to most wizards until they’d reached the patience and maturity of their thirties and to have to teach it to children with the attention spans of a poodle was beyond frustrating. But here was something that could penetrate their thick skulls. Something they could comprehend and thus strive for with the enthusiasm few would ever have for potions.

Violence.

Ritualistic and socially excepted, but violence none the less.

“Before that, dueling as a sport had been declining in both dignity and honesty for almost fifty years. Hundreds of spells had been banned, year after year, until finally they allowed only a selected list of about a hundred, quelling creativity and study in favor of pandering to the whining of the ungifted masses who were too stupid, too weak, or too uneducated to strive for more than the most common of hexes. Safety rules were added. Then more rules. Every year, every tournament, every match there would be a new rule added until the only way to win was to blame your opponent for some sort of rule violation. The sport went into decline. The true enthusiast went underground, and the honor and prestige of a thousand year old tradition became little more than plebeian death matches in the slums of Knockturn Alley.”

He paused for dramatic effect, watching as even the jaded Potter boy leaned forward just a little to catch his next words.

“The practice has undergone a recent revival, but it is still severely lacking in numbers and experienced duelists. It is my hope that when you graduate Hogwarts you will continue with it outside these walls, and bring a new standard of quality magic and creativity to every match in which you participate.”

There was applause. Snape scowled as his student’s attentions were suddenly diverted away from him and to the two interlopers standing at the door. Headmistress Lestrangle and Professor McNair stood side by side, clapping their hands in open mockery.

“Bravo,” Lestrangle said, “A rousing speech. I felt so moved.”

“Aye, it was that,” McNair agreed. “I don’t think I’ve felt so moved. Makes me long for a good match. It’s been years.”

“It hasn’t been that long,” Snape said pointedly, the reminder making McNair hesitate, if only for a moment.

“Ah, but it does stir the blood. Come now, Professor, why don’t we introduce them to real dueling, eh?”

The potion's master lifted a regal brow. Certainly, McNair wasn't suggesting they duel in front of all these students? Snape would not lose, they both knew it, unless McNair cheated and that wouldn't gain them anything.

"Come on. Bring up a bonnie lad or lass for a demonstration. They'll get a kick out of it."

Snape could not help but reveal a little of his surprise. So this was what Lestrage intended. If something happened here, with these children under his supervision, there would be little mercy shown to him. Especially if the something that happened involved-

"Potter, why don't you come up? You've shown some skills in my class."

Harry blinked stupidly at McNair for a moment, before turning his questioning eyes to Snape. Snape hated it. There was an implicit statement of trust in the gesture. A blind, unconscious belief that the potion's master would not intentionally allow harm to befall him.

But he could not protect the boy... not unless there was a serious threat of permanent injury or death. He'd sworn that he would show no dissension between him and McNair, and blatantly refusing him before their students and the headmistress would break that oath. Promises meant little to him, but treaties were another matter altogether. Break a promise and you lose trust. Break a treaty and you could lose a great deal more.

"I have not yet begun teaching them counter curses-"

"Don't worry so much, Profess'r," McNair said, climbing onto the stage. "He's learned some from last year, no doubt, and I've taught a few myself. I won't use anything too nasty. I promise."

Snape glared daggers at the man, before stalking off the platform.

"Potter, get up there."

Anxious whispering broke out among the students, but it quickly fell silent as Harry steeled himself and moved forward. This was bad, he knew. Voldemort was not in the castle to protect him. Chances were, no matter how badly injured he was, he would be healed by Madam Pomfrey and returned to classes long before the Dark Lord returned.

Fear made his hands shake. Pride made his feet move forward. Anger kept his gaze on McNair. The wizard leered at him, lifting his wand. Harry shifted his stance and raised his wand in salute. McNair jerked up his wand.

“Res-”

“It’s customary to salute a wizard before attacking them, Professor,” Snape interrupted, throwing the other man off completely. McNair glowered down at the man, but raise his wand for the required salute.

“Expeliarmus!”

The disarming spell knocked McNair clean off his feet and very nearly off the platform.

“Potter!” snapped LeStrange.

Harry smiled, hoping it looked apologetic at least. “Sorry, Professor, but since I already saluted I thought I was allowed to start.”

Snickers ran through the watching students, and even Snape’s mouth twitched just a bit.

“I haven’t gone through all the rules with them either,” the potion’s master said, maintaining a straight face, even as some of the snickers broke out into full out laughter.

“Resputia vigi!”

Harry managed to dodge most of the spell, but it brushed against his left arm, tearing through leather and flesh like tissue. There was a moment of shock, followed by a splatter of blood on the platform, and soon after came pain.

“Harry!” someone cried.

“FUCK!”

That really hurt.

Snape turned to the Headmistress, “I think that’s enough for-”

“Espitalitus!” Harry shouted, sending the wind hex flying towards his attacker.

Bellatrix smirked. “He looks ready and willing enough.”

“Sagori malicta!”

The unfamiliar curse tore through Harry’s, hitting him directly and tossing him up in the air like a doll. He landed heavily on his already injured arm and felt the wound tear further. He let out a choked scream, curling over his injured appendage instinctively.

Pain and hatred filled him as he turned his burning green eyes to McNair, finding him raising his wand for yet another curse. It was too late for Harry to realize that despite his obvious defeat, he had not released his wand and by the rules of the sport the match had to continue until one of them lost their wand or fell out of bounds of the platform. McNair sent him a malicious grin.

“Serpentortia!”

From the tip of his wand flew an enormous king cobra. Summoned so violently, it immediately reared up before Harry and flared her hood.

“What’s this? What’s this? I kill you for treating me this way. How dare I be treated this way. Queen of the Nile I am, not fucking confetti to be tossed around. I kill you all!”

Harry stared at the agitated serpent in surprise. He had not spoken to another snake since his trip to Moaning Myrtle’s bathroom last year, and he had forgotten how bad tempered snakes were. She slithered towards him, the one closest to her and thus the likely source of her ill treatment, and made to strike him.

“Wait!” he cried, falling into parseltongue without conscious thought, “I’m sorry. I’m sorry you were thrown so carelessly, but I didn’t do it. I would never- I would never disrespect the Queen of the Nile!”

The cobra stopped, she hovered over him a moment as if uncertain.

“Princeling,” she said, finally, “King’s little princeling... sweet tongued child... No, no, little princeling would not treat Inana this way.”

She spun around to face the crowd of students at the platform’s edge, hissing angrily.

“Who is it? Who must Inana kill?”

“There,” Harry hissed, pointing his wand at McNair, staring stunned at them both. “There is the enemy of Inana.”

She was after the man in a flash. At almost eight feet long, she could not only reach him before he could lift his wand, but raise her body up high enough to strike his hand, his face, his neck. In these three places she struck him in lightening succession, before retreating to leave him to his fate. She moved back to Harry. From the corner of his eye, Harry saw Snape lift his wand. He rolled quickly, blocking the serpent from the man’s attack.

“Potter, get out of the way!”

“Don’t! Leave her alone! She didn’t ask to come here!”

“Potter, you’re speaking gibberish! Move out of the way!”

He didn’t move out of the way. Instead, to the surprise and horror of all, he pocketed his wand and pulled her gently towards him. She did not resist, curling around his uninjured arm and around his neck and shoulders.

"It still moves," she hissed angrily, indicating McNair struggling to shout out yet another curse while his air way began to slowly constrict.

Harry stood, Inana tangled around him and his bloody, useless arm hanging limply by his side. He looked at the man who had done this to him, pointlessly, maliciously and then summoned from her home a creature meant to terrify and poison him. He stalked over to the man, now barely able to breath, let alone talk and kicked him squarely in the face and clean off the platform.

From the floor, Snape made a dramatic, almost satirical gesture towards Harry, but his eyes were fixed firmly on a still stunned Lestranger.

"The winner."

Chapter 27: The Prince's Gift

Harry awoke in the infirmary. The first thought that came to him was not 'oh, no, how badly am I hurt?' but rather 'oh, bother, not again'. He sat up, and after a few moments of blindly groping for his glasses, took a good look at himself. The arm that had been cut near to the bone yesterday felt perfectly fine, and only a strange scar vaguely resembling a sword marked the existence of the first curse. He felt a wave of anger as look down at it.

How dare that bastard leave such a mark upon his body while carrying the title of teacher? How much worse would McNair have done if he hadn't bungled it at the end with the snake summoning spell? It some how seemed worse than what Morgenson and Whitehall had attempted the year before. McNair might not have intended murder, but he intended harm with the assumption that his title as teacher would allow him to get away with it.

He hoped he broke the bastard's nose.

A movement in the corner of his eye drew his attention to the night stand across his bed, and he nearly jumped out of his skin. There, curled rather snugly in a large glass jar was a great big snake, flicking her tongue at him.

"Inana! Are you alright?" he hissed, going over to open her jar. She slithered out of it and into his welcoming arms, curling about his shoulders.

"Why musst humansss be sssooo unpleasssant? You left me to take a nap, and I'm put in a jar. It'ssss very rude."

"I'm sssorry, your majessty. I'll will try my besst to have you ssent home as sssoon asss possssible."

"You're welcome to join me, princeling. The other humansss don't ssseem to treat you any bettersss," she offered. Harry smiled.

"Perhapsss when I am a bit older I will come to visssit you, my Queen. For now I have to deal with the rude people."

He set her on the bed as he changed out of his hospital pajamas, and into a fresh set of clothes that had been placed on a chair by his bed. On top of the pile was a note.

Potter,

Find a place for your limbless friend and get to class.

Professor Snape

Harry rolled his eyes. At the end of his bed was a cluster of cards and candy. According to his watch, he was suppose to be having DA&D at the moment, so he took his time perusing his cache. Fred promised him his first born child if he could teach him how to say 'I promise you my first born child' in Parseltongue. Draco made serious threats about strangling him for getting sorted into Gryffindor. Natalie said his new language was sexier than French. Ginny wrote that he fought really well against McNair. Hermione told him to get well soon

Harry sighed and silently gave up the hope of a perfectly normal school year.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

With Inana comfortably situated in one of Professor Sprout's greenhouses (a heated one that the teacher had given him permission to use), he had just enough time to slip into potion's class without his watch setting fire to his robes. The class, which had been chattering away, went silent as he stepped into the door. He paused briefly, a wave of discomfort washing over him under their curious and mistrustful stares.

Oh well, he thought to himself, I expected this.

He found an empty seat beside Clyde.

"Hey."

To this Clyde merely grunted, glowering at his notebook. Taking the hint, Harry busied himself by studying the potion instructions on the black board. Something bounced off the back of his head. He turned to glower at Seamus Finnigan, who was leering at him. The boy let out a series of hissing sounds.

“So what did I say there, Potter?”

“You said ‘I’m a king of the fairies. I have the pointy shoes to prove it?’,” Harry replied, looking perfectly serious even if his answer was as nonsensical as the boy’s attempt at parseltongue. Seamus flushed as several nearby Slytherins snickered. Draco and Ron weren’t among the amused.

“Geez, Potter, why the hell did you end up in Gryffindor when no one likes you but Slytherins,” the embarrassed boy snapped.

Harry couldn’t come up with a witty reply to that. It was perfectly good question. Hermione hadn’t spoken to him days, Clyde was now following her example, and none of the other second year Gryffindors looked ready to defend him at the moment.

“Shut up, Finnigan. Just because you said something stupid, don’t take it out on Harry.”

Hermione was sneering at Finnigan like he was something distasteful. It was the first time Harry had seen such an expression on her face in almost a year, and it was jarring how scary it looked on her. Lestrangle would have even been impressed. Finnigan looked momentarily disconcerted, but he was still angry enough to foolishly keep talking.

“How can you defend him? He’s been lying to us for over a year!”

Hermione sniffed. “He hasn’t done anything of the sort. So what if Harry didn’t tell anyone about it first year? Everyone was just so understanding and friendly with him, I suppose he should be spilling his guts about every little thing? Besides, he told me about it the summer we met, and McGonagal knew too. If our own Head of House didn’t think it was anyone’s business, than obviously it wasn’t.

For Merlin's sake, he's just a parselmouth. It's not like he's suddenly turned into a vampire or something."

Everyone just stared at her stupidly, Harry being among them.

"That's... Well, he...it's a Slytherin trait!" Seamus struggled to find a retort.

"Circumstantial. It's a blood line trait. Just because the few parselmouths we know about were in Slytherin, doesn't mean they all were or that such a trait determines their House. In fact, Harry just proved that isn't the case. And just for the record, I am rather fond of Harry, so keep your presumptuous statements to yourself."

Finnigan looked too thrown to say much of anything. Clearly, he hadn't been prepared for his teasing to be turned into a full out debate. He was spared having to respond by Professor Snape stalking in.

"Mr. Potter, how good of you to join us. Since you should be particularly well rested after your nap in the infirmary, you can help me demonstrate the proper way to prepare cattails for boiling. You remember how to do that, I hope? I do recall you spending over two hours on it in your last detention."

Harry turned a bit pink, but moved to the front to do as instructed while the potion's master lectured. From the front he could look directly at Hermione, and tried to convey with his eyes alone a sincere 'thank you'. Hermione nodded in acknowledgment, and after making sure no one was observing her, she gave him a little smirk.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

No one in the second year class was talking to Harry except Hermione. This was fine with Harry since the only second year he truly cared about talking to him was Hermione. Oh it definitely stung to be on the outs with his classmates again, more so since Draco and consequently Natalie (who didn't really look upset with him if her wicked smile was anything to go by) were avoiding him as well. Clyde, the only Gryffindor Harry felt was entitled to feel betrayed wasn't even looking to him. It sadden Harry a bit, but he'd never regarded Clyde as a steadfast friend like Hermione. His willingness to abandon Harry for the crowd last year had not been forgotten.

A multitude of harmless pranks started occurring shortly after his release from the infirmary; garden snakes in his desk, his black school robes being turned green, whispered hisses as he passed groups of students, and a barely avoided hex that gave Percy Weasley a forked tongue for half a day. The Weasley twins had a few pranks of their own, but mostly things even Harry could laugh about. The stuffed snake wrapped around his broom singing 'I may not have armsss, but I can still hug youuu... I may not have wingsss, but I can still flyyyyy... I may not have lipsss, but I can still ssssing' was pretty funny. When the pranks persisted into next week, however, they seemed to take it as a personal affront.

"I'm all for a good prank or two," George said, "But it's bad taste to stick to one person for a long time. That's just bullying. We better set these blighters right, yeah Fred?"

"You are correct, my devilishly handsome brother."

The pranks had quickly diminished, but the silence and accusatory looks hadn't. Conversely, those Slytherins that had been rather distrustful and resentful of Harry before had become positively congenial. Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw were just curious mostly (particularly Ravenclaw, where several students had requested demonstrations he had sternly refused).

Only Hermione's forgiveness and support made it all tolerable.

"They're just embarrassed," Hermione explained while looking over Harry's potion's homework. "They were so convinced they figured you out by now, that they're embarrassed to have missed something so important. They think you were laughing at them."

"If that's the case, then they're going to be hating me routinely. They don't know anything about me."

The only good thing to come out of the entire dueling fiasco was Madam Umbridge. The toady woman whom he'd met only briefly at St. Mungo's last summer had been called in to 'help' supervise the class... or rather, to supervise McNair. The poor man had very nearly died from Inana's several bites, and spent several days in St. Mungo's. When he'd finally returned it was with his new assistant, who did very little to assist in any thing. Every barb, every instruction, every choice of subject, every little thing the man attempted to do in the class was met with a disparaging little 'hmm-hmm', that had him cringing every time.

Nothing was getting taught, but no one was getting hurt either, so Harry considered it a major improvement even if the woman did annoy the hell out of him. Harry had no idea who summoned Umbridge to look after McNair. He wanted to say Snape, but he didn't have the authority. He doubted Lestrage would bother putting a leash on the man she had known was a monster before she'd hired him. That only left Voldemort, but how much could he know about what was happening in Hogwarts? He hadn't been seen since the Welcoming Feast, and his only contact with the school would have been through the Headmistress, right?

He was entertaining the possibility of somehow asking Snape on his way to Dueling Club when Tom stopped him in the hall.

"Hey, Harry," the older boy said, looking quite serene.

"Oh hey, Tom, I haven't seen you in a while."

"Yes, and I feel quite bad about that, what with you being hurt and all. I meant to visit earlier, but you seemed busy every time that I saw you."

"Don't worry about it. Madam Pomfrey is good at her job. I'm fine now."

"Just the same I thought I should check on you. You're House doesn't seem to be very understanding lately."

Harry ignored the stab of pain that statement made, and smiled reassuringly.

"I don't care what most of them think anyway. Everyone whose opinion really matters has already forgiven me or never held it against me in the first place."

Tom didn't look very convinced, but he smiled back anyway.

"Yes, I suppose a situation like this is best for determining who your real friends are. I take it Granger and you have made up?"

"Yeah- hey, how did you know we were fighting before?"

At that Tom chuckled and his smile became a bit more natural. "You Gryffindors are hardly subtle. Everyone can tell when you two have had a row."

Harry ducked his head and shuffled his shoes, feeling unduly embarrassed. While it wasn't something he thought about consciously, he admired Tom. He couldn't put his finger on it, but there was something about the Slytherin boy's attention that was so flattering. It wasn't just that he was older or even that he was quickly becoming the most popular boy in his House, but there was something about his self confidence that made his confidence in Harry seem so much more reliable. He felt he was capable of things he hadn't been when Tom spoke to him. Even his teasing sounded like encouragement to Harry.

"Well, we are best mates," Harry admitted, moving the conversation along before he started blushing like a ninny again. "We spend so much time together I guess it's hard to pretend when nothing's wrong."

Tom placed a hand on his shoulder. "I'm glad you made up, Harry. You two seem to have a special connection and it would be a pity to lose that. But next time you two are on the outs, remember she's not your only friend. I'm here if you ever need to talk."

The older boy's eyes were suddenly so intense, Harry felt frozen, unable to do anything other than nod in agreement until Tom removed his hand started to walk away.

"You better hurry or Snape will make you do demonstrations."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom listened to Harry's footsteps as the boy hurried on his way. Briefly, he wondered if he hadn't over done it. Harry didn't know that much about him after all, and their conversations had been extremely limited. Had he thought Tom presumptuous? Or even a little creepy? He dismissed these ideas quickly. The boy had been smiling, albeit timidly, so obviously he had been flattered like was suppose to be.

Satisfied that Harry wasn't suspicious, Tom decided to consider this meeting a success. He had provided Harry future opportunities to seek out his company of his own volition and Harry, still being a bit naive, would take his words regarding that mudblood Granger at face value.

The smile he had been wearing fell like a ton of bricks, leaving his expression cold and cruel.

Granger.

Harry's best mate.

That simply would not do.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

September passed into November. As Quidditch season rolled around, most of the Gryffindors seemed to forget that they were supposedly mad at Harry and started giving him encouragements like 'Good luck on your first match, Harry!' and 'Show those Slytherins how to fly, Potter!'. It was very tempting say something like 'Aren't I too Slytheirn to be playing for Gryffindor? If I won, wouldn't it still be a Slytherin victory?'. Hermione pinched him whenever he seemed on the verge saying something so pointless.

"Just let it drop, Harry. They were wrong, they know they were wrong, and they'll continue to be wrong until you start acting like they said you would."

So he let it slide, but once again ignored any further attempts at friendship. It was just like Snape's view of dueling club stragglers: They had their chance and let it slip by. Clyde was still ignoring him, and Harry let him. It would be a lie to say he didn't miss the other boy's company, but some things were more important. Draco got over it pretty quickly, although Harry suspected it was because he wanted help with some of the snake-related objects scattered around the Slytherin common room. Harry didn't make any promises. Natalie kept teasing him to 'hisss sssweet nothingsss' in her ear. Ron was Ron, and there wasn't much that could be done to improve that.

Harry found he was even busier than last year. In addition to Quidditch practices and tougher assignments, there was now Dueling Club as well. Practices were only held once a week, but Snape had been promising them matches soon and Harry was going the extra mile to make sure there wasn't a repeat of his last duel (his blood splattering the platform, not the winning part). His duel with McNair was quite infamous (and not just because he blurted out parseltongue either), and though half the club was too afraid to stand on the platform with him there were still a few Slytherins looking forward to earning a reputation by defeating him. Draco and Ron were the most eager to try, although a cocky fourth year was probably the biggest threat.

"Maybe you should just lose," Hermione said during one of their practices, "If you keep winning then people are just going to keep trying harder and harder until they beat you. You could get seriously hurt."

"It's not that different from what I have to do in Quidditch. I face serious injury every time I climb on a broom, but I can't let fear keep me from doing my best. Besides, being a lousy duelist sounds more dangerous than being a good one."

She wasn't convinced, and truthfully he knew his example was unsatisfying. She hated him flying on the Quidditch team as much as she hated him dueling. He knew it was because she cared more about his safety than his pride and he didn't fault her logic, but neither could he bring himself to adopt her philosophy. The pride was there to stay..

So when he wasn't practicing Quidditch, drawing, or doing regular homework he was studying spells for future matches. This wasn't something he could do during normal study group, since so many of his potential opponents were there as well. He usually ended up studying with the Weasley twins. They too were in Dueling Club, although at varsity level, and despite their goof ball personas, they were a veritable library of curses, hexes, counter curses, tricks, and techniques. He felt a bit bad about taking up their free time, but they seemed so happy that their 'god of chaos' was actually accepting a bit of their tutelage that he quickly got over it. When Draco had seen some of the spells he'd been taught used on dummies during Dueling Club, his cocky smirk dimmed a little. Even Snape had raised a curious brow.

With Voldemort at the other end of Britain and no one else able to offer him a solution, Harry had no means to send Inana home and had to content himself with making her as comfortable as possible. She seemed to enjoy the heated green house well enough, and he occasionally brought her to his dorm room for conversations (and to freak out his dorm mates when they were being particularly bothersome). Bilgerat, who had been rather scarce lately to begin with, disappeared for almost a week the first time he brought her up.

All of this Harry related in a letter to his godfathers, including the fact that he was a parselmouth and had known about it before he'd met them. As much as he would have liked to keep it a secret, he didn't think he could bare it if they'd learned he had pretty much lied to them from a little snippet in the gossip column of Wizzarding Weekly. They deserved better than that. At the same time he was terrified about what their reply would be.

His next letter, he resolved, would revolve heavily around his next Quidditch victory over Slytherin... and perhaps a request for a full suit of armor for Christmas. First though, he had to get down to the pitch for practice before he was late. After handing off his first letter to Snape, the potion's master had shamelessly read it and proceeded to check it over as if though it were an essay, complete with little red marks pointing out spelling and grammar mistakes as well as any material the man didn't think his godfathers should be privy to (this included the dueling incident with McNair and Voldemort being in Bristol). Then he had Harry rewrite the whole thing, proofread the second version, and made him do it again. By the time he had finished a letter to the man's meticulous specifications, his watch was already starting to grow uncomfortably warm.

"Bloody, rotten, big-nosed..." Harry muttered as he stalked his way through the dungeons. "Just wait till he and I have a duel... turn him into a real vulture..."

He passed Moaning Murtle's bathroom and pondered stopping in for a quick 'hello', but decided against it. He was late enough as it was, and if he showed up now she'd likely go into a long monologue about no one liking her and how he never visits.

Well, it's not like she couldn't leave. It would certainly be easier for her to visit him up in Gryffindor tower than it would him visiting her in the girl's lavatory. There was enough gossip flying around about him as it was.

"Stupid little girl..."

Ok, he wouldn't go that far. She was just...

Wait a second.

Harry turned around. He looked at the ground and the ceiling. There was no one there. Had it been him who really thought that? It didn't feel right, but...

"Ouch!"

His watch was starting burn in his breast pocket. As much pain as the silly thing caused him, it was a wonder he was so fond of it. He cursed under his breath and made a dash for the stairs, forgetting the strange incident entirely.

Dear Readers

I know you have been enjoying consistent updating of this story for the last several month, so I thought it important to let you know I will be temporarily suspending this story. I am NOT abandoning it, but events have made it difficult for me to write and fulfill personal obligations. I hope that I will be able to continue this story some time as early as mid February. I do have some chapters already written, but I think this is the best point to stop for the moment, since we're between plot movement. I hope to see you all next month and hope you don't forget about me. Thanks to everyone whose reviewed and offered their support. You all been wonderful!

Sincerely,

Mizuni-sama

Book II

Chapter 8: The Prince and the Phantom

“Still no reply from your godfather, yet?” Hermione asked, looking over at the glum expression of her friend. Harry, who would normally be in high spirits after his Quidditch victory over Slytherin last Saturday, had been growing steadily more depressed.

Harry glanced around the potion’s lab to make sure no one was paying them any attention. Class hadn’t started and everyone was busy finishing conversations before Snape arrived.

“Yeah. I want to say it’s all just red tape making it take so long, but I can’t help but think he’s mad at me.”

“Harry even if he is mad at you about the parselmouth thing, I’m sure he’d write you back, even if it was to scold you. I mean you’re his godson, for Merlin’s sake. Didn’t he say in his first letter that he’d probably only be able to write infrequently?”

Harry nodded, but didn’t look any happier. Everything she’d said he’d thought of before, but there was no real way of knowing until he got another of Sirius’ letters. If he ever got one again. And the not knowing made it exhausting to think about. Hermione gave him a worried look.

“Perhaps you should ask Professor Snape,” she suggested, “He might know what’s taking so long.”

As if on cue, the man appeared, stalking to the chalkboard and snapping out instructions. Everyone immediately set about to follow his commands, and Harry wasn’t about ready to stop and ask him anything at the moment other than where he kept the cedar ashes and eye of newt. As things settled down into the more mundane processes of brewing (stirring), Harry considered Hermione’s advice. Snape was an unpredictable man. He might answer Harry’s questions, he might snap something sarcastic at him, and he might just lie. No response was more or less likely than the others.

What Snape felt for him, other than the standard irritation he felt for everyone in general, was a mystery to him. There had been times when Harry was convinced the potion's master wanted him dead, but every so often he'd say something that made him sound almost... fond of him. There was no telling which way his questions might be met. He thought of asking Hermione to come with him when he talked to Snape, as he almost definitely seemed fond or at least protective of his goddaughter..

But he couldn't. Snape had said if he dragged Hermione into any of his troubles, particularly regarding Voldemort and his godfather, he would make him regret it. Well bother. He'd have to do this alone. After finishing the assignment, he dawdled with his clean up and suggested to Hermione that she go ahead and save him a seat at the Great Hall.

"Was there something that you wanted, Mr. Potter?" Snape asked, not bothering to look at him as he wrote out instructions for his next class.

Now alone with the man, he felt particularly foolish for asking him for anything. He supposed he'd feel even dumber if he just left without asking, and went ahead.

"Um... I was wondering... do you know why it's taking so long to get a letter back from Sirius?"

The chalk in Snape's hand suddenly snapped in half at the mention of the werewolf's name.

"Never mind!" Harry blurted, and rushed out of the classroom. The door slammed shut behind him without his touching it, and he wondered briefly if it had been Snape or his own accidental magic flaring in panic. He sighed. So much for that idea.

The corridors were empty as he made his way back towards the upper levels. He came to the girl's lavatory and remembered he hadn't spoken to Myrtle yet. He imagined she would be quite peeved with him for not visiting since they'd first met, but he thought she deserved knowing she hadn't been forgotten.

He scanned the hall, and confirming that no one was around, walked in to the bathroom. He hadn't gone two steps before he saw something that gave him pause. He blinked once. Twice. Rubbed his eyes.

Still there.

He walked out of the bathroom. He took a deep breath and exhaled. Another. One more. He went back into the bathroom.

The body was still there.

It was a girl. A fifth or sixth year. He couldn't see her house badge as she was laying face down, but he did not recognize those wide blue eyes staring out at nothing as someone he'd met in Gryffindor. Her dark brown hair fanned out around her head, floating in a shallow pool of water around her body.

There was no blood.

There should have been blood. There had been blood last time. Bits of inside on the outside. On the walls, the floor, the photographs on the mantel. Blood on his shoes as he stepped closer to touch the smooth cheek still warm-

Her cheek was cold. There was no blood. This wasn't last time, but the girl was still dead. He needed to call the police.

Wait, there were not police here. No telephone to call them with. A sudden reminder that he was wizard and had no idea what he was doing. Who did you go to for help?

"Snape."

He walked briskly out of the bathroom and back the way he'd come. The door was still closed, and he knocked quickly before stepping inside. Snape favored him a rather unwelcoming look.

"I don't have a clue why your godfather doesn't write you back. Perhaps spending all day bashing heads with Greyback means he's finally forgotten how to read and write."

"There's a dead girl in the bathroom."

Snape blinked at him. He said nothing for a moment, frowning. Something seemed to occur to the older wizard, and he rolled his eyes.

"Yes, Myrtle's been dead for some time now. She hasn't been invading the boy's lavatory now, has she? That girl's almost as big of an annoyance as Peeves was."

"No," Harry said, evenly, "In the girl's bathroom."

"Why were you in the girl's bathroom, Mr. Potter?"

Ok, perhaps he should have prioritized his statements better.

"There's a dead girl in the girl's bathroom," he repeated. "I don't know who she is."

Snape's expression suddenly grew bored.

"Her name is Myrtle Tetherwood, Mr. Potter, just as I said. She is just another resident ghost of Hogwarts. Since you were so curious, you'll be happy to know you'll become well acquainted with her during your detention tonight when scrubbing out her toilets. I expect you at seven. Now go away."

"But- she's not- Myrtle isn't-"

"Mr. Potter, if you're not out of here in the next two seconds you'll clean every bathroom in Hogwarts."

He left. He went to the bathroom again. She was still there. Nothing had changed. Her unblinking eyes still regarded him dispassionately. Stepping forward, he stared down at her. There was nothing he could do to help her. She was already gone and nothing could be done about that.

But he couldn't leave her here. How long had she been left here already? He had heard nothing about any missing students, but her skin was already cold to the touch. Someone had to be looking for her by now. Her friends had to be looking for her. He couldn't let them find her like this. He had to hurry and tell Snape, but how could he make the man listen? How could he say what needed to be said when he himself couldn't seem to move beyond that single statement of fact: There's a dead girl in the bathroom.

He tried to alter that statement and say it aloud. There's a dead girl in the bathroom and she isn't Moaning Myrtle.

"Nngh..."

He couldn't. Not when she seemed to be looking at him as if ready to did he say what needed to be said?

He knelt down, his hands trembling as he reached for her.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape considered making good on his threat to have Potter clean every bathroom in Hogwarts. Technically, it had taken two and half seconds for the little snot to leave the classroom. It would serve the boy right if he not only made him clean the bathrooms, but let everyone in the school know why he was being punished. It would certainly take the wind out of Gryffindor's sails if it turned out that their star Quidditch player was some sort of closet pervert.

He dismissed the idea. Voldemort would not be pleased with such rumors circulating about his protégé. Besides, Potter was one of the best chances for his dueling club's success. He was doing rather well, and his stunt with McNair had garnered a lot of publicity. His own decision to not allow others to join until the next semester had given the club an air of exclusivity, a prestige that could only work in his favor when promoting his teachings.

Although it would be nice if the brat weren't so much trouble. He did not enjoy being a post office for his familial exchanges.

There was a knock on his door. Snape snarled, throwing down the papers he had been grading. He had no doubt who his visitor was. Potter hadn't been gone five minutes, and who else was dumb enough to stick around during lunch hour? Was he trying to infuriate him or was this all just apart of his natural charm?

He threw open his door, prepared to send the idiotic Gryffindor to clean every toilet in Hogwarts, the owlery, and the stables.

"Potter! What is wrong with-"

In the dim light of the corridor, he suddenly realized how pale the boy looked. Those brilliant green eyes stood out too vividly, conveying something he had been too busy being angry to notice before. Potter took advantage of his momentary hesitation, lifting his hand out to the older wizard. There, laying in Potter's trembling hand where his wand should have been, was a tuft of long brown hair.

"There's a dead girl in the bathroom."

This time, Snape knew what he really meant.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry sat in an empty classroom, nursing a cup of hot chocolate. He'd overheard Madam Pomfry mention to a Court Sentinel that he was in shock and the chocolate would help. Perhaps it did, but he still felt cold, like he had just after his escape from the werewolves that summer. This was not a feeling he cared for, but he supposed it was better than the alternative.

A major freak out wasn't going to help anyone.

Someone had taken his statement earlier, while Snape had kept watch with a handful of vials in his robes should he suddenly realize that he might just as easily have been killed and start to panic or cry or feel the need to hex something. Snape was gone now. Off to make sure the Headmistress didn't bungle the whole investigation. His words, not Harry's. Harry wondered if the man wasn't in shock as well, having let slip such a thing.

Now McGonagal was there to look after him. He was glad she was there. She'd reheated his chocolate twice for him already. While he looked into the foamy swirls in his drink, taking the occasional sip, she explained what was happening. That was something no one had bothered doing in the last three hours.

The dead girl was Cassandra Sweet, a fifth year Hufflepuff. She'd had potions during her first period that morning, and must have been killed shortly after class. All of the students and staff were accounted for, and there was no sign of any other victims. Classes had been canceled. Most of the school had been in the Great Hall during the lunch period, and it was decided that for safety's sake no one would leave it until the school had been searched and everyone was questioned. Chances were no one would be returning to their dorms that night.

When she seemed to run out of things to explain, she sat there and looked at him for a long time. He took a sip of chocolate and waited.

"Are you alright, Harry?"

Oh...Oh god, why did she have to ask that?

He suddenly wasn't cold anymore. In fact, the chocolate he'd been drinking made him feel too hot. It swirled around in his empty stomach, making him nauseous. He set the cup aside, and threw off the blanket he'd been given. He walked to the far end of the classroom, staring at the empty shadows and reminding himself he had to breathe more slowly. If he kept breathing so quickly, he was going to end up hyperventilating or worse, he might cry. He couldn't go upstairs while crying. Everyone would see him. They would always remember and they would never let him forget this day or the feeling that left him, although briefly, broken.

Besides, he didn't want to worry his friends. He was already worrying McGonagall.

"I'll be fine," he managed weakly, "When can I go up with the rest. My friends must be worried. Do they know what's happening?"

The elderly witch sighed, and smiled ever so slightly. James and Lily's son really was a brave child. Any other child his age would have broken down by now or else have lacked the heart necessary for sympathy. Such a brave boy, but she couldn't help worrying about him.

"I'm sure your friends have some idea about what's happening. Secrets don't stay secret long around Hogwarts as I'm sure you've noticed."

He smiled a bit at that.

"I'm not entirely sure how much longer they'll be. If you don't mind being alone for a few minutes, I can go and ask to escort you up now?"

"Yes... I'll be fine."

Once she was gone, Harry used the privacy to think. The shock had worn off, and now he was left with this feeling of dread. A girl was dead. Someone or something had killed her. The castle wasn't, if it had ever been, safe anymore. The Court was investigating, and he hoped they found the culprit, but what if they didn't? Myrtle hadn't ever found out... where was Myrtle? Surely, she must have seen what happened!

He made toward the door, thinking to call McGonagall back to ask her about Myrtle, but he never got the chance. The door slammed open and Lestrage stormed in. Harry took one look at the wand in her hand and leapt to the far end of the room. She smiled grimly at his retreat.

"Why am I not surprised that you're involved in this grim affair, Mr. Potter?"

Involved?

As far as Harry was concerned he wasn't involved in this matter beyond being unfortunate enough to find poor Cassandra first. He hadn't done anything wrong, and he didn't like her implying that he had. Particularly with a pair of investigators following right behind her.

"Nothing cheeky to say?"

"Cheeky," he said, glowering defiantly.

Her face twisted into something ugly, and she stalked over to him and seized him by the arm. Her grip was brutal, and he bit his lip to keep from crying out as she dragged him out of the room and into the hall. There were easily thirty wizards in official looking robes loitering outside the bathroom, many with notepads and strange looking instruments. They all stopped whatever they were doing to stare as he was forced into the girl's lavatory and thrown to the wet floor. Harry scanned the room frantically for the dead girl, but she was gone and only a glowing green outline on the floor marked where she had fallen.

He scrambled to his feet, backing further in as Lestrangle stalked in after him, followed by Snape and a greying wizard in even greyer robes that Harry assumed was the chief investigator. The Headmistress crossed her arms and stared at him expectantly. Now cold, wet, and with an aching arm, he felt no more inclined to obey her. He mimicked her stance and stared back at her, mockingly.

Lestrangle's grip on her wand tightened noticeably.

"Potter," Snape began tersely, drawing both wizard's attention. "In order to end this matter as quickly as possible, Sentinel Mallory here has requested the use of your 'special skill'."

Harry looked at Snape and then Mallory dumbly. How could playing Quidditch help an investigation?

“Parseltongue, you nitwit,” the potion’s master growled, pointing to the sink faucets with the ornamental snakes.

Oh, that special skill.

He glowered at the lot of them, but dutifully approached the sink. He leaned in close, studying the immobile fixture and briefly wondered what it was doing in the girl’s bathroom anyway.

“Hey,” he hissed. This close, Harry could see it’s tiny silver eye open and turn to him. It’s tongue flickered out to show he was listening.

“Did you see what happened to the girl over there? Did you see who killed her?”

Behind him, he heard a gasp, and figured it was Mallory.

“Which girl?”

Harry’s eyes widened in horror. Which girl? There was more than one?

“Potter, what did it say?” Lestrangle demanded.

“There’s another... another girl,” Harry said, his voice faint and weak, not looking at her.

No one said anything, and after a moment he was able to collect himself enough to continue.

“The Hufflepuff girl who was laying on the floor. Did you see what happened to her?”

“It got her,” replied the snake. “It got her, just like the other one. It got them both. Got the annoying one twice. Tee hee hee...”

Harry didn’t understand what it meant. How could you get someone twice. Assuming get meant what he thought it mean. The only way you could kill someone twice was if the person was revived the first time or...

“Myrtle...”

“The King will be so pleased,” the faucet hissed as an afterthought, falling into its own version of laughter. It sounded a bit like it was choking.

“Please, don’t tell me a ghost did this, Potter. Especially not that little twerp,” Lestrangle said, sounding as if this was all a bad prank and not a murder. He glowered at her, but looked to Snape when he spoke. He may not like the man, but he trusted him somewhat and he seemed to be taking the matter seriously.

“Where is Myrtle? She would have seen what happened. She’d be bragging about it.”

Snape said nothing for a moment, then looked over at one of the bathroom stalls intently. Harry swallowed thickly, and walked slowly over. Lestrangle made an impatient sound.

“We brought him here to talk to the faucet, not run rampant around the crime scene. This is pointless.”

“No,” Mallory said, the first time Harry had heard him speak, “I want to see this.”

Harry’s hand was resting on the stall door, hesitating while he listened to them speak, unsure if he wanted to see this. But then they remained quiet, and he had no excuse to hold back. Gently, he pushed open the door.

Myrtle stared right through him, her face caught in a tableau of surprise. She would have looked rather funny if she weren’t so still. She was pale, or rather more transparent, than she had been before. She floated in the air, bobbing faintly, and looked as if she would move to yell obscenities at him any moment now for coming into the girl’s bathroom. He stepped back out of the stall and quietly closed the door.

“She’s not dead...” he said, without thought.

“Technically, she is... she’s a ghost after all,” Mallory informed him. “We think the culprit may have tried to exorcize her to eliminate witnesses, but didn’t perform it properly. She’s in a fugue state.”

Harry nodded, not really listening.

“Did the snake say anything about who did this?”

He thought for a moment, trying to make sense of what the faucet had said. He couldn’t make heads or tails of it, so finally just decided to repeat it and let them figure it out.

“He said an it got them, not a who. He said it got Myrtle twice. He said the King would-”

The rest of his sentence went unheard, though his lips kept moving. He paused, confused and tried to speak again, but nothing came out. He looked to the others, and noticed Lestrangle had her wand pointed at him, though he hadn’t heard her cast a spell. But Snape had mentioned in Dueling Club that some witches and wizards could do that. Why was she casting Silencio on him in the first place?

Mallory hadn’t seen her wand, and looked confused by his sudden cut off. He didn’t have time to figure it out as Lestrangle turned to him.

“I think the rest can wait until another time. Mr. Potter should really return to his classmates, and I must prepare for Our Lord’s arrival.”

Voldemort was coming back to Hogwarts?

Harry wasn’t certain how he felt about that. On one hand, it was strangely comforting having the formidable wizard looking over the school and keep the inevitable press at bay. On the other hand, the man would want to speak with him. Really, this constant misplacement of himself was bound to grate on Voldemort’s nerves eventually.

Mallory was protesting, clearly agitated with Lestrangle’s interference. While they were busy pulling rank on each other, Snape took him lightly by the shoulder and led him away. Not knowing what else to do, he followed the man meekly and hoped for some sort of explanation.

As they moved past the score of wizards and witches milling about the dungeons and up the stairs to the upper levels, he began to feel the effects of the day's excitement. He'd missed lunch and had been in shock for several hours, and after the confusing and troubling events in the bathroom he was starting to feel exhausted. He let out an enormous yawn, still silenced by Lestrage's charm, and felt his eyes droop.

Snape said nothing, but Harry knew what to expect next. As soon as they were out of sight and hearing of the investigators but before they had reached the Great Hall, he pulled Harry aside.

"Do not speak of what the snake said to you. In fact, I highly recommend you forget it ever occurred. There was a flow of water from the bathroom which you went to investigate and found Miss Sweetie. You then informed me and spent the day being questioned by investigators. That is as far as your involvement of this investigation goes. Myrtle Tetherwood doesn't exist. Is that clear?"

Harry simply nodded. This was his what? Second? Third? incident where he had been told to censure what he knew or had seen and heard.

There was a slew of information being given to him just by Snape's choice of things he wished him to keep silent about. He imagined it was somehow related to Myrtle and 'the King', who ever he was, but he was too tired to sort it all out at the moment or to consider if it was worth the trouble wondering about. Snape stared at him for a moment, assessing his willingness to cooperate, but finally lifted the charm.

"What happens now?"

Snape considered for a moment. "That is up to the Dark Lord."

Why wasn't he surprised? He sighed and followed Snape the rest of the way to the Great Hall. There were two wizards standing guard outside, and they regarded Harry and Snape suspiciously as they approached but didn't stop them. From inside, Harry could hear the voices of many excited students and steeled himself. Snape opened the door for him, letting him inside but didn't follow. Harry watched the door close and wished he hadn't been left behind.

The tables had been removed from the Great Hall, but with so many students it was still too full. The houses were mingling without consideration, stopping to talk and gossip and make conjectures with whom ever would listen to them. He spotted a couple of Hufflepuff girls crying, and his heart ached for them.

Everyone was so loud and busy, no one noticed him and he slipped through the crowds trying to figure out what everyone knew or thought they knew. It soon became clear that they knew someone or someones had died. It surprised him somewhat that they all seem to think he was the one who'd kicked the bucket. There were already wild rumors that Ron Weasley had finally finished the job Whitehall and Morgenson had failed. Harry briefly caught a glimpse of the redhead hiding amongst a protective circle of Slytherins, clearly trying to avoid the accusations. Cassandra Sweet's absence didn't seem to register with anyone except her own house mates.

He searched the crowd, keeping to the dark corners of the Hall in hopes of finding his friends before the rest of the students noticed him. He spotted Clyde first, sulking in a corner and not talking to anyone. Though they hadn't been on very good terms lately, he decided to let the other boy know he was alive.

"Hey."

Clyde's eyes, which had been fixated on his shoes, shot up to meet unmistakable green.

"Har-!"

A hand over the boy's mouth quickly muffled his cry of surprise. He gestured to be silent and removed his hand.

“Harry,” he whispered, still awed by his sudden appearance, “Everyone keeps saying your dead. There are Court Examiners and Sentinals all over the place! What happened to you? Are you ok?”

“I’m fine, but someone has died. Where’s Hermione and the others? They’re probably worried sick.”

Clyde blinked several times, trying to wrap his head around his friend’s sudden resurrection. For the last two hours, when everyone’s insistence that Harry Potter was truly dead had finally convinced him, he had been absorbed in his own regrets. Looking back he realized what an ass he had been to Harry. The other boy had never done anything to him, had even befriended him and helped him with his school work. He’d been a good friend, and Clyde couldn’t say the same. So what if Harry hadn’t told him about his Parselmouth abilities? It wasn’t like he’d murdered someone!

But now Harry was back, raised from the dead, and he had come to him first. It might have only been convenience, but he’d been such a jerk lately and still Harry had come to him first to let him know he was alive. It made his past resentment feel ridiculously insignificant.

“She’s... she was here a moment ago. I think she saw McGonagall and went to ask her what was happening. I’ll help you find her.”

Harry couldn’t help but smile. Somehow he knew their past grievances had been forgiven, and he was glad. Together they scanned the hall for Hermione and finally located her near one of the side doors, talking earnestly with McGonagall. Ginny was standing closely behind her, chewing her fingernails nervously and clearly distressed.

They made their way to them quickly, Harry partially hidden behind Clyde so no one else would notice him. McGonagall spotted them first, and smiled in relief. Hermione turned quickly to see why.

She was pale and teary eyed, but she hadn’t cried it seemed. Not yet anyway. She broke out into a brilliant smile when she saw him, and quickly grabbed Ginny to point him out to her. The little redhead’s eyes became enormous.

“Harry!”

Instantly, the noise in the great hall ceased.

Over four hundred pairs of eyes suddenly landed on the most lively looking dead boy they had ever seen.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Author's Note:

Court Sentinal: Sort of like the Russian KGB and an auror combined. Their job is basically to make sure that wizards and witches behave themselves, but their job has some sinister implications.

Questions? Leave them in the review and I should get back to you in a day or two.

Chapter 29: Serpents at Play

Tom turned towards Harry the moment the Weasley girl cried out his name. He had spotted the younger boy the moment he entered the room of course, but had not wanted to alert anyone else to his presence until he was ready. Judging by the vaguely panicked look Harry was sporting at the sudden rush of students towards him, he clearly hadn't been ready yet.

Stupid Weasleys.

The girl was a useless little fool. The prefect was a pouncy fool. The twins were laughable fools, and no doubt proud of it. Even the single Slytherin Weasley was an irritation, suited for little more than being Draco's cronie. At the moment, Ronald Weasley wasn't even suited for that, cowering behind a ring of Slytherins who were not inclined to handing over one of their own to a presumptuous mob.

To hell with the lot of them. The only one Tom had been worried about was Harry.

He had expected something like this to happen eventually. He'd even callously tricked Cassandra to the lavatory to wash some imaginary potion's residue from her robes on the off chance that it would happen today. She was a muggleborn and a rather stupid one at that. She had the nerve to pass notes to him in class and even request a date within the last month, and though he'd stayed in character and declined her politely he had wanted nothing more than to...

The chances that she would have found...it... were fairly slim. It had merely been a way to take the edge of his annoyance. Indulging in an amusing possibility really.

He hadn't even conceived of Harry getting involved. The boy shouldn't have been near the girl's lavatory, except in passing on his way to lunch with his classmates. Could something have happened to draw Harry's attention to the bathroom? Had his beautiful pet been inside and lured the boy with a hunting song? Had it perhaps broken his orders and entered the corridors, finding Harry there?

A thousand possibilities ran through his head, trying to explain the absence of his young friend. All the while he cursed his carelessness. He knew Harry had potions three morning a week, so why hadn't he left express orders to his pet not to be out in the open during that time? If something happened to Harry, he didn't know if he could forgive himself. All he had wanted to do was protect and nurture him.

Precious Harry. Mother. Brother. Friend.

His only family aside from his counterpart.

Voldemort. Father. Brother. Ally... competitor?

But there Harry was, a little pale and flustered but perfectly alright.

He wanted to rush over to him, but the crowd was too thick and he refused to take part in a rabble. Draco was already near Harry. He'd question the young Malfoy later about what he learned, and then wait for his opportunity to approach Harry in private.

For now, he would have to content himself with Harry's continued health and plan for the ramifications of today's incidence. No doubt his elder would be summoning him for an explanation, and he had to prepare some reasonable replies.

His life was in greater danger than Harry's at the moment.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was surrounded. On all sides the four Houses of Hogwarts had crowded around to verify that he was, in fact, not dead. Once this was confirmed, they immediately set about shouting questions at him. They spoke all at once, repeated each other often, threw out conjectures, and demands until Harry couldn't tell what anyone was saying. He tried to find his friends amongst the horde, but older students had crowded round and blocked the shorter ones from view. He felt claustrophobic, unable to move as everyone demanded his attention with shouts and cries and tugs at his robes.

He was tired and hungry, and their demands made his constant underlying resentment for the majority rise to the forefront of his thoughts. A particularly overbearing sixth year Gryffindor came right up to his face.

“Who tried to kill you now? Did you get them first this time?”

The boy was bigger than him, at least fifteen kilos, but in the tight confines of the crowd he had no room to catch his balance when Harry punched him in the face. It was an awkward hit, as Harry didn't have much practice with fist fights, but the boy fell backwards into the crowd, knocking over half a dozen others. The space his fall left was soon filled with more students, and Harry panicked as he realized at least some of them had to be the older boy's friends.

“Contorno parete!”

The crowd was suddenly forced back two feet from him in all directions, again causing several students to fall over. Through the chaos, the Weasley twins stalked determined through the mayhem. Harry had never seen them look so angry, or angry at all for that matter. They were some of the tallest boys in the school, taller than most of the seventh years even and muscular from Quidditch. Their physical presence alone was enough to send everyone creeping away from them, but if that hadn't been enough their unusual animosity would have. Fred (George?) breeched the empty ring Harry stood in first, while his brother turned to the crowd to keep everyone else at bay.

“You alright, Harry?”

Harry closed his eyes, bringing his hand up to push through his messy hair. He took a deep breath and exhaled slowly.

“Don’t ask me that,” he said, his voice soft but clearly audible in the sudden silence. “Just... ask me anything but that.”

[illegible]

Voldemort entered Hogwarts shortly after midnight, and was met by a nervous Mallory. His temper was foul and he did nothing to hide it from anyone. His plans for organizing a wizarding army, something larger and more specialized than his private Court Sentinals or his former Death Eaters, had just gotten past the basic command structure and starting on actual personnel assignments, when he had received word of the killing at Hogwarts. That a child, even a muggleborn one, had died in his home was unacceptable. That the child had been murdered was just plain insulting.

As the details became known to him, the matter went from infuriating to something almost worrisome. Harry, his insufferably unlucky protégé, had been a witness of sorts and why did that not surprise him? He doubted the boy would intentionally harm let alone murder anyone, but his involvement was inconvenient. It was likely his parselmouth abilities would provide him with knowledge he would rather the boy remained ignorant of.

The location and circumstances of the girl's death was uncomfortably familiar. The basilisk still lived in the school after all. He had never considered removing it. It was a part of his ancestor's, Salazar Slytherin's, legacy to Hogwarts as well as important reminder of his misbegotten youth.

Speaking of misbegotten youth...

He stalked into his office and slammed the door shut in Mallory's face. Closing his eyes, he murmured the soft whisper of an ancient spell and felt his mind submerge itself in the corporal realm of his spirit. A dark and twisted place, interlaced with webs of brilliant reds and oranges and whites that held his rendered soul within his body. He 'moved' towards a web of red strands and carefully pulled a small section of them free so that he dripped ever so slowly out of the confines of his flesh. His mind, freed and immersed in a spirit form, flew from the tower unseen and undetected.

Through the halls, the classrooms, the secret passages he made his way towards the Great Hall where the energy of hundreds of souls, and one familiar soul in particular, resonated. Moving through the walls was like moving through a curtain of water, but once inside he had to be cautious. It was crowded and he had no intention of alerting the students of his presence. Luckily, it was unlikely they would be able to understand who or what he was, and even less likely to acknowledge him as most of them were fast asleep.

The entirety of Hogwarts was sheltered within the confines of the Great Hall, like the refugees of The War he had since assimilated into his society or scattered years previous. Rows of bodies packed tightly together, reminded him of the fields outside the camps where they'd lined up the corpses of their allies and enemies and innocent bystanders to eventually be claimed by their families or incinerated with a few flicks of the wand.

He shimmered, sending the memories away like a dog shaking water from it's coat. Hogwarts was home, and though he remembered the battles and the struggles with fondness and a sort of dark thrill, he recognized that they held no place in his home.

He stopped briefly near McGonagall, observing as she paced quietly between the rows of students, all four houses, and seemed to count each and every one of them. In a dark corner, he felt Snape watching her and everything else, aware of everything (almost) in the room even without moving. Good. These two fierce guardians were more than enough to safeguard the students for the time being.

He circled the room, searching for Tom, his most likely suspect, but found Harry first and couldn't help but linger. The boy was sandwiched between the Weasley twins, while Granger slept across from him, the tops of their heads pointing towards each other. He recognized several of Harry's friends sleeping around him, most with their wands in their hands, like somnolent guards to an equally somnolent prince.

Despite their protection, the prince was clearly troubled. He was pale and restless, clutching tightly to his blanket despite the heat of the surrounding bodies. His brow was furrowed and every so often Voldemort thought he heard the faint hiss of parseltongue. It made him wonder what Harry had seen and if it had damaged the boy some how.

He felt a sudden rush of anger at the thought.

Harry was his. No one's, not his friend's or teachers' or Greyback's or Tom's, but his. No one else had a right to hurt him in any manner without his consent, and he would make this known to any and all transgressors.

He found Tom amongst the older Slytherins, his back to Snape and staring into the darkness. His eyes slid immediately to Voldemort's wandering spirit, and after a moment he closed his eyes. With that, Voldemort left. There was no need to explain himself. Tom would find him as soon as he was able to slip away unnoticed, which more than likely wouldn't be until the morning.

It was just as well. Voldemort wasn't sure he would be able to hold off from breaking the boy in half at the moment.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry and the rest of the students were woken at the ungodly hour of six o'clock in the morning. Disoriented and sleepy, they were herded to their respective common rooms and finally to their private dorms in order to prepare for the school day. Most of the other boys in his dorm went immediately to their beds to sleep for another hour, but Harry reluctantly dragged himself to the showers. Clyde followed him quietly, and Harry admitted to himself that he was glad for the company. He didn't think he'd want to be alone for a while.

He was a bit surprised to find all his friends awake in the common's room when he headed down. Hermione and Ginny were sitting next to each other at one of the tables, going over Ginny's homework while Fred and George were talking quietly to Percy, who for once wasn't checking his pockets every thirty seconds. There were a few other students, mostly prefects and habitual early raisers, but they lacked their usual energy and purpose. The room was held in the quiet suspension of a funeral parlor.

"Harry, Clyde," Hermione said, beckoning them over. "Did you finish your herbology essays?"

Harry felt a rush of relief when she didn't ask how he was feeling. He had told them Snape's pre-conceived story, and though Hermione seemed to suspect something was amiss she hadn't prodded. He knew that it was only a matter of time though. She knew him for a perpetual, if not exactly habitual, liar and he doubted any event she was not present for wouldn't be cause for thorough cross examination. He didn't resent her for it, but it wasn't something he was looking forward to.

"Do you think we'll even have classes today?" Clyde asked, sounding hopeful. Hermione glared at him.

"They might cancel potion's class for a few days, but I don't see why they'd stop us from going to our other classes."

"But," Ginny said, her freckles more brilliant than ever against her pale skin, "isn't that a bit dangerous? I mean, there's a murderer running around the school!"

"We don't know that," Hermione said firmly. "We still don't know for certain how Sweetie died. Harry said himself that he couldn't tell what happened to her, only that there wasn't any blood. It could have been a magical experiment gone wrong or an accident or who knows what? Even if there was a murderer, what are the chances they stuck around?"

"I don't like it," Clyde said, "It sounds like a Killing Curse to me no matter how you look at it."

"Don't, Clyde. There's going to be a million rumors running around as it is, there's no point in adding to the collection. I mean look what happened yesterday? Everyone thought for sure Harry was...was... I was scared to death for him, but he's fine!"

Certainly better off than Cassandra, Harry thought morosely, scanning his DA&D book incase they had a quiz that morning.

“Percy says the match against Hufflepuff will probably be cancelled,” Fred said, plopping glumly beside Harry at their now over crowded table.

“Dueling Club practices too,” George said, dragging over another chair. “I bet they’ll be canceling all extra curricular activities until they catch who ever did it.”

“We don’t know anyone did anything!” Hermione insisted, although no one looked at all doubtful that foul play was involved.

Having offered nothing to the conversation so far, Harry made a feeble attempt.

“Classes?”

“Percy says the prefects will be escorting the younger students between classes and meals. There’ll definitely be a curfew, but at least we’ll be able to sleep in our own beds,” Fred said.

“That’s good,” said Clyde, “I don’t fancy sleeping on the floor again. I think I got a crick in my neck from last night.”

The conversation turned to trivial complaints after that, and Harry tuned it out in order to read through his textbook. His friends formed enough of a barrier to keep most of Gryffindor from bothering him, and he sat quietly amidst his human sanctuary until it was time to head down to breakfast. Everyone had been brought to the Great Hall at the same time, and with the addition of the tables it made the hall as crowded as the Welcoming Feast, but still depressingly quiet. All of the teachers were present, as well as several Court officials standing guard at the entry ways. There was a chair at the teacher’s table where Voldemort normally sat when at Hogwarts, but it remained conspicuously empty.

Harry was relieved to note that the press hadn’t clawed their way into the school yet.

Food appeared on the table, and Harry ate on autopilot, ignoring the probing looks of his schoolmates. He finished quickly and was surprised when Snape came up behind him.

“Come with me, Mr. Potter.”

The man walked off without further explanation, and looking to his friends Harry saw they were just as baffled as he was. Sighing, he gathered up his things and followed after the potion’s master.

He felt the eyes of the entire hall mark him as he exited.

It didn’t take long for Harry to realize where Snape was leading him.

“Voldemort is in the castle? He summoned me?”

“The affairs of Hogwarts have always been of great interest to our Lord,” Snape said, not bothering to look at his young charge. “The same might be said about your affairs, as well, Mr. Potter..”

“ ... ”

The Dark Lord was sitting behind his desk when they arrived at his office, his hair slightly mused as if he hadn’t slept and therefor hadn’t fixed it that morning. The stacks of reports on the man’s desk seemed to support this theory. Mallory was sitting anxiously in one of the sitting chairs and regarded the new arrivals tiredly. Snape escorted him to the empty chair closest to Voldemort, and then took up his usual position near the bookshelves in order to watch the proceedings.

The Dark Lord studied Harry intensely for a moment, making the boy fidget self consciously.

“Mallory, you are excused.”

The Court investigator looked ready to protest, but quickly bit his tongue and got up to leave. His eyes lingered suspiciously on Harry for a moment before he disappeared through the secret entry way.

"I am pleased to see you are undamaged, Mr. Potter," Voldemort began, regarding him coolly.

"... Thank you?"

Voldemort sighed, tired and already impatient. He decided it was best to get their meeting over with as soon as possible lest he do something regrettable to the boy.

"Let us get straight to the point. I am going to legilimens you, and I would prefer if you tried to relax and not struggle. It is easier to find the memories I'm looking for in this manner, and avoid those memories that are... personal and unrelated. Do I have your cooperation?"

Harry scowled at him. Voldemort scowled back.

"A girl has died here, Mr. Potter. At the moment, you are the prime suspect. Believe me when I say this is as much for your benefit as my curiosity."

Harry grit his teeth, and got to his feet. Voldemort gestured to a spot on the floor right in front of him, and Harry reluctantly complied. He knelt before the Dark Lord, who gently but firmly took his head in his hands and locked their gazes. Harry tried to relax and call up the memory of the day before, but his own mind struggled against the recollection, escaping the pain and horror of that moment which so resembled a day over four years ago.

"I can cast Imperius to calm you, if you like," Voldemort offered, skimming only lightly at his surface thoughts, testing the waters for a deeper plunge.

"No," Harry insisted, "Just do it."

There was an immediate pressure, not exactly painful but Harry felt himself jerk at the initial shock of it. His previous experience with legilimency was a pale comparison to this forced intrusion, a tsunami rather than a gently rising tide. The first wave of memories was of this morning, and his mind reluctantly gave way to the previous evening; the anxious feeling of being surrounded by too many curious bodies, of the punch to the fifth year boy, and the eery silence of the walk from the dungeons to the Great Hall.

Anything before that his mind resisted, choosing instead to jump around to random moments of time. The day Natalie approached him by the Whomping Willow. The first Christmas party with the Dursley's. A hot summer day at the lake, water up to his knees and a fish eyeing his feet curiously. Voldemort watching him from the VIP section of the stands during his first Quidditch match. Sitting in his mother's lap as she pointed to the sky, a hundred hot air balloons in a hundred different colors floating by.

The pressure increased, forcing his mind back towards the shallows of recent memory. Tom on the train, smiling at him. Sirius's letter. Finding out his Quidditch robes were now an inch too short at his first practice. Ron's half transfigured glove running away like a mutant crab during last Monday's classes.

A sharper pain, and suddenly he was alone outside the girl's lavatory recalling he hadn't visited Myrtle in a while. From there his thoughts flowed out linearly, retelling the event each painful moment at a time. Harry felt a mixture self-depreciation and nausea at his own bungling upon discovering Cassandra and the cold feeling of shock soon after. As he came to the part where he questioned the serpentine faucet and found Myrtle, he was struck by how dangerous these discoveries seemed to him now. He had forced the memories out of his mind the day before, but now Voldemort wouldn't let him discard them, forced him to recall and analyze the moment in excruciating detail.

"It got her. Got her, just like the other one. It got them both. Got the annoying one twice. Tee hee hee..."

A moment later

"...King will be so happy..."

An earlier memory forced it's way through, this time of Inana standing erect on the dueling platform her hood flared in anger, but her words calm.

“Princeling. King’s little princeling... sweet tongued child... No, no, little princeling would not treat Inana this way.”

Princeling... if Harry was the princeling, then the King would have to be-

The pressure receded abruptly, leaving Harry lightheaded and dizzy. The hands on his head were the only thing that kept him from falling over. Carefully, his head was guided downward until it rested against Voldemort’s knee, and one hand removed itself while the other stroked his hair. Harry remained still, gasping for breath and staring out at nothing. His world was spinning, and he tried to reorient himself and determine what he should do with this earth-shattering revelation that the man he was currently resting against may have some how been responsible for Cassandra’s death.

“Careful, Harry,” Voldemort hissed, almost affectionate, “Your thoughts are running into dangerous territory.”

Harry shoved himself away from the man, forcing himself weakly to his feet and back towards his chair. He leaned against it heavily, but refused to sit down to face the Dark Lord again. From the corner of his eye, he saw Snape make a step towards him, then hesitate. He looked towards his master, and though Harry couldn’t see what Voldemort did, Snape stepped back again.

“What now?” Harry managed at last, still not turning around.

Voldemort’s reply was smooth and innocent.

“Now? Now you go to class, Mr. Potter. This matter should be resolved shortly.”

“And Cassandra Sweetie?”

There was a pause.

“There’s nothing that can be done for the late Miss Sweetie, aside from the usual ritual. Her foster family has already been contacted and will arrange her funeral. There will be a memorial service this Sunday so that her friends and classmates might attend and pay their respects.”

That all sounded distinctly unsatisfying to Harry. There was another pause.

“I did not harm that girl, Mr. Potter,” Voldemort said matter-of-factly. “Why would I? I have more important things to do than terrorize school children.”

Harry glanced back at him cautiously, and after a moment he nodded. It was true. There was no conceivable reason why the Dark Lord would hurt a student. But there were many things about what happened that suggested this had happened before with Moaning Myrtle, so for whatever reason the ghost had died must likewise be the reason why Cassandra had. It didn’t necessarily have to be a reason that made sense now if had made sense when Myrtle had been killed. When had the bespeckled girl died again?

The Dark Lord mentally sighed. He could practically see Harry’s thoughts rushing around in his head, though the boy was careful to avoid direct eye contact. He was inclined to cast Imperius on the boy or even perform an obliviation, but he ultimately decided to leave him alone. Harry would need his wits about him for the next couple days, and running around in a daze was likely to arouse suspicions.

“Severus, escort Mr. Potter to his first class, and then report back to me,” he ordered, turning back to his paperwork. He wanted to speak with Snape about what he should do about Potter, but there was another matter he needed to attend to first that required privacy.

The two wizards were gone less than a minute when the portrait of Salazar Slytherin above his desk suddenly turned black, then rippled. Tom practically slithered out of the inky substance, black globules sliding away from his face, his body, his robes reluctantly. The moment he was free the picture solidified again, Salazar flicking a bit of black goo from his robes the only sign of what had occurred.

Tom moved to the chaise by the window, unwilling to sit in the chair across his brother's desk like a child waiting to be scolded by the school disciplinarian. They regarded each other coolly, with twin looks of expectation. Voldemort, however, had the benefit of age and the patience it allowed him. Tom broke the silence first.

"You wished to speak to me?"

"What have you done Tom?" Voldemort hissed, parseltongue turning his already dangerous tone lethal.

Tom glowered back at him.

"This is NOT my doing. I would never be so careless or obvious!"

Voldemort sneered.

"And I suppose you were framed? By whom? Potter?"

"Of course not! No one knows who I am to bother with framing me. But you have the right idea. I think who ever did this is trying to frame Potter."

Now that gave the Dark Lord pause. That hadn't occurred to him. Tom was not reckless enough to unleash the basilisk, as his guilt would be instantly obvious... but only to Voldemort and only because he was a Parselmouth with knowledge of the Chamber. Yet the only parselmouth anyone at the school knew about was himself and... Harry.

A list of people was already flitting through his mind who might hold a grudge against the boy. Slytherins were a jealous lot by nature and the attention he had been giving the Gryffindor was more than enough reason for many to feel resentment, coupled with the boy's Quidditch victories, his popularity with two of the prettiest and richest girl's in his class, and his obvious magical talent and it was rather surprising more attempts hadn't been made to damage the boy's reputation before now.

Lestrangle was at the top of the list, as she knew of the Chamber and was clever enough to find a way inside without using parseltongue. He'd brought several Death Eaters down there just before taking the school to perform various dark rituals and the Lestranges were of course among them. She also had an intense hatred for the boy that he had not overlooked.

Yet there were flaws in that idea. Releasing the basilisk to kill students, even if he had never suspected her, would reflect badly on her ability to run the school and she had been desperate to maintain her position as of late. Unless she had meant to kill Harry and make it appear as if the basilisk had done it, and then kill the basilisk in its lair to prevent the truth from being revealed...

Or it may have been one of the students, acting under their own volition or imperius to break into the chamber and steal the many valuable artifacts and lay the blame on Harry...

Could someone have been using Harry to open the Chamber and accidentally let out its guardian, then tried to cover it up by altering Harry's memories? Harry's thoughts had been a bit odd and disjointed, but that could easily be explained by shock or shoddy memory spells equally.

Then again it might just be Tom fucking with him.

There was only one way to find out. There was, after all, another witness who also happened to be the weapon. Muchalinda.

"Get back to class, Tom, and keep your ear to the ground. If what you're suggesting is true, than it won't take long for the rumors to start. I want to know everything they are saying."

"As you wish, my Lord," his counterpart hissed mockingly, rising to his feet with serpentine grace and disappearing back through the portrait once again. Voldemort stared after him for a long moment.

"I don't remember being that much of a prat..."

In case you're not sure Muchalinda is the basilisk, named after a giant cobra and king of the Nagas (Hindu deities that resemble serpents). Ironic, since Muchalinda is known as a benevolent deity; said to have protected Buddha (and the tree he happened to be meditating under) while he was reaching Enlightenment during a storm.

Any Questions? Leave them in the comments section and I should get back to you within a day or two! Otherwise, have a great weekend!

Chapter 30: The Prince and the Second Quest

The Chamber of Secrets was as beautiful and mysterious as he remembered it. A strange mixture of natural geology and human design; symbolic of an age when practitioners of magic were less apt to differentiate the two. It brought a powerful longing in Voldemort, a nostalgia for a time he had never known yet dreamed of constantly. It had been before Christianity had completely smothered the pagan rites and beliefs of the people, and muggles newly pressed in the idea of monotheism, still held an instinctive fear of something other than the devil.

But he was not here to pay homage to the ancient past nor his ancestor who had made the chamber itself. He was there to find Muchalinda, and so far he wasn't having any luck. He had called to him three times, and though the great serpent was powerful, it would never knowingly defy him. It was gone, and it seemed to have been gone for a while.

The secret entrance from the girl's lavatory was undisturbed, and his questioning of the serpentine faucet/gatekeeper had proved frustrating but not completely fruitless. The chamber had been opened from the inside, meaning whoever had let Muchalinda out had to have entered from the only other secret passage that led here. With neither the gatekeeper as witness nor the guardian present to answer his questions, there was no way he could be certain who had let Muchalinda escape. It did, however, eliminate an Imperius-ed Harry as a possibility since the other entrance was located in the forbidden forest. His choices now seemed limited to only those Death Eaters he had revealed the second secret entrance to over a decade ago. No one else could have known of it and the magical contract binding them to secrecy would have kept it that way.

That eliminated Snape as a suspect, as he hadn't needed to bring the potion's master to the chamber in order to infiltrate the school. He had already done that on his own as a new teacher. Not that he had ever seriously considered Snape. MacNair would have been in class... yet he loathed to drop him as a possible suspect. Lestrangle was capable, but without suitable motive. The six or so still living Death Eaters who knew of the place had to be considered as well. His minions may have done well for themselves after the war, but he had left more than a few disgruntled enough to pitch a hissy fit in the form of terrorism.

Or Tom really was involved.

Tom had no resources and no conceivable motivation, but he was clever. Clever enough to orchestrate a death or two without leaving a clue and clever enough to hide (or destroy) his weapon of choice afterwards.

He should know. He had killed his father and grandparents before graduation and never been accused. He had killed a lover too. And her other lover. And that pick-pocket from Knockturn alley... or had he only maimed that one?

He shoved aside his useless meanderings and headed towards the exit. There were no clues left to be found here, and he was expected back in Bristol later this afternoon. He had just enough time to inform Lestrangle and Snape of what he found or rather didn't find, and perhaps lay a few spells where he felt it warranted.

Time would tell if the threat had passed, disappearing into the unknown with his precious Muchalinda.

Some how, he doubted it.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Cassandra Sweety's funeral was held on Saturday, and only a few of her closest friends had been permitted to leave the school to attend. Harry was not counted among them. The memorial service Voldemort promised was that Sunday, which Harry did attend.

The service was held in a section of the castle Harry had never been in, which was a pity since it was very beautiful. The ceilings were high and vaulted, with equally tall windows on either side, letting southern light streamed in through most of the day. Gothic arches and columns decorated the chamber and divided the room into partitions, elegantly drawing a person's eye's upwards to the ceilings, inlaid with golden lief in patterns Harry vaguely recognized as Greek Orthodox with a heavy Islamic influence. Harry wasn't certain if the room was meant to be a church per se, as the only religious icon he recognized was a sort of cross inlaid with runes standing over the memorial altar which easily could have been removed, but it resembled the inside of a cathedral enough to give a divine aura to the place.

The Hufflepuffs had been hard at work preparing for the service, Harry could tell. The room was laden heavily with white and yellow flowers, of many varieties from lilies and roses to marigolds and baby's breath. There were gold banners, not with Sweety's house crest, but her adoptive family's hanging above them in two rows of six.. Hundreds of white candles in long golden candlesticks glimmered from the dimness of the upper inner sanctum, forming a series of perfect half circles around an altar. The altar was so heavily laden with flowers that you couldn't see the altar underneath, but the framed picture of Cassandra Sweety was clearly visible from the top.

In her frame, Cassandra giggled and flitted in and out of view so that only one part of her face seemed visible at any given time. A twinkling blue eye. The teasing curve of lips. A wisp of wavy brown hair. Every so often she'd pause and pull back and you could see her entire face, and her hands twiddling with her yellow and black scarf.

Harry thought she looked like a very playful and happy person. The sort of girl who would have done well with children and the elderly. But there was no way of knowing now.

Standing amongst the flowers and the candles and the golden banners, Harry felt like little more than a ornament himself in his own glistening white robes. They were merely his school robes transfigured white, much like everyone else's as no one had thought to bring their funeral robes to school, but they seemed so strange to him. Beside him, Hermione who also dressed in white, looked ready for a marriage rather than a funeral. Draco was somewhere in the crowd of white, but with his pale skin and hair he had all but disappeared. Almost the entire school was there, either out of real sympathy or sense of obligation, from the Headmistress all the way down to the Sleuw's.

"In the wizarding world," Hermione whispered, "White is the color of death, not black. It symbolizes purity and a return to the divine light."

Harry supposed it made more sense than black, which he supposed seemed like a symbolic return to absolute nothingness. Still, in the part of him that still thought as a muggle, all this white seemed farcical for such a somber occasion. Especially since the entire school had seemed in a such a gloomy mood.

The Hufflepuffs were of course, hit the hardest. It wasn't uncommon to have one of the girls spontaneously burst into tears during a lesson or a meal, often dragging a few of their classmate's into an emotional fit in the process. The rest of the time they were withdrawn and quiet, avoiding the company of other houses in favor of clustering together in comforting circles.

Slytherins, which were hardly known for their sympathetic side, were more than likely mocking them behind the closed doors of their common room, but in the open halls they remained respectfully reserved with a few exceptions. A few of the more mean spirited boys and a petty Millicent Bulstrode made the mistake of mocking Cassandra Sweet's former boyfriend, Cedric Diggory, throwing out suggestions that he had knocked up the girl and then killed her to keep from taking responsibility. None of his mockers were in Dueling Club, and if they had been they would have known better than to torment the Captain of the Junior Varsity team.

Diggory received a week's worth of detention for what followed. Many thought he got the worst of it, but Harry had seen the Slytherin's leaving Snape's office after the event. The shame in their eyes and the bright red hand print on their cheeks seemed a greater punishment than polishing trophies by hand to Harry.

The Ravenclaws took it mostly in stride, though a few who had the girl in their study group seemed genuinely upset by her absence.

Gryffindor was handling things the worst in Harry's opinion. Gryffindors were witches and wizards of action, not contemplation, and death was something none of them could really do anything about. But they tried anyway. There was a great deal of talk about finding the culprit and making that person pay, but it was mostly talk. Harry himself had been interrogated for clues several times, but he had started replying only in German after a while and then cursing them in Parseltongue shortly after.

There were a few whispers about his involvement in Cassandra's death, but after last year most were still stinging from their misjudgment of him and avoided such rumors.

Harry wasn't sure how long their guilt would hold off their need to blame someone, namely himself. Hermione had warned him that since he was well known, he automatically fell under more intense scrutiny and that made him vulnerable to baseless accusations. He didn't know what he would do if that happened. Being unpopular because of a mistake he'd made was one thing, but being accused of murder was something else altogether.

At least the Hufflepuff's didn't seem to be entertaining that nonsense. He had talked with several of them as they had gathered for the memorial service. Their honest grief over Cassandra touched Harry, and the pained look in their eyes when they asked whether it appeared she had suffered in her last moments inclined him to answer them as he hadn't anyone else, not even Hermione.

"She looked a little startled. I think she died before the surprise had even worn off. There was no pain in her expression."

The girls all cried. Every single one of them. A few of the boys too. Diggory had nodded once, taken a deep breath and thanked him.

The memorial service lasted an hour and a half. A few teachers talked about what a hard working student she was, her determination, and the regret that she wouldn't go on to aid the wizarding world with her strength and her character. Her friends talked of less grand things. Of study groups where there was more laughter than actual studying, where comforting a friend had meant more than studying for an exam, and smiles even when things didn't go as planned or perhaps because they didn't.

Afterwards they all walked by her memorial, laying down cards and more flowers and trinkets. Harry hadn't known her, but feeling a strange connection to her, had drawn a picture of a lark for her. One of her friends had said it was her spirit animal.

For the first time since the murder that Wednesday, Harry wanted to be alone. Unable to leave the common room like the rest of his House until Monday morning classes, he had to settle for pulling the curtain around his bed and casting a silencing charm.

Secluded in his new, smaller world consisting only of his bed, the surrounding darkness, and the sound of his pocket watch ticking softly, Harry lay thinking for a long time.

"There really is nothing else I can do for her, is there?" he asked himself, recalling his last conversation with Voldemort.

Cassandra was gone and there was no bringing her back.

But... God, how many times would this happen? Girls dying in that bathroom. Had it happened before Myrtle? Would Cassandra eventually return as a ghost to haunt the bathroom in Myrtle's place? And what about the bespeckled ghost? Being already dead, the chances were she was only paralyzed or stunned or in some sort of stasis. All these things could be undone, given the right spell or incantation or incense. Would she eventually be unparalyzed, exorcised and evicted from the castle, or hidden away like an unwanted painting? Had she been removed from the school already? Should he risk Snape's attention by asking?

No.

Hell no.

But how could he...?

The faint ticking sound suddenly grew louder in his ears. Of course! He pulled out his watch, and climbed out of his bed. Several boys were startled by his sudden appearance but he didn't offer any explanation, instead retrieving what he wanted from his trunk before scurrying back into his small sanctuary.

He cast a lumos and studied Voldemort's gift. The golden band glistened in the light, a shade brighter than his golden watch. He had been meaning to try it out all year, but hadn't found a suitable target or place to test it on. Slipping the band over his watch, he observed with rapt attention as it glowed white for a moment and then shrank to surround the face.

The hands of the watch, which had indicated it was fifteen minutes til dinner, suddenly moved. The short hand pointed towards Harry, while the long hand pointed towards three. Harry rotated the watch, and the hands changed time but always pointed in the same direction. It took him a moment to realize that the long hand pointed North by default, like a compass, and the short hand always pointed towards himself.

"Where is Myrtle Tetherwood?" he whispered, half a afraid of the answer. The long hand twitched, and then slowly rotated counterclockwise until it reached the number seven. There it stopped. It was pointing further into the castle. Harry grinned.

At least he knew Myrtle was alive...er... not gone anyway.

Now all he had to do was get to the library and figure out what was wrong with not knowing was intolerable. It may have be pointless, but he needed to know what really happened. He needed to know it would never happen again.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Opportunity presented itself that very night, without Harry having to do a thing.

Clyde had timidly invaded his 'fortress of solitude' when it came time to go to dinner.

"Hey, mate. You hungry?"

Truthfully, he wasn't, but he no longer felt like being alone. He had an idea, a project of sorts that he thought his friends might be interested in helping him with. Now if only he could get them alone long enough to ask them.

"Come on then, Clyde," came Percy's authoritative voice, "There's going to be an announcement at dinner, so everyone is expected to attend. That includes you, Mister Potter!"

"Yes, your Majesty," Clyde muttered, earning a little smile from Harry.

They met Hermione in the common room, already packed with students lining up to be escorted to the Great Hall. She gave Harry's still white and now rumpled robes a disapproving look before muttering a couple of spells.

"Honestly, Harry, you really need to read the book I gave you for your birthday. I can't be doing your laundry every day."

He just smirked. Truthfully, he had read half of it already and it was good, but he tended to skip the sections on 'domestic housework'. He'd lived in his Aunt Petunia's fastidiously clean house for years and it had sort of turned him off of anything that resembled a chore... However, there was another book she had wanted him to read that he was more interested in at the moment.

"Hermione, do you still have 'Hogwarts; A History'?"

Clyde looked horrified. "Bloody hell mate, she just forgot about it this year and you have to go and remind her?!"

She favored him with glare, leaving him cowed, before turning her intrigued eyes to Harry. "I'm way ahead of you, Harry."

Looking to make sure no one was watching them, she pulled the aforementioned book (albeit shrunk to the size of a match box) from her pocket and showed it to him then quickly put it back before anyone else noticed. Harry gave her a surprised look. She rolled her eyes.

“Why’d I have to open my big mouth?”

“What’s wrong with you, Clyde?” Ginny asked, passing him a basket of rolls. The youngest Weasley didn’t often sit with the second years, feeling a bit naive surrounded by veteran students and her newest crush to boot, but there had been some rather offensive rumor-mongering amongst her fellow first years and she had decided to sit with Harry to demonstrate exactly what she thought of that. Honestly, as if Harry Potter would ever hurt anyone! McNair didn’t count, since that was self-defense in her opinion.

“Ignore him,” said Hermione, trading Harry’s hot potato for a salad, much to the boy’s consternation. “He’s just crying over spilt milk.”

Ginny wrinkled her freckled nose.

“Is this about that first year Hufflepuff? Cathy Ratchet or something? ‘Cause honestly, Clyde, she’s kinda of a nit. Nice, but a nit.”

“It’s Cathy Wicket, and she’s not a nit. Just because she actually acts like a real girl, doesn’t make her stupid. Jeez, you could use a few lessons from her!”

“Next time I want to know many times to flutter my eyes or who the most eligible sixth year is, I’ll remember that!”

“Calm down, both of you,” Hermione scolded, turning to Harry who was prodding his salad with his fork. “Aren’t you going to say anything?”

“I hate salad.”

She rolled her eyes. “Anything useful?”

“I like potatoes... with sour cream... and butter... and cheese...”

“Harry!”

“Well... it’s useful if you want to give me my potato back.”

Hermione rolled her eyes, while the others were now distracted enough from their argument to actually laugh. She was half way through her lecture on the importance of a good diet, especially for a boy as physically active as Harry with his Quidditch and Dueling Club activities, when Lestrangle drew the student's attention by tapping her glass. The resulting chime spread rang like a great bell through the hall, silencing all conversation.

"Good Evening, students," she began, looking the most relaxed she had since the term had started, "I have some good news. After a thorough investigation, the culprit of last Wednesday's heinous crime has been discovered."

Excited murmurs erupted from every table. Harry and his friends shared cautious looks of suspicion and hope. Lestrangle tapped her glass again to draw back their attention, completely unperturbed by their interruption.

"As I was saying, it turns out that this unfortunate incident was not in fact an act of murder by a wizard as so many have come to believe, but the result of an animal attack."

More murmurs, this time rather disbelieving. Who had ever heard of a student being attacked by an animal in Hogwarts? (Outside of Care of Magical Creatures and occasionally DA&D, of course).

"Now, now children, I think it is important that you remember that the school is built beside a very dangerous forest with some of the greatest populations of magical creatures in Britain," the Headmistress chided, "Upon examining Miss Sweetie, it was found that she had been bitten by an arachnid, a very aggressive and very venomous breed of spider. A nest was found in some of the vents and destroyed, and additional wards have been set up to destroy any spiders that may have escaped. Hogwarts is once again safe."

A great cheer rose up through the students, and even the Hufflepuffs looked happy or at the very least satisfied. Harry, however, wasn't. Lestrangle was lying and he knew it. There was no way a spider, however venomous, could have harmed Myrtle. Hermione nudged him with her elbow.

“Clap, Harry,” she said, smiling stiffly and applauding with everyone else. “We know she’s full of it, but we don’t need to let her know we’re aware of that.”

Reluctantly, Harry joined the others cheer, although if anyone had seen his ‘smile’ they would say it looked more like he’d swallowed something sour. Discreetly, he searched the Hall for anyone who doubted the Headmistress’s words as much as he did. Snape was sitting quietly, neither smiling or applauding, but staring out at the students contemptuously. He moved his gaze along before the man spotted him, found McGonagal looking as reluctantly cheerful as he felt, and McNair grinning a bit too much, likely amused at what he knew was a lie. He found the Slytherin’s table next. Draco was applauding politely with the others, although his expression was neutral. There was no telling if the Malfoy heir believed his aunt’s words or not. Natalie just looked bored, seemingly regretful that all the excitement was coming to an end. Ron... looked constipated... moving on...

Tom.

The fifth year boy was neither smiling nor applauding, but regarding the Headmistress with a thinly hidden veneer of disgust. Harry felt his smile become a bit more real as he realized there was at least one other who questioned what they were being told. He turned back to his own table looking for the Weasley twins. Fred and George were taking the excitement as an opportunity to slip something into Percy’s pockets, while the other was distracted. Harry shook his head. He’d just have to ask them point blank later.

“Yes, yes,” Lestrage said, preening under the applause as if it were meant for her, “This is all wonderful news, but lets settle down. I have a few more announcements.”

Everyone took their seats and stopped clapping, but there was still a dull roar of pleased murmurs. The Headmistress continued.

“Since the school has once again been secured, I am allowing the continuation of extra curricular activities, unsupervised movements between and after classes, and the resumption of Hogsmead Weekends. The Gryffindor/Hufflepuff Quidditch match will be held next Saturday, and the Ravenclaw/Slytherin match will be bumped to Sunday. All other matches will resume as scheduled.”

Another resounding cheer rose through the Hall, leading to such a racket that Lestrange could say nothing more and resigned herself to her seat. She sparred Snape a smug look, but the potion’s master looked less than impressed with the mess of rampant students she’d left in the wake of her announcements.

Harry, Hermione, and Clyde took the flurry of activity to gather up a bit of dinner and leave the Great Hall for their common room. There were half way there when Ginny caught up to them.

“What’s going on? Why did you guys leave?”

The three shared anxious looks.

“Ah... the library,” Clyde stammered.

“What?”

“Oh! Yes, we’re heading to the library,” Hermione picked up, “We haven’t been able to visit since Friday and it was so crowded we didn’t get anything done! We want to get started on the essays we didn’t finish before everyone else gets done with dinner.”

Ginny’s expression was clearly doubtful. She looked shyly to Harry.

“Sweetey wasn’t killed by a spider, so we’re going to try and figure out what did,” he said bluntly.

“Harry!” his friends protested in unison. He glowered back at them.

“If there’s something killing students wandering the halls of Hogwarts I think she has the right to know.”

There wasn't anything they could say in protest to that. Ginny looked curious.

"O-oh... I wondered... C-can I help?"

"Can you keep it a secret?"

"Harry!"

"Secret? Why I don't know... I've never had any secrets before," the younger girl said, laughing nervously as if she'd made a bad joke and knew it. Harry grinned.

"Okay, then."

"Harry!"

"The more who know the truth, the better," was his only response. "It makes it that much harder to kill."

Hermione's expression stated clearly that she didn't agree.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape left dinner early to take refuge in the dungeons. Dinner was always a circus with that many children crammed that closely together in the presence of food, but tonight it was particularly rowdy. He understood their exuberance, but must they all act like screeching monkeys with bananas? At least his Slytherins had kept relatively well behaved, speaking just loud enough so that they could hear each other over the din from the other tables.

Many of his snakes hadn't seemed inclined to talk at all. Draco, he knew, was suspicious. Smart lad, his godson. So was his new student Thomas Rook. Also a smart lad... unnervingly so. Rook had integrated himself into Slytherin hierarchy in record time, charming and manipulating his classmates and teachers with the ease of an experienced politician, and his ambitions for more were apparent. At least to Snape.

He had seen the boy observing Harry Potter during meal times on several occasions and Draco had mentioned Rook's curiosity regarding the Dark Lord's 'favorite student'. His godson's words had suggested the interest was more carnal than political, but the young Malfoy was young enough to confuse the two... many adults still did. It was possible the interest was both. In any case, Snape felt the boy worth watching.

Someone had to protect Potter, after all, and Lestrage clearly wasn't going to cut it. She wasn't even going to make an attempt to protect the rest of the students. Her removal of the staff's safeguards and the state of complacency she had now lulled the little nitwits into was beyond reckless in his opinion. It was unforgivable.

The situation was strange enough to Snape to warrant a repeat incident, a further teasing. It didn't matter if their Lord hadn't been able to find the basilisk. In fact, that was even more worrisome. Lestrage seemed convinced the culprit who had unleashed the snake had destroyed it afterwards. Voldemort hadn't done anything to dissuade her of this theory, but to Snape it was obvious that whoever had done it wasn't targeting Sweetie or Myrtle. They were either an accident or the beginning of a very disturbing trend.

Voldemort had already left the castle to return to Bristol, leaving Lestrage with the acromantula story and Snape with explicit instructions to remain alert and protect Potter, suspecting that the boy might somehow be a target. Snape was less convinced, but the little Gryffindork had disappeared immediately after Lestrage's announcement with his goddaughter and some friends, and he couldn't help but wonder if they weren't up to something.

Perhaps Potter had simply wanted to warn them. Officially, Snape would have to object to the uncovering of one of the Dark Lord's many lies, but at the same time he was pleased Potter was opting to protect Hermione, and Draco by proxy. He was fond of those three...two, he meant two!

Just as likely, Potter was letting his curiosity get the best of him, thus risking Hermione, and Draco by proxy. Then he'd have to roast the little fool on a spit and feed him to the basilisk... or Rook.

He was going to have to find out soon if he wanted to keep all of them out of trouble.

Mentally, Snape sighed. When and how had he ended up playing father for Hogwarts's most troublesome?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Just a reminder:

DA&D stands for 'Dark Arts & Defense'. It's like DADA, accept it includes actual Dark Arts in the curriculum, not just how to defend against it.

Chapter 31: The Hunt

"They blamed an acumantula last time this happened," Hermione said, handing over 'Hogwarts: A History' to Harry. The four of them were gathered in at the far end of the library, surrounded by a silencing charm. They had selected a couple of books on hexes and dueling, so that if anyone should question their secretive behavior they could say they were studying for matches against other Houses in Dueling Club. No one else had come up from dinner yet, but Madam Pince was eying them suspiciously.

"What do you mean, 'the last time this happened'?" Clyde asked, looking over Harry's shoulder at the article.

"According to 'Hogwarts: A History', another girl died in the exact same manner as Sweetie did, and in the exact same location, almost fifty years ago," Hermione explained.

"Oh! Moaning Myrtle! I've heard about her from Patricia York. She says she's a right menace, what with flooding the bathroom and screeching at anyone who enters," Ginny let out excitedly. "If that's the case, then we can just ask her what happened right?"

"Who the heck is Moaning Myrtle?"

"She's a ghost of a first year who haunts the girl's dungeon lavatory," Harry said.

"Gross! Who could take a leak with a dead girl floating through the stall?"

"Clyde!" Hermione scolded, but then tilted her head in concession, "Well, I suppose that's pretty accurate. No one really goes in there because she's pretty up-in-your-face as soon as you step inside. But she is a gabber. I bet she'd tell us what happened-"

"No."

All three looked at Harry, surprised.

“What? You think she’d tell someone we asked her?” Hermione asked.

“No, I mean it’s impossible to ask her. She’s been... I dunno what’s been done to her, but the investigators brought me back into the lavatory, I found Myrtle in one of the stalls. She looked like she’d been frozen in place. She just sort of ... floated there with this vacant expression on her face. Can you curse a ghost?”

“Wait, why didn’t you say this before?” Ginny asked.

“Ginny, I’m sorry to say that just about half of everything I say about what happens to me has been edited for content. Voldemort and Snape keep the scissors.”

Ginny shuddered.

“Well...ah... that’s a clue at least, right? I mean, who would know how to curse a ghost?”

“Snape,” offered Clyde.

“No,” Hermione cut off pointedly. “I don’t think there are any spells you can caste directly on a ghost. You’d need special equipment or incense or incantations. Really, it would have been a lot easier to exorcise her rather than ... suspend her. But that’s a clue. We should start looking up things that could do that to a ghost. Maybe we can figure out how it was done and then figure out who or what could have done it.”

“Or perhaps we could just find a cure and ask Myrtle directly,” Harry offered.

Everyone looked rather interested in his idea for a moment, but then Hermione sighed.

“No, they’ve probably exorcised her by now. She would have been proof that an acumantula hadn’t killed Sweetie. They would have hidden her at the very least.”

Harry pulled out his watch and grinned.

“Thankfully, I’m a master at ending up exactly where I’m not suppose to be.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“I’m going to kill Potter!”

Tom looked up from his book, ‘A History of Serpents and Magic’, to observe Draco Malfoy storming into the Slytherin Commons Room. He was followed shortly after by his little band of cronies and the Cypher girl, all with varying degrees of agreement. Tom mentally rolled his eyes. Draco’s frustrated and often ambiguous friendship with Potter was infamous among Slytherins, and resulted in many speculations on his true feelings towards the Gryffindor.

The most common were as followed: Draco was secretly in love with Harry, but would never admit it. Draco was secretly in love with his adopted sister, and hated Harry because he was competition. Draco wanted Harry to marry his sister Hermione, and was frustrated when he did stupid things to muck that up. Draco hated Harry, but kept him as a friend because of his influence with the dark lord. Draco hated Harry, and was pretending to be his friend so he could destroy him later.

Tom was of the personal opinion that Draco both admired and envied Harry, and hated himself because of it. It didn’t really matter to Tom. He didn’t intend on letting Draco remain in Harry’s sphere of influence for much longer, and the boy was still young enough not to pose a real threat. He turned back to his book, fully prepared to ignore the Malfoy heir but his next words drew his attention back.

“Some one died, and Potter’s already meddling and dragging my sister along with him! I swear the next dueling practice I’m knocking his head clean off his shoulders! It’s not like he uses the silly thing!”

“Draco, you’re being paranoid,” Natalie said, sighing, “They went to the library, not the dungeons. I bet your sister dragged them up there to study.”

“With Ginny? She doesn’t have any of the same classes as them!”

Natalie shrugged. “For Dueling Club then. Maybe just to talk about what’s happened. If they have a half a knut worth of sense between them then they don’t believe Lestranger’s load of dragon dung about spiders anymore than we do.”

Ron paused, mirroring Crabbe and Goyle’s looks of confusions. “It wasn’t really a spider?”

The two blonds rolled their eyes, and continued to stalk up to the second year dormitories. Tom pretended to read his book for another fifteen minutes, then got up to head to the library. If what Draco suspected was right, then Harry was setting himself up for trouble.

An intervention might be in order.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry and his friends spent almost four hours in the library researching ghosts and old newspapers regarding the death of Myrtle Tetherwood. There was a lot of material about the ghosts, less so about Myrtle.

“I can’t seem to find anything about her in the newspapers,” Hermione lamented, “There seems to be some missing around the time of her death, but there’s no way of knowing if they were removed before or after Sweetie’s. But it does suggest that they’re connected some how.”

“Yeah, and I doubt a spider went around stealing newspapers,” Harry said, before turning to his book, Dealing with the Dreadful Dead.

“Maybe McGonagal would know,” Ginny suggested, “She would be about the right age to attend Hogwarts then, wouldn’t she?”

Hermione shook her head. "She'd never tell us, if she even knows. She probably thought it really was an acromantula, like everyone else at the time anyway."

The bookish witch turned suddenly thoughtful.

"It's weird though, that both girls were killed in that bathroom. I mean, if it were an animal or a person, what are the chances of them killing someone in the same place?"

"Well," Clyde said, taking the opportunity to close his book on exorcisms, "that depends. If I were an animal or homicidal wizard, where would I be most apt to kill anyone I met?"

Everyone turned him expectantly. He grinned and rolled his eyes.

"It's obvious. It'd be the place where I wouldn't want anyone else but me to be. My secret lair."

"In the girl's bathroom? What kind of lair is that?!" Ginny protested.

"Wait," Harry interrupted, "Clyde might have something there. It might not be the bathroom itself, but perhaps there's a secret passage in there. There's secret passages all over the school, especially in the dungeons. They say no one's ever found them all. Perhaps Cassandra and Myrtle both found it, and accidentally set off a trap of some kind. Maybe a curse or a poison... or a guardian."

There was a tense moment of silence as they digested the possibility..

"If that's the case, and they accidentally released a guardian to some secret passage... then I bet the Dark Lord knows about it," Hermione finally continued, "That's why there's this big cover up. That's why they're blaming it on something as ridiculous as spiders. They want to keep it a secret."

"But what if it really is a spider," Clyde suggested, "What if the acromantula was the 'guardian'?"

"I doubt it," said Harry, "A spider wouldn't have been able to bite Myrtle. Besides, I've talked to Myrtle before. She said she saw a pair of big yellow eyes just before she died. I think spiders have six or eight or something like that."

"Harry! Why didn't you mention that before?!"

"Sorry, Hermione, I kind of forgot about it, really."

"Hold up a sec. When did you go into the girl's bathroom before? Why did you, for that matter," Clyde asked.

Harry turned a bit pink around the ears. "I got sick after potions last year, and ran into the first bathroom I could find. I still don't know where the boy's bathroom is down there. But that's really not important right now!"

Hermione sighed and closed her books.

"I think we should call it a night."

"What? But we've just started making progress!" Ginny protested.

"Hardly," Hermione said tiredly. "We've only got a theory, and one that's going to require us getting a lot more books about things other than exorcisms and ghosts. I think we need to decide whether we want to pursue finding a cure for Myrtle first or start investigating a secret passage theory before we continue. Let's head back for now. I need to talk with Draco and I still have to study for next Friday's History of Magic quiz."

Ginny and Clyde agreed, but Harry lingered.

"I'm just going to see if I can find some old maps of Hogwarts. It might prove useful if we're looking for a secret passage or a hidden ghost. I'll meet up with you all at dinner."

"Alright, Harry, just don't get carried away. And be careful!"

“Yeah, those paper cuts can be deadly,” Clyde laughed. Ginny smacked him upside the head. They disappeared somewhere beyond the book shelves and Harry cancelled the silencing charm. Now he could hear the faint sounds of library activity, pages rustling, vague whispers, and the light creak of old wood. Pulling his watch from his pocket he whispered ‘Hogwart’s maps’ and let it lead him to the far end of the library, where he found himself looking at the locked gate to the Restricted Section.

“Well, damn.”

“You should be grateful for the locks, Mr. Potter. Your curiosity in that room will kill more than just a cat.”

Harry jumped, dropping the books he’d been carrying and spun around to see Snape looking coolly down at him. Mentally, he let out a groan. Just the person he didn’t need to see. From the other end of the library he could see Madam Pince glowering over at him, and he avoided her accusing gaze as well as Snape’s by gathering up his books.

“Nervousness is a sign that a person is up to no good, you know,” the potion’s master drawled.

“Or that someone else is up to no good,” Harry muttered back, then glowered at the man, making a point to look just above his head as he did so. There wasn’t any reason to take chances.

“Ah, perhaps,” Snape conceded generously, but snatch up a book from amongst those he was carrying. He read the title and raised a brow at Harry, who was now blushing. “‘The Anatomy of the Spiritual Body’. Found religion, have we?”

“It’s not about religion, it’s about metaphysics,” the Gryffindor bit out, taking the book back.

“I don’t recall metaphysics being apart of the second year curriculum, Mr. Potter.”

“Personal interest, Professor. Detentions have been rather low this semester.”

Judging by Snape’s expression, the older wizard clearly didn’t believe him, but he let it go for the moment. He pulled a letter from an inner pocket.

“This will likely be of personal interest, as well. If you think you might put aside your meanderings on your inevitable demise for a few moments, you might like to know you’ve received a letter.”

Now Harry’s interest was definitely perked. His mail, as far as he knew, was handled completely through owl post with the exception of ...

“Sirius.”

“Yes.”

Harry reached up to take the letter, but Snape grabbed his wrist with his free hand, and pulled him forward so the older wizard could hiss in his ear.

“I would like to take this opportunity to remind you that these letters are a privilege for both you and your mangy godfathers, and so can be taken away if either of you behave poorly. Poor behavior includes, but is not limited to, meddling in affairs that do not concern you and lying to your guardians. I trust we have an understanding?”

The man’s grip was incredibly strong, and Harry knew he could snap his arm without hardly trying. Worse, perhaps, was the fact that he had the power to uphold his threat, severing the last chances Harry had at family. Reluctantly, he looked Snape in the eye.

“I understand, Professor.”

Snape held his gaze for moment, but there was no pressure or the slithering feeling of a foreign presence in Harry’s mind, and finally the potion’s master released him and handed him his letter.

“Good. I trust we will not require a repeat of this conversation.”

Harry’s gaze fell to his shoes.

“No, Professor.”

Snape nodded sharply and turned to leave. He made it all the way to the end of the first row of shelves, before pausing. Harry was afraid he was going to say something else to him, but instead he turned to towards another row of books.

“Good evening, Mr. Rook. Studying hard, are we?”

There was a pause, and a very reluctant response.

“Yes, Professor.”

A wave of humiliation washed over Harry. Had Tom been there through Snape’s entire visit? Had he seen him spook at Snape’s sudden appearance? Had he heard his godfather’s name? Snape’s threat? Had he seen Harry’s pathetic submission? He didn’t know, but whatever Tom saw or thought he did, Harry didn’t want to be around to face the older boy’s questions or pity. He quickly slipped down another aisle, left his books with Madam Pince, and escaped to the hallway.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape kept his eyes on Rook, but listened closely to Harry’s retreat. Rook hadn’t spoken, and the potion’s master suspected he was listening as well. He was glad he had decided to deliver Harry’s letter here. It had originally been his intention to wait till after Monday morning Potions, but the abrupt appearance of Sirius Black’s belated letter provided him the opportunity to sate his curiosity on Harry and Hermione’s activities in the library. He had learned two very important things from the excursion.

One, the Gryffindors either weren’t investigating after all and were pursuing stranger hobbies involving ghosts or they had devised a theory that had absolutely nothing to do with basilisks. Both circumstances meant he didn't have to worry about them discovering the truth about Sweety (and really, what was the truth?), but still meant he would have to watch to make sure they didn't get involved with different kind of dangers altogether.

Two, Rook really was interested in Harry. Perhaps even stalking the young wizard. That was something he was going to have to list in his next report to Voldemort. It might provide him with sufficient reason to perform a background check on the mysterious boy. Failing that, it would at least reassure the Dark Lord that he was being vigilant in his duty regarding Potter, and perhaps even further validate Snape's importance at Hogwarts.

Every little bit helped.

He smirked at Rook. “Your diligence to your academics is commendable, Mr. Rook. So many students become distracted in their free time. I am glad to see that is not the case with you. After all, with your late admittance to the school, it is important for your future university to see how well you acclimated to student life at an institutional level...”

Every little bit helped.

Rook's expression was cool and neutral, but the lack of his usual confident smile, told Snape his threat had been received and given appropriate significance.

“Yes, Professor.”

“Well, then I will leave you to it. Don’t stay too late.”

With that he strode out of the library, gracing Madam Pince with a wicked smirk. The strict librarian blushed inexplicably and turned away from him to sort through the books Potter had left on her counter.

[illegible]

Tom watched Professor Snape's withdrawal, thoroughly flummoxed. Fifty years ago, he could not recall a single wizard who had been able to see through and out maneuver him with the exception of Albus Dumbledore.

And Severus Snape was no Albus Dumbledore.

Not yet anyway.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry practically ran out of Hogwarts. Or at least the castle. He had hidden his letter in an inner pocket upon entering the school corridors, and then headed straight for the green houses. After his initial embarrassment of Tom witnessing Snape's reprimand, he was filled with excitement and anxiety over his godfathers' letter. He had been waiting for so long, he didn't want anyone to disturb him while he was reading, friend or foe, and went to one of the most private places he knew.

No one but Professor Sprout and Harry used Green House number three, and Harry only went there to visit and care for Inana. The highly venomous cobra lurking amongst the greenery was more than enough of a deterrent to curious students. Inana had an understanding, via Harry, that Sprout was there simply as a humble servant to keep the illustrious Queen Inana's abode suitably green and lush and should thus be ignored completely when ever she came or went. Sprout assumed Harry had simply commanded Inana to leave her alone.

As if he could command a snake to do anything it didn't want to do. Convince, perhaps, but never command.

So he knocked on the green house door, and then slipped inside. Inana was curled up sleepily in one of Sprout's tin tubs, and hardly gave him any mind. He found a large, upside down pot he used as a chair, and made himself comfortable. He took out his letter and began to read.

Dear Prongslet

Firstly, sorry we couldn't write to you sooner. I left a dead fish in Loki's bed, and the twerp threw such a hissy fit, I wasn't allowed to write for a while. He deserved it, I swear!

Harry rolled his eyes, but smiled. Why was he not surprised? Incredibly relieved, but not surprised.

Secondly, don't worry about being a parselmouth. Your father told me once that your great-grandfather was one as well, but never told anyone outside of the family. He was also a Gryffindor, and a very kind and decent man. Don't let anyone hold this talent against you.

A surge of joy fill him. It was a family trait! A gift passed down the Potter line, perhaps the descendants of Slytherin, but obviously the black sheep of that particular family. And Sirius and Remus knew and didn't care! Thank Merlin! Thank God!

Of course, we could have told you this if you had bothered to mention it before you managed to run off and started setting cobras on dark wizards. You do know you made it into Wizarding Weekly again, don't you?

Eep. So that's how Voldemort knew to send Umbridge.

Judging by McNair's short vacation to St. Mungo's, I take it you won that duel. Congratulations. We're so proud of you. Or I am at least. Remus was puttering around like such a girl. 'Oh, poor Harry, he must have been terrified!' 'What if Harry was hurt? What if he's mentally traumatized for life?!' I was more worried about you actually joining a club taught by Snivellus. Are you mad?!

Well, if you are, welcome to the club.

Harry grinned, and continued to read.

[illegible]

Harry's good mood lasted all the way until Wednesday. Sirius' letter had been long and pleasant and such a relief. Despite all the bad things that had happened, he couldn't help but feel things were starting to take a turn for the better. The only down side to receiving it had been Snape's threat. Hermione and Draco had also received a little 'talk' after potion's class on Monday, and though Hermione hadn't told them what was said he had a pretty good idea. The potion master's scrutiny had temporarily halted all research in the library until they could think of a more discreet way to search.

It likely wouldn't have mattered anyway, as everyone seemed much to busy catching up with school work and missed club activities to spare much time. His Quidditch team was in a fierce competition with their rivals for time on the pitch, and Harry found himself dragged off for practices at a moment's notice at the oddest times. During lunch break, just before breakfast, and half an hour before sunset were just a few examples of his quirky practice schedule. Clyde had taken to bringing Harry and his adoptive uncles snacks and meals they missed because of it. The boy chalked it up to 'showing House spirit' by supporting the team, but Harry was touched by the gesture nonetheless.

It was during one of these meal runs that Wednesday evening, that Clyde came upon his friend being given an unusual assignment by Oliver Wood.

"Angelina's late," the captain said. "She probably didn't get the message or something. I want you to go back to the castle to see if you can find her, kay Harry? It's almost sunset and not good light for practicing with the snitch, even with an illumination charm, so after you do this you can skip practice. Kay?"

"Sure," Harry agreed, albeit reluctantly. As much as everyone seemed to value his Seeker's skill, they still tended to treat him like the part-time towel boy he'd been last year as punishment for flying without permission during his first flying lesson. It was rather annoying.

“Come on, Harry!” Clyde urged, “Let’s eat at the table for once. You remember the table right? The food actually stays hot there and they serve dessert!”

Harry smiled and followed his friend back to the castle. Taking out his watch he said Angelina’s name, and observed as the long hand pointed down an empty corridor.

“That’s weird,” Clyde said, “There’s nothing down there but the Hufflepuff’s dormitory.”

“Hold on, let me check something.”

Harry turned the watch upright and watched as the long hand started to angle upwards.

“She’s on a higher floor. I think it’s pointing toward the library or near there. Come on.”

“What’s she doing in the library? It’s already dinner time. I thought the only girl crazy enough to choose a book over food was Hermione.”

“You can ask her yourself when we find her.”

The halls were mostly empty, with only a few students and teachers heading down to the Great Hall, until they reached the fourth floor which seemed entirely deserted. A distant flash of lightening drew their attention and after a moment the distant rumble of thunder could be heard.

“Looks like practice will be cancelled anyway,” Harry lamented. “I hope Wood lets them off soon enough to avoid getting rained on.”

Clyde remained silent. Glancing over at his friend, Harry saw that he wasn’t paying him any attention at all, but looking further down the hall. He followed Clyde’s line of sight and jumped in surprise as another round of lightening cast a figure in blinding white and darkest shadow. The light faded almost immediately, revealing Angelina, looking down at what appeared to be a make-up mirror.

“Angelina!” Harry called, but she didn’t look up. He frowned and moved forward, but Clyde grabbed him by his arm.

“Something’s not right.”

Their wands were in their hands instantly, a special flick of the wrist Snape had taught them in Dueling Club that they hadn’t thought they would ever need to use in the halls of Hogwarts. They scanned the surrounding hall, found it empty, and slowly moved forward.

“Angelina?” Harry tried again, but she remained motionless.

“I don’t like this, Harry.”

“Me neither.”

At last they were beside her. There was still no response. Cautiously, Harry reached out to touch the underside of her neck.

“She’s alive, and still warm. She must have been cursed.”

“Do you think she’s been petrified?”

“Maybe, but not the kind we learned in Quirrell’s class. It kind of... She looks kind of like Myrtle did...”

They shared a telling look, and spun around to scan the hall yet again.

“What do we do?” Clyde asked.

“I’ll stay here and guard Angelina. You go to the Great Hall and find some teachers.”

“But what if it comes back?”

“That’s why I can’t leave Angelina alone. She’s can’t defend herself like this.”

“But Harry!”

“Go! The faster you get someone the better.”

The other boy hesitated, clearly torn about leaving his friend alone and finding help for Angelina. Realizing he couldn't convince Harry to come with him, he finally bolted back towards the stairs and out of sight. A distant roll of thunder drowned out the sound of his shoes on the stones.

Alone in the hall, Harry tried to calm himself. Angelina wasn't dead. This was a bad school prank. The Slytherin team trying to sabotage Gryffindor's practices. A finite incantatem later, and she would probably be fine. He would try it himself, but McNair's warning against applying counter-curses without knowing the actual curse hadn't been forgotten. Madam Pomfrey or Flickwit or even Snape would know what this was, and a simple incantation or a bad tasting potion later and everything would be back to normal. He swore he was going to cream Slytherin in their next match.

“Bloody hell, Potter, what did you do?!”

Harry spun around, his wand ready with a curse to defend himself, but he hesitated. Ron Weasley stood at the end of the hallway, his wand in one hand and accusatory glare on his face. Suddenly, Harry realized what this must look like to the other boy.

“Bullocks.”

Chapter 32: The Hunt

“Expelliarmus!”

“Refutia! Knock it off, Weasley. You’re going to hit Angelina!” Harry snapped, after fending off the third disarming spell Ron had thrown at him.

“Ha! Says that bastard who cursed her!” Ron snarled, “What she do, Potter? Turn down an offer for a date? Is that what happened to Sweetie? You’re a sick bloody fucker! Rofendio!”

“Refondae! I didn’t do anything, you stupid twat! She was like this when I got here!”

“Sure, just like Sweetie was just lying there when you found her too! Sorentia! Peticio salenco! Porinarde desticia!”

Harry could only recognize the first two hexes, and with no time to caste a counter curse and figure out the third, he caste his strongest blocking charm. The spells smashed into it at once, causing his shield to trembled violently until they dissipated or veered off harmlessly into a wall. His arm tingled in the aftermath.

“Oh, bugger off, you flipping muggleborn-hating little Nazi. Clyde went to get-”

The spell that hit him, smashed him sideways into wall. He fell to the ground and was unable to move, too stunned to understand what had happened. Ron had been in front of him, looking for an opening for his next hex that hopefully wouldn’t hit the still frozen Angelina, and what ever had hit him had definitely come from behind but he hadn’t heard a curse.

“What is the meaning of this?” came an angry, feminine voice.

For an instant, Harry though Clyde had managed to find McGonagall, but his heard sank as he managed to roll over weakly and look up at the fuzzy outline of Madam Umbridge scowling down at him. He closed his eyes and let out groan.

"I caught Potter hexing... whoever this is," he heard Ron say, and suspected he'd thrown in accusatory pointing for dramatic affect. Another familiar, and equally unwelcome voice joined in.

"That true, Potter?" McNair snarled.

Oh, wonderful. Two of his worst enemies (and a very annoying toad woman) gathered in one spot, and him having already lost his wand.

"No," Harry said, not bothering to pick himself up. If they intended to curse him again, he wasn't going to give them the excuse of self defense. He would lay there and wait for Clyde to show up with a real teacher and straighten this all out.

"Liar!" snarled Ron, "I was coming from the library, and saw him with his wand pointed at that girl."

"I didn't point it at her," Harry grumbled, still not bothering to get up or look at any of them. "I had my wand drawn in case who ever cursed Angelina was still around. And shouldn't you be trying to fix her? She could tell you exactly what happened."

There was a moment of silence, and Harry had to physically swallow 'nitwits!' before he earned himself another curse. There was some shuffling about, and someone toed him sharply in the leg.

"Do get up, Mr. Potter," Umbridge twittered, "You're a student of Hogwarts, not a drunken vagabond. Please behave accordingly."

He sat up, but didn't try to stand. He felt dizzy and still shaken from the attack. Making himself comfortable against the wall, he searched the corridor for his wand but realized it was useless. He'd have to find his glasses first. A catch twenty-two situation. He couldn't find anything without his glasses, and it was the glasses he needed to find.

"What's wrong with her?" he asked, waiting for his dizziness to pass before starting his blind groping.

"Silence, Potter," McNair hissed.

"I don't know, Professor, I think he asked a very good question."

"What are you doing here McGonagal," growled McNair. "You should be at dinner supervising the rabble."

"I am where ever my students need me most, Professor," came the cool reply. A moment later, the witch's fuzzy silhouette knelt before him. Gently, she set his glasses on his face. His vision cleared... mostly, and he offered her a weak smile. She smiled back and helped him to his feet, before turning her disapproving glare on the other two. "Clyde Hoffman came to me reporting that one of my Gryffindors had been cursed, and that Harry Potter had remained behind to guard her. I see it was good that he did. I can't imagine what might have happened to a paralyzed girl left unprotected with the three of you roaming the halls."

"Now Professor McGonagal, do try to consider this situation from our point of view," Umbridge said, looking not the least bit contrite. "Two students casting curses in the hall and a third already paralyzed! Such extreme behavior can not be tolerated!"

Yet another voice joined the verbal battle, this one as smooth a silk noose.

"But clearly it can be mimicked. What is going on here?"

"Potter cursed someone else!" Ron spouted quickly, determined to take credit for the discovery.

"Weasley, shut up," Snape muttered. "The grownups are speaking. McGonagal?"

She repeated what she had said before, then added, "I found Potter slumped against the wall and his glasses on the floor. I think it's best I take both children to the infirmary."

Snape nodded, dismissively. "Of course. They're from your house after all."

Madam Umbridge, unable to let any opportunity to condescend pass her by, protested.

“Now we must not act hastily. This is not a mere hex! A more thorough investigation must be conducted!”

“I told you what happened!” insisted Ron, earning him another ‘shut up’ from all the teachers. The potion’s master sneered at the toady woman with enough condescension it was a miracle the woman wasn’t drowning in it, then turned away from her to stand before Angelina. He snatched the compact mirror from the frozen girl’s hand and tossed it at Umbridge.

“It should be fairly obvious what happened. A spider did it.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Starring across the infirmary at the still statuesque Angelina, Harry somehow doubted her condition was cause by a spider. He had watched Madam Pomfrey pattering about the girl for almost half an hour, neither moving or speaking lest the medi-witch take note of him and close the privacy screen around the paralyzed girl. McGonagal had stayed only long enough to be sure her students were taken care of before escorting Clyde back to the Great Hall, informing them that Harry would have to stay the night in the infirmary while she went to inform the rest of the school of what had occurred.

Harry would have liked to know what had happened as well. Snape had said it was a spider, but what did a spider have to do with Angelina’s makeup? And if it was the same ‘spider’ that had killed Cassandra Sweetie, why was Angelina still alive?

It had to be a clue. An incredibly important clue, but Harry didn’t know what to make of it and frankly he wished he had gotten it without someone else getting hurt. Would Angelina recover or remain like she was forever? Somehow that seemed even worse than death.

His disturbing thoughts were interrupted by Professor Snape’s entry. He spared a warning glare for Harry, before casting a couple of charms. Harry felt himself suddenly go deaf and the privacy screen around his bed slid closed around him. He didn't dare try to counteract the spells with Snape still present, even though he felt his insides squirm with curiosity over the potion master's and the medi-witch's conversation. Did Pomfrey know what had really happened? If Snape lied to her and she believed it was a spider, would Angelina not receive the proper treatment and never recover?

Only a few minutes had passed, when both spells were suddenly lifted and Harry could see and hear them again. Madam Pomfrey was looking a bit disgruntled, but encouragingly less frantic than she had before. Snape... looked like typical Snape.

"I trust that blow to your head hasn't stolen what little remained of your wits, Mr. Potter," the wizard said, moving towards him.

"He's quite alright. Just a mild concussion," Pomfrey insisted, then flicked her wand at Angelina. "Muscolo distendasi!"

Angelina's previously immovable form suddenly went limp, landing half way on the hospital bed. Displaying years of experienced nursing, Pomfrey quickly and easily maneuvered the girl into a more comfortable position before she spelled the screen closed. Harry guessed she was getting Angelina ready for bed, and pointedly looked elsewhere. His eyes immediately found Snape.

"Will she be alright?"

Snape pulled up a wooden chair, transfigured it into something much more comfortable, and sat down. Harry thought it didn't bode well for him if this very ill-tempered man was settling in for a nice long chat.

"You will be pleased to know Ms. Johnson will make a full recovery..."

The young Gryffindor felt the knot of anxiety in his stomach uncoil.

"... in about five months."

Err... well, at least she'd recover. She'd probably have to take the entire year over again, but that was a small price to pay for being alive and without any permanent damage. Although what the Quidditch team would do without her he didn't even want to consider.

"Why so long?"

"She will require an antidote that will require very peculiar and very fresh ingredients. Professor Sprout will have to grow much of it herself. Luckily, I believe she has already ordered the mandrakes for some of her second year students."

He wanted to ask more questions about the mandrakes and Angelina's condition and what would happen now that there had been a second attack, but he forced himself to hold his tongue. Snape wasn't here to talk about any of those things, and could he really trust any of the man's answers? So he stayed quiet and waited, staring down at his wand, which he had refused to surrender even after being changed into hospital pajamas. Snape noted the wand and nodded in approval.

"I have to ask, Mr. Potter, if you heard or saw anything suspicious before or after you came upon Ms. Johnson. Voices perhaps or a fleeting shadow?"

Harry gave his professor a queer look.

"Voices, Professor? Can acromantulas speak as well as paralyze and kill people? What talented creatures they are!"

"It was only an example, Potter! Ten points from Gryffindor for being obnoxious. Now answer the question."

"No, I didn't see or hear anything. The hallway was empty."

"And why were you in there in the first place? Didn't you have practice?"

Harry told him about Wood's instructions and the use of his pocket watch to find her. Snape seemed to accept his explanation.

“Sir, what will happen now? Will everyone be stuck in their common rooms again?”

“If you’re lucky.”

Snape settled back in his chair and studied the boy carefully, wondering why the boy reminded him so much of Lily Evans when he looked so much like James Potter. Was it the familiar concern in those bright green eyes or that particular way he fiddled with his wand when nervous?

He didn’t know, but whatever the reason, Snape didn’t like the similarities one bit.

If Harry didn’t remind him so much of his mother, Snape theorized he wouldn’t give a damn about what might happen next. Certainly, he wouldn’t have felt even the tiniest twinge of guilt at the boy’s subtle and unconscious show of trust, for the boy turned to him far more often than he should have when things went amiss.

“Will Voldemort come back?” Harry asked.

Snape’s usual dark expression suddenly went neutral.

“Do you want him to?”

Harry fiddles with his wand, and considered.

“I just don’t want anyone else to get hurt.”

The irony of Harry’s words were not lost on either of them.

“I am not sure what the Dark Lord will do. His business in Bristol is of great importance to Britain’s future. However, Hogwarts is a national treasure in and of itself, and this sort of incident is bad for public morale. It may be better for the school if Voldemort doesn’t return for a while yet. I’ll give you back the ten points if you can tell me why.”

Harry racked his brain for a reasonable answer, but all he could pull together was a feeling of unease at the prospect of Voldemort in a bad mood.

“Because he’ll be cranky?”

Snape cough into his hand, fighting to keep his face neutral and not actually smirk.

“Yes... well, that’s true, but not the answer I’m looking for. Voldemort will be in a hurry to return to Bristol. Haste and ‘crankiness’ will lead to rash and likely drastic actions.”

“Oh.”

“Yes, Mr. Potter, ‘oh’ about sums it up. I would like to enlist your assistance in preventing Our Lord’s untimely return.”

“What could I possibly do?”

“I want you to provide an alternative story about what happened. Something that will point to a culprit unrelated to Ms. Sweetie.”

Harry scowled.

“If my friends and classmate’s lives are in danger, they have the right to know.”

Snape matched his expression.

“I am a teacher, Mr. Potter. As irritating as I may find the entire lot of you, student welfare is one of my responsibilities. Safety measure will be taken regardless of what story is given, and all will be provided with the appropriate level of protection. I require only that you help divert a panic.”

Harry settled back into his pillow and crossed his arms, and waited to be convinced. Snape sneered in disgust.

“Very well, if public peace of mind is not enough for you, perhaps self preservation will be.”

“What are you talking about?”

The potion master smirked, already convinced he'd won the battle of wills.

“No doubt Mr. Weasley is at this very moment down in the Great Hall, telling everyone how you cursed your own house mate. No doubt they’ll bring up the late Ms. Sweetie again, and review the matter will a more ‘informed’ perspective.”

“What?! But it’s a lie! Clyde was with me, he can vouch for me!”

“He’s welcome to try, but whose to say that he didn’t help you? Or perhaps you ‘confunded’ him? No doubt you’re a walking encyclopedia of dark arts. Speaking to snakes, defeating former Death Eaters, and having Voldemort’s favor... It would hardly take much of a leap of logic to assume that you are a Dark Wizard intent on ruling the school,” Snape said, the more absurd his postulations the more cruel his tone became.

What truly horrified Harry was that Snape was right. Ron Weasley wouldn't stop spouting his ridiculous story, and the rest of the students were often eager latch onto a good story regardless of it's validity.

“You can stop the rumors?”

“Of course not. Gossip is a force that cannot be controlled, only manipulated.”

“So what do I do?”

“Blame someone else of course. I would suggest a Slytherin. Mr. Weasley would be the most reasonable choice.”

[illegible]

Snape left the infirmary without having finished his conversation with Potter, and felt more than a little anxiety over the matter. Blast Pomfrey and her weird belief that 'rest' cured everything from the flu to head trauma. Potter had not looked the least bit pleased at his suggestions. Snape understood his concerns, and he would have preferred himself never to have suggested it and let the entire scenario play out into one enormous mess of panic and rumor-mongering.

And he would have if Lestrangle had been in the castle to take the blame. Instead, the Headmistress was touring Britain, interviewing professors for new teaching positions that were opening up next year. That meant the Deputy Headmaster, one Severus Snape, had been in charge, and there was no way he was going to take the fall for safety deficits that had been Lestrangle's doing.

The situation had to be controlled. Downplaying the situation as nothing more than overzealous House rivalry was the only way to prevent student and parent panic while still giving Snape the excuse he needed to re-enact the safety precautions that Lestrangle had prematurely removed.

Potter was his only hope to make that possible.

Merlin, that was a depressing thought!

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort received news of another attack at Hogwarts while in a meeting discussing taxes with four of the most talented economists in Wizarding Britain. He wasn't sorry for the break, but neither was he pleased with the source of the interruption. Commanding his secretary that no one should disturb him, he returned to his office and considered his next move.

His first instinct was to return to the castle, but if his first attempt at locating the basilisk had failed then he doubted the second would be anymore successful and he was too busy to go chasing phantoms. That's what minions were for.

After meditating on the matter for almost an hour, he decided to wait. Headmistress Lestrangle was out of the castle, and this was the perfect opportunity to see whether Snape had what it took to run the school. He was curious what the man would do. Would he immediately come begging for assistance, let his pride allow the situation spiral out of control, or demonstrate some of that Slytherin cunning of his and turn it all to his favor?

He was willing to take a little risk to find the answer.

Except when it came to Harry. The young Gryffindor was doing well for himself, especially after his defeat of McNair in Dueling Club and the hype over his parselmouth abilities had died down. Harry was turning into quite the powerful wizard, but Voldemort couldn't help worry about his inexplicable ability to put himself in the middle of trouble. How long before his prince ended up seriously hurt?

Lestrangle was useless. Snape was better at cleaning up after problems than preventing them. That left Tom. Tom was already dedicated to Potter's well being, and his position as a peer rather than a superior held many advantages. However, Tom was... Voldemort. Younger and more idealistic, but still Voldemort and Voldemort knew himself well enough that the boy would be unsatisfied with the current status quo. Snape's letter suggesting Tom's interest in Potter might be political or carnal or both disturbed him far more than it should. He should have merely assumed Snape was tacking on a personal motivation for the Slytherin boy's behavior. Tom spying on Potter was motivated only by Voldemort's orders and twisted sense of filial duty... wasn't it?

Voldemort scowled. If there was one thing in the world he truly hated (and truthfully he hated many things) it was uncertainties. Pressing the intercom on his desk, he addressed his secretary.

"Get me Pettigrew. Immediately."

The next morning, Harry was escorted to the Great Hall for breakfast by Percy Weasley. The older boy didn't ask him any questions, but there was a sort of suspicion in his eyes that made Harry suspect that the youngest Weasley brother hadn't wasted time spreading his 'Evil Harry' story. He wasn't sure what he was going to do about that. The idea that people would believe him capable of such horrible things was nauseating, but Snape's idea to blame someone else to divert attention wasn't any better. Why would Snape even suggest such a thing?

He was there for Harry. Whenever he got into serious trouble the man was there to guide him out of it or through it. He taught Harry not just potions or dueling, but what it meant to live amongst the most powerful wizards in Britain and how. Could he really deny Snape this one thing? If he did, how much would Snape lose and how much would he himself lose by proxy?

Harry ponder this as he entered the Great Hall, and noisy gossip turned to whispers. Ironically, despite whispering the volume in the chamber only seemed to get louder. Sighing, Harry found his usual seat amongst his friends.

“Welcome back, Harry,” Hermione greeted, “How do you feel? You look tired.”

“Couldn’t sleep. Too much to think about,” Harry said sleepily, then started to gather some eggs onto his plate. “So have the rumors started yet?”

Hermione shared an uncomfortable look with an angry-looking Clyde and a nervous Ginny.

“Oh, everyone is just being so utterly ridiculous! And Ronald Weasley is such a bloody prat!” she snapped, tossing down her fork angrily.

“Hm. I take it I’m public enemy number one now?”

Hermione glared at everyone around them, sending more than a few students on an intent study of their breakfast, before leaning across the table to whisper at Harry.

“Don’t worry about it, Harry. Once we figure out what really did it, then we can prove-”

“We already proved I was innocent, Hermione. I have a list of alibis, and they’ve all been ignored,” Harry interrupted. “Nobody cares. They just want a story. Isn’t that right, Clyde?”

“Bloody twats kept saying I was confused or covering up for you or something stupid like that,” the boy muttered angrily.

And here was Harry’s opportunity. He could suggest to them right here and now that Ronald Weasley may have set it all up. People were listening in already, unable to avoid spying on the curiosity of the day. He would only have to suggest it once to his friends.

Hermione would be skeptical. She was already convinced, like Harry was, that this event was related to Sweetie. Clyde and Ginny might latch onto the idea immediately though. The surrounding Gryffindors might too, and if he didn’t try to force the explanation onto them the more likely they would believe it. The counter theory would spread like wild fire, a fascinating contrast to Ron’s story that would add an intriguing twist to the tale.

After that, it would be up to the rest of the students to decide. What did they want to believe more? That suspicious Harry was guilty or a Slytherin Weasley? That was as far as Snape had managed to layout what would happen before Madam Pomfrey had expelled the man from the infirmary. There had been no opportunity for questions or alternatives. The many possible consequences were an unforeseeable danger.

He licked his suddenly dry lips and looked up at his friends, Snape's story on the tip of his tongue. They were all looking at him with such worried expressions. He couldn't do it. He couldn't use their friendship as a springboard for some vague political maneuver.

"Don't worry about it," he said instead, "Snape said Angelina would recover sometime in the next five months. Perhaps she'll be able to tell everyone what happened."

"Five months?" Clyde exclaimed, "Don't tell me we have to put up with this for five months!"

Ginny glowered at Clyde. "At least Angelina will live! Clyde, I can't believe how selfish you are!"

He snorted at her. "Easy for you to say. You're not being accused of being a liar or incompetent or an evil cronie."

Harry felt his lip twitch. "An evil cronie?"

"Don't laugh, Harry! It's not like what they're calling you is any better!"

"I for one wouldn't mind being called Harry's evil cronie."

They all turned to see the Weasley twins coming up behind Harry. Clyde and Ginny quickly scooted aside before either of the boys could sit on them. Harry immediately found himself in the center of a 'Weasley cuddle', as both boys latched onto him in their over-enthusiasm.

"Our Dark Underlord of Chaos, did that wicked boy dare to lay a hand on you!?" Fred cried, using his words as an excuse to poke and tickle

Harry until he was laughing uncontrollably. As Harry's eyes started to water, George batted his brother's hand away and leaned in to 'whisper' in his ear.

"Don't worry, Master of Mayhem, we, your loyal devotees figured out what really happened!"

Harry blinked at them, wondering if they were serious or this was the beginning of another joke at his expense.

"That's right! Clyde told us everything that happened last night, and after an excruciating process of reasoning and deduction lasting no less than an entire two minutes, it came to us!"

Deciding it was yet another joke, Harry couldn't help but smile at their antics despite the seriousness of the situation. Yet as they began to speak, he couldn't help but notice that most of the students had stopped talking in order to listen in.

"We realized almost immediately that something was off about Clyde's story when he said Ron was alone on the fourth floor," George continued, "Now we all know that the only thing up there is some class rooms and the library. So why was Ron up there in the first place? He likes to study about as much as he likes a skin rash."

Hermione seemed to sense where this was going and started to say something, but let out a startled yelp instead. She glared at Fred accusingly, but he was already picking up where his twin left off.

"The obvious answer is that he was a plant! He was there specifically to accuse the next person who showed up of cursing Angelina!"

Murmuring broke out at the surrounding tables. Harry felt suddenly light headed. What were Fred and George doing?

"Guys, come on," Harry protested, "Do you really think Ron could have cast a curse like that? It's way too advanced. Why would he bother anyway? He doesn't even know Angelina."

The twins let out identical grins, as if expecting Harry's response.

“Of course Ron didn’t curse her! He was just a co-conspirator,” Fred said, “It was obviously the work of an older student.”

“One who would have gained from taking out Gryffindor’s leading chaser just days before their next match!” George said.

Then together they called out so that the entire Great Hall could hear them.

“Captain Flint!”

The hall burst out into amazed gasps, followed by a loud uproar. Harry and Hermione just stared stupidly at one another, wondering what had just happened. Clyde kept muttering ‘why didn’t I think of that?’ At the Slytherin table, Captain Flint and the rest of the Slytherin team stood up to snarl at them.

“You take that back, you bloody fools!”

George laughed at them.

“Why should we? It’s not like it would be the first time this sort of thing has happened! You guys are sore losers even before the match has started!”

At the teacher’s table, McGonagal who seemed to have been waiting for Snape to do something up until now, stood up.

“All of you sit down at once! This ridiculous mudslinging is entirely unbecoming of boys your age!”

Someone at the Slytherin table took the opportunity to cast a hex at George while he was distracted by the professor. Harry saw it coming first and caste a shield, but someone else mistook it for another hex and then everything just went crazy after that. Suddenly everyone was casting spells. Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw were sandwiched between the Slytherin and Gryffindor, the main combatants, and forced to start casting against everyone just to keep from getting hit in the crossfire. Plates of food exploded all around them, and soon everyone gave up on spells and started throwing food (which was ironically harder to cast shields against). Harry and Hermione slipped underneath the tables almost as soon as the fighting started, dragging Clyde and Ginny with them.

Clyde was grinning like a lunatic, while Ginny sulked over the glob of oatmeal in her hair. Hermione quickly cast a cleaning charm on all of them and Harry cast one of his stronger shield charms that blocked even noise from their little bubble.

“Merlin, how did this happen?” Hermione cried, peeking out at the chaos that was the Great Hall.

“I blame Ron,” Clyde said cheerfully. “And of course, Captain Flint, but mostly Ron.”

“Don’t be stupid, Clyde. Ron’s a prat, but he’s not some conspirator!”

“Then why was he there in the first place?”

Now Harry didn’t think Ron had cursed Angelina, but that was still a very good question. Hermione suddenly blushed.

“He- he... my brother sent him to the library to call be down to dinner. I told him to leave me alone and he stormed off! I was only a few doors down from where it happened and I didn’t hear or see a thing!”

Harry was horrified. Hermione, his very best friend, had come so close to being like Angelina or worse, like Sweetie. If she hadn’t argued with Ron, would she too have run into whatever had hurt the Gryffindor chaser?

“This is bad,” Harry said, “Very, very bad. Whatever got Sweetie isn’t limited to the dungeon lavatory anymore. It’s roaming the rest of the school as well. We need to find out what it is and stop it fast!”

Clyde looked confused.

“What do you mean? How could this be the same as with Sweetie? Angelina was paralyzed. She didn’t die.”

"I don't know, but Snape confirmed it for me when he said a spider did it. It meant that the two are related... Wait! Angelina had make-up!"

His friends looked at him oddly.

"I mean, she had a compact mirror! I remember because Snape took it out of her hands and tossed it to McNair. She was looking at it when I found her. Maybe the mirror somehow limited the effects of the curse or something?"

"Hey, you're right!" Clyde agreed. "I completely forgot about that! So what does it all mean? We got a 'something' that was probably guarding a secret passage in the dungeon lavatory, but is now roaming the halls. No one has seen it except for the people it's cursed, it's curse will kill except in the presence of a mirror where it will only paralyze-"

"Oh, and the paralysis can be cured with a potion that uses mandrakes," Harry added, remembering what Snape had said earlier.

"Righto, mate. Mandrakes. And last but not least, Voldemort and the other teachers seem to know what it is, but haven't or can't stop him/her/it. Argh! This is driving me nuts!"

Harry patted him on the back sympathetically.

"No, this is good," Hermione said, looking very excited, "It's finally starting to come together. I've got a good idea on what we need to look for, but we need to get some books before I can confirm it."

"Good luck," Harry groaned, "After this, Snape's not gonna let any of us out of his sight. If he catches us..."

He caught himself before he mention Sirius and Remus. He hadn't mentioned either of them to Clyde or Ginny, and though his trust in them was growing, he didn't think now was the time or place to bring them up. They had enough on their plates without bringing in Harry's demented family situation. The unsaid threat however seemed to do its job, leaving everyone uncomfortable at the prospect of Snape's possible punishments.

"Hey, I think the fighting's stopped," Ginny said finally, and Harry cancelled the shield charm so they could climb out of their hiding spots.

Just in time for Snape, who appeared in mid rant, to spot them.

"And you will be joining them in detention!"

"What? What did I do?"

Snape sneered. "They're your minions, you should have better control over them."

Harry turned to the Weasley twins, who tried to look contrite, but only managed to look ridiculous with neon pink freckles and covered in scrambled eggs.

"And when, where, and what is my detention?" he asked them, after everyone had settled down from Snape's tongue lashing, too subdued to even gossip.

"Owlry, Saturday, and I think you can guess what we'll be doing."

Harry let out a groan and tried to figure out what was worse. Cleaning the owlry while some homicidal thing wandered Hogwarts or being accuse of being said homicidal thing in the comfort of his own dorm room.

Decisions, decisions.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I think that went very well. That story was perfect. Making the Slytherins the villians was brilliant," Fred congratulated, as they made their way to their first class of the day.

“Yes, I think you’re right,” George agreed, “Too bad about the detention though.”

“It won’t take long with the three of us. Besides, Harry didn’t look too upset. Things should go a lot more smoothly for him now.”

“Except with his Slytherin friends, of course.”

The twins looked at each other, smirked and shrugged it off as unimportant.

“Now we just have to figure out how to protect him from Rook...”

“And the monster.”

“And fangirls.”

“And fanboys.”

“Voldemort.”

“Now you’re getting a bit ambitious, George.”

“Ambition is my middle name!”

“Liar, your middle name is Winthropel!”

George coughed and pretended he hadn’t heard him.

“So what should we do about Ronnie-kins? He’ll only get worse now.”

“Harry can handle Ron. He’s a little spitfire, remember? We’ll let them fight it out.”

“Thus, perpetuating the chaos as is our mission!”

The twins laughed maniacally, the future looking perfectly marvelous to them.

Chapter 33: The Prince and the Red Knight

“Were you able to find anything?”

Hermione shook her head, and sat down at the table for lunch. After class she had gone to the library to look for the book she thought might solve their mystery, while Harry and Clyde had been roped into an emergency meeting with the Gryffindor Quidditch team. Oliver Wood was in a complete panic over the loss of Angelina and more than a little paranoid that Slytherin would start targeting his players routinely. It had taken an intervention by McGonagal and some stern words directed at the team captain before they were finally allowed to head to dinner.

“I haven’t been able to get to the library yet, and it looks like I won’t be able to tonight either. The corridor was cordoned off and a Sentinal was snooping around. Though, I doubt she’ll find anything with all the curses Ron and you tossed about. We should be able to go together on Saturday though. I doubt anyone’s going to be desperate to get their hands on ‘Guardian Beasts’. It actually growls at you when you touch it.”

“Afraid I’m going to have to sit this one out. I have to go clean the owlry with Fred and George tomorrow and then there’s the Quidditch match, remember? Just be careful. Don’t go anywhere alone for awhile, ok Hermione?”

“I will if you will, Mr. Potter,” she said airily, “You’ve got more enemies than me at the moment, in case you haven’t noticed?”

“She’s got you there, mate,” Clyde said, gesturing towards the Slytherin table. “I wouldn’t fancy meeting any of that lot alone in the halls.”

Harry silently agreed. The tension in the school was palpable, particularly between the two rival houses. Harry and several of his classmates had witnessed two seventh years dueling in an abandoned classroom next to transfigurations. It was with a bit of pride that Harry noted several glaring mistakes they made while tossing around petty jinxes and hexes even when most everyone seemed overly impressed, and attributed it to his time in Dueling Club. Their biggest mistake, however, was starting a fight so close to Professor McGonagall. The three nights of detention would be putting definite damper on their weekend.

And that was only a little of what Harry actually saw. There had been several accounts already of duels, pranks, and mysterious curses elsewhere in the school. Madam Pomfrey was said to be quite busy. Even the Weasley twins, skilled duelist and pranksters themselves, hadn't come out unscathed. Fred had been jinxed to say 'I'm with stupider' and point at George whenever someone spoke to them. George got hexed and his tongue went completely numb so he could barely talk for an hour. It might have been pretty funny except he had been standing next to them when it happened, and still no one knew who the culprit was.

So far he had avoided most of the trouble, except for an angry note at his desk and a few suspicious looks. He wondered how long his good luck would hold out.

"Do you suppose Draco and Natalie are mad at me too?"

"Natalie, probably not," Hermione said, sounding a bit irritated at the mention of the other girl. "Draco... is probably just mad in general. He got in as a reserve Seeker you know, so he's taking the accusations kind of personally. At least he's been keeping Ron under control during our classes together, so that's a good sign."

Harry wasn't so sure. It might have meant nothing more than Draco not wanting Ron starting a fight with Harry and substantiating any of the twin's claims. He would have to find a way to talk to him and Natalie in order to clear things up, but even then it would be some time before they would be able to hangout together as casually as they had last year.

Hermione's startled yelp, drew the boys attention just in time to see her flicking a furry body off the table.

"Merlin's sake, Bilgerat, the table is no place for a rodent!"

It turned out that Collin Creevy's eyes had not been cursed to fall out. They'd falling in to his head, which while probably extremely frightening to experience, was easy enough to fix. He was back in the common room by the end of the school day, grossing out his fellow Gryffindors with pictures he'd had one of the medi-witches take of his seemingly eyeless head. Clyde had puked twice after seeing it. Harry, Hermione, and Ginny wisely avoided looking.

The list of casualties in the Gryffindor/Slytherin conflict had only increased as the day went on, though nothing as bad as Creevy the Eyeless Wonder happened again. Harry had finally gotten hit by a Coughing Curse on his way to Herbology, which sent him coughing uncontrollable until he could barely breath and was struggling not to gag. Luckily, Hermione knew the counter curse, but a group of Slytherins had blocked her from him for almost three minutes before Clyde and some of his friends had physically shoved them out of Hermione's way. He was physically weak from being unable to breath for so long and his throat was raw, but he ignored everyone's advice to go to the Hospital wing and marched right out to the greenhouses with as much dignity as he could muster.

He was glad he did, despite feeling ill through most of the class, when Professor Sprout introduced them to mandrakes. They were fascinating. Hideous, but fascinating. Watching one bite Draco's finger was just plain hilarious. Or perhaps it was just that someone had turned his hair into fuschia spikes.

It was about the only thing Harry found funny about that day. Everyone was so tense and paranoid and angry, that he couldn't drop his guard for even a second to enjoy his renewed friendship with Clyde or some of the sillier curses floating around. Harry had hoped something would be done to end the fighting soon, but when Snape finally made an announcement during dinner to do just that, it wasn't at all what the young Gryffindor had hoped for.

"Once again, your juvenile behavior has required that I take drastic action," the potion's master sneered, glaring out over the four tables. "Since you all can not seem to be trusted to your own devices, all extracurricular activities will be cancelled with the exception of those supervised by a teacher. You will be escorted between classes by prefects and specially assigned students. You will return to your dorms directly after dinner. Anyone caught casting spells on a fellow student without a teacher's permission will have their wand revoked for an entire day. Hogsmeade weekends are cancelled, as well as Quidditch. That is all."

There was much whining and muttering. Oliver Wood practically collapsed into his bowl. Adding insult to injury, the only thing for dinner that evening was porridge and wheat rolls. Harry didn't join in with the table's complaints, instead mulling over Snape's latest orders. They were pretty much the same restrictions the students had been given after Sweetie's death.

Was it possible that this was what Snape had hoped for?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Late Saturday afternoon found Harry trudging behind the Weasley twins down to the main floor under Umbridge and McNair's watchful stares. Apparently, Snape hadn't thought cleaning the entire owlry by hand was enough of a punishment. He had sent those two to supervise. McNair had barely said a word, obviously disgruntled at having his spare time wasted on them, but Umbridge couldn't seem to shut up. She kept stopping them at odd moments to tell them they missed a spot or where they should scrub next or to put more effort into it. Harry came very close to hurling his bird crap covered scrubber at her. He didn't doubt the Weasley twins were plotting their revenge.

With Umbridge's insistent nitpicking and micro-managing, it was well after lunch by the time they finished. Tired, sore, and hungry, they stopped by their dorms briefly to clean up and then went in search of the kitchens, only to find that the hallway had been cordoned off with a barrier shield. In front of the shield was a sign that read: No Student Access.

"Blimey, this is getting out of hand. That's the third barrier I've seen since this morning," Fred said, scratching his head. "Do you suppose Snape's inhaled too many potion's fumes and gone nutters?"

"Maybe he thinks the house elves cursed Angelina now," George giggled.

Harry, already in a bad mood, scowled darkly at him. "That's not funny."

George sighed. "No, it isn't... Shit. What now?"

"We'll just have to wait until dinner," Harry said, heading towards the library. His stomach twisted uncomfortably, demanding food but he ignored it. It had been some time since he'd been forced to go hungry, but he knew from experience a few hours wouldn't kill him. "I'm going to look for my friends in the library."

"We'll go with. Maybe we can get Clydy-kins to hand over some of his Halloween stash," Fred suggested. Harry wasn't about to point out that Clyde probably didn't have any candy left and wouldn't be getting anymore until after Christmas. They probably knew it already. He'd told Hermione he wouldn't walk around alone, and if the Weasley twins were following her line of thinking, he wasn't going to make it more difficult for them.

They had just turned away from the sign, when Harry spun around sharply, drawing his wand. The twins had their wands in hand a split second later. Beyond the barrier, the hall was still empty. Harry watched it for several long moments before pocketing his wand again.

"Sorry, I thought I heard whispering."

"Geez, Harry, you almost gave us a heart attack," Fred said, clutching his chest. "Good reflexes though. Don't fancy taking you on in a duel any time soon."

Harry waved off the compliment, and they headed towards the library.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Without Hogsmeade trips or Quidditch matches, the majority of Hogwarts was at a loss on how to fill up their weekend free time. It seemed a good many of them had opted to spend it catching up on their assignments, and had crowded into the school library. Snape was standing next to a blushing Madam Pince and overseeing the place, holding true to his belief that students could not be left unsupervised at the moment. Harry carefully avoided the man's attention and went in search of Hermione.

He found her among the shelves, but instead of searching for books she was blatantly staring at a crowd of students gathered around one of the study tables. Harry wasn't sure what she found so fascinating about this group until he spotted Ron Weasley amongst them. Ron's presence was particularly odd, as not only was Draco absent, but so was the rest of his house. A majority of them seemed to be Hufflepuffs and Ravenclaws.

"What's going on?"

Hermione jumped, too caught up in her pensive staring to notice his approach. She blushed and floundered for a moment before coming back to herself.

"Oh, um..."

She glanced a bit suspiciously over at her godfather, whose attention was being held by the Weasley twin's arrival, before answering.

"Something's up. I think Professor Snape knows what we've been up to."

Harry tensed. If that was true... would he hold up his threat to withhold Sirius and Remus' letters? Seeing her friend's anxious face, she began to reassure him.

"Calm down, Harry, I don't think it's gotten that bad yet. I could be completely wrong, but... you remember that book I told you about? The one I thought might finally tell us what we need to know?"

Harry nodded.

"It's gone. And I don't mean checked out or misplaced, I mean gone. Madam Pince says she doesn't even have a record of the book ever being in the library, but I know it was here last year. Someone has been spying on us, Harry."

He frowned, not liking that possibility at all.

"Are you sure?"

“No, I can’t be completely sure, but it seems probable. I mean, he’s already watching us, plus as Deputy Headmaster, the magic on the school obeys him at least partially. He has the authority to remove the book and any record of it now that the Headmistress is absent. I think this is his way of saying ‘I know what you’re up to’.”

“So what do we do?”

Hermione shrugged helplessly.

“What can we do? He’s got us under his thumb.”

“Dammit.”

She put a comforting hand on his shoulder.

“Hey, don’t beat yourself up about it. Professor Snape already knows what is going, and doing everything he can to protect everyone. Even if we learned the truth, could we do half as much? When this is all over, if we still haven’t found out what happened, then we can start searching again without someone looking over our shoulders at every turn, alright?”

Harry sighed, feeling as if this was his first failure as a wizard. He had taken on this search knowing the dangers, and abandoning it left a bitter taste in his mouth.

“Yeah, I guess your right,” he conceded, then to distract her from his disappointment he changed the subject. “So what going on over there?”

Hermione let out a loud sigh.

“Remember yesterday when Professor Toure yelled at Bulstrode that she wasn’t a newsie?”

He nodded.

“Well, one of the Hufflepuffs got this brilliant idea that they did want to be a newsie. She managed to convince a bunch of her classmates to start a school newspaper.”

“And Ron’s over there because...?”

“Where better could he spread his ridiculous stories?”

He cringed at the thought. Hermione continued to glare at the table, then caught Snape staring at the two of them. She spoke again without looking at him.

“The professor is watching us again. I think we better split up before he wonders what we’re up to. I’ll go keep an eye on Ron. Why don’t you start your DA&D assignment? You’re way behind as it is.”

“What’s the point? McNair is never going to let me pass. He stamps ‘Troll’ on all my essays without even looking at them.”

“Harry, just do it. You can protest the grade later, but you have to do the work first.”

Knowing there was no point arguing with her whether a scholarly pursuit was ever superfluous, he headed deeper into the shelves. When he finally came out again half an hour later and five large tomes heavier, he saw Hermione was now in the midst of the would-be ‘newsies’. He smiled to a bit to see her bent over a parchment of paper, writing things down furiously as everyone around her started tossing around ideas. Despite their attempts to keep their voices down, they were hardly quiet.

Deciding it would be impossible to study there, he went to the front desk to check out his books. Snape watched him closely, but seeing nothing suspicious in his selections, soon went back to observing the Weasley twins snickering over a mysterious book. Madam Pince caste a Feather-Lite Charm on his stack, warned him to return them in two weeks, and then went back to her Snape gazing... eeewww...

The halls were almost empty, except for the occasional patrolling teacher or prefect, making the castle seem eerily quiet. As he headed up the second flight of stairs towards Gryffindor Tower, a sudden unease came upon him. He looked around quickly, but the stairs were empty with the exception of the enchanted paintings bustling about. After a long, tense moment he turned to continue up the stairs.

The uneasy feeling did not leave him, and as he passed another black barrier to a little used wing near the portrait of the Fat Lady, he felt himself begin to shake.

“Here?”

Harry dropped his books, and still being charmed they floated soundlessly to the floor. He spun around, searching the hall, but it was still completely deserted

“I heard him... this way? That way? Otherway? Hhhhhmmmm...”

Harry waited and listened, but nothing else was said and he had the impression that whoever had been there had left.

“Are you alright, dearie?” came a feminine voice.

He jumped in surprise, and looked to see the Fat Lady staring down curiously from her frame. Sighing with relief, he picked up his books. How stupid he was being. He must have overheard one of the portraits talking.

“I’m fine, just a little stressed,” he said, managing to smile at his own foolishness. “Barbarous Bombardment.”

The portrait swung open, and he climbed safely inside.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It was only half an hour before dinner when Hermione finally showed up, looking infuriated. Harry looked up from a set of cards as she entered the common room, but Clyde remained seemingly oblivious as he puzzled over which hand he should play.

“You look lively,” Harry mentioned as she passed him on her way to the girl’s dormitories. She looked startled to see him, and then let out a sound of frustration.

“Ergh! He infuriates me!”

Harry couldn’t help but smile, knowing exactly who she was referring to. Ron was technically his enemy, yet somehow he caused Hermione a lot more strife.

“Get this, he wants to join the paper. I mean, Ron. He can barely form a coherent sentence on a good day! So then I figure he’s got to be up to no good. He probably wants to use the paper to spread his lies about Harry. You know, making it seem more legitimate after investigating and then having it written down. Ergh! It makes me so mad!”

“So you were spying on him this whole time?” Harry offered.

Hermione’s frustration suddenly turned to embarrassment.

“Well... yeah, that’s what I meant to do anyway. I just sort of ambled up, no one had officially joined anyway, and listened in. After that, I don’t know what happened. Everyone was starting to put in name ideas, and one just popped into my head so I suggested it and everyone loved it. Then we were brainstorming what topics the paper should include, and I just kept getting ideas and everyone liked those too. Suddenly, I’m sitting in the middle writing a general outline for the paper. I don’t know what happened!”

Harry burst out laughing.

“Harry! What’s so funny?!” Hermione said, crossing her arms and actually pouting.

His laughter died down to snickers.

“I know exactly what happened, Hermione. You joined the school newspaper.”

“No! No, I absolutely did not! We haven’t even passed around a sign-up sheet yet!”

“‘We’, Hermione? You’re already thinking like a person whose joined. Plus you had all those great idea that everyone liked, and you had a lot of fun. I think you should sign up.”

“Harry’s got a point, Hermione,” Clyde piped in, having finally set down a card. “You did seem pretty happy when you walked in. Well, infuriated and happy... and how did you manage that?”

“Don’t be ridiculous! I only went over there to make sure Ron didn’t make trouble.”

Harry shook his head, setting down a Joker and sending Clyde into a silent fit of frustration.

“You don’t have to make excuses to us, Hermione. I like Quidditch. You like the school paper. It’ll be good for you to have another hobby aside from studying.”

“No, I couldn’t. I’m already in Dueling Club. I don’t want to fall behind with my studies.”

Harry and Clyde rolled their eyes.

“This from the girl whose always weeks ahead of the class?” Clyde pointed out. She seemed to consider.

“Well... I would be able to keep an eye on Ron... and maybe get this wretched rumor mill under control... it would look good on a college application... Oh fine, I’ll think about it.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Too many. Too many. Must wait... wait... wait...”

Harry paused amidst the group of Gryffindors heading towards the potion's class to look behind him. The only one there was Percy Weasley, who was raised an imperious brow at his study.

"Something bothering you, Potter?"

Harry shook his head. "No, I just thought I heard voices."

Percy considered a moment.

"The Slytherin dorms are down that way somewhere. You must have heard an echo in one of the pipes that runs by their rooms."

The younger Gryffindor nodded in agreement, but wasn't so sure. The voice sounded strangely familiar, both from yesterday on the stairwell and somewhere else he couldn't recall.

"Hurry up, Harry," called Clyde, "Or you'll end up sitting at a table with Goyle."

"Clyde, that's very unsporting of you," Percy reprimanded weakly.

Harry just smiled to himself, and went to catch up with his friends. They entered the potions lab to find the Slytherins had already arrived and taken the best seats (those at the very back) for themselves, leaving the trailing Gryffindors to the full wrath of Professor Snape. Harry made it a point to move to the seat farthest from Ron, even though it put him right in front of Snape's desk. The potion's master was already there, sifting through some papers while some chalk floated over the chalkboard, completely ignoring everyone.

"You know what, Harry, I think I ought to sit with Draco today," Hermione said, just a minute before class started.

"Doesn't he already have a part- oh.."

Looking over at Draco, he soon understood her reasoning. Pansy Parkinson had somehow managed to take the seat Natalie normally occupied beside Draco, and seemed to be doing her best to make the young Malfoy as uncomfortable as possible just by batting her eye lashes.

“Yeah, you go ahead,” Harry said, waving her off.

“Thanks.”

She just barely managed to rescue a very grateful Draco before Snape stood up to address the class.

“Today, we start your first extended-brewing potion. Potter, what defines an extended-brewing potion from a long brewing potion?”

“An extended-brewing potion requires a lapse of at least thirty-six but less than seventy-two hours between the addition of an active ingredient or ingredients to the initial stock. A long-brewing potion requires a lapse of greater than seventy two hours but less than a month,” Harry said quickly. Snape almost always called on him at least once during potions, and it had taken him most of last year to figure out what sort things the potion’s master would expect him to know. It made studying so damn stressful.

The wizard shrugged, the closest thing he’d receive to a ‘very good, Mr. Potter’ in this class, and continued.

“We will be preparing the initial stock today, which can used to create three different potions. After class you will all decide which potion you wish to brew and then write a foot long essay due this Wednesday, where you will then complete your selected potion. You may work in pairs or individually, but be aware that those working in pairs will be required to brew twice as much stock as each student will be preparing their own potion individually. I suggest you be very careful with your stock, as it will affect your grade for two classes. You may begin.”

They collected their cauldrons, filled them with water, and set them aside for boiling before going to gather their scales and ingredients from the store room. Those who had partners to set up their cauldrons got to the store room first, leaving Harry and a disgruntled Parkinson to wait outside.

“Get out of the way, Potter,” Ron snarled, knocking into his shoulder as he exited.

Harry forced himself not to react to the twinge of pain, and replied evenly.

“Sorry, I didn’t notice you.”

The pugnacious Weasley’s face darkened at the subtle slight, but the students behind him forced him along before he could start something. Harry ignored the redhead after that, quickly gathered the rest of his supplies, and returned to his work station. The first step was simple enough: Weigh 5g of Norwegian Peat Moss to boil for fifteen minutes, stirring four times counter clockwise every five minutes. Everything went fine for the first ten minutes, then the thin brown broth began to thicken into a dark green goo. He looked to the board to see if he had somehow missed a step, and by the time he looked back down the solution was already bubbling over the sides of the cauldron and sending off sparks whenever it got too close to the flames.

“Professor!”

Snape was there in an instant, tossing in a handful of what appeared to be wheat into the brew. The bubbling mass immediately settled into a brown goo, simmering gently. The potion’s master scowled at the ruined concoction and then at its brewer. Harry blushed in embarrassment.

He was not the best student in potions (that spot was reserved to Draco), but he had never bungled such a simple step before. Truthfully, he didn’t know what he had done wrong. Short of setting it on fire, peat moss was almost completely nonvolatile substance, used for tempering overly bubbly potions.

“Well, that was fun, Potter,” Snape sneered. “Mind telling me how you managed to accomplish it?”

“...I don’t know.”

From behind him, he could hear several snickers. A sour look from Snape shut them up quickly though. The potion master pulled a thin stick, nothing more than a large toothpick really, from the breast pocket of his robe and dipped it into the potion. From the top of the stick a ribbon of paper began grow. After a moment it stopped growing and Snape looked at the paper to see what it said. He frowned.

“Mr. Potter, the acorn is not added until the very end. Can you not read?”

Harry looked confused.

“I didn’t add an acorn, Professor. Mine is right there,” Harry said, pointing. The man’s dark eyes located the innocent little nut, and hardened as if it were somehow the responsible. Although, Harry supposed if Snape’s weird little stick was right, then perhaps it was its brother’s fault.

The snickers returned, and not only faded but perhaps died a horribly miserable death as the wizard turned to them yet again.

“And what, may I ask is so amusing?”

There was a tense silence.

“Perhaps you all think it’s funny to go throwing your ingredients around at random, and seeing what happens. If you’re all really lucky maybe you’ll turn a simple sleeping draught into a lethal acid. What a hilarious joke that would be! Or better yet, maybe the potion will explode! Bits and pieces of students everywhere! It will be a party!”

No one made a sound, and even Harry was left to stare awkwardly at his shoes. Snape was in a perpetually bad mood, but few things made the man angrier than people fooling around with potions. How much of it was due to respect for the art or just plain fear for what it could do in the hands of the careless, Harry wasn’t sure.

“Well, you know what I think is funny? I think it’s hilarious to expel students. And so help me, if I ever find out who did this I will be laughing up a storm. Now get back to work. Potter!”

Harry jumped, daring to peek up at the still aggravated man.

“You do not have enough time to complete your potion during this class, so you will re-brew it tonight after dinner. Clean up, and you may work on homework for the rest of the period.”

“Yes, sir. Thank you, sir.”

The rest of the class was spent in a tense silence, with no one daring to utter a word, let alone a snicker, after aggravating Snape already. Harry reviewed his herbology homework, and pretended he didn’t care about his quasi-detention he’d gotten even though he was more than a little angry. Cedric Diggory arrived to escort them to their next classes just before the end of the period. As soon as they were out from under Snape’s scrutiny, Ronald Weasley was after him.

“Looks like the advantages to being the Dark Lord’s pet doesn’t include a get-out-detention-free pass, does it Potter?” the redhead hissed into his ear. Harry didn’t turn around, not about ready to start a fight while a prefect was so close by.

“It still has more advantages than being Draco’s goon,” he said coolly, hoping Ron could hear his smirk even if he couldn’t see it.

There was a pause, and Harry wondered what Ron’s expression was now or if he wasn’t planning to punch him in the back of the head. Ahead of him, Diggory wasn’t paying much attention, but behind him he knew Hermione and Draco must be watching them like hawks.

“It wouldn’t have saved you if I had added two acorns instead of one though. I should have done it and rid this school of-”

Harry stopped abruptly, causing Ron to run into his back, nearly knocking the redhead over. The Gryffindor couldn’t imagine what his expression must have looked like when he turned to face him, but the Slytherin took a definite step back. Classmates parted around them as they moved by, staring back at them curiously and perhaps even a bit nervously.

"I don't know whether you're an idiot or just plain pathetic," Harry said evenly, "Risking expulsion or worse over something as stupid as a prank puts you in either category. Either way, I'm warning you now to leave me and my friends the fuck alone or expulsion will be the least of your worries."

To emphasize his point, he grabbed Ron by his robe and pulled him closer with a single sharp jerk and hiss parseltongue into his ear.

"You are beneath me."

"Harry, come on," Hermione said, grabbing onto his arm and pulling him off the stunned Weasley. "He's not worth it."

Harry spared Ron one last glare, then left him to Malfoy for further scolding. He turned back to Hermione and sighed.

"Why couldn't the guardian have paralyzed him instead of Angelina?"

She didn't laugh. In fact, her expression only seemed to get harder.

"What is it, Hermione?"

"Hermione!"

"Harry, just... shut up for a minute," she snapped. "You can't just... just threaten people and then turn around and play at being... being... well..."

"Myself?" he asked, quirking a brow.

She let out an exasperated sigh and rubbed her temple, clearly frustrated.

"Please don't do that again... You were like that when you dueled McNair, and frankly it scares me."

He felt stunned. He scared Hermione? Him? How did he respond to something like that? He hadn't thought of what he had done as wrong. What was he suppose to do? Let McNair hurt him? Let Ron hurt him? At the same time, what did that mean when he frightened someone he trusted and whom he assumed trusted him?

"I'll try not to..."

"There, there, there. I can hear them both... still too many... too many. No way out here. No way out there. Where, where, where?"

Harry stopped cold. It was that voice again, this time closer than he had ever heard it and then gradually fading into the distance.

"What is it, Harry?"

"Did you hear something just now?"

She gave him a confused look.

"Never mind."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Author's notes:

For those who have forgotten; DA&D stands for 'Dark Arts & Defense'. It's like DADA, accept it includes actual Dark Arts in the curriculum, not just how to defend against it.

Book II

Chapter 14: The Hunting Grounds

“What are you looking for, Mr. Potter?”

Harry turned back around, and trotted to catch up with the irate potion's master. They had just finished dinner, and as promised headed down to the dungeons to prepare his potion. Though this part of the castle never received any natural sunlight, it still seemed somehow eerier at night than during the day. The halls echoed louder and the shadows seemed deeper.

“Thought I heard something.”

And I'm still hearing it...

‘The voice’ had persisted throughout the day, popping up at odd times. He had heard it during a study period in the dungeons with the other Gryffindors, near the Great Hall on his way to lunch, and now again in the dungeons. It seemed to be looking for something, but other than that he couldn't tell what it was or what it wanted. For a while he had thought it might have been ‘the guardian’, but that didn't explain why he was the only one who could hear it. Unless, of course, it was a snake, but that seemed to make as much sense as the spider story had. How could a snake hurt a ghost? If it were just a random snake, it seemed to know Hogwarts extremely well. He finally concluded he'd been hit with some sort of ‘schizophrenia curse’, and rather than skip class to get examined and babied by Madam Pomfrey, he'd instead opted to see if it would fade on its own. Most illusionary curses didn't last long on wizards or witches, especially when they aren't cast on ones self. If it had been caste by Ron, he wasn't going to give the boy the satisfaction of knowing the spell worked.

So far it hadn't begun to fade yet. Even now he could hear the vaguely masculine voice mumbling to itself about where ‘he’ was and how bored it was and how dark it was and how smelly everything was. Sometimes it wouldn't say anything, and just hum some odd tune that seemed vaguely familiar. As far as pranks went, it was pretty damn creepy.

“Come, Potter, we do not have all night.”

The murmuring voice disappeared altogether once Harry entered the potion's lab, and he couldn't help but wonder about that. Snape set him to work nearest his desk, while he himself started leafing through his papers. They said nothing as Harry set up his cauldron and scales and gathered his supplies, but once the Gryffindor had settled into stirring for the next fifteen minutes, Snape surprised him by initiating conversation.

“Mr. Weasley seems to have taken a rather strong dislike to you, Mr. Potter.”

“You've just noticed?”

Snape shot him a look.

“It has never made me concerned for your safety before now.”

Harry shrugged, not seeing the point of this conversation. It wasn't like it was his fault Ron was a prat.

“You would do well not to provoke him.”

The ladle in his hand stopped for a split second.

“When did I ever provoke him?! I've always ignored him and his stupid games.”

“Yes, exactly. You refuse to acknowledge him as someone worth noticing, and now he feels as if he must make you acknowledge him, even if he has to hurt you to do it.”

Harry acknowledged that what Snape said made sense. Perhaps, in a way, he had known it all along. Hadn't his ignoring the other boy been his way of angering him in the first place?

“Less than a week ago you were suggesting I accuse him of cursing Angelina, and now you want us to be buddies?”

“Circumstances have changed,” Snape admitted. “The Weasley twins have already alleviated the need to blame their younger brother, and provided even better circumstances for me to set up safety measures. Yet, I seem to have miscalculated the lengths with which young Ronald would go to achieve his own perceived vindication. He is becoming a threat not only to your reputation but also your physical well-being. For both your sakes, I wish to ease the tension. You should add the dragonfly wings now.”

Harry floundered to retrieve said ingredients and crumble them into his brew before it turned completely black, then settled back to let the newest addition dissolve on its own.

“You could just expel him,” Harry offered. “He confessed to adding the acorn just after potions class.”

Snape sneered.

“Expel one of my snakes over you, Mr. Potter? Don’t flatter yourself.”

The young wizard could have pointed out that a lot worse had been done to Morgenson and Whitehall than mere expulsion, but didn’t want to risk it. He was being cheeky enough already. Briefly, he wondered what happened to his two would-be murderers and whether he should write Sirius and Remus to ask.

“What do you propose then?”

“Duelling Club practices will continue as always. We will be performing our first practical demonstrations this Thursday. I want Mr. Weasley and you to be one of the dueling pairs.”

“I won’t lose to him intentionally.”

“Oh, believe me, Mr. Potter, I’m not worried about that. I suspect he’ll defeat you with his own skills. After all, I’ve been tutoring him.”

“What?!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“The entire school has gone nuts,” Draco grumbled, moving his trembling black pawn to block Natalie’s vicious white knight. Predictably, the bloodthirsty piece smashed the pawn clean off the board a moment later. The young witch smirked at her knight’s antics before deigning to acknowledge Draco.

“Whatever do you mean, Malfoy?”

“That for one thing. You never call me Malfoy. And then you left me with Parkinson in potions and then again in arithmancy. Are you mad about something?”

“Of course not,” she said dismissively. “But I mustn’t give anyone the impression that I’m one of your minions. It’s degrading.”

Draco scowled.

“I suppose it’s fine then, but I can’t think of why everyone else is acting weird. Ron refuses to listen to me anymore and even seems to go out of his way to annoy me. Ungrateful little bastard. Slytherin would have torn him apart if it weren’t for me. I’ll have to remind him of that fact soon.”

Natalie nodded in approval.

“Yes, one should never let one of their pawns run the board. And who else is acting oddly?”

“Hermione. She’s joined another club. Journalism this time.”

“What’s odd about that?”

“She hates reporters.”

She laughed at that.

“And then of course there’s Potter.”

“Isn’t there always?”

He ignored the tease.

“I think he’s starting to crack. He threatened Weasley in the dungeons today-”

Natalie giggled, recalling the incident perfectly. Harry had been so perfectly wicked.

“And now he keeps looking around as if he expects someone to hex him at any moment. Plus I must have seen him turn around at least three times saying he heard something today. Paranoid, I tell you. He’ll be locked away in St. Mungo’s before the end of term.”

His black rook overthrew the white knight, causing his friend to pout. The knights were her favorite pieces after all.

“He has reason enough to be paranoid. These are dangerous times.”

“Still going to go crackers.”

“Check.”

“Shit.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom’s roving spirit re-entered his body and he opened his eyes to stare up at the canopy of his bed. He pondered over the conversation he had overheard between Malfoy and Cypher, and tried to determine how much of it was worth investigating and how much was just idle gossip.

“And now he keeps looking around as if he expects someone to hex him at any moment. Plus I must have seen him turn around at least three times saying he heard something, today alone.”

Was Harry being paranoid or was he really hearing something. Something only Harry... and perhaps another parselmouth might hear? If that were the case, then Muchalinda had been given far more liberty than was wise. Snape's many barriers were doing their job, but how long would that last? There were so many secret passages, and no way to secure them all.

He had not heard the basilisk at all when he was about the school, but was that because the serpent wasn't there or because it was following his orders to keep at a distance? He had made it very clear to his minion what exactly he expected of them and what liberties would be allowed. His own inculpability and Harry's safety must be assured before they were allowed to 'play', and only as a means to be rid of his targets. The mistake with Angelina was inconvenient, but understandable. At the same time, Harry had gotten much too close to danger.

He had made his displeasure well known to his servant, but had not been able to deliver the message in person. Something he felt was critical to them understanding the gravity of his instructions. He had a sneaking suspicion that they were having a little too much fun.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Five o' six am was an ungodly time to be called out of one's bed, even for as ungodly a man as Severus Snape. Particularly by house elves.

Wretchedly over excited and frightened house elves.

“Master Snape says Nibby must come quick if something nasty is seen in Hogwarts. Oh and what a nasty nasty thing Nibby has seen!” she wailed, her floppy ears sagging like an unhappy puppy.

Snape merely grunted in response, tying back his hair for once so he wouldn't be delayed with combing it. He took a vial from his night stand and downed it in one shot, the potion chasing away his sleepiness as no amount of caffeine ever would and without the irritating side effects. With that, he slipped on his teaching robe and stormed out of his private quarters and towards the kitchens, Nibby running after him.

By the time he reached the kitchen the barrier had already been taken down by Flitwick and McGonagall, both still in their bed clothes. Snape almost cracked a smile at the charm's professor's frog print pajamas. Almost.

The five dead house elves pretty much killed whatever humor he found in the situation after that. There was a horrid stench of burnt flesh.

"I pulled one of them off the stove before it completely caught fire," McGonagall said sadly. "Aside from that, we haven't disturbed anything."

"The rest of the house elves?" Snape asked, tip-toeing around broken eggs and flour until he reached the first body, her large bulbous eyes staring innocently up at nothing. He recognized her as Yoyo, the youngest and giggliest of her fourteen siblings.

"I found them hiding in the pantry. I sent them to the laundry. Working always seems to calm them down."

Snape nodded, moving to the next body and then the next. After confirming they had all died in the same manner, he went on to investigate the rest of the kitchen. It was a mess, food and cooking utensils scattered everywhere, tiny hand and foot prints of flour marking the hurried escape of Hogwarts's cheery slave population.

"There's no sign of a secret passage in here. It must have entered from the hall and gone out the same way. There are at least four different hidden passages it might of escaped through," he said.

Flitwick surveyed the damage and shook his head in dismay.

“This is awful.”

“It could have been worse, Filius. A lot worse. Hufflepuff’s dormitories are only another hall away,” Snape pointed out.

“Hem-hem.”

Three heads turned to see Madam Umbridge, looking as if she had been up and ready for hours, and Professor McNair, who looked none to pleased to be awake, standing in the door way. Umbridge cast her wide eyes around the room, her vapid smile firmly in place even as she spotted the dead house elves.

"My goodness," she said pleasantly, "This will take forever to clean up. I hope no one was hurt."

The three looked at her blankly for a moment, then at the five corpses. Snape spoke first.

"No... I suppose, technically speaking, no one was hurt."

Then he went on to ignore her.

“Filius, Minerva, I want you to secure this corridor and take care of the elves. I want the barrier up again by six. Umbridge, inform the rest of the staff. McNair, you and I are going hunting.”

McNair's grumpy scowl curved into a malicious grin. This was likely the first bit of fun he'd had all year.

“Hem hem...”

“You should really have that checked, Madam,” Snape said, already stalking past the toady woman and following the traces of flour that marked the murderer’s passing.

[illegible]

The voice was gone the next day. Harry waited for it to appear all through his morning routine, on his way down to the Great Hall, all through his oddly skimpy breakfast of oatmeal and fruit, and on his way to classes, but it never reappeared. He felt strangely accomplished by that, now knowing his avoidance of the hospital wing had been the right decision and that somewhere someone was wondering what they'd done wrong in their casting.

This cheery feeling didn't last long. The circus of curses had died down over the weekend, even if everyone's disgruntled attitude had not. The general atmosphere of Hogwarts remained tense and uninviting. Even the teachers seemed stressed and disgruntled.

Oliver Wood was insistent that even though Quidditch was cancelled, that the team still keep up practices under Professor Grimm's supervision to keep their competitive edge. Harry would have been quite content with this, but the weather which had been unseasonably mild finally decided to rear its ugly head. A cold snap had blown in from the North, bringing with it a light snow and a reminder that the Christmas season was only a week away.

Suddenly, Harry found himself inundated with a completely new set of worries on top of his old ones. There was his inevitable duel with Ron that Thursday, semester exams and papers he would need to start work on, 'the guardian' which may or may not have gone, Christmas presents he would need to buy or make within a month, Quidditch practices in bad weather, and still the need to be watchful of attacks in the hall (even if hexes had become rarer, he doubted he was completely safe).

It was almost a relief that he and his friends had decided to halt their investigation. In fact, it would have been a relief except that made Harry feel like such a cowardly jerk.

His life went from dangerous and exciting to hectic and mundane practically over night. Hermione tried her best to get him organized, but she was having more than a little trouble with that herself. Much of her spare time was being taken up with getting the newspaper up and running. Clyde's only concern was gathering enough courage to ask Cathy Wicket to the Winter Dance, and that wasn't going to help anyone.

Deciding he may as well face his most immediate concern- his duel with Ron- first, he found himself burying his nose in spell and strategy books. He wasn't sure what good it would do him in the end. Books would help him, but not nearly as much as instruction from Snape would likely help Ron.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Relax, Harry," Clyde said, as he and the rest of their club made their way from dinner to the Dueling Hall, "It's only Ron."

Ginny pinched him. Hard.

"Shut up, Clyde. What do you know about it?" she snapped, not liking the dig at her brother one bit. Ron was full of flaws, but she knew better than most that he was not weak. Stubborn as a mule and oblivious at times, but never weak. She hoped Harry had been paying more attention to his rival than Clyde had and realized this. She wished Hermione hadn't decided to skip this lesson in favor of calibrating the Hogwart's Herald's new printing press. The brainy girl might have had better luck cautioning Harry than she would have. Not that she had been able to caution him much to begin with. Every time she turned to him to say something, she'd notice and cute his serious face was and get distracted.

Ron kept peeking over his shoulder at them, his expression hungry.

They entered the Dueling Hall and found it had been rearranged a bit. The dummies had all been pushed back to press against the far wall, and a matt that was shaped like the dueling platform had been pushed to the center of the freed space.

"You have ten minutes to suit up and line up beside the matt," Snape instructed them, gesturing towards the armor on their practice dummies. They all hurried to obey and were in formation, standing at attention in military fashion within seven minutes. Snape walked along the line and made sure they were fitted properly before he began their lesson.

“For the last several weeks we have gone over the basics of Dueling, but lectures and practice dummies only provide so much preparation for the real thing. When you finally take the platform, you will not be facing a piece of wood, but a living, breathing, conniving person who wants to destroy you. Hesitation is natural, a result of the unpredictable consequence of your spell and the equally unpredictable response from your opponent. Natural, but unacceptable.”

Snape paused, pulling their attention towards him like fish on a hook. It almost hurt to be drawn in, but it hurt worse to struggle.

“We will begin actual duels today. I do not want you to worry about strategies yet. That will come later. I want you to simply work to overcome your natural hesitancy. Fire the first spell that comes to mind, and do not worry about your opponent’s spells.”

Mentally, Harry scoffed at the hypocrisy of Snape’s instructions, for despite the man’s words he knew that he and Ron would be neither hesitating or spouting out anything randomly. It would be a REAL duel.

“You will not be scored on your success or failure,” the professor continued, “but I do want you all to try your best. Next semester I will be assigning one of you as the captain of the Junior Dueling Club, based on your proficiency in my lessons. Houghton, Malfoy. You two first.”

Clyde seemed a bit startled. He had known Harry and Ron were going to fight, but it hadn’t occurred to him that he might actually have to as well. Draco was looking rather smug in comparison. He had a reason to be, for they had only gotten through the ritual salute when Draco blew him clean off the mat with a simple expelliarmus. Snape did not hesitate to call up the next two duelists; Ginny and a first year Ravenclaw boy. They were more equal, and they managed to cast two spells each before Ginny took the boy’s wand with a simple summoning charm. And so it went, with each of them being called to the platform. The duels were short, most of them over within the first three spells cast and all of them under a minute.

Harry and Ron were the last summoned. It wasn't unexpected, but it didn't make it any less nerve-wracking for Harry. He took a deep, calming breath and moved to the platform. Harry briefly noted that Ron had changed his uniform colors to solid black, but quickly returned his attention to more important things.

They saluted, and locking his eyes to his opponent, he could see a savage hunger for battle and something else which seemed more dangerous for his inability to recognize it.

"Suffoco sentenia!"

"Oculus obligo!"

The two hexes smashed into each other simultaneously, evaporating into nothingness. The voices had barely stopped echoing through the hall before the duelists were set to attacking again.

"Sterneo!" cried Ron, gesturing violently with his wand. Harry simply moved sideways to avoid, shouting out a Wind Curse. Ron blocked it with a shield charm, but the charm was meant to block elemental curses and not the Stinging Hex that followed. Turning sideways, the redhead caught it in the arm not holding his wand, before casting three curses of his own in quick succession.

"Perturbo ordo!" Harry called, the disruption spell causing two of the three spells to break off and fizzle in the air like firework sparks. The third curse slipped through behind the other two, ghosting into and over Harry. He felt the effects immediately, not in the form of pain as he had expected, but fear.

"Fortis fidens!" This spell, Harry did not cast on Ron, but on himself. A Bravery Charm. It was a risky move, especially since he wasn't entirely certain what spell Ron had used on him, but he hoped it was enough to prevent the rise of magically induced terror.

And it seemed to work... or at least work in his favor.

The fear was still there, making his heart beat frantically and his hands tremble around his wand. It also made the adrenaline rush through him, unleashing strength and a flurry of mad thoughts formed for simple self preservation.

The spells were coming to him faster, coming out more powerfully, more recklessly. Ron was forced to move to the offensive, blocking and dodging, clinging to his position on the matt and waiting for exhaustion to do what his own curses could not.

Harry was on his twelfth hex when his magic suddenly flickered, causing him to stumble, almost from the matt all together. Ron brought down his shield to cast his next curse.

“Spina mordeo!”

Harry instinctively brought up his arm to protect his face, foolishly using his wand arm which caught the worst of the Thorn Curse. He hissed as he felt a hundred little barbs sink into his exposed hand and the bend of his elbow where his armor did not protect him. Stubbornly, he refused to drop his wand, even as the sickening feeling of his own blood on his hands and the sickly scent of it pervaded his senses.

“Not so tough after all,” Ron said, breathless and gleeful, and followed his observation with another spell.

He heard the second curse shouted and quickly rolled out of the way and to his feet, shouting out two successive spells of his own. Ron blocked the first curse easily, but the rock Harry had summoned flew through it as if it weren't even there. It struck him clean in the forehead and knocked him to the ground.

Harry's magic wavered yet again, preventing him from casting the final blow before Ron managed to scramble back to his feet, blood seeping from a gash on his forehead.

“Blood. Oh, I smell it! I smell it!” came an unfortunately familiar voice. A feeling of dread that had nothing to do with Ron's previous curse settled into Harry's stomach. He had thought 'the voice' gone, certain it was a cursed induced hallucination that had finally faded away. It couldn't have come back. Curses didn't work that way!

"It's here, and it sssmellsss sssooooo goooooood... I musst have it!"

'The voice' distracted Harry enough for Ron to regain his balance, but the impetuous boy wasn't satisfied to fling another fruitless spell. His head throbbed, his anger throbbed in time with it, frustration pounding in his mind in time with the heart pounding in his chest. It wasn't suppose to be like this! He had trained so hard, done everything Snape had told him, studied for hours and hours on end when even Draco had given up. Potter should not have lasted this long. There was no way the stupid Gryffidnor was as powerful or perfect as everyone thought he was. He was just a stupid mudblooded fool with brainy friends and a silly ability to talk to snakes.

There was no way Harry fucking Potter was better than him!

With a roar of pure rage, he rushed for the Gryffindor, tackling him to the matts.

"Harry! Ron! Stop!" someone cried, reminding Harry of the spectators he had forgotten about. He had been so preoccupied with Ron, he hadn't been able to think about those around them. How long had they been dueling, anyway?

"I want it! I want it nowthe disembodied voice demanded, and then fell into the most horrible description of why. Even as he struggled to push the other boy off of him, Harry felt the rise in panic as the voice drew closer and louder and more bloodthirsty.

Hewanted to flee, believing it was his blood the thing wanted, but the fight with Ron wasn't over. The first punch split his lip, but he managed to block the second, only to loose his wand on the third.

Snape managed to reach them before the fourth one landed, pulling Ron off physically.

“Wealsey! What in the name of Merlin are you doing?!” Snape snarled, shaking the boy like a rag doll. The potion master’s attention was soon diverted to Potter who had jumped to his feet before any of his friends could reach him and bolted for the door. “Potter! Get back here!”

But the Gryffindor ignored him or possibly hadn’t even heard him, slamming the door behind him.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The halls were deserted, still forbidden as result of Snape’s rigorously enforced restrictions. Harry was both glad and terrified of that. He sprinted in a random direction, but the voice followed him, growing impatient in its hunger.

“I can sssmell it, sssso clossse, so clossse. Sssso hungry. Housse elvesss are too musty to sssatisfy.”

He found the stairs and rushed down them, barely keeping himself from plummeting down them head first. When he reached the bottom, he paused a moment to gain his bearings. The halls down here were silent. Should he remain where he was then? Where could he go? This thing following him, what was it? Should he flee the castle altogether?

Harry’s mind was flooded with panic, partly from Ron’s curse and partly from a very real fear of the things he knew haunted this school. For a minute he clung to the rail at the bottom of the stairs, trying to think when all his mind wanted was for him to flee and all his body wanted was for him to rest.

“There! I found you!”

Harry let out a startled scream, spinning around and finding no one, but unable to keep himself from running away nonetheless. He didn’t know where he was going. There was no plan. Finding a teacher to protect him or a place to hide was secondary to simply getting away.

He found himself at the front entrance of the school. The heavy wooden doors were closed, latched shut from the inside. He seized the first lock and tried to unlatch it, but it stuck firm. Harry searched his pockets for his wand before remembering that Ron had knocked it out of his hand in the Dueling Hall. Screaming in frustration and fear, he pounded at the door with already bloodied fist.

“Let me out!”

“Sssmellsss like fear. Deliciousss.”

“LET ME OUT!”

“Potter!”

He spun around to find Snape rushing down the hall, and his terror leaping between that of the bloodthirsty voice or his enraged professor. The man seemed to hesitate as he came close, eyeing the bloodied hand prints on the door suspiciously before turning his sights to the one who had made them. Harry could only stare mutely at the man, knowing it was almost as dangerous to run from this man as it was to stay in the non-presence of his pursuer.

“Do not move, Potter,” Snape warned coolly, moving forward with deliberate slowness to prevent the boy from bolting. “You’re under the affects of a Panic Hex.”

Harry shook his head.

“I can hear it. It wants to kill me. It can smell my blood. Can’t you hear it? Why am I the only one I can hear it?”

Snape hesitate. Harry eyes widened.

“It’s a snake, isn’t it? Whatever killed Sweetie is a snake, isn’t it? And it’s here, and it wants to kill me-”

“Don’t be conceited, Potter. It’s only the curse making you think that,” Snape said, taking another step closer. Harry pressed himself further into the door, as if he might somehow push himself through it altogether.

“No. No, I heard it before. I’ve heard it everywhere. In the dungeons and the hallways. Not in the tower, but once just outside of it... It’s following me... Let me out, let me OUT OF HERE!”

He seized the locks again, tearing at them with all his strength and gradually he felt the first one give-

“Praesens dormio!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Sitting in the infirmary, Severus looked down at the boy who gave him so much trouble and wished he could resent him for it. Resentful was his usual state of being, and even in situations where it wasn’t warranted he could easily summon the feeling and remain quite comfortably there.

It was certainly better than pitying. He didn’t like the feeling and he doubted Potter would appreciate it any. Yet whenever he tried to banish the feeling, he would see the bloodied hand prints on the entrance doors and screams to be let out. Not all the screaming he heard in his mind had been from Potter. Some of the voices were old and dead and gone forever except in the odd moments when his memories surfaced and the frail remains of his conscious plagued him.

Harry was not old or dead or gone though, merely sleeping, dark hair hallowing his pale sweaty complexion. He would have to write the Dark Lord about this. It was a calculated risk on his part. Voldemort would not be happy to learn that Harry was possibly being hunted, but he would be even less so if he learned Snape tried to hide that fact.

The death of the house elves and the failure of the resulting search early that morning was hardly going to impress his Master, although his skill in keeping it quiet so far, just might.

There was no telling what the Dark Lord's response would be in the end. He may return to the castle or have Harry removed from it, or leave Snape to handle the boy's protection (and he was hoping for the last option). He could not be completely sure that the voices Harry heard were from the basilisk and not something or someone else, and he hated the idea of turning someone's practical joke into an act of treason.

Regardless of what happened next, Snape had to deal with the problem of keeping Harry safe and also keeping the boy quiet. In his deranged state, the boy had stumbled to a conclusion about Sweetie's killer that hit far too close to the truth. Demands of silence would only go so far. He would have to ensure that Harry was kept conveniently (and safely) out of the way of rest of the school, particularly Hermione who would easily figure out the rest of the puzzle.

Until Christmas break at least, only two and half weeks away, and then the boy could be sent away from the castle for the holidays and a more permanent solution could be found or the basilisk destroyed with any luck.

Plucking a small vial from his robes, Snape very carefully unscrewed the top. The lid doubled as a thin dropper, and he used it to carefully place two tiny drops on the bottom of Harry's lip. The sleeping child licked his lip reflexively, taking the potion into his body with hardly a grimace.

Snape returned the vial to his robe and sighed. The next few weeks would not be pleasant for Harry, but in the end it would be for the best.

The best for everyone.

He nudged prodded Harry sharply with his wand. The boy bolted up right, his sleep and potion fogged mind less quick to follow his body's lead. Wincing against wakefulness, he batted the wand away and glowered in his assaulter's general direction. His glasses were elsewhere and he couldn't be bothered to care, wanting nothing more than to fall back to sleep.

“What?” he grumbled.

“Sign this,” Snape commanded, placing a quill in one lax hand and some sort of parchment on his lap. Harry looked down at the parchment but without his glasses it was illegible. He let out an enormous yawn and scribbled something he thought vaguely resembled his signature between two other nonsensical squiggles.

With the sedative running fresh and strong in his blood, it did not occur to Harry to question what he was doing, only to find the quickest and easiest means to return to the comfort of sleep. Once Snape had taken back both the quill and parchment, the potions master allowed him to do just that.

When Harry awoke next he would be in no condition to wonder exactly what he had done in his vulnerable state, and it would be several days later before he realized the consequences of that hasty act even if the act itself remained vague in his mind. He did, however, make an important decision rather quickly after.

Snape was officially off his Christmas list until he died.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

I have no idea if this is true or not in Rowling’s universe, but I would think it would be harder to make a long term spell stick to a witch/wizard without having their own natural magic disrupt it. It wouldn’t be the same if say someone caste a disguise spell on themselves, since it would already be compatible with their body’s own magic. Curses and hexes can work better because they work quickly and rarely linger for long (although it certainly feels like a long time to the cursed I’m sure). There are, of course, exceptions, but you’ll notice that they’re usually considered very powerful spells. Potions work for longer periods because they have no magical signature of their own. That’s my theory anyway. Agree or disagree as much as you like. Artistic liscense. :P

Book II:

Chapter 35: Potions and Plagues

Waking up in the infirmary was not an uncommon experience for Harry. Waking up in the infirmary feeling worse than he had before going there was. The discomfort of a fever had woken him, several times in fact, until late the next morning when he finally had the energy to stay awake long enough to wonder at his situation.

He could remember his fight with Ron, the return of 'the voice', and the subsequent escape into the halls. After that, things became a bit vague. Snape had chased after him, he knew, but not how or where he had caught him. The memory wasn't lost, but his head felt stuffed with cotton and thinking anything but the simplest thing was huge effort he didn't have the energy to expend.

"H-hello?" he called, coughing a bit from the dryness in his throat. Madam Pomfrey was beside him in an instant with a glass of water. He drank greedily, taking in the coolness of the liquid gratefully. A moment later, his vision cleared a bit as she placed his glasses on his nose.

"Thank you."

"You are quite welcome, Mr. Potter," she said cheerfully, then quickly got to business, sticking a thermometer (or a wizarding equivalent) in his mouth. "How do you feel? You've had a fever all night."

How did he feel? If could concentrate enough he would have to say he felt awful. Sicker than he'd been in years, and unable to account for it.

"What happened to me?"

She smiled sympathetically, taking his hand and holding it closer to his face. He was stunned to find it covered in tiny blue spots.

"See for yourself. You, young man, seem to have contracted Blue Pox."

“What? How could I have... I was vaccinated and quarantined! How could I have Blue Pox?”

“Calm down, dear, you mustn’t excite yourself. You have a lot of recovering to do after all. As for how, well, you may have had a bad batch of vaccine but more than likely it was probably stress. All this nasty business happening at the school on top of end of semester school work, I imagine the stress harmed your immune system to the point you couldn’t fight off the infection.”

She plucked the thermometer from his mouth and read it.

“101.3°. Hmm... a little better than last night, I suppose. Lay back down dear, and I’ll get you a compress. We can talk a little more after you’ve rested some.”

He wanted to talk more NOW, but she had already scurried away and by the time she had returned, he had already drifted off. The next time he woke it was to someone gently calling his name. He blinked sleepily and turning to his left he saw a worried looking Hermione, Clyde, and Ginny standing a few feet from his bed. Draco was also there, although he looked more amused than worried.

“I can’t believe it. You really did catch the Pox. I thought they were just covering up that you fell down the stairs or something else equally ridiculous,” the Malfoy heir sniggered.

“Draco, be quiet, this isn’t funny!” Hermione snapped, made a move towards Harry but then hesitate and stepped back again. She sighed. “I’m sorry, Harry, but you’re under quarantine. This is as close as we’re allowed to get.”

Harry felt a pang of loneliness, but managed a reassuring smile for her.

“It’s alright. I’ll be fine in a couple of days, I’m sure. But what happened? I remember running away, but I don’t remember why.”

He did remember why, but he needed to hear why they thought he ran away. Surely, Snape would have made some excuse that in no way resembled the truth.

“Panic Hex,” Clyde offered, “Who knows what you were thinking while under its affects? Maybe you thought you were bleeding to death or Snape was going to kill you or you needed to study for Herbology in case of a pop quiz. Scared the bejeezus out of the rest of us though.”

“Yes,” Draco agreed, looking bored, “Ron did quite the number on you. I didn’t know he had it in him. Though, you didn’t do half bad yourself.”

Harry shrugged.

“And what happened to Ron?”

“Suspended from practices till after the holidays for ‘unsportsman-like behavior’,” Hermione said, sounding disgusted, “He’s lucky I wasn’t there or I’d have turned him into a toad.”

Harry chuckled, but it caught in his throat, making him cough violently. The shutters to the nearest window slammed shut.

“I-I’ll get it,” Ginny offered, opening the shutters again with a few flicks of her wand.

“This is ridiculous,” Harry muttered, taking the now warm compress from his forehead and wiping the sweat from face. “I’m dueling one moment and dying the next... from something completely unrelated.”

“You’re not dying, Harry. You’ve probably been carrying the virus around for a while now, so when you expended all that magic during your duel-”

“Rather careless of you,” Draco pointed out smugly, earning him a pinch from Ginny.

“- it left you vulnerable to the infection. You’ll be up an about in a few weeks. At least that’s what my godfather said. You have the worst luck.”

“A few weeks? I can’t lay around her for a few weeks?! I’ve got class-”

Another round of coughing cut off his protests, closed the shutters again, and tipped over a glass of water. Ginny set everything to right again without a word.

“Don’t worry about class, mate,” Clyde admonished. “You’ll be well by winter break, and you can make it up then.”

“I’ll lend you all of by notes. And I’ll visit every day to keep you up to date.” Hermione offered. Harry nodded, but didn’t feel particularly comforted. He hated staying in the infirmary, where it was always too quiet and too lonely and too boring. Besides, there were things happening in Hogwarts. Some of these things were fun, some of them scary, but all of them important to him.

It was completely unfair that he’d have to miss out on it, even if it was only for a little while.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort read the latest report from Snape and felt distinctly unhappy. The return of the basilisk was disturbing enough, even more so since it seemed to be doing a wonderful job of avoiding Tom while at the same time following Harry. At least Snape had found a way to secure the child, even if it did disrupt the boy’s education.

This turn of events was confusing, as well as frustrating. It left him in doubt of Tom’s involvement yet again. His younger counterpart would never place his ‘mother’ in danger, after all. Yet at the same time, how could Tom possibly keep missing the basilisk? True, Snape’s safety measures had limited Tom’s freedom of movement, but if he were earnest there wasn’t anything the young snake couldn’t accomplish.

“Pettigrew,” he said, startling the sniveling little man sitting in the chair across from his desk.

“Y-yes, Master?”

“Have you learned anything new?”

The coward rung his hands for a moment, his nose twitching like the creature he so often mimicked.

“Ah... well, no, not really. The, the Slytherin dorms are harder to get into than Gryffindor’s. There are a lot of p-pet s-snakes there.”

Voldemort watched Pettigrew shudder with some amusement. He knew it was unfair of him to ask the animagus to infiltrate a place swarming with his natural enemy, but he was a sadist and such things were entertaining to him.

“So be it. If you are too incompetent to infiltrate the bedrooms of mere children, I suppose it is too much to ask for you to search the secret passages.”

Pettigrew paled. His master was not his friend, and their relationship and his affinity to breathing hinged on his continued uses to the Dark Lord. Should he run out of uses, the secrets he held would not permit him to simply walk away.

“N-no, Master! I can do that for you! I- I could even... maybe... get into the Sl-Slytherin d-dorms. It-it will just t-take time.”

Voldemort seemed to consider, although he was merely taking a moment to enjoy watching the little man squirm.

“Very well, I will give you another chance. Return to Hogwarts and find me something useful. If something should happen before I receive a meaningful report from you, I will be most... displeased.”

“Y-yes, M-ma-”

“GO!”

The man was a rat (or rather the rat became even more of a rat), and disappeared through a strategically placed hole in the wall. A scuttling sound was heard for a few moments and then blessed silence. He took the opportunity to consider his next move, but there was little he could think of to do. Snape was handling the situation as best he could without knowing the truth about Tom, Tom was the only one who could control the basilisk in his absence yet was less than trustworthy, and Harry wasn't going to be able to help or hinder anyone for a while.

Unable to think of an immediate course of action, he shoved his concerns aside and turned back to his other responsibilities. For now, that involved sorting through correspondence with his various spies and officials. There was over fifty to look through for today. He sorted through them, and found one from Lestrangle. Apparently, she was having better luck serving Hogwarts abroad than she was serving at home, for she had already found a couple of very fine teachers that even Voldemort approved of. The newest missive presented the teacher who would be replacing McNair next year, a former Ravenclaw with impeccable credentials and a reputation that preceded her.

Finally, some good news.

He set it aside, making a mental note to have Lestrangle's candidates undergo a thorough background check, and checked the rest of his letters. One in particular gave him pause, if for no other reason that it was pink. If his mail sorters had missed yet another love letter, he was going to cut off someone's fingers.

But no, it wasn't a love letter. It was an Umbridge letter. Mentally, he sighed. The toady woman really was tiresome. Clever and capable, but tiresome. And perhaps a bit over ambitious if the contents of her letter were anything to go by. She quite thoroughly reported everything that Snape already had, perhaps hoping she would reveal something her supervisor had withheld.

Really, did that woman believe she could ever surpass Severus or even Bella? He tossed the letter aside, seeing no reason to waste time with a response.

[illegible]

Ronald Weasley stared down at his adversary with a combination of disappointment and irritation. Harry Potter really did have Blue Pox after all, and was not just covering up the fact that one of Ron's spells had done real damage. The bruises, the split lip, and the tiny cuts on Potter's hand and arm had already been healed, leaving only a series of little blue spots to justify his hospitalization.

Currently, Potter was sleeping restlessly, his pale skin shiny with fever-induced sweat. Ron didn't like it. He thought he'd take pleasure in the discomfort of the pompous bastard, but it felt wrong to see him brought low by something as menial as a flu. He never admitted it to anyone, least of all himself, but the Gryffindor had always seemed indestructible. But he had bled under Ron's fists, made mortal by a mortal.

Now, Ron couldn't claim he defeated a god, but he could claim what was rightfully his.

“Potter.”

The sickly boy flinched, awakening with a groan and a hand blocking the dim light of the infirmary from his eyes. The medi-witch had left his glasses on, but even then the room looked blurry at first. He finally managed to lock onto the vague shape of someone standing at the foot of his bed, and after a long tense moment Ron's expressionless face came into focus.

Harry tensed. Without looking, he already knew that they were the only two there, and of them only Ron had his wand. There was absolutely nothing comforting about this situation.

Yet Ron did not have his wand in his hand and he made no move for it, merely stared at Harry intently, making a demand the Gryffindor couldn't understand yet couldn't deny. How long they remained there, silently staring at each other he didn't know. But finally, Ron's blank expression broke into a pleased smirk.

"Hn."

With that, Ron walked away, leaving Harry to wonder what had happened or if it all hadn't merely been a fever dream. Let him wonder, Ron thought, he had gotten what he had come for.

Potter had looked at him.

Potter had seen him.

And if the mudblooded bastard ever dared to disregard him again, he'd leave him a bloody smear on the stones of Hogwarts.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

A week passed, leaving Harry to dismiss Ron's visit as nothing more than one of a series of bad dreams. The Pox left him weak, fevered, and light headed, despite the many potions Madam Pomfrey poured down his throat. Worse than this, however, was the endless boredom. Hermione visited him daily, usually in the company of his other friends and occasionally a teacher as well, but she could never stay long and in her absence the infirmary was a silent and lonely place. Reading and studying were impossible, his mind still too foggy from fever and potions to concentrate, leaving him to random thoughts and during his more energetic periods he could squeeze in a few sketches.

The only even slightly remarkable thing to happen was a visit from a Hogwarts' Herald student reporter, Abigail Bilst, and her young photographer Collin Creevy. Some rather unflattering rumors about what had happened in dueling club had been circulating, and they had both come to confirm or bust the official story. Abbey seemed disappointed that her first story didn't have some hidden twist, but seemed delighted to have an interview with him. Apparently, she had to beat four other students in a round of Exploding Snaps to get it.

Harry wasn't sure if he should be flattered, amused, or vaguely worried.

He settled on amused, because he didn't get near enough amusement in that place.

A second week passed, leaving Harry a little stronger, a little more clear headed, and with fewer spots. And he remembered. He remembered his desperate escape through the halls, 'the voice' chasing him the entire way, Snape confrontation at the doors, his own mad conjecture proven true by the potion master's reaction.

And it was all pointless. Because...

"Harry, don't speak," Hermione begged, her friend bent over himself and coughing violently into his sheets. Around them his erratic wild magic opened and shut shutters, knocked over flower vases, and exploded a nearby pillow. "I'll go get Madam Pomfrey!"

"No-wait! Her-" more violent coughs wracked his body, until the medi-witch appeared and dosed him with one of her potions. His fall into unconsciousness was swift and deep.

When he had woken again it was late, and Snape was standing over him with only a Lumos Charm to see by. His expression was devoid of emotion, of anything resembling regret or guilt.

"What did you do to me?" Harry hissed through clenched teeth.

"I protected you."

"You poisoned me."

"Don't be melodramatic, Potter. You are safe here. There are more wards protecting the occupants of the hospital wing than half of Hogwarts combined. Now you have a reasonable excuse to remain here. You should thank me."

"Fuck you."

Snape arched a brow.

"I will overlook your asinine attempt at insult just this once, as you are ill."

"I'm not ill. I'm poisoned and I'm pissed."

“Mm... well, I didn’t come to argue semantics. Aren’t you going to ask me about the contract?”

Harry was diverted in his search for something to throw at the potion's master by his question.

“What contract?”

“The one that made you almost cough out your lungs when you tried to tell my goddaughter what you had learned. The one that will cramp your fingers if you ever try to write it and scatter your thoughts if someone were to try and legilimens you. The one that will protect the Dark Lord’s secrets. That contract.”

“... I don't remember...”

“You weren’t really coherent when you signed. In fact, I think you signed ‘Hairy Plumber’, but with magical contracts you could have signed ‘Mary Antoinette’ and it wouldn’t have made a difference. You’re bound, Mr. Potter, and there’s no getting around it.”

Harry could only stare at the man, horrified. Snape waited for him to say something, but quickly grew impatient.

“Well, goodnight then, Potter.”

The lumos charm ended, plunging everything into total darkness, and by the time Harry's eyes readjusted the infirmary was empty.

[illegible]

Harry managed to catch up on his school reading fairly quick, with nothing else to do, and though he was not yet in enough control of his magic to practice spells he practiced the hand movements with a pencil. Anything was better than thinking about Snape's betrayal, and more importantly the success of it. A great deal of energy was spent just not thinking about it.

If possible, he was even more bored than the week before. Hermione visited like clockwork, but she brought fewer and fewer visitors. Although, sometimes when he was napping he could have sworn someone else had been there, but could never be sure it wasn't the result of bad dreams. Hermione assured him that no one could enter the infirmary without alerting Madam Pomfrey, who had reported no one but the odd patient and occasional student visitor.

That Sunday brought the first edition of the Hogwarts Herald, delivered by Hermione herself. She was giddy.. He found it pretty amusing until she accidentally smacked him in the head with the rolled up newspaper (she still wasn't allowed close enough to simply hand it to him), her excitement badly affecting her aim.

"I'm sorry!"

He righted his glasses, and offered her a wane smile.

"That's ok. So how's it going?" he asked, unrolling the paper. It was thicker than he'd thought it would be, nearly as thick as the daily Wizing Weekly. The front page read "Meet the Heralds of Hogwarts" and showed a large picture of the paper's staff, including Hermione sitting right up front with the more prominent older students.

"Fantastic! Everyone did a marvelous job! I wasn't sure if we were going to make our deadline, but Professor Toure really knows how to get people organized. We put an article about her under 'The Teacher's Tattler', and it mentions she used to be coordinator at the National Wizing History Museum. And to think before that she-"

Harry listened to her with half an ear, most of his attention focused on the various articles scattered in the paper. It was actually pretty interesting. There were articles about recent events, future events, student activities, teacher and student announcements, weather reports, a gossip column, a fashion column, sports sections, advice column for school related problems, study tips, health section (which he was amused to find his picture a part of), student interviews, teacher interviews (this week was Toure as Hermione mentioned). The student interview featured none other than Tom, coming off as charming and poised even on paper.

He skimmed Tom's article briefly, but it revealed nothing he hadn't heard about him before. Disappointed, he checked the 'Events in Review' to see if anything new or the least bit suspicious had been written about 'the Guardian'. Aside from a article about the 'hex epidemic' that had since passed, there was nothing unusual mentioned. He wasn't surprised.

Looking over at Hermione happily chattering away about the paper's success and her plans for future articles, he couldn't feel too terribly guilty. Nothing bad had happened and Hermione was happier than he could ever recall seeing her. Perhaps 'the Guardian' had been following Harry, and now that he was seemingly out of reach it had left. It was too much to hope, but it was the season...

Which reminded him.

"I don't suppose I've received another invite to the Malfoy Christmas party?"

Hermione, who had gone off on a tangent about Collin Creevey's questionable photographer's morality was brought up short in her speech. Confused, she merely blinked at him for a moment.

"Oh! I told you last week. We only hold those balls on even years. We're sort of in an agreement with the Hothwell family, who hold the balls on odd years. Otherwise we get into quite the competition over guests. I'm not surprised you don't remember. You were pretty loopy from fever."

Harry couldn't remember much of last week, and it was his greatest wish that no one else would remember him like that either. 'Loopy' wasn't a very flattering state to be in.

“What about you, Harry?” she asked, “Has Professor Snape or Professor McGonagall come to talk to you about where you’ll be spending winter break?”

“What do you mean? I assumed I would be staying here for the holidays, like last year.”

Hermione frowned, somewhat worried.

“I would have thought... oh, never mind. Turn to page four, under ‘Important Announcements.’”

He did as instructed, skimming over the schedule for midterm exams and located just above the Hogwarts Express Departure procedure was an unexpected bit of news.

Due to an unusually low number of available staff during the holiday season, all students will be sent home or to an otherwise specified domicile for the duration of winter break. Letters to parents and guardians have already been sent, and should all arrive by Tuesday. If you or your family have any questions, please speak with your Head of House. Arrangements will be made for special circumstances.
- Deputy Headmaster S. Snape

“Huh. First I’ve heard of it,” he admitted. Could this somehow be a part of another of Snape’s plans? Perhaps with the rest of the school empty, the potion’s master would attempt to find and capture the serpent yet again? He looked to his friend to ask her opinion on his theory, but a sudden flush of strange magic surged through him, invoking a series of violent coughs.

“Harry?! Are you ok? Should I get the nurse?”

He waved her off, continuing to cough. After a moment, it stopped. He had forgotten about Snape’s contract, but clearly it hadn’t forgotten him. Running his hand through his hair in frustration, he tried to think of what to do next.

“Still sick,” he said distractedly, voice a bit raspy now. “But at least I didn’t tip any glasses or something.”

Hermione nodded sympathetically, and got up to go.

“You should rest if you want to get better before break. I’ll talk to McGonagall and see what their plans are for you. You can keep the paper.”

“Thanks.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

After Hermione left, no one else visited that evening or the Monday morning that followed. Alone with his thoughts and frustrations, the restlessness that had plagued Harry since his hospitalization came to a peak. He could not stand to lay there in bed any longer.

He peeked down the hall of the fourth floor corridor, and finding it predictably empty, moved quickly until he reached the next turn. At ten in the morning, everyone would be in class, including Madam Pomfrey who taught Intro to Medical Wizardry twice a week at this time. That gave him one hours to search the school and get back to bed before anyone noticed him.

Hardly feasible, but he had a few places in particular that he wanted to check out. The dungeon would have been his first choice, but he couldn’t risk being caught by Snape, so he began with the hall outside the library and made his way to every place he could remember hearing ‘the voice’. Now that he had figured out it was from a snake, he though he might have better luck finding it... possibly even reasoning with it to return to the place it had been guarding.

So far all he had to show for his trouble was a nasty chill.

“Harry?”

The young Gryffindor let out a startled squeak, and spun around. Climbing out of a secret passage behind a suit of armor was Tom, looking almost as surprised to see Harry as the boy was to see him. Harry bolted.

He was half way back to the hospital wing when Tom finally caught him, catching hold of his wrist and spinning him around. Harry twisted in his grip, struggling weakly. Whether it was his own prolonged sickness or Tom possessed unusual strength, it quickly became obvious that escape was impossible.

“Let go, Tom. I still have the Pox, you know,” he grumbled, staring pointedly at Tom’s hand gripping his wrist rather than the boy himself.

“Which is why you should still be in the infirmary. What are you doing out here, Harry? Merlin, you’re freezing!”

The Slytherin released him, but he didn’t have time to run again before he found himself netted in Tom’s school robe. The robe was much too big and pooled over his feet. With a few flicks of the older boy’s wand and a muttered spell, the black cloth began to warm like an electric blanket.

Harry almost sighed in relief.

Until Tom grabbed him by the arms, his grip wickedly fierce.

“What are you doing out here? And dressed in nothing but hospital pajamas? Are you daft?”

He flushed in embarrassment.

“Nothing. I was just... bored. I’ve been laying bed for two weeks and I’m sick of it. What are you doing out here? Don’t you have class?”

Tom hesitated, his grip loosening.

“I... this is my free period.”

“Shouldn’t you be in your dorm with your classmates.”

Tom snorted.

"If I have to spend one more minute listening to what so-and-so's parent is buying them for Christmas, someone's not going to live long enough to get their gifts," the Slytherin said, sneering. His expression smoothed when he looked back to a Harry. "Why are you here, Harry? I can think of a dozen better...warmer places an escapee-patient might prefer."

"Then why aren't you there?"

Again, that moment of hesitation and Harry was quickly beginning to think Tom was up to something. He wondered if... could Tom be looking for 'the guardian' too? Did Tom know or at least suspect the true nature of Sweety's killer? If so, how much did he know about Harry's own investigation? Was the older boy spying on him that day in the library for that reason?

A thousand thoughts bombarded him, all questioning Tom's possible role in the mystery and whether it was curious investigator or... something else. Something that was too absurd to think about. Tom was his friend, why would he spy on him? But then why wouldn't he tell Harry if he knew something?

"I refuse to have a conversation in the middle of the hall with someone in pajamas," Tom said finally. "I'll take you back to the infirmary and we can talk there."

Once enclosed in the warmth and privacy of the infirmary, they each settled into a chair. For a long moment, neither said anything. Then Tom looked at his watch and sighed.

"I have to be back in the dungeons in twenty minutes, so we best make this brief and to the point. Why were you wandering in the halls?"

Harry shrugged, unable to answer truthfully even if he wanted to. Tom frowned.

"Were you... looking for it? That thing that hurt your teammate?"

Green eyes widened. Tom's frowned deepened.

"You can't keep doing this, Harry. You're much too important to be risking your life over trivialities. Let Professor Snape take care of it."

"Trivialities? A girl is dead, Tom! There's nothing trivial about it! And Snape's the bloody reason I'm in here!"

The Slytherin's mouth twitched, fighting a smirk as he poked at a prominent blue spot on Harry's forehead.

"Yes, it was rather clever of him too. No one's even suspected, not even your own best friend. And I heard she was smart."

The Gryffindor slapped Tom's hand away from his forehead, glowering. Anger bloomed in his heart, its root feeding on his sense of betrayal. He should of know, he thought. Tom had been too perfect. He had seen his lying smile and still been charmed. But Tom wasn't what he had thought... hoped?... he was. But how far did the lie go? Was the mask simply a charming cover for his more callous and cynical thoughts or did they hide something more sinister?

"Tom... what do you know?"

The Slytherin smirked.

"What anyone with half a brain, a little bit of curiosity, and access to the Restricted Section of the library might know. I imagine you've figured out quite a bit yourself."

"You didn't answer my question."

"You didn't answer mine either."

True.

Tom glanced at his watch again.

"I don't have much time left, and after this I may not be able to visit you again before break. How would you like to spend the holidays with me?"

Now where did THAT come from? Tom's charm was back, his clever little smile directed at Harry, and his eyes were intense...no...welcoming?

"What?"

"I had hoped to keep you out of the matter, but if you're going to be stubborn we might as well work together. I was planning on spending Christmas in Askrigg. Have you ever been there? Tiny little town, but very pretty when it snows."

That sounded nice, and Tom wasn't acting mean or weird now. He was smiling and curious and just what Harry wanted.

"I still have no idea what you're talking about."

"I keep my best books in Askrigg. Spend the holidays with me there, and I promise I'll tell you everything I know and you can help me search for more. How about it, Harry? Will you come?"

Green eyes, different than his own, soften from intense emerald by little flecks of red, held him gently, warm as the charmed robe around his shoulders.

"I... I don't think..." he tried, thoughts of Snape's unknown plans for him slipping into the warm atmosphere like a cold mountain spring. Innocent, but distracting.

"Don't worry about your guardians, Harry. I'm sure I can convince them. I'm very convincing, aren't I?"

Yes, he was definitely that, he thought hazily. But there wasn't much he had to convince Harry of after all, was there? Why spend Christmas alone when he could spend it with a friend he both liked and admired? One who shared his interest in the-

A familiar surge of foreign magic welled up, spilling out into violent coughing, breaking the connection Tom had made to his mind. The connection that had sought out the knowledge Harry's contract would protect, even from legilimency.

"Harry! What's wrong?"

Tom's hands were on his shaking shoulders, and Harry shoved him away harshly, stumbling away from him. The robe fell from shoulders, tangling his feet and dragging him to the floor.

"Don't touch me! Don't come anywhere near me! You-you...bloody..." he snarled up at him, eyes flashing in rage. Tom was stunned.

"Harry?" he tried softly, looking almost pitifully confused. All Harry saw was a lie.

"You... I trusted you! I thought you were my friend! Then you tried to...to... I THOUGHT YOU WERE MY FRIEND!"

The lie fell away, leaving Tom's expression cold and his eyes devilish red. Like a striking serpent, he went from absolute stillness to violent motion within a fraction of a second. He shoved the smaller boy to the floor, pinning his wrists beside his head.

"I am the only friend you will ever need," he hissed, parseltongue turning an already dangerous statement into something obscene. Harry could only lay there, stunned and frightened.

Tom's expression softened, and he released Harry's wrists when he showed no signs of struggling. He let out a long, frustrated sigh and checked his watch.

"Damn it. Out of time."

He pointed his wand at Harry.

"Obliviate!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Potter, wake up.”

Harry sprung up, gasping, his mind shredding and scattering his nightmare like bits of paper. A moment of panic, of displacement, and then the infirmary began to take on the familiar shapes and patterns of light he remembered. He blinked away the vague afterimages from his sleep, and turned to see Snape standing beside him. It was strange to see the man after two weeks of absence. Had he always looked so irritated?

Oh, wait, they were in the same room together. Question answered.

“Are you coherent?” the man sneered. “I would hope after two weeks lazing around in bed you would be well rested.”

Harry glowered back at the man.

“If you didn’t want me bedridden then perhaps you shouldn’t have poisoned me? Just a thought.”

Snape waved his statement away like an irritating fly. He pulled an envelope from his robe, and for a second Harry’s heart leapt at thought of Sirius and Remus. Then he realized the envelope was black. The potion’s master handed it to him. An elegant ‘V’ was inscribed in gold across it.

“The Dark Lord has extended an invitation to spend the holidays with him in Bristol.”

“Why?” he asked, confused and feeling disoriented again by rather ominous deja vu.

“PR, probably. Orphan-hugging and all that.”

Oh, well that actually made sense. It wasn’t exactly flattering, but at least it made sense.

“You should be released from the infirmary Wednesday afternoon, which will give you just enough time to collect your assignments and pack. McGonagall has assigned a Prefect to keep an eye on you... incase you suddenly relapse from your illness.”

Harry snorted. Snape smirked.

“The train leaves the next day at exactly 8 o’clock. You must be ready to leave the castle at seven-fifteen with the rest of your House. A WYRA representative will be in London to escort you to the estate. After that, it’s up to the Dark Lord. Happy Holidays.”

“I hope you’re hit by low flying reindeer.”

“If only I were so lucky. The Headmistress is returning on Friday.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Remember Blue Pox? I mentioned it in the first book. It’s a common illness of young wizard. Sneezing commonly results in the lights flickering on or off, and other odd little things happening.

Book II:

Chapter 17: The Prince and the Fortress

Outside it was snowing, and it had been since Harry and all his classmates had left Hogwarts. The heavy, fluffy white flakes had gradually given way to sleet as they drew further south towards London. Inside the Hogwarts' Express, however, the atmosphere was warm and bright and smelled strongly of chocolate and peppermint. Christmas carols were being sung, picked up and left off by who ever wanted to join in, and laughter filled the silences in between.

The compartment Harry had managed to procure was already crowded with luggage and his friends. For once, Harry was able to sit with Natalie and Draco, made possible by Ron opting to sit with his siblings. Clyde had opted to sit with them, avoiding his 'uncles' as much as possible before being trapped with them at home. Natalie had gleefully offered to hold a spherical basket for Harry, and peeked inside at Inana's dozing form every so often.

"Would you stop that," Draco grouched, glaring suspiciously at the basket, "It's going to wake up eventually and then bite you on the nose."

"But she's so pretty!"

"And can kill you within minutes!"

"Even better!"

Hermione and Draco rolled their eyes. The Malfoy heir turned to Harry.

"You couldn't have left it in the baggage car?"

"It's not heated back there. Besides, when I told the baggage carrier what was inside the basket, they refused to touch it. Don't be a sissy, Draco. I fed her before we left, so she'll sleep for the next couple of days."

“Just because I have a survival instinct that surpasses that of lemming doesn’t make me a sissy.”

Harry just chuckled. He had missed his Slytherin friends and the battle of wits and philosophy that inevitably sparked between. If Draco was at all resentful of the trouble sparked between Gryffindor and Slytherin and the unpleasant restrictions that had resulted, he did an impeccable job at hiding it. They had spent most of the day discussing the last couple of weeks, finding out where their houses differed in perspective of recent events.

“Speaking of survival instinct,” Natalie said, redirecting the conversation, “Are you ready to face the Dark Lord, Harry?”

Harry sighed, and wondered that himself.

“How can I be ready? I mean, it’s the Dark Lord. What’s he do for Christmas anyway?”

“Absolutely nothing,” Draco said, smirking. “He’s a pagan.”

Now that Harry hadn’t been expecting, and felt a sudden nervousness. Witchcraft was technically a pagan craft, and Professor Toure had done much to remind them of that fact in History of Magic. She held a sort of contempt for what she referred to as the ‘pseudo-Christian’ religion most wizards and witches followed today, and he briefly wondered if she weren’t pagan as well. Yet for all the homework and research assignments she had assigned, Harry still wasn’t entirely sure what it all meant.

Hermione rolled her eye.

“Don’t worry about it. He might be a pagan, but he knows the benefit of playing a Christian to the public. Aside from the lack of a Christmas tree or nativity scene, I doubt you’ll see much difference,” she said. Clyde nodded in agreement, pulling a candy cane from his mouth to speak. Harry was amused to note that his tongue was now stripped red and white.

"Yeah, mate, what she said. Christmas is supposedly steeped in pagan symbolism anyway. And you get to skip those boring church masses and Christmas pageants. Consider yourself lucky."

Draco sighed, irritated that they had ended his fun before it had really gotten started.

"Fine, so he won't set you on fire as a sacrifice, but don't let your guard down. I doubt he invited you into his house out of the goodness of his heart."

Harry shrugged. He knew the situation was strange and more than a bit frightening, but what could he do? The chances were this was just a publicity stunt, which meant he would have to smile and look grateful around people and then spend the rest of his time bored out of his mind in his room. It wouldn't be so different from Christmas with the Durs-

Okay, comparing life with his relatives to life in the wizarding world was a definite no-no on his mental list, so he was going to make sure they never resembled each other even if he had to let Voldemort set fire to him to make it so.

"I'll be fine. I doubt he wants anything... bad. I'll just keep to myself as much as possible and be polite whenever we meet. I doubt we'll see each other much. He's busy doing... whatever he's been busy doing the last couple of months."

"I'm sure we'll find out what he's been up to before the end of break," Hermione said, "Lucius has been helping with his latest project. Crowned Negotiator, whatever that means."

"It means," Draco drawled, "that half the Court is going to be traipsing through our estate while we're there and most won't have the common sense to keep their mouths shut. Chances are we'll know more about the Dark Lord's latest plans than half of his inner circle. You should keep your ear to the door as well, Potter. You might learn something interesting."

Clyde snorted.

“Yeah, like what the Dark Lord does to spies.”

“No! Harry, you keep with your plan. Keep your head down and out of trouble.”

Harry chuckled at her overly concerned expression.

“Despite what your brother thinks, I do have some survival instinct. I fully intend to have the most boring and uneventful Christmas I can manage without being comatose.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The platform in London was crowded, slick from sleet, and gloomy this late in the afternoon. Harry procrastinated leaving the warmth and companionship within the train, but eventually he had to say his goodbyes to all his friends (and check his pockets thoroughly after Fred and George glomped him by surprise) and make his way to the platform. Claiming his luggage, Elsbeth, and Inana’s basket, he maneuvered them awkwardly to a bench under the station’s awning. Being closer to the ticket booth and opposite the floo stations, he was able to free himself from most of the traffic and dutifully await his chaperon.

From his vantage point he could see families finding each other, parents and children and siblings and friends drawn together and apart like droplets of oil on a smooth surface. He watched as the Weasley bunch gathered into a particularly large crowd, joined now not only by their mother Molly but by two unfamiliar young men who could have only been Charlie and Bill. Not long after they had come together though, did other witches and wizards come along and start to tear them apart. Clyde’s grandparents lingered the longest, chatting amicably with Mrs. Weasley, but they too eventually drew their adopted children and grandson away. Bill and Charlie rested reassuring hands on her shoulder, but even from across the platform Harry could see her eyes had grown large and shiny.

“Mr. Potter?”

Harry started in surprise, his wand in his hand and raised before he could stop himself. A woman stood beside him, her expression vaguely indignant at the sight of his wand. She sort of reminded him of Professor McGonagall, looking most prim, proper, and a bit severe; but where patience and the occasional ironic smile soften the Transfiguration teacher's demeanor, this new woman lacked anything that might make her more approachable.

"Sorry. Habit," he said, reluctantly returning the wand to the holder in his sleeve. She tilted her head in acknowledgment, but there was nothing forgiving about her expression.

"I am Madam Hardwick. On behalf of WYRA, I am here to escort you to Bristol."

"Oh..." Joy. "Nice to meet you. Um... password?"

Snape had been very insistent on remembering to ask for the password. Had even threatened severe punishment if he forgot to ask (how the hell would he know anyway? Unless this woman was his mother. She sort of looked like she could be).

She nodded in approval.

"Curiosity killed the Black Cat of Gryffindor."

Subtle, Snape. Very subtle.

"Come along then. We have a long way to go and traffic is going to be atrocious in this weather," she ordered, snapping her fingers. A chauffeur, dressed in a grey uniform appeared, taking up Harry's trunk and Elsbeth's cage. The young Gryffindor quickly snatched up Inana's basket before he ran off with that as well, and followed after the retreating woman. She led them to an old fashioned car, black and shiny with silver accents, waiting for them just outside the muggle station. Madam Hardwick ignored the curious stares of the surrounding muggles, and encouraged Harry to do the same by forcing him to quicken his pace in order to keep up with her. She shuffled him into the back seat as quickly as possible, and after a suspicious glance around the station, climbed in as well.

The car was not the same one that had first retrieved him from the Dursley's, and Harry had a strong suspicion it belonged to Voldemort when he found the interior lined with dark green velvet. His trunk in the boot of car, Elsbeth in the front passenger seat, Inana's basket set at his feet, and a rather quiet and unfriendly stranger to his left, Harry tried his best to settle himself for the rest of the ride. It was rather hard to get comfortable with Hardwick's sharp grey eyes pinning him to his seat, daring him to so much as sneeze.

Once they left the station, however, Harry soon found himself suitably distracted. They were not traveling through wizarding London like he had thought they would, but through the muggle city. All around them the curiosities of his magical world gave way to distantly familiar things. Sunglasses, Christmas lights, traffic signs, Big Ben, trench coats, high-rise office buildings, snow shovels, and a postman danced across his line of sight with all the peculiarity of a polar bear lounging on the beach. Such inane little things he hadn't realized were missing, and was startled to find he missed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

After forty minutes stuck in holiday traffic, their driver pulled off into a tunnel, and came out of it somewhere in the middle of a country highway. Bristol was about a hundred miles directly west of London, and though both were notable cities, there was very little by way of settlements between them. It was also colder in the interior, and the light cast a gloomy pall over the empty farm and pasture land.

Harry tightened his winter cloak around him, the chill seeping into him through the glass of the window even as the rest of car remained toasty. His chaperone cleared her throat, drawing his attention.

"Do you have anything nicer to wear?" she said evenly.

He looked down at himself and wondered what she thought was wrong with what he had. It was a little plain, but clean and in good repair. WYRA had certainly thought it suitable when they'd given it to him last year.

"This is the only winter cloak I own. Really, the only clothes I have are what WYRA gave me last year," he answered nervously. Which reminded him that he needed to get some new socks and underwear. Perhaps some new shirts too, since the sleeves were starting to get too short. Not that he was going to ask her for any.

"I see," she said, her grey eyes turning inward in thoughtful introspection. She said nothing else for another hour. They passed a sign citing Bristol city limits at 12 kilometers, but pulled off the highway onto a county road and then pulled off again onto a dirt road. They traveled until they reached a short stone wall with a small wooden gate, and the chauffeur had to get out and use his wand to open it. As soon as they crossed the boundary the English countryside fell away to a thick forest, though nothing but more countryside could be seen from the other side.

"Where are we?" he murmured, but in the silence it was easily heard.

"The Dark Lord is a guardian of the people, but he values his privacy. Most of his estates are outside city limits. This one is known as the Sianach Lodge, named after the man-eating deer that are bred here. I encourage you not to wander the woods at dawn or dusk."

Didn't anyone like animals that didn't eat people?

"Thanks for the warning."

The Sianach Lodge was anything but a lodge. It was nothing more or less than a country mansion, encased in extensive gardens and lawns that gave way to wild forest. From the driveway, Harry could see a flock of pheasants grazing near a stone gryphon, and wondered what else wandered onto the grounds.

Harry released Elsbeth to stretch her wings, and within moments her white plumage faded into the misty gloom and she disappeared. Suddenly, Harry found himself surrounded by three servants dressed in green and black uniforms. They quickly gathered up his trunk and Elsbeth's cage, but when one eager young maid tried to take Inana's basket he dissuaded her by showing exactly what she was trying to take. Her startled shriek was rather satisfying. They were lead into the front entry where they were met by two neat rows of six servants.

An older, but solid-looking butler with a green cord draped over his shoulder marched down the row to introduced himself to Harry and his chaperone.

"I am Mr. Whitby, manager of this estate. On behalf of Lord Voldemort and his staff, we welcome you to the Sianach Lodge, Young Master Potter."

The manager and the servants all bowed or curtsied to them, and Harry flushed, unsure if he should do the same. Madam Hardwick didn't, so he followed her lead. There was a moment of tense silence before Harry realized they were expecting some sort of response from him.

"Oh...er... Th-thank you. I'm... I'm glad I was invited."

Thankfully, none of the servants seemed to pay attention to his awkward response, and no sooner than it was out then they all dispersed to complete their usual tasks. Mr. Whitby spoke to him yet again, gesturing to a pretty young maid who couldn't have been more than twenty.

"This is Miss Victoria. She will be your personal maid during your stay here. If you need anything or would like to go somewhere, she will assist you in any way she can. Miss Victoria, if you wouldn't mind settling our guest in his room?"

The maid curtsied, and Harry blushed when she smiled at him. She was very pretty.

"It would be an honor and a pleasure," she said demurely, "If you would please follow me, Young Master?"

He followed her to a corridor and up a narrow stairwell. Once at the second floor, tall windows allowed a gloomy silver light to fill the hall.

He was surprised to find it appeared to be decorated for Christmas, bows of holly, garlands of real evergreen, and wreaths of pine and winter berries. Then realized these were pagan decorations long before Christians adopted them. The portraits lining the hall were mostly woodland scenes, filled with beasts and hunters moving cautiously through the painted greenery. Indeed, for all that the estate was clearly a mansion, the place had a sort of 'lodge' atmosphere to it, aided by the abundance of unpainted wood furniture and soft natural colors.

Victorial led him to a room at the farthest end of the hall, opening it to reveal a large room with sets of windows of two adjoining walls, looking out over the gardens and forest beyond. The room was done in elegant ambers and dark woods, dominated by a large four poster bed in the center and an ornate rolling desk in a corner under a Western window. He was immediately drawn to the Northern windows to admire the view.

"Pretty, isn't it?" his maid said.

"Y-yes, it is," he said, feeling strangely shy. He had never had anyone obligated to do what he told them, especially not anyone older than him, and he wasn't quite sure what to do with her. She quirked tilted her head, regarding him curiously.

"Are you really only twelve?"

"Yes, I really am only twelve. Why? Do I look older?"

"Not really, it's just... You know you're pretty well known, in certain circles," she said. She peaked out the door to make sure no one was coming, and that made Harry feel inexplicably better. When she did that, she looked much younger and more than a little mischievous. "You're probably the most famous twelve year old in Britain."

"I wouldn't know," Harry said, skeptical of her claim, "WYRA and Hogwarts and few hours in Daigon Alley are about all I've seen of Britain."

She seemed to consider his words, testing them against what she had heard and what she was seeing for herself. She smiled when she reached her conclusion.

“You seem like a nice boy. Is there anything I can get you? A snack or something to drink? I can give you a tour of manor if you wish, or would you prefer to rest?”

“Ummm... well, I do need to get caught up on some homework. Perhaps a trip to the library, and then we can save the full tour for tomorrow.”

“Very good, Young Master. Master has a very impressive library. I am certain we can find you something useful.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“I want those background checks done before the office clears for the Holidays or no one is going home. Let the personnel department know they can recruit from the administration office, and make sure McCullen knows not to give them any grief over the matter,” Voldemort ordered, standing before his office mirror as his assistant draped his cloak around his shoulders and fastened it with a brooch in the shape of coiled serpent.

“Yes, My Lord,” Lewis reassured, “I will have it taken care of it. Are you certain you wouldn’t prefer to stay in the city tonight? The weather has gotten nasty since this afternoon.”

Voldemort regarded himself in the mirror, and finding his appearance satisfactory, made his way to the door. His private secretary scurried to open it before he reached it. The receptionist stood and bowed respectfully as he crossed her desk, handing him his messages without a word. He leafed through them as he made his way to the door.

“Thank you, Lewis, but Harry should have arrived by now, and I wish to speak to him before tomorrow.”

"I understand, Sir. Will Mister Potter be joining you tomorrow?"

"Eventually," he said, exiting the inner sanctum of his Bristol office and entering the restricted offices, where six Court Sentinels suddenly appeared around him to escort him. The Sentinels eyed the enchanted paper airplanes floating overhead and the late-working employees peeking out from their cubicles suspiciously. Voldemort spared an acknowledging nod to his hard-working staff as he passed, before continuing his conversation. "He's recovering from a bout of the Pox, so he'll need the mornings and afternoons to catch up on his studies. There are some social gatherings I would like him to attend in the evenings though. I think it's time he's introduced to his future colleagues. Except for Bernstein. Make sure that woman and the little whores she calls her daughters aren't in attendance at any of these gatherings."

"No Bernstein whores. I'll see to it," Lewis acknowledged, vaguely amused at the order. Normally, the Dark Lord made it a point to have them around. They tended to keep the more easily distracted audience suitably entertained.

"And Moyse. That man's a pedophile, I don't care if they found evidence or not."

They left the restricted section of the office and entered the public corridors. A Sentinel at the front desk saluted as they passed and picked up the phone to call the garage.

"Perhaps it would be easier to fit young Mr. Potter with a chastity belt. I'm afraid political officials tend to have aberrant tastes," Lewis joked, then hoped he wouldn't regret it. The Dark Lord's sense of humor was patchy at the best of times.

Voldemort barked a short laugh, and dismissed the matter. Four of the six guardians and their master entered the private elevator, while two of them headed for the stairs. His personal assistant bid the Dark Lord goodnight and headed back to the office to complete the last of his orders.

The elevator released them into the underground garage where a motorcade was already standing by to relieve his current Sentinels. The two that had taken the stairs reappeared to confirm everything was clear so far. Six men already mounted on brooms surrounded his private car, and he walked through them without hesitating. This sort of security had become such a routine it moved like clockwork, even at times when it was designed to do exactly the opposite.

The driver opened the door for him and he slid in, allowing himself the luxury of a deep calming breath. Faintly, he thought he could still smell Harry and the distinct scent of snake in the velvet of his seat. On the floor of the compartment he made out a tiny down feather, no doubt belonging to Elsbeth.

"I trust everything went well, Helena?"

[illegible]

Voldemort's private library was indeed just as impressive as Victoria had said it was. It hardly compared to Hogwarts's, but the two story bookshelves lining the walls had a little bit of everything. And one particular book caught his attention.

He hadn't expected to find it. Hadn't even conceived of the possibility. All he had wanted was a book on magical booby traps for DA&D. Yet there it was, nestled between 'The Security of a Castle in your Home' and 'One Hundred Useful Creatures for Your Home and Garden'.

'Guardian Beasts' by Elmer Furly lay in his hands, growling softly.

“No way.”

“Everything alright, Young Master?” Victoria asked from across the room, browsing through transfiguration tomes.

“Uh, yeah. Just... you know, some interesting stuff in here.”

He quickly turned away, knowing his face was probably read like an open book. He took a deep breath. This wasn't necessarily the same book Hermione was looking for. There were lots of books out there, no reason why there shouldn't be copies. Perhaps every library had this particular book. He opened to the cover page and nearly dropped it.

'Property of Hogwarts School of Wizardry and Witchcraft' was stamped in bold red ink across the bottom of the page.

"Young Master Potter?"

"Eep!"

He spun around to see Mr. Whitby standing at the library door.

"I am truly sorry to disturb you, Young Master, but your designer as arrived."

"Huh?"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Madam Hardwick sat across from the Dark Lord, her severe expression unmoving even in the face of the most powerful man in Britain.

"There were no problems. He behaved himself well enough, though I might recommend some etiquette lessons. The servants unnerved him a bit. Though, I suppose anyone used to house elves rather than real people might behave similarly."

"I'll have Whitby teach him the basics," he said. "Anything more will have to wait until summer holidays perhaps. Anything else?"

"A haircut."

"I'm afraid that's pretty much useless. He has a terminal case of 'Potter hair'. No cure has yet been found."

She sighed, disappointed. They exited the garage and entered a narrow cobblestone street. The Guardians mounted on their broomsticks cleared the way, pointing their wands threateningly at witches and wizards who lingered about the street in order to glimpse the Lord of Wizarding Britain.

“He will need new clothes. All he has are his clothes from last year, and those are hardly suitable for more than formal than school. I’ve sent a designer on ahead to the house. Mr. Whitby was informed and is prepared for his arrival.”

“I trust they are discreet?”

“Mrs. Malfoy recommended him.”

Voldemort nodded in approval.

“It’s good to know that there is someone in WYRA I can entrust these matters to when Professor Snape is indispose.”

“Thank you, My Lord.”

He turned his attention to the man sitting on the other side of the woman. He was a short, solid man, easily overlooked in a crowd and easy to ignore in private as he was prone to neither fidgeting or talking.

“I trust all safety precautions have been adapted to include my young charge, Morgan?”

“Yes.”

“I will hold you personally responsible if it turns out your team is unprepared.”

“Yes.”

That was Morgan in a nutshell. A yes-man. It would have been annoying if he’d ever actually failed to follow through.

They made their way through wizarding Bristol without any delays and finally exited the city by crossing under an archway that exited from under a train tunnel and onto a muggle road. The driver killed the lights, hiding the car and the shadow figures that followed it. They stopped briefly at the entrance gate to the estate, and Morgan exited with the driver. The driver returned a moment later, but Morgan did not. Once they passed through the gate, Morgan and his men disappeared in seven resounding 'pop!'s.

A minute later they pulled up to the front entrance. Whitby was there to meet him when the driver opened the door for him and Hardwick.

"Whitby, has the designer arrived yet?"

"Yes, Master. Mister Spindle and Young Master Potter are in the White Room taking measurements."

"How was he?"

"Studious. He went straight for the library after we settled him upstairs."

Voldemort considered Harry's actions, and decided they were good. He wanted Harry to feel comfortable enough in his home...homes... to venture out from his bedroom. He made his way to the White room, Whitby and Hardwick close behind, unable to depart without his dismissal. He opened a set of double doors to a long room, painfully bright after his nighttime journey.

"A little privacy, please?! At least knock!"

Voldemort found Harry standing on top of a stool, stripped down to his briefs and turning bright red. He smirked in amusement, but sent his followers away with a dismissive gesture. He closed the doors behind him, and told the surprised designer to continue. His young protégé looked none too pleased that he was still there, circling his half naked self like a curious shark.

"You're looking a little thin."

An irritated look crossed Harry's face, but the embarrassed blush didn't recede. Mr. Spindle handed him a crisp white shirt.

"Yeah well, blame Sna- Professor Snape. No Quidditch practices for a month and then two and half weeks in the infirmary will do this to you," he muttered, struggling with the shirt that seemed too big in some places and too small in others. With a little help, he managed to get it on and Mr. Spindle went about setting pins for the refitting.

"I see it hasn't dampened your spirits any. How do you like my house?"

Deciding it was better to save his anger for a time when he was a little less naked, Harry accepted the subject change.

"Man-eating deer aside, it's rather nice. Ouch!"

"S-sorry," the designerr stuttered, glancing nervously at the Dark Lord who ignored the slip.

"What do I need a new wardrobe for anyway? My old clothes were fine. Maybe I needed to let out the hem a little in the pants, but otherwise fine."

Voldemort snorted. He found himself a chair and slid into it, regarding Harry thoughtfully.

"You are more than a mere orphan, Harry. You are my protégé," he hissed. "You will dress to a standard I find befitting."

Protégé. Draco had called him that once. Natalie had tossed it around like flower petals. A few students had murmured it in the halls of Hogwarts. But Hermione had never said it. Snape had never said it. He had trusted that they would tell him if it were true.

"Why? I'm nothing but a trouble-maker."

Voldemort smiled, a sort of fondness in his expression he'd never seen before. It looked familiar somehow.

“We are two of a kind, Harry. Parselmouths, orphans, and brother wands make up only a small fraction of what we have in common. Even our differences strengthen us. We can do great things together. We will do great things together.”

Uh-oh, might have frightened the boy that time, if the sudden shift from pink to white was any indicator.

“Even if you are skinny and have silly hair.”

Oh good, the pink was back.

“There’s nothing wrong with my hair! Ouch!”

“S-sorry.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

A few pin pricks and far too many clothes to fit in his single trunk later found Harry and his keeper at the dinner table. Aside from the serving woman standing behind them, it was a fairly laid back affair. Voldemort, predictably, sat at the head of the table while Harry sat at his right, conversing over pot roast and mashed potatoes.

The Dark Lord had opted to keep things light, talking of nothing more grand or ambitious than taking a shopping trip sometime during the holiday.

“Victoria is nice. Seems kind of young to be working full time though.”

“She’s a squib,” Voldemort informed him. “All of my servants accept Whitby and my security staff are. Most start working by the time they’re fourteen.”

Yet another surprise. He’d known about squibs of course, but hadn’t been interested enough to learn much about them before.

“Why do you take muggleborns from muggles, but keep squibs with wizards.”

Voldemort considered his question, or perhaps was just enjoying the flavor of his wine, before answering.

“Magic is a gift and a birthright. Nature provides the gift. She does not give her gifts to everyone, and her deprivation can be devastating. Yet we, as a culture and a race, provide the birthright. It is a history and a future that we share with all of our children. I find it fundamentally wrong to deny them this part of themselves. Especially when it will more than likely be the birthright and the gift of their children. There have been studies conducted that suggest the re-emergence of magical talent in later generations is more common than previously thought. There’s even a theory that all muggleborns are the descendants of squibs.”

That seemed reasonable, Harry supposed, except that despite what Voldemort had said, squibs seemed to have the short end of the stick. Working what he suspected were mostly menial jobs from fourteen till you died seemed a bit of a rip off. He was just about ready to point that out, when Voldemort took charge of the conversation.

“Whitby tells me you’ve already found the library. How much homework do you have to make up?”

Harry flinched at the mention of the library and reminder of the book he’d found there. For second, he wondered if the Dark Lord hadn’t laid a trap for him, seeing if he could catch him in a lie, then remembered if he suspected anything legilimency would be his first option and trickery his second.

“Um... well, I have most of my reading done. I have a lot of essays to do, but Professors McGonagall, Flitwick, and Sprout are letting me get away with writing half of what they assigned everyone else. I have exams in everything. I’ll be making up potions for months when I get back to school. Then I have some wand work, but I’m usually a pretty quick study with that.”

“I’ve taken the liberty of hiring you a tutor to help you. Hopefully, he’ll be able to speed things along. There are some matters I would like your assistance in.”

Harry felt panic well up inside. What could the Dark Lord possibly hope he could help with?

“Careful, Harry, if you decide to panic now you’ll choke,” Voldemort drawled. “I have several public appearances to make, outlining some projects I have for next year. All I need for you to do is stand around and look pretty for the cameras. I want the press and the public aware of you before you graduate.”

“Do they know about my parents?” he asked, hating the thought of being surrounded by cameras and people asking nosy questions, and then again of said people prying into his past and painting it across the next edition of Wizingamot Weekly. He hated all of this but he could only focus on small pieces of it at a time.

Voldemort remained silent for a moment, regarding Harry’s sudden interest in moving his food around his plate rather than eating it. It was a good question, and one that had taken more sensitivity than he was used to dealing with.

“They know... but they won’t release that information. Not for some time yet. Who else knows about your parents?”

“Hermione, sort of. She knows they were both wizards, but I couldn’t tell her their names because of the Taboo. She found my family name in the Wizingamot. Does that mean I still get votes?”

“No, I had your family’s name revoked from the Wizingamot after they fled the country. Lestrage has them now, but I might reinstate them when you’re older. Your friend is discreet?”

“Yeah.”

“Good. We will let the public continue thinking you’re just an orphan muggleborn for now.”

“And later? A lot of people knew my parents. It can’t stay secret forever.”

“Let me worry about that.”

“And my godfathers?”

“That... is another question for later. You have enough to deal with at the moment without worrying about the things like that. That’s my job.”

“And my job is to stand there and look pretty,” Harry groused.

“And eat your potatoes. You’re too thin.”

He did as he was told, but was sulky about the whole thing. Everything had gotten weird and considering life before he had gotten here that was saying something. He was helpless, caught in the push and pull of people older and more powerful than him, thrown back into the same unease that had plagued him during his brief stay at WYRA. Hadn’t he promised himself he wouldn’t allow himself to put into that situation again? How was he going to pull himself out of this tide?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort retired for the evening feeling more satisfied than usual. The slow progress on his latest project was briefly overshadowed by his current success with Harry. The boy was warming up to him, despite the recent debacle at Hogwarts. Their conversation over dinner had been littered with trivialities that he normally despised, but were strangely refreshing coming from his young charge. Every little mundane detail he took in, he twisted and morphed into something that could be helpful to Harry’s future purpose.

Harry got along with his squib staff. Perhaps he might go on to quell Squib protestors by negotiating with them.

Harry was shy in front of cameras. He would come off as modest or mysterious and the public would be made even more curious about him.

Harry was skinny and had silly hair... he'd think of something.

Even the boy's apparent reluctance with his new role pleased him. If he had been too eager, Voldemort wasn't so sure he'd be able to trust him. He didn't need or want another Tom. Speaking of which, he wondered if he shouldn't slip in a visit with his younger self after his meeting with Lestrage and Snape.

That, he supposed, would depend on what his two minions had to say.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Guardian Victoria slipped into Harry's room shortly after midnight, following the schedule set down by her boss. Her real boss. Chief Sentinel Morgan was not a man whose orders you ignored. So despite the inconvenience and the risk, she flitted about the room in her maid's outfit and wand, checking for potential security risks.

Harry was fast asleep, looking very young and angelic despite the giant cobra snoozing on his chest. Victoria paused to regard the snake, but it seemed as oblivious to her as Harry was. It was the first sign of Harry's special gift that she had seen, the one that had drawn the Dark Lord to the child in the first place.

She shook her head and let out a soundless sigh. Poor child, he really did seem like a nice boy. How long would it take for their Master to ruin him?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

I couldn't remember how to convert miles into kilometers. Something to look into when I go back and proofread again.

Book II:

Chapter 17: The Pride of Kings and Princes

Harry bent over his work table, trying to ignore Professor Benjamin Beechlull's curious study of him in favor of his own academic pursuits. He had been reviewing Hermione's copious notes on Herbology and penning down an essay on the magical properties of roses since lunch almost two hours ago. Before lunch he had been reciting Dorian's Three Properties of Metal to Alloy Transfiguration and outlining his midterm paper for Charms.

Professor Beechlull, an elderly gentleman who seemed more curious about everything Harry except his homework, had been overseeing his progress. The man spoke very little, content to offer his name, his assistance if requested, and then relax in one of the library's plush reading chairs in order to watch him. Frankly, it was irritating.

Perhaps the only good thing about the man's presence was that Harry didn't dare shirk his school work and risk it being reported to his latest batch of keepers. Of course, left to his own devices, Harry thought he might have learned something more important from 'Guardian Beasts' than from Hermione's notes on the magical properties of roses. He hadn't been in any state to look through the book the night before, being exhausted and still reeling from his discovery. That morning hadn't been any better, as Victoria had woken him up early and hustled him through his morning routine and then straight to breakfast with no time to dally.

Voldemort had been on his way out just as Harry sat down at the long dining table, and offered him a short greeting, patted him on the shoulder, and then disappeared for the rest of the day. After breakfast, he'd been brought to the library, introduced to his tutor, and hadn't had an unsupervised moment since. Even now, the book sat in a neat pile by his desk amongst yesterday's selection. A constant temptation he couldn't yet indulge.

At a quarter to three there was a knock on the library door, and Mr. Whitby and Victoria entered.

"I'm afraid studies are finished for the day, Professor. Young Master has an appointment," Mr. Whitby said formally. Beechlull raised a curious brow, but said nothing as Victoria shuffled Harry out of the library.

"Come along, Young Master. We need to get you ready," she gushed, looking rather giddy about something.

Harry was a bit more dubious.

"For what?"

"There's a press conference today at four. The Dark Lord has requested you be in attendance."

The young Gryffindor felt a surge of panic.

"What's the conference for? I'm not going to have to talk to the press, am I?"

Victoria giggled, hurrying him up to his bedroom without a moment's pause.

"Who knows? I was just told to make you look appropriately plush and debonair."

"What does that mean?!"

They entered his room and Victoria went straight to his closet. Her reply was partially muffled by his new wardrobe.

"It means a suit, tie, and that lovely new cloak the tailor dropped off this morning."

Moments later, she reappeared with said ensemble, and took his shoes to be polished as he got dressed. Harry had worn suits before, but never in the wizarding world. His vaguely resembled Snape's usual black teaching robes, but were of a silkier material with dark violet vines embroidered along his inner robe, with a brighter violet vest over a starch white dress shirt with black tie. His trousers were dark grey and his shoes now shiny. He wasn't sure what to make of it. Violet was not one of his usual colors, and he had a sort of fear of developing the inexorably bad fashion sense that plagued the majority of the wizarding world. At the same time, he thought he might indeed look a bit...ah...debonair?

"Ohhh! You look perfect!" Victoria squealed in delight. She didn't attempt to straighten his hair at all.

In his vest pocket, his watch began to grow warm.

"Are we running late?"

His maid let out a flustered squeak, and hurried him back down stairs. There was yet another maid there waiting for him, winter cloak and gloves in hand. The winter cloak was black and heavy, lined with thick fur, and hooded. The gloves were black, thin, and charmed to stay warm.

It seemed that if he somehow embarrassed himself it wasn't going to be over his clothes. Everything they'd dressed him in seemed to be at the height of elegance and style.

Harry on the other hand felt awkward and displaced.

He wasn't given time to linger on the feeling, being rushed out to the familiar black car waiting for him in the drive way. Mr. Whitby opened the door for him while he climbed inside.

"Good luck to you, Young Master."

"Er... thank you, sir."

The door closed and the driver pulled away from the estate. Harry watched it disappear longingly, before settling into his seat. He almost jumped out of his skin when he saw Madam Hardwick sitting across from him, her expression seamlessly dour.

"Oh... Good ... Good afternoon?"

She tilted her head in acknowledgment but didn't return the greeting, instead launching into the reason for her presence.

"Our Lord has requested I provide you with a more thorough explanation of what this press conference will entail and what will be expected of you."

He swallowed, processing what she had said, and then nodded.

"Our Lord has decided to re-organize our Court Enforcement offices, opening up a large number of positions for wizards and witches that do not require the stringent educational requirements of most Court positions that are beyond the average person."

Oh, more jobs for everyone. That sounds nice, Harry thought naively.

"He will be making the announcement today so that he might begin recruitment after the first of the year. This is to be a celebrated occasion, so our Lord thought today would be a good opportunity to present you as his... protégé? Most of the papers will be more interested in his announcement, but there will of course be a few gossip rags represented. You will be stationed with the Dark Lord's advisors and some of his staff, safely behind a line of Sentinels. Stay close to either myself or the Dark Lord, smile and try to act interested in the proceedings, and what ever you do don't pick your nose or scratch yourself."

Not even if it itches really bad? he thought sarcastically.

Having said her part, she said nothing more, which was fine by Harry. He was starting to dislike the haughty old prune. They disregarded each other for the rest of the journey. They entered Bristol on a muggle highway, then spent the next fifteen minutes weaving between muggle and wizarding streets, marked only by sudden change in pedestrian wardrobe and the intermittent silences of the planes landing and leaving Bristol International Airport. Quaint little shops and restaurants gave way to cathedrals, clock towers, and government buildings.

One moment, Harry was sitting back and enjoying the strange metamorphosis and the next he was plunged into a darkness. Startled he turned to his chaperone.

“We’re in Our Lord’s private garage. Security precaution,” she said dismissively. The car came to a stop and they were confronted by several Sentinels, who cast several spells to check them for... just about anything, before being escorted to the elevator. The elevator released them into the lobby, where Voldemort was already waiting.

After being shuffled about for the last two hours by strangers, Harry felt strangely grateful to see the man. Which was silly really, since it was Voldemort’s fault he was in this mess in the first place. The dictator was busy ordering several of his staff around, demanding reports on who was coming, who he wanted excluded, what pages he wanted dedicated to this story, and where was his cloak for Merlin’s sake? When he spotted Harry, he broke of his line of commands to gesture the boy closer.

Reluctantly, Harry obeyed until the Dark Lord was close enough to seize him by his shoulders. A cool elegant hand lifted his chin, forcing him to look out at the bustle of witches and wizards who had paused to watch them curiously.

“This is Harold James Potter. It would be wise of you to remember him,” he stated, offering nothing by way of explanation before seeming to lose interest in the boy altogether. Without a second glance he went back to ordering everyone around.

Harry felt rather miffed... or was it disappointed?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“... For centuries, thousands of witches and wizards have been deprived the privilege to serve their country simply by the circumstance of their birth. Political positions have been treated as familial assets, passed down from parents to children, and withheld from others who long to serve this proud nation...”

Harry stifled a yawn, and tried to look interested just as he had been instructed. The conference was being held outside to accommodate the large number of reporters and curious onlookers who had gathered in the square to listen to their ruler. Despite the cold, the crowd seemed excited to be there, cheering enthusiastically at words like 'patriots' and 'opportunities'.

He wished he were among them, rather than stuck sitting behind and off to the left of the podium, trying not to sneeze or yawn or scratch his nose in full view of the flashing cameras. It didn't help that he still had no real idea what the Dark Lord was talking about. He understood that there were going to be a lot of jobs opening up at Court, perhaps even a new branch of the Court itself, and that anyone was welcome to apply, but not what the jobs were or what they paid or what people would be doing.

To make matters worse, he found himself sitting two chairs down from Hermione's foster father Lucius Malfoy. The man was poised perfection, not so much as a hair out of place and his gaze fiercely intent on his lord and the crowd that adored him. He knew Malfoy Sr. had a coveted position in the Court working closely with the Dark Lord, but Harry hadn't realized how close until now. He was sitting one chair closer than Headmistress Lestrage was.

The woman had shown up just as they were being given instructions on where to sit by one of Voldemort's million-and-one lackeys, and seemed utterly horrified when she spotted Harry. Luckily, a completely unfamiliar man was stationed between them or else Harry thought he might not have gotten off with just a nasty glare.

Snape was no where in sight, but perhaps that was to be expected. Hermione had said that while her godfather coveted power, he didn't give a wit about popularity. Still, Harry wished the man were there. They could have been uncomfortable and bored together.

"- one more step towards a nation where privilege and success are earned, not inherited!"

There was more cheering from the crowd and Harry clapped with his fellows, desperately trying to keep himself from scratching the thousand different spots that had started to tingle from lack of distraction and ignore the bitter cold seeping into his toes.

“- and a Happy New Year to you all.”

One last thunderous applause and a wave of cheering, and the Dark Lord exited, as regal and majestic as a lion and grinning with the subtlety of a snake. Harry and the rest of Voldemort’s entourage stood and followed as he passed.

“Harold, come here,” the Dark Lord instructed, not looking back at him. Harry was quickly becoming irritated with this strange not-disinterest, but he dared not disobey with Lestrage practically kicking him in the heels as they walked. Even if he wanted to kick the man for calling him ‘Harold’. Who the bloody hell was Harold?

Voldemort took him by the shoulder as soon as he was in range, having him walk beside him as they made their way back inside. The flash and click of cameras was conspicuous, and did not cease once they had entered the building. A flock of reporters and photographers were waiting for them, eagerly throwing out questions.

“My Lord, who will be in charge of this new department?”

“When will the name be finalized?!”

“Has anyone expressed reluctance opening Court positions to the average witch and wizard?”

“Who is your young friend?”

Harry blushed and ducked his head at the last question, unconsciously stepping a little closer and behind the Dark Lord. The hand on his shoulder tightened a bit, either to comfort him or ensure he didn’t retreat any further Harry wasn’t sure.

“I will, of course, remain the ultimate authority as Commander and Chief of the Court. But as I have stated before, these new positions, including that of the Department Head, will not be finalized until after the first of the year and will go to whom ever proves most qualified, regardless of political or familial ties.”

Voldemort seemed to conveniently forget the third question and went straight for the fourth.

“And this young man is Harold James Potter. He is my ward, for the holidays at least.”

A curious murmur ran through the ensemble. Some of the reporters seemed to recognize the name.

“The Harold Potter. The only known parselmouth aside from the Dark Lord?”

Harry’s ears turned pink and he ducked his head even more. Voldemort’s thumb sudden stabbed him sharply.

“Eep.. I...ah.. That is... yes, yes I am.”

“Is it true you’re the youngest Seeker at Hogwarts in a century?”

Harry glanced cautiously at the Dark Lord, before answering.

“Yes... or I was last year, any way.” A genuine sigh. “Haven’t been playing much of anything at Hogwarts these days.”

Thumb stab. And did that man ever trim his nails?

“I mean... I’ve been sick the last couple of weeks!”

“Which is why I should take him home to rest,” the Dark Lord picked up, throwing off any further questioning of his charge. “It has been an eventful day.”

The reporters sensed nothing more was going to be gained from questioning this latest curiosity, and went back to getting comments on the Dark Lord’s announcement from the rest of the entourage. At last they moved into the restricted section of the building, leaving the reporters behind.

"That went well," Voldemort remarked, entering a private corridor and releasing Harry.

"Yes, My Lord," Lucius agreed, "They seemed very receptive to the idea."

Lestrangle rolled her eyes.

"Why shouldn't they? It's the answer to their prayers. Jobs for everyone and all you need is a wand. You don't even need to be very good with it."

"Bella, now now," Voldemort chided gently, "They all have their place. What they'll lack in power and skill they'll make up for in sheer numbers and obedience. Speaking of power and skill, I've been reviewing your latest selection of new professors for next year. They seem quite capable."

Lestrangle preened under her Lord's small praise, the first she gotten in several months. Harry who had started sulking, perked up at the news.

"New teachers?"

"Hush, Potter, this doesn't concern you," Lestrangle hissed, irritated by the boy's very presence. She wanted nothing more than to cast several of her more creative curses at him and she thought she had conveyed that well enough with just her eyes, but the little brat actually had the audacity to glare at her.

"It will if we're stuck with another McNair," he said pointedly, then slapped his hand over his mouth. Bad mouth! Bad! What I have I told you about running away with yourself?

He got away with a dark look and a slap upside the head from Voldemort, a nasty look from Lestrangle (it was less intimidating while she was blushing from embarrassment), and a chuckle from the man he didn't know.

"We're going to have to do something about that mouth of yours," the Dark Lord drawled, "It's far too compulsively honest. You handled yourself with the press fairly well though."

"I sounded like a twat."

Voldemort smirked. "Perhaps, but you came off as honest. That's why I didn't give you any prepared statements."

No, only a couple bruises, Harry mentally groused and rubbed his shoulder. After that, Harry frankly didn't want to talk any more and the Dark Lord seemed more than happy to let him continue sulking while he chatted with his minions about work and holiday plans. The sulking deepened as Harry overheard several dinner dates, press conferences, and charity banquets he was probably going to have to attend with the leader of wizarding Britain. Somehow he doubted it was going to be anymore exciting than it had been today.

There was a brief, more formal conference in the Dark Lord's office, which Harry was thankfully excluded from. He was placed in an empty cubicle and given some tea by a harried secretary, whose twitchy smile made Harry suspect she was only a few short hours from a psychotic break.

Harry used the sudden privacy to try and figure out what was going on. Voldemort had been strangely reserved with him today, even a bit cold, despite the casual conversation and good humor they'd shared the day before. Had Harry done something wrong, he wondered, or was the man just too busy to pay him any mind? If he had done something wrong, would he be told? Would he be punished?

He glared down into his tea. He already had been punished. He'd been poisoned and tricked into signing that contract. It might have been Snape's idea, but it was done to fulfill the Dark Lord's orders of absolute secrecy. Never mind that the bloody thing was trying to kill him.

Good God, what was he doing here?

How had he gone from orphaned nobody to the protégé of a bloody King? Dressed in the finest clothes a wizard could ask for, having a tutor, going to press conferences, mingling with the most important families in Britain... and being forced to keep secret a murder, attempted murders, and a murderer. How?

And more importantly, why?

The answer lay in Voldemort, but he could not truly trust the answer. The man would only tell him something sweet and sugar coated, like he had the crowd outside that afternoon. Something to induce compliance, even enthusiasm for something you didn't even truly understand. The truth... the truth was of a different flavor. Was it sour like Lestrage's superior, conceited view? Was it bitter like Snape's poisonous practicality? Or was it rich and dark with a sharp bite like Voldemort himself?

"Harry?"

The soft call jolted him, spilling lukewarm tea on his hand and the desk. He cursed himself, and quickly cleaned the mess with his wand before going out to meet the source of his confused thoughts.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The ride back to the estate was a quiet one. Aside from the driver, Harry and Voldemort were alone in the car. Madam Hardwick had apparently found alternative means to get to her house, or her crypt, or whatever sheltered the stuffy old biddy. The Dark Lord was studying him intently, completely opposite of the earlier disregard. Also completely opposite of earlier, Harry had no desire for the man's attention. He avoided intent red eyes by looking out the window, searching the trees for life as they entered the Sianach Estate.

"Are you angry, Harry?" the man finally asked, sounding genuinely curious.

"So it's 'Harry' now, is it?" It was the first thing that came to mind, yet it wasn't what was truly bothering him. Of course, he didn't really want to talk about what was really bothering him. This man's assistance could only make things worse.

The Dark Lord chuckled.

"Don't take it personally. It's necessary to put some professional distance between us while in the company of others. You are aware of how jealous Slytherins tend to be, aren't you?"

Oh, yes, Harry had been made well aware of that.

"Keeping you as nothing more than a PR prop prevents... or at least delays such feelings. No one envies a prop."

"And am I? A prop, I mean," he asked, watching the man in the reflection on the glass.

Voldemort looked surprised by the question, but quickly recovered, his expression curious.

"Do you think you are?"

Harry looked beyond the reflection to the passing buildings, eyes floating upward briefly, following the bell towers of a gothic style cathedral.

"I hope I am."

Now Voldemort's curiosity was anything but feigned. He had been unprepared for such a response. Why would anyone want to be a prop?

"Why?"

"Because... after I get thrown away, I'll do my own things. Stuff I want to do, with people I want to do them with."

Well, that was an idea that Voldemort could appreciate, yet still utterly not appreciate from Harry. Being shy or uncertain of his capabilities as his protégé was one thing, but not wanting the job was a different matter altogether.

“... You ungrateful little bastard.”

Startled, Harry spun around. Voldemort moved with the speed and accuracy of his totem, a hand at his prey's neck before he could so much as lift his wand in defense. The boy's startled yelp was smothered with a sharp increase in strength of his captor's grip. Crimson eyes glowed like hot coals, burning with a rage that sent aimless waves of malevolent magic pounding against Harry's senses.

“I would make you my prince and you would chose to be a pawn?!” he snarled.

Dark magic pressed against Harry, crushing his mind and spirit, invading the cracks and crevasses like salt in an open wound. He buckled under the initial onslaught of pain, stunned by its intensity.

But then the will to live, to fight, to lash out at the source of his torment rose up with fangs bared, sinking its teeth into the dragon.

“FUCK!”

Voldemort snatched back his hand, stunned by the miraculous pain the likes of which he hadn't known for almost a decade. He now bore a crescent shaped wound on the delicate skin between his thumb and forefinger. He turned his wide eyes to Harry, the child's teeth bared and stained with blood. His blood.

“Prince or pauper, your pawn either way,” Harry hissed.

Already unbalanced by the retaliation, and again by Harry's savage look and words, he was unable to rouse himself to action quick enough for what happened next. The car wasn't moving fast, but it was still moving, which logically meant one should not attempt to exit the vehicle.

Gryffindor's were not known for their logic.

One moment Harry was pressed defensively against seat and the door, and then the next the seat was empty and the door slamming shut.

“Stop the car!”

The driver, seemingly oblivious to what could possibly have been construed as a murder-in-progress not moments before, hit the brakes on command. The car skidded to a halt, but by the time Voldemort managed to pull himself out of the car, Harry had disappeared into the shadows and trees.

“FUCK!” he snarled, pounding his hand into hood of the car. A spike of pain made him hiss, and unfurl his fist. The bite mark shown bloody with the beginning of a bruise forming around the edges. He glared angrily at it and it seemed to glare right back, righteous in the midst of his folly.

Yes, his mind taunted, you deserve this.

It was ridiculous. He had killed men for less than this. A lot less than this. Yet to be defied, no, attacked by a little boy? A god damned ungrateful little bastard...

Oh... oops.

Harry wasn't a bastard, ungrateful or otherwise. He was a descendant of Slytherin. Of the same blood, of the same clan, as he. A clan with a sense of pride too easily bruised. Voldemort had, carelessly, made the first blow. Harry had, rightfully, returned it. Then things had escalated, again a result of his carelessness.

Well, bother. Things had been going so well, too.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry ran as far as he could and as fast as he could, which wasn't nearly far enough. The cold of the approaching night burned his lungs, forcing him to stop and cough violently. Paranoid, he scanned his surroundings and then hid behind a large tree while he tried to think up a plan.

Voldemort had just tried to kill him... well, fuck. He couldn't go back the mansion or really anywhere in the wizarding world. Would the man send the Court after him? Would he come and finish the deed himself? What was wrong with that man?!

Oh, he had known about the violent temper. He had been at the end of it more than once, but he'd seemed to warm to Harry since then. How stupid of him to think it had been honest interest or affection? The Dark Lord was probably laughing at his gullibility, or had been at least. Right now he was probably thinking of creative ways to dismember him. Or maybe he'd just let the man-eating deer do it.

Ok, rest period over. It was time to get out of these woods, out of Bristol, out of the country when it came down to it. But how? Getting out of the woods was easy enough, he just had to keep walking. Perhaps if he was quick enough he could get past the barrier before they sent someone to guard it. If someone wasn't guarding it already. If it even required a guardian to keep people out or in. Had the driver just opened the gates or had he used a spell or password?

Alright, stop thinking about that. Think of something more important... like man-eating deer.

Feeling newly motivated, he tightened his cloak around him, covering his mouth and sprinted in the general direction of the exit. It was dark and gloomy in the forest this time of year, full of empty shadows and strange noises. Several times Harry had to pause, thinking he'd heard something or seen something move out of the corner of his eye.

This continued until after sunset, after almost an hour of wandering had convinced him that there was no way to get back to the road or the gate. He was trapped in a land steeped in magic. Perhaps the only way to leave the place was by the road, and now that he'd wandered off the path he would never be able to find it again. The wizarding world was full of such places.

Just as despair fell over him, stealing the warmth that his cloak and gloves provided, he heard something. He turned to see torches flickering in and out of view as they passed through the trees. Faintly, he could hear people calling 'Young Master' and 'Harold' and even the occasional 'Harry'. He turned to flee, but all that stood before him was darkness and dangers unseen.

"H-Harry?"

Victoria stood behind him, caught up during his long moments of indecision. She was wrapped in a dark green cloak, but her legs held no protection but a sheer pair of pantyhose and her shoes were even less suited to the cold. Her nose and cheeks were bright red, her teeth chattered a bit.

"Good grief, what are you doing out here dressed like that?!" Harry admonished, casting a warming charm on her. She sighed in happy relief, but then came back to herself to glare intently at him.

"What am I doing out here? Looking for you, you silly sod. What were you thinking running away like that?" she scolded. He gave her a glare of his own.

"Oh, I dunno. Maybe I was thinking, 'I don't want to die'?"

"So you ran into a strange forest filled with Merlin only knows what?!"

"No. I ran away from a psycho trying to kill me!"

That seemed to take away a bit of her self-righteousness. She fidgeted uncomfortably, scrambling for a retort.

"Well... The Dark Lord sent us out to find you. He's worried about you."

He snorted.

"Oh, come on, Harry! What are you going to do? Stay out here all night? I don't know what happened between you two earlier, but he's not angry anymore. I really do think he's worried."

Harry said nothing for a moment, trying to think. Really, what else could he do? He couldn't really run away, and he had known about Voldemort's strangely fickle temper. This wasn't the first time the man had grabbed him by the neck or threatened him, but he had never... never what? Never hurt him? Completely untrue. Never frightened him? And Snape's favorite color was hot pink. Never what then?

Never made you feel disposable.

Ah, that was it. The crux of the matter. He had felt like he was going to be thrown away, and so easily too. It wasn't a fear he had been consciously aware of. Perhaps it hadn't even appeared until that morning, when the man had so casually dismissed his presence and it had come to head in the car where he thought for a moment the man was going to strangle him to death. And he had provoked him to do just that. Alright, not strangle him, but throw him away. Was it to reassure himself that he would be fine with that or to make the Dark Lord reassure him that it would never happen?

But had Voldemort really tried to kill him? It seemed kind of silly now, really thinking about it. He had been angry, and an angry Dark Lord was always scary, but had he been deadly? No more than he had ever been, he supposed.

"Ok, fine," he surrendered. "But he better not be expecting an apology."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort waited in the study for his servants to return with Harry. One of the servants had lit a fire, and it roared in his thoughtful silence, casting heat and light and shadows over the contents of the room. A few book shelves, filled with more instruments than actual books, the wooden floors, the writing desk that was little more than slanted table, and the ancient tapestries he'd chosen in place of paintings, gave the room an ancient feel he found homey and comforting.

He wasn't particularly worried about Harry's disappearance, the boy being more than capable of handling the local wildlife and incapable of leaving estate grounds without his consent, so he need only be patient. What did concern him was what he should say to the boy.

"Sorry, I tried to strangle you."

That just didn't seem to cut it. And frankly it was never his practice to apologize to anyone... for anything.

"I won't do it again."

That... probably wasn't true.

There was a light knock on the door. He had no more time and no idea what to say. Hopefully his improvisation skills would be up for the following conversation.

"Come in."

Whitby entered the study, followed by Harry, and then his maid still holding his cloak and gloves. Voldemort's gaze found Harry's. The boy's eyes were intense, guarded and distrustful, ready for yet another attack.

"Leave us."

Whitby and Victoria shared concerned looks, but neither of their masters were paying them any mind. They bowed as they left, closing the door behind them. With their absence, Harry's eyes shifted to the rest of the room, taking it in curiously. It was odd, but the room reminded him strangely of Hogwarts. Or rather of time in which Hogwarts would have been built. In the light of the fire, Harry was reminded of another time exactly one year ago when he had seen Voldemort stand before another fire place at the Malfoy mansion, and thought him a devil.

And he still thought him a devil, but a devil made more comfortable in his own fiery pit. He was bare foot and stripped down to his trousers and dress shirt, one hand holding a silver chalice and the other resting on the mantle of the fire place. The glow of his red eyes seemed muted in the fire light, as did the rest of his expression. Was that restrained rage or quiet introspection Harry was seeing now? He couldn't tell, and until he could he was staying close to the door.

"Are you alright?"

Harry started. The voice was gentle, regretful perhaps?

"Yeah," he replied, reluctantly.

There was a tense silence.

"... You bit me."

"You deserved it."

Voldemort felt an unexpected twitch in the corner of his mouth.

"True enough... but I'm not going to apologize."

"I'm not going to either."

This time, he did smile, almost laughed even.

"Good... if we have nothing to apologize for, than we have nothing to be angry over either."

Harry glared, clearly not agreeing. He released the first button on his shirt and pulled at the collar, revealing the bruises encircling his throat.

"These say otherwise."

Voldemort mentally admonished himself at his own foolishness. Those bruises were going to be difficult to hide from the public. On a more immediate note, they were serving as a reminder to Harry of his own wounded pride. He was going to have to make amends, a gesture where words would not suffice. He set his glass on the mantle and walked over to Harry. The boy took a step back at his approach, but didn't run.

Brave child.

"I have one to beat yours," he said, holding up his wounded hand to his protégé. The bite had turned dark, the exact shade hard to see in that light, but ugly all the same. Harry flinched. The Dark Lord mentally grinned. Perhaps he would luck out and obtain a little regret from Harry as well. "I tell you what. I won't apologize, but... I won't heal this wound with magic either. A reminder of my mistakes."

Harry was taken back by the offer. The man was throwing him for loop. He hadn't expected an apology, but even more so he hadn't expected an admittance to being wrong on any level. Penitence hadn't even occurred to him.

"W-won't people wonder?"

The Dark Lord chuckled.

"I doubt they'll suspect that you're abusing me, Harry."

The boy flinched at the mention of abuse, hand instinctively reaching for his bruises.

"We'll have to get rid of those before tomorrow afternoon. We're going to a charity banquet," Voldemort informed him.

"I... shouldn't I... keep them as well?"

"People will wonder. And in your case they will suspect I am abusing you."

Because you are, Harry thought, then dismissed the idea. The Dursley's had abused him, and though they had done far less physically, he still suffered from the wounds they had inflicted. Voldemort's behavior... was something more complicated.

"But... it won't... it's not..."

Frustrated with his own inability to express that yes, he wanted to accept his attacker's penitence without actually accepting it as the apology Voldemort wouldn't give, he resorted to a gesture of his own. He undid the button of his sleeve and pulled it up.

“Harry, what are you...”

And bit himself... hard. He let out a grunt of pain and released himself, swallowing the taste of blood. It hurt and lingered in a way that magically induced pain didn't. More real some how.

“There... a reminder of my mistakes that no one else will see.”

Voldemort bulked. He hadn't been expecting it at all. Improvisation had been serving him well for a majority of their interaction, but he hadn't counted on Harry's need for reconciliation. He'd thought all that could be obtained that night was vindication, in which he suffered for his mistake and Harry's pride would be soothed.

He wasn't prepared for it, and his wits had suddenly deserted him. He didn't know what to do now, didn't know how to accept Harry's unspoken offer.

“... You should go have Victoria clean that. Bites get infected easily,” he found himself saying, and felt extraordinarily stupid for being so inane. Harry didn’t notice, or perhaps he was as eager as he to escape the awkwardness that was quickly descending over the room.

“You’re right,” the boy said, re-buttoning his sleeve and turning to leave. “Goodnight.”

“Goodnight.”

The door opened and closed, leaving Voldemort alone with his confusion.

[illegible]

Victoria, as far as servants went, was more liberal than most, yet even she knew better than to question the bruises on his neck or the bite wound on his arm. He could see her suspicion, her indignation, and her worry but ultimately did nothing to reassure her aside from offering her a smile. She rubbed a salve into his neck and wrapped it in gauze, and per his instructions merely disinfected his bite and stuck on a large band-aid patch.

Afterwards, he asked to be alone to study and to have dinner brought up to his room. Now, Victoria was not really a servant, but she had come to understand the need for servant gossip rather quickly. When the cook asked if everything was alright with 'Young Master', she indulged the woman by saying Harry was simply tired and had thrown a tantrum and run off, but was now quite contrite and resting in his room.

She made no mention of what Harry had said earlier or of his injuries, though she feared for the boy. What could any of them really do to protect him? Morgan, the bastard, would probably be more concerned that Harry had bitten Voldemort, than the other way around. Ruddy bastards the whole lot of them.

Harry, for his part, didn't seem unsettled in the least. He had found himself an interesting book to read when she had dropped off his dinner, and when she had checked on him later he had fallen asleep over it. She roused him just long enough to change and brush his teeth, then set him gently to bed.

"G'night, Vicki," he murmured as she tucked him in.

She smiled and shook her head. Such a strangely charming child.

As she tidied his desk, she took a peek at what had been reading so diligently.

The basilisk is the second largest of all the known guardian beasts, but also the rarest. With the ability to kill by merely looking its prey in the eye, few wizards or witches are capable of handling let alone controlling it. Originally from the Mediterranean...

Charming, but with strange tastes in literature.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“...I know it’s not shown on the map, but we placed one way seals on both entrances to the Chamber. If anything wanders in, it won’t be leaving,” Lestrage said, pointing to the general area of girl’s bathroom on one map and a part of the Forbidden Forest on another. Voldemort nodded thoughtfully, looking for flaws or weaknesses in the castle’s many new defenses and traps that had been laid since the school had been cleared of students and a majority of the staff. Lestrage and Snape had been thorough, and he couldn’t see anymore necessary additions to suggest.

“All of the alarms can be monitored from my office, and there is always someone present to watch them. When I’m not around it’s either Snape, McGonagall, Toure, or Umbridge. Only Snape and I are aware of all the security measures of course, but the others have proven their loyalty and I felt them trustworthy enough to remain in the castle.”

“McGonagall?” Voldemort asked, more amused than contradictory. Minerva McGonagall was indeed a capable woman and an asset to the school, but if she indeed had loyalty it wasn’t to him.

“Is loyal to the school. She is as territorial and fierce as any lioness. She would do just about anything to keep her cubs safe,” Lestrage said, strangely affectionate. The Headmistress held no love for the other witch, but Lestrage would be the first to admit she held a sort of reluctant respect for her old teacher. McGonagall was stubborn, powerful, and against all odds had managed to come out of the war relatively unscathed and undiminished.

Voldemort conceded the point. He too was strangely fond of the woman.

“Then it would seem that you have everything in order. I entrust Hogwarts to you and your staff, Bella. I know you will not disappoint me,” he said easily, turning towards the exit. Lestrage fought back a grin, maintaining her poised neutrality at the compliment. It seemed she was gradually falling back into the Dark Lord's favor again. All she needed to do now was catch and destroy the basilisk and its handler and she would be firmly in his good graces.

"Oh, and do tell, Severus hello for me, won't you?" Voldemort said, glancing back at her. "I was hoping to speak with him today, but I suppose it can wait. The Christmas party perhaps?"

Lestrangle's triumph waned. Curse Snape. The man hadn't faltered in her time away, and it seemed that he had moved up in the Dark Lord's regard, even if he had failed to catch the culprits. She blamed Potter. Most of potion master's new importance revolved around his ability to protect, manipulate, and spy upon the boy.

"Perhaps, my Lord," she said, "But you know Severus. He despises parties and usually finds something 'more pressing' to attend to. I will let him know of your interest, however."

Maybe.

"Thank you, Bella, I would appreciate it."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

From Hogsmeade, Voldemort apparated to Askrigg without his usual entourage of Sentinels. The little coastal town held no wizarding community and Voldemort felt confident he could wander there without impunity. He appeared in an alley way between a pub and a café, transfigured his cloak into a trench coat and walked out into the muggle town. Despite his perfectly normal appearance, many people stopped and stared as he passed them, suspicion or curiosity clear on their faces. He had to fight the impulse not to pull out his wand and...

His private town house was suddenly before him. It was one of several, used more as a safe house for various officials than for himself, but he visited this one occasionally. It was small, but tidy and rich in historical details with a beautiful little garden in front. He opened the wrought iron gate, stepped inside, the muggle world now safely separated by a tall brick wall, and breathed a little easier.

He knocked once on the door to announce his arrival, then let himself in. It was, after all, technically his house. Tom did not come to greet him. Rude, but not unexpected. A brief search of the lower level of the house revealed the ornery boy in the kitchen, eating lunch and glowering over a newspaper.

“You couldn’t resist, could you?” Tom said, glowering at his elder counterpart as he entered.

“Whatever do you mean?” Voldemort asked, playing at innocence.

Tom threw down the newspaper at the Dark Lord’s feet. The headline read ‘You-Know-Who Promises Hundreds of New Jobs in New Year’, and featured several moving photographs of Voldemort himself and one Harry Potter hovering beside him. The Dark Lord smirked.

“Surely you didn’t think I’d let you keep him. I told you before, he’s not for you. He’s for all of Britain. The sooner Britain is made aware of this the better.”

Tom’s face twisted into angry snarl.

“Even if it makes him a target of your enemies and ‘allies’ alike? Are you so arrogant as to think you can protect him from all sides and at all times?”

Voldemort lifted up his hands as if to say ‘probably not, but oh well’.

“Damn you!”

“We’re both damned regardless, as you well know.”

Tom snorted, and then turned his attention to his lunch. If Voldemort had come merely to mock him, and that was likely the case, he wasn’t going to oblige him any further.

“What do you want?”

“Ah, nothing much. I just thought I’d see if you’d discovered anything more about the basilisk and its handler.”

Tom took a large bite of his sandwich, chewed it longer than was necessary, swallowed, drank from his glass of juice, and waited for a flicker of impatience to cross the Dark Lord’s expression before answering.

“I sent you my report already. The basilisk isn’t in the castle anymore, and since I am limited in my range of movement my investigation has run cold. If you’d release my restrictions, I would perhaps have made more progress. As it is, I don’t even know if the handler is a teacher, a student, or even located in the school. The more I think about it the more I suspect an outsider.”

“You know I can’t set you loose on civilians. I remember when you and I were the same person.”

“Then I suppose you’ll have to rely on your minions, and I’ll have to sit here and twiddle my thumbs.”

Voldemort did not appear surprised or annoyed with this declaration. He’d more than likely knew it all along.

“So be it. I’m just going to take some books from the library and be on my way.”

Tom said nothing, pointedly taking another bite of his sandwich. Voldemort went to the library as he said. After selecting a few books at random, he went the desk sitting in the middle of the room, unlocked one of the drawers, set something inside, and relocked it.

If Tom thought he was spending the holidays alone and unsupervised, well... let him keep thinking that. It made things so much easier.

Book II:

Chapter 18: Ancient Rites

PLEASE READ: The following scene contains depictions of Celtic paganism and some ideas anathema to Christianity. If you're a Christian who finds some of these ideas offensive or a pagan who is offended by inaccuracies, please don't take them personally. I'm only using the ideas presented as a fictional prop and not as a reflection of my personal belief or understanding of religious custom or ideology. So please, PLEASE don't leave Bible quotes or links to pagan sites or angry missives in the review box. It's just a story.

Otherwise, I hope you all enjoy the chapter!

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Alright, Draco, how do I look?"

Hermione spun around, her pale blue and white lace dress spreading out beneath her. Her hair had been curled into tight little ringlets and piled on top of her head and held there with a beautiful diamond tiara. Narcissa had put it on her, along with just a hint of blush, gushing shamelessly about how her beautiful little princess was growing into a majestic young queen. With her foster mother's approval obtained, she went in search of a more masculine opinion.

Draco watched her little twirl with some amusement in the reflection of his bedroom mirror. He was dressed almost entirely in black, the large silver buttons and other odd ornamentation standing out in striking contrast. The effect, he thought, hinted at a malevolence with good fashion sense.

"You always look lovely, sister. I have a hard time telling when you look more so," he said teasingly.

She rolled her eyes, but her blush made the flattery worth it.

"Draco..."

“Now, now, Hermione. I know you want to look your best for your boyfriend-”

“He is not my boyfriend.”

“Oh... then can I have him?”

“Draco!”

“Just kidding! As I was saying, I know you want to look your best for Harry, but don’t you think you’re coming off as a bit desperate?”

She smacked him with a pillow.

“Ah! Not the hair!”

She smacked him again.

“You’re gorgeous! Breath-taking! Helen of Troy was a hag in comparison!”

She tossed the pillow back onto the bed.

“Why thank you, brother.”

He glowered at her, and tried to reset his hair in the mirror. He’d just managed to get it back into its immobile perfection when Narcissa appeared to hurry them downstairs. Malfoy Sr. was part of the Dark Lord’s entourage that night, and would meet them there later. They took the bespelled door in the music room that usually lead to nothing but the wall behind it, but opened up into the entry way of the Hothwell Family mansion that night. They were lead to the ballroom, their presence announced, and as their mother made pleasantries with the Lady of the Estate, they quickly ducked out in search of friends.

They found Natalie flirting with a boy a good three years her senior under a statue of Aphrodite near the balcony doors. She abandoned him quickly enough when she saw them, finding more challenging prey.

“Draco, Hermione, thank Merlin you’re here. This party is utterly droll. Not at all like yours. I swear, can’t the orchestra play anything other than Schubert?”

Draco grinned, accepting her backhanded compliment with a gentlemanly kiss to her white gloved hand.

“Natalie, have you even been here for more than fifteen minutes?” Hermione asked, just as eager for disagreement as the other girl probably was.

“I don’t know,” the blond girl sighed, “It feels like it’s been fifteen hours.”

“I take it Harry hasn’t shown up then,” Draco said, baiting them both.

“Alas, no. And I’m so looking forward to seeing him in his new threads. Analeisse said she got to see him at that press conference a few days ago and that the newspaper photo doesn’t do him justice.”

Draco shrugged.

“That’s Spindle for you. Fabulous fashion sense, even if he’s a bit dodgy with the needle.”

Hermione sighed.

“I hope Harry’s alright. He has no luck, and that’s sort of a necessity living with the Dark Lord.”

“Nonsense, it’s Harry,” laughed Natalie, “What can’t he do?”

“Brush his hair? Mind his own business? Get along with the Weasel?” offered Draco.

“Speaking of the Weasel, where is he? He’s usually following you at the end of his leash.”

Draco's expression turned disgruntled. The one thing he did not want to talk about was Weasley. If Ron had been insufferable before he dueled Potter, he was positively ... positively a bleed'n twat now. Not only was he openly disagreeing with Draco about things, he was arguing with him at the most inopportune times and places. The last he had spoken with the freckled menace was right before they'd left for the train, when Draco told him he wasn't inviting him to the Christmas ball this year and Ron said he frankly didn't give a damn. And by God, it appeared as if Ron meant it.

"Chugging eggnog with the rest of plebs most likely," he muttered. Hermione frowned at the use of the word 'plebs', but tactfully refrained from commenting.

The music suddenly stopped, and they turned their attention to the entry doors, where the Dark Lord was being announced, followed by several other prestigious names, and one Harold James Potter.

The Dark Lord himself was dressed in blacks and silvers (which pleased Draco immensely), the simple sharp cut of his robes drawing attention to the complex pattern of Celtic symbols embroidered into his sleeves and chest and back. Beside him, Harry was garbed in a similar style, only rather than silver, a network of bright amber topaz sprinkled over him. If one paid close enough attention, they could see the stones slowly rearrange themselves, giving the illusion of molten fire flowing over blackened stones. Standing beside one another, Voldemort and Harry made quite the pair.

Indeed, it wouldn't take much for one to wonder if they weren't in fact father and illegitimate son.

Hermione, as subtly as she could, made her way towards her friend as soon as the music started again and everyone went back to their dancing and chatter. At some point, Voldemort had seen fit to release his charge, and Harry immediately went in search of Hermione. They met each other half way, and she led him out of the ballroom. Lucius Malfoy marked their disappearance with some displeasure, before following the Dark Lord to the parlor for their usual private party.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Severus Snape stalked into the parlor wearing black dress robes, plain and severe, and more suited to a funeral than a celebration. They rather suited him. Scattered about the room was the usual contingent of Death Eaters, their spouses, and the occasional offspring that was old and discreet enough to attend. The Malfoys sat side by side, their silent closeness a mockery to the trophy wives and their considerably older husbands who clung together in pseudo affection and the stony civility of those in arranged marriages. Lestrangle, widowed now for four years, held the love seat with the only available seat in the room.

"I apologize for my tardiness," he said stiffly, striding towards Lestrangle with only a moment's hesitation. The Headmistress gave him a cruel smile by of greeting, crossing her legs and drawing his eyes immediately to the wicked points of her stiletto heels.

"That is alright Severus," Lord Voldemort acquiesced. "I was led to believe you would no be attending at all tonight."

"Madam Umbridge owes me a favor. She agreed to monitor the alarms for me... ah, excuse me, for us..." he corrected, glancing towards Lestrangle. "Over the next couple hours. Without McNair to hound, I dare say she has plenty of free time on her hands, but I am afraid I can't stay long."

"I'm glad you're here just the same, Severus. Every year it seems more of my faithful Death Eaters are gone from me. Damon, Gaius, Althea, and of course poor Rudolphus..." the Dark Lord said, lifting his glass to the aforementioned's widow. Lestrangle smiled back demurely in acknowledgment, but then frowned when she noticed the bandage around his hand.

"M-my Lord, are you alright? Your hand-"

Voldemort glanced at his wounded hand, and chuckled a bit.

"Oh yes, that. Harry bit me."

Someone dropped their glass of champagne, but that was the only sound for almost half a minute. Snape felt decidedly less surprised than everyone else, and wished he had just stayed home.

“Dare I ask ‘why’?” Snape said, deciding he’d rather move the conversation along so he could sort out a suitable punishment for when the boy returned to school.

“It was my fault really. I shouldn’t have put my hand so close to his mouth. Lucius, you’re a father. Have you ever had that happen before?”

Malfoy Sr. blinked, quickly recovering from his surprised stupor to nod.

“Yes, once, but that was when Draco was four, and rather adamant to convince me he was a real dragon.”

There were a few amused chuckles, including Voldemort’s, and the conversations picked up again and moved to other matters. Lestrangle, however, did not join in, hearing what Voldemort had said and what he hadn’t said, and stewing with a renewed jealousy. Snape, never a true conversationalist, watched her carefully from the corner of his eye while pretending to listen to the Dark Lord thank Narcissa for her recommendation of her designer.

They lingered in the parlor for about an hour, performing their typical routine of subtle insults, subtler alliances, less than subtle boasting, and invitations into various political dalliances mixed in with menial small talk. Eventually, even the dour Bellatrix was drawn in. Severus remained apart from, and yet aware of, it all, and kept his keenest observations for Voldemort.

The Dark Lord was more relaxed than he usually was this time of year. Being the leader of a nation, he was always rushed but the end of the year was always the most stressful, and with his latest project running behind schedule it was even more so. Yet the tension, the quick temper, the natural disdain for the Christian holiday in general was absent.

Was it Potter's doing?

"Severus, walk with me."

The potion's master was pulled from his musings by Voldemort's command, and quickly moved to obey. A few watched their departure enviously. To catch the Dark Lord in a good mood was rare and often rewarding event. No doubt they imagined Severus was receiving some sort of gift or offer. If only.

"How is the search going?" Voldemort asked as they entered the empty corridor.

"No progress, I'm afraid. It's abandoned Hogwarts for the moment, but I doubt it will stay away. The castle is the only place it is likely to find both food and shelter during these winter months. January, early February at the latest, it will have to return or die in the cold. Whoever is controlling it must realize this. Traps have been set all over the castle, but most will have to be removed once the students return. I believe that is when the final and most aggressive attack will occur, and the purpose of these attacks will be made clear."

Voldemort digested the information, and finding the reasoning sound, nodded.

"That must not be allowed to happen, Severus. You have taken precautions?"

"Both entrances to the Chamber have been bespelled to seal themselves once someone has entered. I have also thickened the ice around the moat and closed the boat entrance, so nothing will leave or enter there. All windows and entry ways less than two stories above the ground have been likewise sealed. This leaves only the front entrance. There are more traps there, but they will all have to be removed when the students return."

"You have been very thorough," Voldemort remarked, pleased so far.

"I can not take full credit."

“But you can take a great deal. No students have been hurt since you’ve taken responsibility over the school and even now these preparations...”

“Have yet to yield results. I will not considered the matter resolved until the culprit is caught and the basilisk is dead.”

“I trust you, Severus.”

An incredible chill ran down the potion’s master’s spine, thrilling and terrifying all at once. It was a rare privilege to have the Dark Lord’s trust. It was an easy and unforgivable crime to betray it. A crime punishable by more than just death.

“Thank you, my Lord.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Harry, I’m so glad you came!” she said, hugging him tightly. He hugged her back, feeling relieved to finally see a familiar face after the last couple of days. “I’ve been so worried about you, but all the letters I tried to send kept getting returned. I think there’s some sort of protection on where ever you live.”

“Yeah, I know. I tried to send Elsbeth out, but she can’t fly beyond the grounds,” he said. “So how are you?”

“I’m fine,” she said, “but what about you? How are things going... where ever it is that you are? I’ve seen your picture twice in the paper already. What’s going on?”

Harry shrugged.

“PR campaign. Sort of. I’m Harry Potter, symbol of the Dark Lord’s care and concern for muggleborns and halfbreeds everywhere. Never mind I’m not really either and that I can speak parseltongue and am a witness in a homicide and an attempted homicide investigation. We make a pretty photo, don’t we?” he said, his tone ironic.

“Oh, Harry...”

“It’s fine, Hermione. Boring beyond belief most of the time, but fine.”

Except for the fact I know what killed Sweetie, paralyzed Angelina, and may have tried to kill me, and that I can’t tell you anything about it because Snape is a clever son of a bitch.

“Oh, did you know we’ll be getting new teachers next year?”

“Really?” she said curiously, accepting his words and his subject change at face value for the time being. For the next hour he told her about many of the things that had happened to him, and despite what he’d said about being bored there was in fact a lot going on. He told her about the forest estate, his new wardrobe, his useless tutor, the trips to the Bristol office, the various events Voldemort dragged him to, and his maid Victoria, but nothing about the Dark Lord himself. She seemed to sense his reluctance in mentioning the man, but when she found an opening to question him he distracted her yet again with a Christmas gift.

“It’s for you,” he said, handing her slender black velvet box like one would find a necklace in. “You should open now, since I won’t see you again until the end of the holiday.”

“Harry, you didn’t have to.”

“But I wanted to.”

She gave him a smile, pulled the silver ribbon off, and opened it. Inside was quill, a raven feather with a obsidian pen head. Tilting it a bit made it gleam in rainbow colors.

“Oh, Harry, it’s beautiful.”

“It’s a quik-quotes-quill,” Harry said, “And not one of those shoddy tabloid ones either. It’s Legal Court standard. I figured you could use one for the news paper.”

"It's perfect," she said, a feeling thrilled jolt when she learned it was more than just pretty. "How did you get it?"

"I convinced one of Voldemort's accountants to trade a half an hour therapy session with his American Corn Snake for it. Apparently, some snakes don't actually like rats."

She giggled at that.

"I got you something too," she said, pulling out a little bell from somewhere in the folds of her dress. "It's an 'Unsilencing Bell'. It's really clever. You can hear it ring even if someone puts up a silencing charm, and if you press it to your ear you can hear even if you're under a deafening hex. I thought you could use it more than me."

The bell jingled as she handed it to him, long and sweet like a crystal glass.

"Thank you, Hermione."

"Good grief, don't tell me you've been in here the entire time."

They turned to see Draco stalking in with a bemused Natalie. Natalie moved in like hawk, snatching up Harry in her painted talons and remarking how dashing he looked in his new robes, and how she'd seen him in the papers, and where was her Christmas present?. Draco rolled his eyes and led them back outside to somewhere less 'tacky' than the cloak room. You never knew who was going to get drunk and stumble inside with some other random drunk and get frisky.

They ended up back in the ballroom, talking and laughing and Natalie managed to drag Harry off for dance when the band finally played something other than Schubert. He wasn't very good, but the dance floor was crowded with taller and drunker men and women, so chances were no one but a very amused Natalie noticed. And as full darkness came, everyone was invited outside for a fireworks display, the likes of which Harry had never seen. These were not the random flashes and streams of light he was used to, but a full on drama of characters played in fire across the sky. Savage warriors and beautiful maidens and Druids and Romans and castles and forests and strange beasts moving across the sky in a story he didn't recognize, but felt stir his blood.

"It's the story of Hogwarts, sort of a New Year's story for wizarding kind in Britain," Natalie whispered, her head resting on his shoulder as they stared up at the sky together. "It was the first castle ever built by magic, and it was the last refuge for those who were 'gifted' when Rome decided one God was plenty, and destroyed theirs and everyone else's. There's a saying, I don't know if you've heard it before. 'Fire, steel, and God are as rain to the stones of Hogwarts.'"

And my forefather helped build it, Harry thought, a feeling of pride and sorrow coming over him as he watched the scenes of tragedy and glory unfold. The firework druids fled from the Roman soldiers, more lost in the flight than those that reached the castle keep. Monsters rose out of the lake destroying ships and wolves the size of train cars rampaged through the forests (so much closer to the castle than they were now) and tearing apart all they found there.

Gradually, the foes departed or gave up or could no longer find the castle, and the lights faded out of the sky to leave only the stars. Harry found his hand clutching Natalie's tightly, pressed against his heart, and immediately released her.

"Oh, sorry. I didn't realize..."

She shook her head, her cheeks a bit flush.

"Don't be."

"Harry?"

He turned to see a rather miffed looking Draco and Hermione watching them.

"If you turtledoves are quite done," Draco droned, "I think your Daddy is ready to go."

Harry looked to Natalie, but she shook her head.

“Don’t look at me. I have two mothers.”

“Then who is he...oh! Not funny Draco!”

The Malfoy heir’s smirk seemed to indicate that he disagreed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The next morning, Harry woke late. Victoria was not there to wake him for once, ordered from the house with the rest of the servants for reasons not specified. He entertained the idea of finishing some homework briefly, and then discarded it. The house was empty. He wanted to explore. He threw on his most comfortable clothes, a pair of slacks and a red jumper (compliments of Clyde and his ‘uncles’) and a thick pair of socks, and set about on his exploration.

He was met with an almost immediate delay when he tried to open the door and bumped something. He found a parcel addressed to him with a note from Victoria on top.

Harry,

This arrived for you yesterday. We don’t celebrate Christmas here, so you may as well open it now. See you soon.

Vicki

There was no return address, but a familiar symbol of a crescent moon over crossbones was stamped on the corner. It was his godfathers’ Christmas present. Grinning, brought it inside and opened it. There was a cloak inside, and Harry groaned. Oh Merlin, please not more clothes. Then nearly smacked himself for being so ungrateful. His godfathers loved him, but they didn’t have the finances or the availability to go shopping like the average wizard. The cloak was probably handmade and the best they could do.

He ran his hand over the cloak and felt it was completely made of fur, black, and incredibly soft. Removing it from the box he found it to be overlarge, and a letter fell out of the folds. He set the cloak on the bed to pick it up, and when he stood up the cloak was gone.

Letting out a startled gasp he searched the bed and floor, and gasped again when he found the cloak right under his hands, now a the exact shade of the comforter it was resting on. For the next five minutes, he tested the new material by placing it on different colored surfaces. By far the most intriguing result was the checkered black and white pattern he got when he laid it on the bathroom floor.

Perhaps this is more toy than clothing after all, Harry thought delightedly.

He wrapped himself in the cloak, felt its warmth and softness ensnare him, and then retrieved his letter.

Hey, Harry

Merry Christmas, or perhaps it's 'I hope you have a Merry Christmas', since more than likely you've opened this early. Good for you.

Harry chuckled.

Remus and I hope this letter finds you well. We have been hearing some disturbing rumors, which we thought you would have mentioned in your previous letter. Please write to us again soon, Remus is a hopeless worrier and I'm not very good with it myself.

If this was meant to guilt trip him, they did a wonderful job.

Well, enough parental nagging, and on to the fun stuff. We hope you like your present. Before you go 'oh no, not clothes!', let me assure you it's way better than an ordinary cloak. Your father had an invisibility cloak once upon a time, but that's still locked away somewhere. So until you find that one, this one should make a suitable stand in. It won't make you invisible, but the fur belongs to a Baluvian bear, which change colors to match their environment, and if you remain still you'll pretty much disappear. I imagine you'll have a great deal of fun with this.

The letter went on to describe holidays in the werewolf didn't celebrate Christmas per se, but there was some festivities surrounding the New Year. There were bon fires, Song Nights, Great Hunts (during which Sirius had killed the Baluvian bear), Athena and Greyback had their third son together (and he looked more like his mother than Rhiannon), and end of the year maintenance they somehow managed to turn into a competition and game (trying to thatch a roof while avoiding tar being thrown at you was apparently a sporting event). Harry found himself laughing at Sirius' descriptions and longing to be there with them to see it all. It all sounded very coarse and even a bit brutal, but there was a warmth and comradery in the undertones.

Feeling the beginning of melancholy set in, he quickly roused himself to do what he had been intending to do in the first place. He explored the kitchens, the ballroom, the parlor, the music room, the guest rooms, and the attic (for about thirty seconds before deciding it was too creepy). When he'd run out of unlocked rooms to explore inside, he transfigured a pair of his old shoes into boots, wrapped his new cloak around himself, and went out into the gardens.

There was a light snow on the ground from the night before, and the now cloudless sky made everything painfully bright. The air was still, frigid, and clean, forming steamy puffs of moisture with every breath. He pulled up the hood to his cloak to protect his eyes from the light and his ears from the bitter cold, and took in the beauty of this lonely world.

At first, everything seemed still and quiet, but the longer he stood the more he realized how false that first impression was. Small winter birds flocked amongst the garden statues, which poured out seeds like a fountain poured out water, chirping and arguing with intruding squirrels and rabbits and ravens. Deer, the sort that didn't eat people, were gathered near the edge of the lawn, pawing at the ground to dig up flower bulbs from the half-frozen earth, and lifting their heads every so often to 'chuff', tasting and smelling the air for danger.

Somewhere on the other side of the grounds he heard the trumpets of peacocks.

The crunch of snow beneath his feet as he headed towards the garden labyrinth seemed the loudest of all, though if any of the creatures about heard him their curious eyes couldn't seem to find him. He entered the maze without a second thought. He was not worried about getting lost. His path was marked clearly by his own foot prints, and after a minute or so he found someone else's as well.

Curious, he followed them, weaving through several turns he would have missed otherwise, and surprised more than once by statues of unfamiliar beings. The statues were all different. Most appeared human, although there were some misshapen creatures or animals, but not all were young or beautiful as he was used to seeing. Some were ugly or old or shown with three faces or no face at all. Though carved of stone, most were adorned with jewelry made from precious metals or animal bones or sea shells and draped in silk or leather or costumes of elaborate design. About a one of every four showed signs of recent worship. Offerings of candles, seeds, nuts, silver and gold coins, open bowls of wine or mead or blood or ink, and the remains of sacrificed birds and animals in their winter coats were placed on the plinths of these statues, turning them to alters.

It should have been frightening to Harry, who had spent much of his life in a world where pagan was the equivalent of satanic, but there was a beauty to it all. Everything was done with such loving care and attention to detail, with all the reverence he had witnessed bestowed upon the alters for saints of Christendom. If it had been dark, perhaps the fear would have come, but the deed done in the bright openness of the garden stole any ominous nature that muggle culture had instilled in the custom. This was no satanic ritual done at night in the middle of the woods, or the ruins of a church, or a dank basement.

This was Voldemort saying hello to his gods. Wishing them a Happy New year and hoping they would return the favor. Harry took his time exploring, careful not to disturb the alters' contents, pondering what all the offerings meant and why some received different items and others received nothing at all.

And then he suddenly took a turn and found himself in the middle of the labyrinth and not as alone as he had thought.

Voldemort knelt in the center of a circle and pentagram, stripped down to only a pair of thin pants and showing no signs of discomfort. In one hand he held a bowl and in another he held a dagger. His eyes were closed, face lifted to the heavens, and his lips whispering too softly for Harry to hear. The lines of the pentagram were clearly marked by red blood on white snow. Runes were painted into the spaces between, some of them even recognizable to the young student. Fire, water, strength, harmony, heart, blood, Mother, and so many more he couldn't identify.

His breath caught in his throat. He wasn't suppose to be here. This was a sacred thing, and he was not a believer, not even a scholar with a base understanding of it all. As quietly as he could, he turned to leave.

"It would be rude of you to leave without offering something."

Harry still.

"This is a temple after all..." Voldemort continued. "...not a gallery. One does not come here simply to observe."

Harry turned, reluctantly facing the Dark Lord. The man did not look particularly angry, but he did look expectant.

"I'm sorry. I didn't realize... no one said anything about... How did you even know I was here?"

The Dark Lord smirked.

"In this place, I have all the power and omnipotence of my gods. And their authority. Come here. I will show you what I mean while you make your offering."

"... I am not a pagan..."

He didn't dare say he was a Christian. It seemed blasphemous somehow to speak that word here. Voldemort shook his head.

"Your soul may belong to Heaven, Harry, but your magic belongs to the Earth. She deserves your love just as He does."

The young wizard didn't truly understand, but he moved forward regardless until he reached the edge of the pentagram. He turned to Voldemort, unsure of what to do.

"Sit there," the man instructed, pointing to the left 'arm' of the star in which the rune for 'water' was drawn. "Don't worry about disturbing the rune. I have preservation spells in place."

Hesitantly, Harry did as instructed, but he had hardly set foot inside when he was suddenly overwhelmed with power and awareness. It was as if the world had suddenly poured into his body or his mind had suddenly poured out into the world. His senses moved beyond the physical, taking in the life and the death of existence. He could feel the heartbeat of the animals he'd seen outside the maze, he could hear the soft sigh of soil as it drank the melting snow, and see the dreams of the sleeping forest around them. And ghosts, or rather spirits, fairies?, ephemeral wisps of things not living moving and breathing and laughing and screaming in all places. All these things and so much more, until there was so much awareness that he became numb to it, as if he'd been shocked by an electric jolt.

"Incredible, isn't it?"

Voldemort regarded him, smiling serenely. The man drew his 'awareness', and suddenly Harry's numbness broke into knowledge. Without even looking at him, Harry knew him in ways that simple vision would not allow. He felt every piece that composed his body from sinew to synapse, his mind unfolding like a dark plane larger than the whole of Britain, and his soul was not what Harry had ever thought a soul could be. It was singularly itself, and yet other... things came and went in and out of it, with definite flavors and energies and 'awareness'. It was as if all that defined the unseen of existence were reaching out to touch him, as if Voldemort's gods were paying homage to him and not the other way around.

“What are you?” Harry whispered, too awed to stop himself, to question himself, to question the entire experience. Weakly, he sank to his knees inside the pentagram and power unfurled from the earth to hold him, gently, caressing, singing sweetly in tones of an ocean miles away.

“I am... all that They would deem to make of me. Priest. Warrior. King. God. I am the anger of this scorned land, and I am its sorrow. I am one of the few of the Children of the Earth who have turned back to our Mother and said ‘thank you for your gifts, how might they serve you?’ Do you see it, Harry? Do you see our magic flowing into us from our Mother?”

And Harry could. He could see the magic he had always thought of as his own, flowing up from the ground and around them in the wind, seeping into each of them, different colors and textures and vibrations wrapping around that part that was singularly themselves, their souls, in a cocoon of power.

And Harry could see that Voldemort’s soul was different from his.

He could see it was broken and torn, and that it should have flown apart and disappeared into nothingness long ago, but tendrils of magic, of Mother, held it together, power reinforcing the places where it would crumble and sewing together those parts that had torn. Voldemort’s soul had become so saturated with magic that it was hard to tell which part was which.

“She loves you.”

Unable to stand in the presence of that love, pure for the impure, between greater-than-human and less-than-human, terrible and beautiful, without it touching a piece of his own soul, tears welled to the surface. Even as they flowed down his cheeks and to the ground, Harry was aware that they were more than water and salt, but part of his own soul, tiny pieces of his love and his sorrow and his awe.

“She loves you too, Harry.”

That was true too, and suddenly he found himself sobbing.

“That’s it, child. Tears are as fine an offering as blood.”

Even without watching, bent over and shaking as he cried his offering into the snow, he could sense Voldemort’s intent. The dagger was for more than just show after all. When he could look up again at last, Harry could see the thin stream of blood flowing into the little bowl.

Saw the anger, hate, sorrow, joy, and hope flowing into the little bowl.

Magic flared up around them, swallowing their offerings, taking it into the Earth to become apart of it. The bowl of blood caught fire, the flames blue and barely visible, and Harry’s tears hissing and evaporating little dots into the snow. The magic spread, setting alight the pentagram itself until the blood was devoured and the snow melted into a perfect circle. Once the diagram disappeared the power, the ‘awareness’, left them.

They both collapse, shaking in the after affects of the ritual. There was grass beneath them, green and lush and impossible this deep into winter. Harry buried his face into the soft carpet, inhaling the delicious sent of Earth and Magic and love before it faded from him altogether.

When finally the overwhelming presence of Mother and themselves had dissipated from their minds, the two wizards turned to one another, still laying where they’d fallen. It was a strange sort of understanding that passed between them, intimate on a level few would ever know with another human being. They had, for a few brief minutes, not only seen the other’s soul but becomes connected to it, sunk their spiritual hands into the common material of their existence, both physical and metaphysical.

They both reached for the other, their cool hands coming to meet, warmth and love and perhaps a ghost of ‘awareness’ passing between them as it had with their Mother only a few minutes before.

“She loves you...” Harry repeated, then sighed softly, “... more than anyone else. You are... more Her than anyone else.”

There was no jealousy in the statement, just a sort of longing. Voldemort smiled very gently, as Harry had never seen him do before.

“I have given myself totally to her. When this body and this magic fade, my soul will not return to the Father you Christians have promised yourselves to. There is not enough of my soul left to reside in Heaven or Hell. Rather, it will be drawn into the Earth with the rest of me, to be absorbed or reborn or reshaped as She sees fit. Over and over and over again for as long She exists. I chose Eden over absolution, and I regret nothing.”

Harry’s hand tightened around his. Was it to comfort him? Or was it to ask for comfort? All he knew was in that moment, after what they had shared, he didn’t want to be separated from him. Couldn’t conceive of such a connection breaking. Not ever.

“Why did you show me this?”

Voldemort’s expression turned from serene to amused.

“I’m afraid I can’t take credit for this. I only intended for you to give a few drops of blood and be on your way. I hadn’t expected your magic to align with ‘water’. I thought your element would have been ‘wind’ or even ‘fire’, but not ‘water’. It must have been Her will. She wanted you to be apart of this.”

“And what is ‘this’?”

“Magic at its purest and most powerful. If we had wanted to, we would have had the power to sink the entirety of Britain while in that circle.”

A shiver ran through Harry at the very idea of it.

“So why haven’t you ever done it?”

Voldemort smirked, his previous gentility dissipating with the revival of their sense of self. He got up, pulling up Harry by their conjoined hands. The boy stumbled a bit, but Voldemort held him steady, not yet releasing him.

"I have no desire to sink Britain, Harry."

"Then what do you want? Why conquer it in the first place?"

There was no accusation in his voice, Harry was feeling too connected with the other at the moment for anything other than affection and curiosity.

"I suppose, because more than anything else, I want the wizarding kind to love me... and to love Her, but mankind has always had free will. I cannot make them love or accept Us anymore than God can make them love or accept Him. So, I must first make a world in which She can be loved, where Christendom has no sword with which to strike Her followers and any who wish to follow Her customs, may. If I am careful, I will need to do nothing more than this. Wizarding kind will inevitably rediscover the source that separated them from muggles in the first place and return to Her. It is a natural progression."

Voldemort slowly led Harry back to the mansion, his hand still clutching firmly to Harry's. It would be a lie to say he hadn't been entranced by what he had seen in Harry during the ritual. This was not the first time he had performed the ceremony, not even the first time he had performed it with other people, but it was the first time he'd felt such strength. Not just of magic, but of being. Harry's soul was... it was...

Intense.

The resulting magic was likewise intense, a necessity in order for the Earth to even hope to bind it to Her, but ultimately futile if he didn't accept Her completely. Today, Voldemort had created a bond with Harry, one they would share with the Earth and each other until they died. Would it be enough after they died?

No yet, but perhaps someday...

They entered the mansion and went immediately to Voldemort's study. They each moved to a chair close to the fireplace, setting them so they faced each other before settling in. All this was done in complete silence, the hum of their respective magic in tune with each other and their environment. Their will was so apparent to each other that they had no need to instruct or question, nor to verbally command the magic that willed the fire to life or opened the drapes without touch.

It would not last. After tonight, once the winter solstice and come and gone, the extra boost in magic would fade. In the meantime, however, Voldemort saw no harm in basking in their 'awareness' of each other and their magic.

"My Lord," Harry said, breaking the silence after almost an hour, "There is a basilisk running around Hogwarts. Why can't anyone know?"

Voldemort blinked. He hadn't thought Harry had figured out that much already. Snape had said the boy knew it was a snake, but not that it was a basilisk. Of course, he'd never bothered to find out exactly how much Harry knew, guessed, or assumed. He had been more concerned with the child staying quiet and out of the way.

"What do you know?"

"I know it's a basilisk. I know it was guarding some secret place connected to the girl's lavatory, and that it got out. I figured it's escaped into the school's secret corridors and pipes, and no one can seem to find it. I know it killed Moaning Myrtle- whose paralyzed spirit is still being kept somewhere in the school- over fifty years ago, and then Cassandra Sweetie, and it would have killed Angelina Johnson too except that she saw it through her make-up mirror instead of directly in the eye. I know you're covering up all of this, probably to keep secret the place it was guarding. Oh, and it's looking for somebody or maybe more than one. I think it means to kill them... I think it means to kill me too."

Voldemort felt rather impressed. So far Harry had been mostly right. He even seemed to know a little something he didn't. Who was the basilisk trying to kill... aside from Harry?

“Very good. You’ve discovered the when, what, and how. Now all that’s missing is the who, why, and where of it. I’d like to know that myself.”

“Sir?”

“Harry, I am not keeping this all a secret just to keep a secret. The fact of the matter is that there is a lot of answers I just don’t have. The basilisk was released from its Chamber by someone, and it wasn’t Sweetie. Who ever released it is using it for some unknown purpose, terrorism or assassination of someone in the school, and they are doing a fine job of hiding it. Hogwarts has always been known as the safest place in Britain, and I can not afford to have that reputation sullied. Britain can’t afford it.”

“But the students are in danger!”

“Children are always in danger, Mr. Potter. Do you think they would be any safer elsewhere? I assure you there are monsters in every school, every settlement, every forest, every place where victims are in ready supply. The one responsible for these actions, the true monster behind these deaths, will be found and destroyed. The irrational fear of students and their parents will not speed things along. Quite the opposite.”

Harry said nothing for a while, turning over the man’s words in his head and prodding the weaknesses he found.

“What was the contract I signed?”

Voldemort hesitated for a moment, considered lying or editing his words, but knew Harry was too aware of him for either option to work.

“It’s old. Almost as old as you are. I wrote it the night before I brought my Death Eaters into the Chamber of Secrets, the private study and laboratory of our ancestor Salazar Slytherin. There was no other way to enter the school without setting off the castle’s defenses, but I did not wish that magnificent place to be disturbed by unworthy fools in search of knowledge and power not rightfully theirs. So I wrote that contract, and had every Death Eater I took there sign it, magically binding them so that they could never speak, write, find again, or otherwise communicate what they had seen with anyone other than myself or those who signed the contract. Not even Severus knows the specifics of it, as he never signed it and I wrote it in parseltongue.”

“So if I found something out, I couldn’t even tell Snape about it?”

“I suppose not, but I doubt it will be a problem. Severus has done a marvelous job with security. I suspect the matter will be resolved sooner rather than later.”

Harry didn’t look reassured, and frankly he was looking down right pissed. Voldmort stood, moving closer, touching Harry’s cheek.

“Whatever happens, I will protect you, my little prince.”

“It’s not me I’m worried about.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Celtic Goddess of the Moon and Inspiration. One of them anyway. There’s no strict hierarchy of Gods and Goddesses in Celtic religion, and most are regional and subject to name and authority changes.

Author’s Note: Now, don’t any of you get the strange idea that Voldemort is some sort of ‘Green Living’ messiah who wants to save the Earth. He’s more of an angry idealist, and everyone should know the dangers of people like that. Plus, despite the warm fuzzies Harry got during the ritual offering, ‘Mother’ isn’t exactly all bunnies and unicorns. In fact, She EATS bunnies and unicorns regularly. Just a little food for thought.

Book II

Chapter 19: Forward to Battle

“You seem different, Harry,” Natalie said, boldly eyeing the boy sitting across the cramped compartment from head to toe.

The subject of her inspection was dressed in his usual attire (although someone had lengthened the hem of his pants and his white dress shirt was still stiff in its newness), his skin back to its normal tone before his sickness, and hair still defiantly mused. By all accounts he appeared exactly as he had before his hospitalization, and yet there was something more about his presence that she just couldn't put her finger on.

“Bollocks,” Clyde said, oblivious as usual. “The country air just did him some good.”

Hermione, for once, was in agreement with Natalie.

“It's true. You seem... I don't know. More confident? No, that's not right...”

Draco snorted, knowing or least believing he knew, what was about the other boy.

“You look like you know something we don't know, and you're laughing at us.”

Harry shook his head, though Draco was partially right. He knew something they didn't know, and while he wasn't really laughing at them, he felt a thrill at being party to something they would never understand. It was not the same as his usual secrets, which weighed him down and tighten his insides, but uplifting and liberating. Empowering.

He knew where magic came from. He knew, not just was told and expected to accept. The 'awareness' had dwindled after the ritual, slowly siphoning off back into the Earth, and then just disappearing altogether with the arrival of the New Year. Yet still the knowledge remained. The days that followed were restless, his mind now completely free to ponder exactly what had happened and what it might mean. His interactions with the Dark Lord were now forever overshadowed by that single intimate moment in the labyrinth. Now every thing said or done by the man seemed to hold an extra dimension, a religious perspective that Harry didn't completely understand. He'd danced around Voldemort for the rest of the holiday, wanting to be closer to study him and yet distanced so as not to be overwhelmed by him simultaneously.

Voldemort had his own ideas. He dragged Harry off to more press conferences and charity banquets and private dinners, always making those present aware of his protégé and yet not allowing them too close. Harry was forced to remain near the man, finding himself drawn into every word and innuendo, wondering at the calculations and the underlining meanings and never certain he had guessed right.

Then in private, the few times opportunity allowed, Voldemort would tell him a story. Never the same story and never about the same thing, though each had a lesson in them.

Even if he didn't always know what they were.

"Do you see that building across the street, Harry? That used to be a muggle courthouse, once upon a time. They burned 'witches' and 'heretics' there five hundred years ago. Now it's a church for wizarding kind. Isn't that strange? They pay homage to the God of muggles, the very ones who preach their inescapable damnation."

Or once at a business meeting with a Director of Foreign Affairs over a recently failed attempt to negotiate some trade agreement with Italy.

"It used to be we could not keep the Romans at bay and now they avoid us as if plagued. A pity, as they have some very lovely libraries and museums. Perhaps it's just as well though. Despite their linguistic contribution to wand magic, they've little talent for the Earth-based magics. Not surprising when their worship has always been directed at the Heavens rather than the Earth, even when they were considered pagans."

There was pride in his words, wounded and inflated pride each in their own measure, but always there nonetheless. It left Harry's head swimming with images of ancient glories and atrocities, making the world larger with possibilities and yet more personal, as if each act and consequence was now being directed at him or someone very close to him.

So if he seemed different to them, he wasn't surprised. He felt different. Bigger and smaller, depending on the new view points he'd found during his brief jaunt through 'Voldemort Land'.

He smiled at his friends.

"It's been an interesting holiday. It will be good to return to Hogwarts though. Anymore time stuck running between the middle of nowhere and the middle of everything was starting to suck me dry. How do you all stand it?"

Draco chuckled, leaning back in his seat with all the poise of a model. This was apparently a topic of which he was confident in his own expertise

"It's a gift, dear boy. Don't feel bad. Some people have it and some people don't."

Hermione chucked a chocolate frog she'd been eating at him. The headless frog stuck to his forehead for a second and then leapt into his hair, which sent the boy into an unhappy fit to get it out. The rest of the company burst into laughter. Draco finally caught the bit of charmed chocolate and tossed it at Harry, but the boy wasn't youngest Hogwarts Seeker in a century for nothing and caught it. And promptly threw it at Natalie who squealed when it got lost in her robes. With everyone distracted by Natalie dancing about to shake it loose, Clyde took the opportunity to open two more chocolate frog packages and stuff one down Harry's shirt and other to Hermione's back.

The Chocolate Frog War lasted for nearly ten minutes, until everyone was exhausted from battle and laughing so hard that they could only collapse in their seats. Finally, between fits of giggles, they cleaned up their candy casualties and chocolate smeared selves with a few quick cleaning and banishment charms. And not a moment too soon, for someone opened their compartment to peak inside.

“Are you all alright? I can’t tell if your laughing or being tortured, or laughing as you tortured someone,” a seventh year Ravenclaw boy, looking perfectly serious despite his playful words.

“Oh, McGunny,” Hermione said, recognizing him immediately, “Guys, this is the chief editor for the Hogwarts’ Herald. Horace McGunny, these are my friends and brother. Natalie Cypher, Clyde Houghton, Harry Potter, and Draco Malfoy.”

“Good to meet you,” Horace replied disinterestedly, although his gaze might have lingered on Harry for a moment, “I’m afraid I need to borrow you for a bit, Granger. We’re gathering interviews on what students did on their holiday break. Do you think you could get some from the first years?”

Hermione perked. This would be her first assignment as a reporter rather than a glorified office assistant. She looked towards her friends.

“Go on then,” Draco drawled. “It’s harder to steal your Christmas candy when you’re hovering.”

“I’ll take good care of Harry while you’re gone,” Natalie teased, cuddling up to said boy. Harry, now pink around the ears, nodded his approval. At Hermione, not Natalie.

“Put my Christmas gift to good use, yeah?”

She beamed at them, gathering a notepad and her new quick-quotes quill from her carry-on bag and hurrying off. Clyde chuckled after she was gone.

“Hasn’t even got out of school yet and she’s already on the fast track to becoming a professional story finder. Watch out Harry, she might give even you a run for your money.”

Natalie and Draco rolled their eyes.

“Nonsense. Harry’s not a story finder,” Draco pointed out. Natalie nodded in agreement.

“Harry’s a story maker. They’ll be natural enemies before long.”

Harry frowned, shaking his head.

“We’re best mates. I’d do anything for her.”

The two Slytherins shared shrewd expressions.

“Anything is a big word. I wouldn’t ever use it in a promise, if I were you,” Natalie said evenly. Harry met her skepticism with a confident smirk. He said what he meant and he meant what he said. Hermione and he would always be friends, no matter what forces tried to tear them apart.

It was an oath to himself, as much as it was her.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

While Harry and his friends enjoyed their time together, Tom smiled and laughed and plotted the painful demise of the sycophants who had latched onto him since he’d boarded the train. He had nothing against blind adoration directed at his person, but his current batch of followers had developed a rather unflattering sense of entitlement. More specifically, they felt entitled to touch him (a friendly pat on the shoulder, a little poke to get his attention, and ugh hugging), and knowing about his past and future plans.

“Delphia, I assure you, I didn’t do anything interesting this holiday. My parents were away on business. I spent Christmas with the house elves,” he said smoothly, shrugging off her hand from his shoulder.

Across from him, a sixth year boy leered stupidly at them.

“Oh, come on, Thomas, you’re saying you didn’t have a holiday fling? If your parents were gone like you say, surely you took the opportunity to have a little fun.”

“Don’t be crude, Jorgenson,” Tom dismissed gently. In truth, he had entertained a few witches and one very charming vampire over the holiday, but he wasn’t about to share the specifics with these imbeciles.

Brian Jorgenson was parasite through and through, siphoning off his older brother’s popularity as Head Boy and his own fiancée, Evelyn Hughes, who was the second most popular sixth year girl in Slytherin. Evelyn was pretty, but a ninny in comparison to most of her House, and too easily manipulated by the boy. Even now she simpered stupidly with Jorgenson’s arm around her shoulders as he ogled her ‘best friend’, Delphia Bellfeldt practically shoving her breasts into Tom’s arm. Belladonna and Aminitas Greystone, fraternal twins, were absorbed in painting each other’s toenails black and basking in their own narcissism.

They all had their uses, but at the moment Tom was having difficulty remembering what they were. His thoughts kept drifting to Hogwarts, his plans, and the one person in all the world he truly wished to see. Soon, everything was going to come together.

He’d made certain of that.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

From the baggage cart of the Hogwarts’ Express, the sound of faintly shifting luggage was drowned out by the monotonous clamor of the great engine. A ragged looking rodent squeezed itself out from the trunk of one ‘Thomas M. Rook’ through a small hole it had chewed in the corner, sniffed curiously at the air, and turned into a man.

“I’m too old for this,” Pettigrew muttered, straightening out the clothes he hadn’t felt for nearly two weeks. He felt his face to make sure he hadn’t forgotten his whiskers or teeth in the transformation. After re-familiarizing himself with his human body, he closed his eyes to concentrate.

Bristol. The secret entryway.

And with a loud 'pop', he was gone.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It was just before sunset when the students filed into Hogwarts in well-ordered chaos. The weather had been cloudless and sunny, but colder than they were used to with a sharp, incessant wind. Everyone was glad to reach shelter and file into the Great Hall for hot chocolate and ciders and seasonal teas. The castle had already been stripped of its yuletide decorations, and everyone felt a bit melancholy at the official end of the holidays.

Everyone, it seemed, except for Hermione who was still blissfully ambushing random first years. Now, however, she was being accompanied by one Collin Creevey, flashing his camera every so often when a student exhibited a particularly interesting gift or an emotional reunion with their circle of friends. The break had done much to restore Hogwarts' comradery, and many who hadn't even been on speaking terms during the 'Curse Epidemic' were now chatting excitedly with each other and comparing stories and presents and New Year's resolutions.

Harry found himself the center of attention of a group of girls who had seen his picture in the newspaper a couple times over the break and were eagerly questioning him. A school reporter was amongst them, and he found himself being bullied into an interview. It wasn't as bad as he thought it would be, mostly because she tended to have a story already in mind when asking her questions so he didn't have to make one up on the spot. The fact that her story was a little too sugar coated and inaccurate was not really of concern to him. It certainly beat trying to convince Hermione of what happened.

At some point, the Weasley twins abducted his interviewer and began regaling her with tales she hadn't asked for of their negotiations with Santa to return the coal they'd received for a new goat (they were very specific about the type of goat they wanted right down to its curly third horn) and their experiments with eggnog and their foster mother.

Ron made a brief appearance during a conversation between Harry and Ginny, but aside from a obnoxious little smirk, hadn't bothered him. The Gryffindor Seeker was still busy pondering the change in behavior, when Headmistress Lestrage burst into the hall and went immediately to her podium.

"Attention students," she began, her voice cutting through conversation like a machete. "There has been a small accident with one of the first years. He isn't hurt badly, but I will require you to return to your dormitories for the evening. Prefects if you would please take charge of your classmates and escort them back to the commons?"

She immediately left the podium and disappeared through a side door, leaving the students confused and without answers to a great many questions. Yet within moments the Prefects and several teachers who had appeared out of nowhere managed to herd everyone into their own House assigned groups.

Harry had just shuffled into the Gryffindor Common Room when he realized that Hermione and Collin weren't with them.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I'm sorry, Harry, but there isn't anything I can do," Percy said sternly. "McGonagall has already sealed the entry way. I can tell her that Hermione and Collin are missing when she gets back, but I don't know when that will be."

The Common Room was crowded and noisy, everyone equally ignorant of what was happening and some how believing discussion would work in the place of actual facts. Many of them were watching the exchange of Gryffindor's Black Cat with one of the prefects in increasing interest.

"That's not good enough! They only mentioned a boy, who is probably Collin, but they didn't say anything about a girl. What if they don't even know Hermione is out there? What if something happened to her?!" Harry shouted, frustrated that Percy didn't seem to understand the severity of the situation. But then, perhaps he didn't. Who other than Harry and the professors knew about the monster roaming the halls?

"Harry, calm down and be reasonable. Hermione's a clever girl, and the professors are perfectly competent. I'm sure they've found her by now if she was ever missing. Did you ever stop to think she was the one who reported Collin's accident?"

The condescension in the prefect's voice threw the already frustrated Harry over the edge.

"YOU'RE A BLOODY STUPID TWAT, PERCY!"

He stalked away, parting the crowds like Moses at the Red Sea and leaving the Weasley prefect stuttering in his indignation. No doubt he'd just earned a detention, but that was the least of Harry's worries. He rushed to the second year dorms and went straight to his trunk, hoping to find something that would help him.

Text books, personal books, his sketching journal, the secret box he still hadn't been able to open, the large sketch pad Natalie had given him, art supplies, school supplies, Hermione's magic bell, his Baluvian cloak, Sirius' necklace wrapped in unmagicked leather, a deck of magic cards, candy, his school clothes, Quidditch and Dueling magazines, a couple bottles of healing salve he'd made in Potions, and absolutely nothing that was going to help him get out of the dorm. The only exit he knew of was through the Portrait of the Fat Lady, and unless he could transfigure something into a flying broom and jump out a window, he didn't see any means of escape.

"Harry!"

The frustrated Gryffindor looked up to see Clyde and the twins rushing in, a rather devilish look sending the few other Gryffindors there scurrying for the exit. Fred (George?) cast a Silencing Charm on the door.

"What?" he snapped, suspecting an abysmal attempt to cheer him up when what he really needed was to find Hermione.

“Happy New Year to you too, mate,” Clyde grouched, but was ignored as the twins sat themselves on either side of their idol.

“Got something for you, Lord Chaos. We think you’ll find it useful,” George (Fred?) said, handing him a piece of parchment. Harry accepted it curiously, opened it, but found it was completely blank. He scowled.

“Now isn’t the time to be playing jokes. Hermione could be in serious danger, you know?!” he snapped, getting up to stalk off again, but they both grabbed him by his arms and dragged him back down.

“So impatient today! We know this is serious!” Clyde said, then pointed his wand at the parchment over Harry’s shoulder. “I solemnly swear that I am up to no good!”

Before Harry could question the odd phrase, the parchment before him suddenly wasn’t so blank anymore. Lines began to form walls, which in turn formed hallways, towers, staircases, rooms, and... secret passages. And right there, was tiny little trap door leading out of Gryffindor tower.

“Is that?”

“Yep,” Fred said smugly. “I haven’t been through that one personally. It’s in the First Year Girl’s dormitory. We’ll set off the alarms, but at this point I don’t think that’s going to matter much.”

“We?”

“You don’t expect us to let you wander the halls alone with a big scary monster scuttling about, do you?”

“You could get suspended for this.”

The twins shared an amused look, one their foster nephew didn’t appreciate.

“She’s my friend too, Harry,” Clyde said, seeming to steel himself for something painful. Harry gave him an assessing stare, but remembered time was not on their side. He pulled the magic bell and the Baluvian cloak from his trunk, and then headed towards the stairs.

“What are all these dots?”

“People, their labeled, see? Collin’s in the hospital wing, but we couldn’t find Hermione. She’s either outside the castle, in a room or corridor that hasn’t been mapped, or... well”

A nauseous quiver ran through him, but he forced his mind on what needed to be done and what he could do to achieve that.

“Clyde, I want you to stay here,” Harry said, “Seal the trap door after we leave. We’ll knock twice, wait a moment and then knock three times when we want you to let us back in. That’s the password.”

“No way, Harry, I’m coming too!”

Harry shook his head. “I need you to stay here in case a teacher or Hermione comes back. Percy and the other prefects are clueless. You’re one of the few with half a clue about what’s going on in Hogwarts.”

“What about Fred or George?!”

“No one will take what they say seriously.”

“Hey!” the twins objected in unison, then shared a ‘well, he has a point’ look.

“Listen, we don’t have time for this. Just trust me, ok?”

Whether Clyde agreed or not wasn’t an issue as all four marched straight into the First Year girl’s dormitory. Instantly, an atrocious wailing sounded, followed shortly by the startled shrieks of several girls.

“What the bloody hell are you doing?!” screamed one girl over the siren. Ginny was there too, stunned as the rest of them, but quickest to recover.

“What’s going on, Harry?” she shouted, whispering impossible over the wailing.

“I’m going to find Hermione!” he yelled back, tearing away a large rug from the floor to reveal nothing but blank floor. The twins shouted out a Revealing Charm, and grooves appeared in the floor, along with a hole just big enough to reach a few fingers into. Clyde pulled it open, and Harry and twins disappeared inside before anyone could stop them.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The trapdoor released them into a large storage closet, and after a few awkward moments of shoving around cleaning supplies with only the light of their glowing wands, they exited into a corridor. The twins took a moment to murmur a simultaneous ‘wicked!’ when Harry’s cloak turned from pitch black to the dim gray of the surrounding stones, before quickly following the running Gryffindor towards the Great Hall.

“Where are we going?” Fred (George?) asked.

“The map says Snape is a few corridors over. I just have to tell him about Hermione. He’ll know where to look.”

The same place Harry knew to look, but wouldn’t risk going alone nor could he take Fred or George. The Contract was still in effect, and if he tried to take them down to the secret chamber, who knew what would happen? Would he become perpetually lost? Fall into a coma? He didn’t know and didn’t want to find out.

“Just don’t show him the map, ok? We’d kind of like to keep it out of the hands of authority, ya know?”

“That’s fine. It wouldn’t help him find Hermione, anyway... Here, you guys take it. There’s no point for all of us to get into trouble for sneaking around. Hide somewhere and keep watch. If you spot... something strange on the map, come and find us again. But whatever you do, don’t go playing hero. I know what it is... and it’s not something you’d ever want to find you.”

The twins shared a significant look, but merely nodded and gave him a quick salute and went off to hide. Harry took a deep breath and went to find Snape. It didn’t take long to find him. They practically ran into each other turning a corner, a quick duck was the only thing that saved Harry from a very nasty hex.

“POTTER! WHAT THE BLOODY HELL ARE YOU DOING OUT HERE?!”

Snape snatched up the boy his arm, giving him a harsh shake. Harry cringed, terrified to find that the potion’s master in a rage was worse than even his silent malice.

“Ouch! Stop, I-”

“I swear to God Potter if you’ve dragged my goddaughter or any of your little friends into the halls with you... Is anyone else out here?!”

The young Gryffindor flinched at another harsh shake.

“No! But I have to-”

“No, Mr. Potter, you don’t have to anything but shut up and come with me. You’re going to get such a beating after this is over-”

“HERMIONE’S MISSING!”

The Snape drew back, dropping Harry’s arm in alarm.

“What?”

“She didn’t get back to the dormitory with the rest of us. By the time we realized she wasn’t there, McGonagall had already sealed the entryway and left. She was with Collin Creevey before his ‘accident’!”

Pallid already, Snape’s minimal color drained to an almost luminescent white. He grabbed Harry’s arm again.

“We’re going to the Headmistress’ office.”

The quick stride Snape adopted gradually increased until they were both actually running, Harry was barely able to keep up with the man, until they reached the gargoyle guarding their destination.

“Salamander,” Snape barked, and the rotating staircase opened to greet them. The potion’s master turned to Harry. “Stay here. You will be safe as long as you remain in this corridor. If you so much as twitch from this spot, I will make you intimately acquainted with the many and varied torture devices that qualify the bowels of this castle as a dungeon and not just an oversized basement.”

Snape disappeared up the staircase, which closed after him. The stairs hadn’t even stopped rotating close before Harry was sprinting up them. He pulled the Unsilencing from his robes and pressed the mouth of it to the sealed entryway and his ear to the other end. He could hear voices easily and clearly, as if he were right in the room.

It certainly didn’t hurt that Snape and the Headmistress appeared to be yelling at each other already.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“NO! Absolutely not,” Lestrangle hissed, pacing in front of a series of maps depicting Hogwarts and the wards that had been set. The girl’s lavatory in the dungeon was glowing red, signaling the activation of the sealing ward at the entrance to the Chamber of Secrets, and on another map a section of the Forbidden Forest was similarly alight.

“We know it’s already trapped, and I’m not going to risk letting it out because you have a grudge to settle. It’s stupid. We will wait for the Dark Lord like we agreed before the little tart went and got herself killed.”

Snape grit his teeth.

“We do not know she is dead yet. Besides, the wards are meaningless now. They’ve obviously been tampered with. There was no way for the basilisk to have gotten Creevey in that particular hallway without setting off the traps. Not to mention the wards indicated that the basilisk entered the Chamber through the girl’s lavatory, not left it and then re-entered it. Someone let it in through either the front entryway or one of the windows, both of which should have been sealed through the holidays and thus been impossible. If we do not kill it now it is going to escape again!”

“Don’t be a fool, Severus. Obviously, it just hid itself somewhere in the school that we overlooked and came out. This is about Granger. Your goddaughter is dead. You failed her. Deal with it.”

He snarled out something savage and perhaps even obscene by the Headmistress’ sudden flush, and then stormed out of the office. Lestrangle smirked as he disappeared from view, positively smug with how things were turning out. Admittedly, their Lord wouldn’t be pleased with the loss of another student, but she was only a mudblood and the capture of the basilisk was ultimately more important. Frazzling Snape was just icing on the cake. No doubt the Dark Lord would be disgusted with Snape’s current frame of mind and his reckless idea to re-open the Chamber. Perhaps she’d even get to see him ‘crucio-ed’.

Her smirk dropped quickly, when Snape suddenly reappeared.

“Harry’s gone.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry ran as fast as he could through the halls, the hood of his cloak pulled over his head, his only gesture towards stealth. It may have already been too late. Hermione was probably gone, dead and eaten by that monster, but he didn't know. He had to know, and if his fears were true then he would make it pay. Fear and anger swam in his veins like shark, all power and teeth and base predatory instinct.

He knew he didn't have long before Snape or Lestrangle managed to catch up with him, but descending into the bowels of the castle he passed the girl's lavatory for an important side trip to the potion's lab. The door wasn't locked, and Harry went straight for the supply cabinet, which was ... but only long enough for Harry's desperation blasted the entire door from its hinges. He was in and out within five seconds, a bezoar clutched firmly in his hand. He didn't know if it would do any good against a basilisk bite, but if Hermione was still alive it may save her life. It might even save his.

He sprinted for the door.

And ran straight into the person he was least expecting. Tom caught him by his shoulders just before Harry smashed into him, saving and capturing him in a single move. The Slytherin's green eyes narrowed in anger.

"What are you doing here, Harry?" he hissed. "You're suppose to be in your Commons Room."

A strange sense of deja vu passed over Harry, but he shoved it away just as he shoved Tom away.

"I'm sorry, but I don't have time for this! I have to go!"

Tom caught Harry by the wrist as he tried flee again, and dragged him further down the hall.

"Absolutely not! It's dangerous out here. I'm taking you to the Slytherin's Commons Room."

"NO! Let go!"

Harry tried to bolt towards the lavatory but Tom's grip tightened painfully, causing him cry out in pain. The older boy jerked him forward, furthering the distance between him and his destination. When Harry tried to get passed him yet again, Tom drew his wand.

“Stupefy!”

Harry flinched, expecting the affects of the spell to overpower him instantly. Instead, he felt Tom’s grip on his wrist loosen and the Slytherin fell to the floor. Stunned, or rather not stunned, Harry blinked down at him stupidly.

“Harry!”

He looked up to see the twins racing towards him, winded and nearly out of breath.

“How did you find-”

Fred (George?) held up the map and grinned, between wheezes.

“Something cooky seemed to be going on, so we followed you! Hurry up, Snape will be here any second!”

Harry didn’t need to be told twice.

“Stay here and protect Tom!” he shouted when they started to follow. They looked ready to object, but when Harry flipped up his hood again, following him was no longer an option.

He had disappeared.

They turned to each other, sighed, and then turned to the boy they had stunned.

“What do you suppose he’s doing out here?” Fred asked, crossing his arms.

“Nothing good, I’ll wager,” George agreed, mimicking the gesture.

“Come on, we’ll ‘protect’ him in the potion’s lab. Don’t fancy Snape popping up while we’re standing here.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Lestrangle and Snape entered the lavatory, both dismayed to find the secret entrance was wide open. The headmistress let out a hiss of frustration, cursing the stupid Gryffindor and his suicidal notion's of bravery. Snape saved his already limited breath and went straight for the entrance.

"What are you doing, Severus?"

"Isn't obvious? I'm going to get Potter and kill that bloody overgrown lizard while I still can. Unless you want to wait till the Dark Lord arrives and kills us both for your incompetence. Now go back to your office and deactivate the wards. If Potter or I am injured, we will need to leave quickly."

"I don't-"

But Snape had already disappeared, leaving the Headmistress with no options but to do as he had instructed or face the Dark Lord's wrath alone.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The tunnels leading to the chamber were cool, eerie, and the great abundance of water originating from the lake was icy cold. Every drop of water, every gentle tap of a falling footstep, and ones own breathing echoed into the darkness for what seemed like miles, so that what may have been falling rock from behind sounded as if it could of come from anywhere, even right behind you. Even as a renown Dark Wizard with a reputation for stoicism in the worst of conditions, Snape would freely admit that he did not like this place.

Luckily, he caught up to Harry fairly quickly. He had the benefit of exploring the Chamber once before while searching for the Basilisk with the Dark Lord, as opposed to Harry who was wandering seemingly blind. Or at least, Snape had assumed blind. However, when the light from his wand finally fell upon Harry's shadowy form, the reflection off the boy's glasses were a strange orange color.

The boy had cast a Thermal Imaging Charm on his glasses, allowing him to see in terms of heat rather than light, just as a snake would. More importantly, that sort of sight would render the basilisk's deadly gaze utterly useless.

Oh, that was clever.

He'd applaud the boy, but he was going to kill him first, so that seemed a rather superfluous gesture.

He was about to snarl out something, but the boy put his finger to his mouth and then pointed towards his ear. Snape's words caught in his throat. The boy was a parselmouth and would be hearing things the potion's master had no privy to, things inaudible to any human ear save two... possibly three?

Harry tilted his head, turned it partially, like a rodent of some kind trying listen for a predator. Then he spun full around towards the direction they'd been going, and then back again, sprinting towards Snape.

"It knows we're here," Harry whispered, but it echoed loudly in the tunnels.

"Frigorio!" Snape hissed, flourishing his wand, and then followed after Harry's retreating form. "We can't go back the way we came. I don't know if the wards have been completely removed or only partially, but we can't risk being trapped. The tunnels around here all circle back to the main chamber. Just follow the flow of-"

WHOOMPH!

The fire trap Snape had set activated, setting off an explosion that rocked the ground above and beneath them, sending fragments of rocks raining down dangerously. He heard Harry cast a shield charm and prepared to do the same, but the tunnel ahead of him collapsed altogether, knocking him in to ankle deep water.

“Harry!”

A wall of rubble now laid before him, blocking his movement forward just as the explosion no doubt blocked his movement backwards. He could easily blast it away, but that could cause even more tunnel collapse, perhaps burying himself just as he may have inadvertently buried Harry.

“Harry?”

There was a tense moment of silence, and then a weak, but welcome cough.

“I’m still here. Are you ok?” came a muffled reply. The boy was on the other side of the wall, apparently unharmed enough to be concerned for his reviled potion’s master’s well-being.

“I’ll live. Stay where you are, do you hear me Potter?”

“Um...” there was a rather telling hesitation. “Yes, but...”

“Potter, don’t you dare even think about-”

“Gotta find Hermione. Be right back!”

“Potter! Potter?! GET BACK HERE YOU LITTLE... heart attack waiting to happen...” he trailed off as the footsteps faded.

Snape sighed in frustration, unable to do anything. He tried something he hadn’t tried in long time. He thought positively.

Well, really, what was the harm now? Chances are that explosion had blown the basilisk to tiny little bits, or even better the handler. And Harry was a parselmouth, certainly he could handle a snake. A giant man-eating snake with venom so deadly it could eat through your skin like hydrochloric acid, but a snake nonetheless.

It was Potter. He’d figure something out.

Hopefully...

Optimism was for idiots, he decided.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry ran as quickly as he could, which was considerably less quickly than he'd been going earlier when he's started running around like a lunatic. His body was sweaty and chilled at the same time, his fur cloak only making things worse. Snape's arrival had been expected, and once he was inside the tunnels, rather welcome as well. The possible death of the basilisk was well worth the trouble he had just landed himself in... he hoped anyway.

A sudden gust of wind from up ahead gave him pause. He pulled out his pocket watch, which until he had entered the secret passage had been utterly useless in locating his friend.

"Hermione," he whispered, casting a Lumos and pulling down his glasses to read the blurry outline of the watches' hand pointing ahead of him. The watch wouldn't have worked if Hermione were dead. A thrill of hope ran through him, and with renewed energy he sprang forward. The tunnel opened up into a larger tunnel, which in turn ran straight into enormous chamber.

Harry's eyes widened as he let his glasses slip to the tip of his nose, taking in the strangely beautiful juxtapose of natural cavern and master masonry. A wide walkway was banked by pools of inky water and enormous statues of serpents. Ahead of him was the carved face of a bearded man in Assyrian style or was that really what Salazar Slytherin had looked like in his later years?

He slipped back on his glasses, and his gaze was immediately drawn to the blob of bright yellow and pink. Scanning his surroundings briefly, he hurried over to the base of the stone face and found Hermione laying in a shallow pool of water.

"Hermione!"

His hands felt the gentle throb at her throat and the faint puff of warmth from her mouth, feeling the presence of her life even though her blue tinted skin implied the chill of death. A half laugh of relief, and he pulled her lax body to a dryer spot, cast a warming spell, and wrapped his cloak around her. He prodded her gently, trying to waken her but she remained utterly unresponsive but for the faint shivers running through her. A spell or the onset of hypothermia? Either way, he needed to get her to the infirmary fast.

And then there was a sound. A familiar, irritating sound, that in this dark place filled him a horrifying dread.

“Hem, hem.”

Book II:

Chapter 40: Toad Venom

Harry stood and turned slowly. Through his bespelled glasses he could see the yellow and orange form of a stout woman. He may not be able to distinguish her facial features, but that phlegmy cough was unmistakably Dolores Umbridge. The enormous green and yellow body of the basilisk's cooler body slithered into the chamber soundlessly and came to a stop behind her. It was huge, larger than he had ever considered a serpent to be without being labeled a dragon.

That's what lives under the school? What was Voldemort thinking?!

"Oh my, this is certainly unexpected," the toady woman twittered, "Shouldn't you be in your dorm, Mr. Potter?"

He scowled, more pieces falling into place. The basilisk hadn't appeared until after Umbridge had been brought to the school, and then it was to guard McNair, a former Death Eater who probably had some knowledge of the Chamber. But how had she managed to glean it from him with the contract in effect? Had McNair been a willing participant or a victim himself?

"Shouldn't you be dead, Madam?" he replied coolly, indicating the lethal beast behind her.

"Now, young man it's rude to answer a question with a question, although not nearly as rude as stopping by unannounced. I'm afraid you'll have to be punished. But first, where is Granger?"

Harry barely caught himself turning right to his friend, now concealed by his cloak and the statue. Apparently, both had arrived just after he'd concealed her.

"I woke her up, and sent her back down the tunnel. She'll reach Snape and tell him everything. If you hurry, maybe you can escape before Voldemort arrives," he bluffed.

Umbridge gave a twittery laugh.

“Oh you silly goose, this is why plotting is left to adults. Children are just so short-sighted. The mudblood and the giant grease spot are trapped here, just like you. My pet here will dispatch everyone shortly, and we will sneak out the back way. When the Dark Lord arrives, he’ll find nothing but corpses.”

The basilisk made a pained hiss and shuddered, twitching uncomfortably and nearly bumping into the woman, who inched away with a belied nervousness.

“It hurts!” the masculine hiss cried, “Theysss burned me! I can’t sssee! I can’t sssee! Heal me!”

Umbridge cast a cautious look at her servant, and indeed it appeared the trap spell Snape had laid had done great damage. The head of the serpent was charred black and bits of flesh torn away. Worst of all, however, was the absence of the monster’s greatest weapons. The eyes had either burst from the heat of the explosion or the eyelids melted shut.

No matter. It’s venom and sheer size was lethal enough for one last slaughter before she killed the thing herself. It had been useful, but ultimately she had known she would have to destroy it. Oh, well.

From her fuzzy pink purse she pulled out a device, that to Harry looked like nothing more than a child’s kazoo made of silver. It’s purpose became clear, when Umbridge put it to her mouth and started to speak... in Parseltongue.

“There, there, darling. Soon, I will fix you,” she cajoled, before speaking to Harry again in English. “Really, your arrival is most convenient. I was going to leave you out of this, but when You-Know-Who finds your mutilated corpse he won’t just fire Lestrage, he’ll kill her. Oh, yes, this is most convenient. And then, in a few days, I’ll cleverly uncover the true culprit and kill the basilisk all on my own. He’ll be so pleased he’ll promote me for sure! Headmistress of Hogwarts or even a Court Judge. So many marvelous possibilities, and I have so many plans. Such marvelous, marvelous plans!”

Disgust and anger welled up in Harry, the culmination of months of grief and stress and fear found to be rooted in nothing more than the ambitions of this thing.

“You..,” he growled, “You murdered Sweetey so you could get a better FUCKING JOB?!”

Umbridge rolled her eyes (not that Harry could actually see that).

“Children, honestly! I’m so glad I never had-”

“Petrificus totalis!”

Quick as lightening, Umbridge brought up a shield charm to block the curse and readied one of her own, but Harry had ducked into the open mouth of the statue and into a small antechamber.

“Kill him! He’s the one who hurt you!” he heard Umbridge hiss, and quickly ran deeper inside. The antechamber, unlike the rest of the Chamber, was not cold, but hot and humid, the floor layered with plant debris, old snake skins, and animal bones. The ceiling was lower, making the area seem almost cramped despite being two stories high on its own. The most striking thing Harry noticed was eggs. Two rows of twelve eggs the size of footballs (English version) lined the walls in individual nests, a yellow fairy light hovering just above each. On closer inspection, Harry could see four eggs were missing. So this place held a back-up supply of basilisks? Ugh.

Harry moved to the back of the lair, selecting the narrowest of three tunnels he found there, and ran inside.

“Contraho!” he shouted, flinging out his wand, forcing his magic as strongly as he could. The stone walls groaned and crumbled in protest as they began to contract around the entrance, narrowing it even further. The basilisk head speared through the opening suddenly, its fangs bared as it made to strike its prey. Harry jumped back, but tripped on a stone.

Death, fanged and monstrosly snapped... missed, barely, leaving Harry to crawl and stumble away as the basilisk struggled to free itself in the now too narrow tunnel. Now distanced and relatively safe, he tried to reason with it.

“Stop! Stop! I’m not your enemy! I didn’t do this to you! That woman is a liar!”

Yet the snake did not seem to hear or perhaps didn’t care. Thrashing about madly, Muchalinda tried to move forward and then finally backwards where he had more success. He retreated into the antechamber and then through another tunnel, retreating to hunt down its prey through another route.

Harry, meanwhile, cursed. The basilisk had been right there! He could think of half a dozen spells he could have used to destroy it right there, but no he had to reason with it. Arg! Stupid, stupid, stupid!

But he didn’t have time to berate himself. He had left Hermione in the main chamber with Umbridge, and if that giant toad found her Harry didn’t want to think what would happen. He had to get Hermione and get back to Snape somehow. All of them together would be able to fend off Umbridge and her overgrown pet, at least until help arrived. Perhaps if he could even stun Umbridge, what ever spell she had cast on the basilisk would fade and he could convince it to leave them alone?

Casting a Silencing Charm on the nest room and placing the UnSilencing Bell to his ear with his free hand, he cautiously moved back inside and towards the exit. He was only half way to the exit when the basilisk re-emerged from another tunnel, and froze. The snake luckily, had paused as well. It flickered its tongue, tasting the air curiously.

“What hasss it done?” the snake questioned itself, “I can’t sssee or hear itsss now. But ohhh... I can tsssste itsss!”

Harry rushed to one side of the nest, crouching behind an egg, hoping it would move on again. If he cast a spell in here and it wasn’t strong enough to instantly kill the basilisk, the inevitable biting and thrashing might kill him instead. The giant monster flickered its tongue repeatedly, gradually turning towards where Harry hid and moving hesitantly forward. Harry moved backwards steadily as he headed towards the narrow chamber again.

The basilisk seemed to sense his plan though, for it suddenly moved swiftly, not towards Harry, but towards the tunnels, blocking each one with its massive body.

Shit. It's smart.

His only option now was to go the direction he'd been heading in the first place, but if the basilisk rushed him then he'd have no where to go but straight and the hunter was much faster than he was. Nor could he stay where he was with the monster gradually tasting out his location. He'd have to distract it, and then make a run for the nearest available exit.

But how?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Fred let out a pained moan, lifting his hand to his aching head and found it wet.

"George?" he called shakily, sitting up. He was still in the potion's lab, hidden between two lab stations. The floor was cold, uncomfortable, and smeared with red on grey. He eyed the bloody pool where his head had been and the matching hand print beside it oddly, disconcerted when he couldn't find anything funny about it. "George?"

"Here," came an equally weak reply. After a moment, George managed to pull himself up from behind another lab station, a slash across his nose and forehead still leaking. "You okay, Gred?"

Fred blinked, managed a shaky grin and climbed the rest of the way to his feet.

"Fine, Forge. What's another head injury?"

“Just another personality improvement waiting to happen,” George replied, then tilted dangerously, nearly falling over again. He caught himself and set himself on a stool.

“We can be improved? I don’t believe it.”

Fred moved to sit beside his brother, took a deep breath, and assessed the damage. The class room was almost completely intact, a few over turned stools and their own blood the only signs of a struggle. They themselves seemed to have suffered nothing more than a few nasty blows to the head... as if that wasn’t enough. Their prisoner was long gone.

“Where do you think Rook went?” Fred asked.

“Either to get a teacher to snitch on us or after Harry probably...”

“Do you think Harry’s alright? Do you suppose he found Hermione?”

“... it’s Harry.”

Which was basically another way of saying the young Gryffindor was causing things no one, even his two greatest devotees, could even conceived of happening. George grimaced and climbed back to his feet.

“Come on. We have to get out of here before someone finds us.”

Fred nodded, helping his brother remain steady on his feet while the other took out the Marauder’s Map to search for the best available exit.

“Uh oh...”

“What?”

“Hurry, Fred. We have less than a minute before we find ourselves surrounded by every teacher in Hogwarts.”

Fred let out a curse and dragged his twin to the door.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Sustineo! Sustineo! Sustineo!”

After almost twenty Support Spells, Snape was feeling both drained and anxious. The tunnel was no longer in danger of collapsing, but the spells had cost both time and energy. Potter had been gone for over fifteen minutes, and he had heard voices and shouting distantly. Had one of them been a scream?

Sweaty and breathing heavily, he turned his attention to the wall of debris, opting to conserve energy with lighter spells in quick succession. He could not panic and waste precious magical energy before the true battle began, even if every second that passed might mean the death of his goddaughter and god- Gryffindork Meal Ticket.

Stupid Meal Ticket.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Umbridge’s pudgy face twisted into something even pudgier, her impatience finally getting to her. She was perfectly assured of her escape, but the basilisk was proving to be a rather poor Guardian. There were three intruders in the Chamber of Secrets, and not one of them was dead yet. She had some time yet before the Headmistress could, if she had even decided to, take down the wards, which Umbridge had re-done to the best of her ability since that night Snape had left her in charge to attend some party. It would have taken at least an hour, forty minutes now, to undue the things. Just the same, she couldn’t have anyone questioning her absence, nor could she leave with Potter alive. Snape knew nothing and the mudblood had been unconscious the entire time, and though she loathed to let them live, killing Potter would be enough to get her what she wanted.

Tom wouldn’t be happy. Potter’s safety had been one of his few stipulations when they’d agreed to this enterprise. Tom had led her to the Chamber, provided her the Parselflute that would allow her to speak and understand Parseltongue, and ordered the basilisk to obey her. In exchange, she would kill Granger and create havoc at the school. When she became Headmistress, he would be given a suitable (if unofficial) position of power, a teaching position of his choosing after he completed college, and be made Deputy Headmaster shortly after.

Too bad for Tom she had no intention of remaining his lackey. He was clever as far as children went, but she was a full grown witch with no intentions of taking orders from one who was barely even old enough to apparate. The evidence of his plots she had left in McNair's rooms would ensure that neither wizard lived to cause her any more trouble after tomorrow.

First, however, she had to make sure Potter wasn't around to contradict her story.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

On reflection, throwing animal bones at a snake almost twice as large as a dragon, wasn't one of his brightest ideas. Levitating a score of deer (horse? pig? house elf?) skulls towards the tail end had worked for all of two seconds. After that, it's tail had lashed out in a swooping arch, covering half the room a few scant inches above the fragile eggs. Harry, unfortunately, hadn't been on the half of the room the tail didn't reach. His body knocked heavily into a filthy floor, bones snapping (luckily none of his) without a sound upon impact. He lost his grip on both his wand and the UnSilencing Bell, and they disappeared into the debris.

The wind knocked out of him, he frantically searched the surrounding litter for his wand, but it was already too late. The basilisk, having felt it's blow connect, struck.

Everything seemed to slow. In the absolute silence of his spell, Harry was able to focus on sight so much more clearly. The snake's horribly mutilated head, abnormally numerous fangs in a pointed muzzle of a mouth, wove through air and earth as if under water, reminding Harry strongly of a salt water eel.

Monstrous.

I don't want to die. More importantly, he thought, I don't want Hermione or Snape or anyone else to die.

The basilisk's reared up, arching like a swan's neck, before rushing down to bite him in half. Harry's hand closed on something hard and slender, and in the rush of adrenaline he didn't stop to question as he pulled it free of the muck and spun it around to the basilisk.

"Expelliarmus!"

Only to realize it wasn't his wand at all, but a... sword?

Beneath the caked on dirt and rotted vegetation, it still managed to gleam, unruined from what may have been centuries of neglect, and though it wasn't a wand it accepted the up welling of Harry's magic and sent it out.

The Silencing Charm suddenly broke, an ear-shattering shriek filling the den as the basilisk reared back, blood splashing everything as it waved its head back and forth in pain. The splash of liquid to his face woke Harry from his momentary surprise, and sent him scurrying to find his wand. The sword in his hand began to glow as more dirt was shaken free and in moments Harry found what he was looking for. He dashed for narrow tunnel, barely avoiding being creamed twice by the basilisk's furiously lashing tail.

Sword and wand in either hand, he followed the tunnel, turning down smaller tunnels whenever he thought they might lead back towards the main chamber. He was lost within minutes. Most of the tunnels seemed to lead back to themselves or else identical to each other, while others opened up into other chambers. In one such chamber, he found a library. In another a collection of weapons (none of which appealed to him more than the one he already had). Still another held nothing more than a large mirror and... Myrtle?

It wasn't until ten minutes of pointless, frantic wandering did he even think to use his watch-compass. Even then, it took another ten to find his way back to the main chamber, opening up abruptly to dump him into a shallow pool. He tripped and floundered stupidly in ankle deep water for a moment, before pulling himself onto the dry...well, drier... walkway and just lay there. Exhausted.

Umbridge was no where in sight.

Had she left, thinking the basilisk would do its thing? Or was she searching for him? Or Snape and Hermione perhaps? Was she hiding in the shadows even now? What had happened to the basilisk anyway?

He didn't know and he didn't want to find out any of these things. Regardless of the answers he couldn't just stand around. After a moment to catch his breath, he rolled to his feet and made his way back towards where he had hid Hermione. She was still there, still unconscious, though not quite as pale.

"Ah, there she is. Very clever, Mr. Potter."

Not again.

He spun around, a Freeze Hex on the tip of his tongue, but she beat him to it. He didn't hear the spell she cast, but both his sword and his wand flew out of his hands while he himself was thrown in another direction. He landed at an angle, sliding across the slick floor and half way into one of the bottomless pool. His glasses fell away and sank to the bottom. He managed to pull himself out, but now he was freezing cold, unarmed, and almost blind in the dim light of the chamber. Still, he was able to make out a vague pink blur he assumed to be Umbridge.

She let out an exasperated sigh.

"I really didn't want to cast anything on you, Potter. Spells can be traced after all. Oh well, I suppose I'll just let the basilisk eat you. HE'S HERE! COME AND GET HIM!"

And it did come, fast and angry through one of the passages directly behind Umbridge... putting the toady woman right in his path. Too late to consider the basilisk's blindness and rage, she hadn't so much as gasped when it's massive body rushed past her, knocking her into a pool.

Harry heard her splashing and screaming, but any dark joy he might have taken from her predicament was overshadowed by the basilisk's blind attacks, venom filled mouth snapping wildly at the air and quickly moving towards him. If there was any nearby escape, he was too blind to see it and the snake too fast. His one option lay in fighting, however impossible the odds, but he needed a weapon!

"COME!" he cried, hand reaching out into the darkness.

The basilisk heard, sliding into a pool and swimming directly for him, reaching him within moments. For a second time it poised for its strike, yet again Harry found the sword grasped firmly in his hand. More ready, Harry did more than simply swing the sword wildly, but sprang up, catching the basilisk under its throat and using its own momentum to drive it clean into its brain.

The snake, killed instantly, curled and thrashed in a death spasm, pulling Harry into the water yet again. Panicked, he gripped his sword and pulled it from the convulsing body, stabbing it again and again, shoving himself away from it even as it continued to drag him deeper and deeper. His panicked scream came out as nothing but a gurgling release of bubbles.

Darkness was everywhere, and even as he finally pulled himself free he became disoriented. Six ways to swim and only one was the right way. He swam in a random direction, hoping against hope it was the right one. The sword was still in his hand. It glowed in the darkness, yet there was nothing to illuminate.

Pressure and the need to breath finally forced his mouth open, releasing the last of the air in his lung and water rushed in. He convulsed once, twice, then even the light from his sword began to fade...

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry let out a startled gasp, eyes flying open and wincing close again. The darkness was gone, though he was still wet and cold. Above him, the blurry outline of Snape loomed.

“Pro-” he tried, only to twist away an vomit up water.

“Don’t speak, Potter, you’ve just woken from drowning,” the potion’s master said, irritation clear in his voice.

Sorry my dying inconveniences you, Professor.

“Her-Hermione,” he managed between coughs, pointing a shaking hand towards the statue where he had hidden her. Snape left him for a moment, then returned.

“She’s fine. Lets get out of here, then I can punish you from the comfort of my office.”

Harry wanted to protest, but what was the point now? He was right, they needed to get out of this place. While Snape gathered up his unconscious goddaughter, Harry stumbled about the cavern in search of his wand. Luckily, it managed to stay on dry land and in plain view (which meant Harry practically tripped over it before finding it). He managed to summon his glasses from the pool that had nearly drowned him, but was too magically and physically exhausted for much of anything else. He found the sword, once again, resting near where he had been laying. How had it gotten there?

“You were clutching it when I pulled you from the water,” Snape said, eyeing Harry and the sword intensely, a thousand questions running through his head. The basilisk was dead, and if Harry’s wand had been on the other side of the chamber that meant...

How utterly preposterous... and yet.

“Where did you find it?”

Harry turned to him, so utterly pale after everything, green eyes enormous with images Snape couldn't even begin to imagine.

"In its nest."

A shiver ran down Snape's back at the mere implications.

"Bring it then. The Dark Lord will wish to examine it."

"Where's Umbridge?" Harry asked, the woman's absence finally wheedling in past the shock. Snape paused, absorbing the revelation.

"She... is not here. She was the one controlling the basilisk?"

"She wanted to kill Hermione and you, and then kill the basilisk so she could be Headmistress... or something. She was crazy."

Nothing else was said. The fear and horror of the last hour was over, and everything fell back into a semblance of disjointed normalcy. Snape, albeit with an unconscious girl in his arms, was once again a cold and unreadable bastard. Harry got into trouble and was now followed obediently towards inevitable punishment. The grand and mysterious tunnels and chambers of the Salazar Slytherin's secret lair gave way to the grand and more familiar halls of the dungeons.

"Harry! Severus!"

Professor McGonagall was there to greet them the moment they appeared from the girl's lavatory, for once on at a loss on who to check over first; a conscious but battered Harry or an unconscious Hermione with unknown injuries. Flitwick, Toure, McNair, and pretty much the entire teaching staff were there as well, though none quite as quick as her. Snape didn't seem prepared to hand over the girl, so she turned to Harry.

"Harry, are you alright? You're bleeding," she said, brushing lightly against a cut on his forehead. The boy looked at her oddly for a moment, before bursting out laughing.

"You... you..." he laughed, "...should see the... other guy."

Harry's laughter faded into brief hysterical giggles before dying altogether, leaving the boy looking haunted. There was a tense silence as everyone regarded him with varying degrees of alarm.

"He's gone nutty," McNair snorted.

"But not deaf, you fucktard!" Harry snarled, jabbing his sword in McNair's general direction. Everyone leapt away in surprise, except for Snape.

"I believe Mr. Potter has had a bad day and requires a nap... followed by a good spanking. Potter! Give Professor McGonagall the sword."

Harry reluctantly did so, offering what he hoped was an apologetic look. He followed after Snape, who led the procession (sans Flitwick and Vector who were left to guard the girl's lavatory and McNair and Toure who were sent to search from Umbridge in the Forbidden Forest) to the infirmary, where he dismissed all the teachers except McGonagall.

Hermione was quickly settled, although Snape opted not to awaken her until later. She had probably been unconscious since her kidnaping, and why awaken her to a unstable situation? It was kinder to let her sleep for the time being.

Potter was another matter altogether.

Pomfrey quickly had him stripped of his wet clothes, dried, and in hospital pajamas within a minute. Yet it was still long enough to glimpse the enormous bruises on Harry's back, side, arms, knees. There was only a few small cuts on his hands and face, but there were bruises there as well, some of them turning dark purple already. It must have been a fiercer battle than Snape had originally thought.

The medi-witch gave Harry a couple of potions, including a Calming Draught when he kept flinching at her touch, a salve to help with the bruises, and one for pain. She cast a few more diagnostic spells to check for internal bleeding and a concussion, then settled him into bed to rest. The Gryffindor remained awake, however, staring blankly across the other side of the room at Hermione and the petrified Collin Creevey.

After she was done, Poppy was quick to pull both Snape and McGonagall behind a privacy screen. Her expression was uncharacteristically brutal.

“Far be it from me to question the ‘why’s and ‘how’s of what brings patients to my door, but this... this is madness. Potter looks like he’s been fighting Bludgers without a stick in the middle of a lake.”

Snape raised an amused brow.

“What a fascinating image you’ve conjured, Madam. How are they?”

“Miss Granger is perfectly healthy, if a bit chilled. A simple Enervate Spell should awaken her, otherwise she’ll come around herself in a couple of hours. Mr. Potter, however... he’ll recover. There wasn’t any serious damage, although the water in his lungs concerns me.”

“He did drown,” Snape offered, “but I managed to resuscitate him. I’m not entirely sure how long he was in the water, but it was long enough for his heart to stop.”

“Oh Merlin,” McGonagall gasped. Pomfrey took a deep breath.

“Which brings me to what really concerns me. I don’t know what happened to him, but he’s clearly traumatized. Shock is the least of it, though I don’t fancy the fall out when it’s worn off. I want you both watching him closely once he returns to classes, perhaps asking his friends if he’s sleeping properly or appears depressed or easily angered.”

“Do you think it’s really that bad?” McGonagall asked.

“Harry has experience dealing with these sorts of situations. You remember he was kidnaped last year and suffered no after affects,” Snape said, always skeptical when it came to the medi-witch’s fussiness.

“No way to know right now, but... just watch him. He’ll need to talk to someone about what happened eventually.”

“Sooner than he might like,” Snape said, “The Dark Lord will be here any minutes, if he isn’t already.”

Pomfrey scowled, and shook her head.

“No, absolutely not. He’s in no state to have an interview with... him. The shock hasn’t even worn off. Do you want him to be around You-Know-Who when it does?!”

“That... isn’t up to any of us.”

The evil scowls that earned him was enough to tell him exactly what the two witches thought of that little bit of truth.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Umbridge huffed and wheezed and shivered as she stumbled out of the back exit of the Chamber of Secrets, little more than big, dirty hole in the ground, and into the Forbidden Forest. A savage bitter wind lashed at her, and though she had spelled herself dry and warm, it gnawed at her like a living thing.

She didn’t have time to wallow in her own suffering though. She had to escape and quickly. Potter was dead, she believed, but then so was the basilisk. But Snape and Granger lived, and Potter’s body was still intact when she’d seen Snape drag it from the water. It would only take a few quick spells to find the magical signature she had left on him with her Disarming Spell. She had two hours at the most to get out of England before Voldemort sent his Sentinels after her.

Oh, what an utter flop this all had been. If it hadn’t been for Tom being so bloody insistent about killing that stupid mudblood, than her stupid friend Potter wouldn’t have shown up and mucked it all up. She was going to make him pay for that. She was going to make all of them pay.

First, she had to escape though.

She waddled through the dense vegetation, fighting against barren branches that gripped at her hair and clothes like skeletal hands. She batted them away, but still they seemed to reach for her. Alarmed she moving faster, ignoring the scratches and the tufts of hair she lost, knowing all she had to do was get out. She had come this way before, at least a dozen times, yet there had never seemed to be so many obstacles.

Angrily, she lifted her wand, intent to cut and burn away all that blocked her path. The ground rose up violently beneath causing her to lose her balance and her wand, and she would have fallen had those skeletal wooden limbs not suddenly grabbed hold of her and lifted her, dragging her up off the ground and into the trees.

Letting out a terrified shriek, she struggled, but all for nothing as she found herself suddenly high above the ground and right before one Thomas Matthew Rook. The Slytherin Fifth Year glared at her imperiously from a throne transfigured from the limbs of the tree that was currently holding her captive. He was as immaculate and dignified as always, the bitter wind and savage shrubbery not displacing so much as hair.

“You disappoint me, Madam,” Tom drawled. “I would have thought you could kill one little mudblood before I disposed of you, but I see I’ve overestimated you. I suppose I can only blame myself. I should have gone to McNair. At least he was wizard enough to attend Hogwarts, unlike you...”

Umbridges face contorted in rage, but it didn’t last long as he flicked his wand and she found herself plummeting to the ground. She hit heavily and something broke. Maybe everything as she choked on her own blood, the pain too excruciating to even roll over.

Tom dropped before her with the grace of bird.

“I had two very simple rules for you to follow, Madam, of which you’ve obeyed neither. First, you’ve disregarded my order that I should never be implicated in these acts by leaving the original Parselflute I gave you in McNair's room, while you used a copy you made yourself. Did you really think I wouldn't have means to keep track of such things? It's a family heirloom after all."

A flicker of his wand and she was sailing through air and face first into a tree. She must have been knocked unconscious, because a unpleasant rejuvenation spell brought her around choking on her own broken teeth as well as her blood. Tom continued as if he had never paused.

“Then, you make the unforgivable mistake of trying to kill Harry. He still lives only because my Suspension Spell preserved his body long enough for Snape to rescue him. A Stunning Hex would have been sufficient to keep him out of the way, but no... you had to be ambitious.”

Now, Tom didn't even bother with his wand, but kicked her with own foot repeatedly, crushing her already broken bones as she could only lay there and wail in pain and horror. Then he stopped abruptly, lifted his head listen, and then grinned to himself.

“Ah, they’re here. I’ve invited some friends to keep you company, Madam. It took some convincing to get them to come out of hibernation, but when I mentioned how you had released the basilisk into their forest, they became rather... eager to meet you.”

He chuckled darkly, gliding away silently into the darkness. Before he was gone completely, he called out one last time.

“Send Aragog my regards, Madam.”

He was gone, and the worse of her nightmare seemed to have departed, leaving her to slip into death at last.

But then the sound of thousands of little feet on dried leaves filtered into her ears...

[illegible]

Harry didn't sleep at all, even after everyone had left. Instead, he crawled out of his bed and sat beside Hermione, watching her sleep peacefully. It had been a close call today, for the both of them. Had Umbridge merely decided to kill Hermione instead of knocking her unconscious this all would have been for nothing, and even if he had lived he would have lost the most important person in the world to him... again.

But he had saved her. Saved her as he hadn't been able to save his parents, and they would both go on being friends until they were both old and grey and senile. So why was he crying now? Why wouldn't the tears stop? She was fine, she was fine, they were both fine.

Why was he still so afraid she would die?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort did not immediately summon Harry when he arrived at the school. He was sorely tempted, but Snape was strangely insistent that the child be left alone until the end of his investigation. The Dark Lord was tempted to throttle Snape then and there, but relented when the potion's master mentioned the drowning and resuscitation. His protégé deserved a little time to compose himself after that.

But only a little.

The subsequent 'Tour of Destruction' Bella and Severus led him through was interesting enough. The teachers had been busily returning order to the school, informing the students that Collin Creevey and Hermione Granger had accidentally released a pair of boggarts from one of Professor McNair's supply closets. Believing they were being chased by monsters, the second years panicked and ran. Creevey was said to have fallen down a flight of stairs and Granger had ducked into a secret passage and become lost. The students had been returned to their rooms so the teachers could round up the boggarts and find her.

A clever enough story, and one that both children would be able to verify with a little legilimency and memory alteration. Let it not be said that Bella lacked imagination.

She had wanted to alter Harry's memories as well, but Voldemort wasn't ready to commit to that course until he saw the boy himself. What Harry had achieved was... miraculous. Stupid, reckless, and suicidal, but still an amazing feat. He had toured the Chamber alone with Snape as the man recounted what he had seen and what he suspected happened. The basilisk's bloated body now floated in the pool that Harry had been drowned in, and he had it levitated onto the walkway to better examine it. The head was badly damaged by Snape's exploding trap, but it was clear the killing blow had come from the deep puncture wound under the snake's throat. There were other sword wounds as well, on the snout and side of the body, signs of Harry's desperate struggle to escape.

He left Snape to gather venom to make an antidote for the petrified students while he checked the rest of the Chamber. The lair remained mostly untouched except for the Nesting Room, where six eggs had been crushed and were now leaking yoke and partially developed snake fetuses onto the littered floor. Voldemort felt a pang of loss. Basilisks were the rarest of the rare nowadays, and if any others existed outside of the refuge Salazar had made for them he had never heard of them. Such magnificent creatures deserved better.

When Voldemort and Snape returned to the upper levels of the castle, Chief Sentinel Morgan was there to inform them they had found Umbridge. Dead. Eaten by acumentulas no less. They assumed that's how she died. It was hard to say. She'd been liquified from the inside out, after all. The only thing they had found intact was her purse, containing an imitation Parselflute.

It was an ironically fitting end, yet very suspicious. Few people even heard of Parselflutes, let alone had the means to create one from scratch. How had she found the Chamber and how had the idea come to her? Then the acumentula themselves should have been hibernating. Had someone woken them?

McNair was arrested on Voldemort's orders. Umbridge had been sent to guard the man, and as often as they had been stuck together it seemed inconceivable that he wasn't aware of at least some of her activities. Voldemort had an alternative suspect, of course, but McNair's arrest served as a convenient excuse to be rid of the incompetent Dark Art's professor. He had screamed bloody revenge, which was the only amusing thing the Dark Lord found about the situation.

Finally, after the initial reports had been given, Voldemort retired to his private office with the Headmistress and Deputy Headmaster. The sword Harry had used to kill Muchalinda was sitting on his desk, waiting for his expert examination, but he ignored it for the time being in favor of examining his minions.

"We were lucky. Very, very lucky," Voldemort said evenly, the underlying edge in his voice causing both Snape and Lestrange to tense. "All your careful planning would have been for nothing if not for the meddling of one precocious child."

Lestrange was quick to find blame. Snape had been the one to leave Umbridge in charge that night, making it possible for her to fiddle with the wards and let the basilisk back inside, and had also left Harry unsupervised outside her office.

"My Lord-"

All of her accusations were silenced by an angry hiss from the Dark Lord, his eyes flashing crimson.

"I don't want to hear your excuses," he snarled, stalking to the other side of his desk and throwing himself into his chair. "I don't care who you think is to blame. I know where fault lays."

They waited tensely for him to elaborate, but he let them mentally squirm for several moments while he sorted through his desk for appropriate forms and a quill. Finally, he spoke again.

"It was I who hired her. I knew from the beginning she was not to be trusted around children, but assumed the promise of a rise in status would keep her on her best behavior. Apparently her best behavior is that of a pack-stabbing, homicidal bitch. I should have known better. Her service during the war in Ireland was... telling."

Snape and Lestrangle were stunned silent (not that they had much to say in the first place except perhaps 'please don't kill me'). The Dark Lord ignored them as he filled out some of the paperwork, looked it over, and then handed a set of it to each of them.

"I want a full unbiased report of what happened by tomorrow night. You may not see or contact one another before then. For both your sakes I recommend complete honesty. Any inconsistencies I find will be thoroughly investigated. Bella, you need to hire a replacement Dark Arts professor for the rest of the semester. Will the one you hired for next year be ready?"

Lestrangle mentally scrambled for a reply, disconcerted almost beyond reasoning by all that had happened and was happening.

"Ah... yes, I mean no. She still has to complete a contract with some real estate company as a curse breaker until July, but I could probably convince Quirrell to return for the remainder of the semester."

Voldemort nodded.

"Severus I will leave you in charge of brewing the antidote and casting the memory charms on the Gryffindors. I expect you to be thorough."

Snape merely nodded, cringing at the combined task. Memory charms were a tricky affair, and exhausting to the caster. To perform three (possibly four if Harry was included) of them in a row was in no way appealing. The antidote would be challenging as well. It was easier than the Pain Curse, at least.

"Good, I expect everything to be wrapped by the end of the week then. The whole affair has been a nuisance, and I want nothing more than to wipe my hands clean of it."

Just as the Dark Lord seemed prepared to send them away, possibly after a couple of hexings, someone activated the ward requesting entrance. A crystal ball of dark green that appeared as nothing more than a paperweight began to glow and a name floated across its surface. Voldemort frowned curiously.

“Enter,” he commanded.

A figure moved through the wall, cloaked from head to toe in grey fur which was gradually turning colors to match the surrounding decor. It moved slowly and deliberately towards the Dark Lord’s desk and stopped between Snape and a confused Lestrage.

“Harry, why aren’t you resting in the infirmary?” Voldemort asked, half curiosity, half irritation. “Does the medi-witch even know where you are?”

“I left a note,” he said, pulling back his hood.

“Potter,” Lestrage growled, wanting nothing more than to throttle the boy who had humiliated her by succeeding where she had failed. If it hadn’t been for him, even if Umbridge had succeeded, she was certain of her ability to salvage the situation. The death of Severus and the mudblood was hardly a loss to her. His eyes flashed towards her like a Killing Curse, brilliant green and full of hatred. She stepped back, startled.

He had not forgotten or forgiven her for abandoning Hermione for dead.

“Harry.”

The boy’s eyes softened as they turned back to the Dark Lord, who was regarding him with unusual patience.

“What are you doing here, Harry?” he hissed in Parseltongue.

“I... I don’t know. I just figured... I didn’t want to wait for you to summon me.”

Voldemort stared intently into Harry's wide green eyes. They were puffy, likely from crying, bruised, and haunted. Why was the child so sad? Had he not come out victorious? Was he afraid of his punishment for his foolish adventure? Was he afraid the Dark Lord would be angry with him?

Harry had good reason to be afraid. Voldemort had wanted nothing more than to take a pound of flesh after hearing the initial report from Snape of Harry's escape from his dorm and then into the dungeons.

But such a thing seemed superfluous now. The child had been hurt, had died, and certainly been frightened enough during his battle. He was weak now. Punishing him could break him, and that wasn't what Voldemort wanted. Obedience would have to be a lesson for another time.

"I understand," he hissed softly, then turned to the others. "I will look after Mr. Potter, and return him to the infirmary later. You are dismissed."

Snape and Lestrangle turned to leave, but Harry grabbed the potion's master's sleeve as he walked past. Snape looked down in surprise at the intent expression on Harry's face, which so reminded him of someone else from long ago. Someone who had not been James Potter.

"Thank you, Professor," the boy began, "for coming after us. For... saving my life."

Snape said nothing, merely stared back until Harry looked away nervously and down at his shoes. The potion's master smirked.

"I wouldn't thank me yet, Potter. I haven't told you about your detentions. Your many, many detentions."

Harry grimaced, and Snape fought the urge to laugh evilly. Ah, well. After the Dark Lord left. In the meantime, he tugged his sleeve free and stalked past Lestrangle, feeling inordinately pleased all of a sudden. He adjusted his route towards the infirmary to see Hermione, suddenly feeling content.

Really, things could only get better from here. No one had been permanently hurt, except of course Umbridge (and really who cared?), the basilisk was dead, he had gotten away without any harm done to his person, Lestrage was no doubt going to throw herself into conniptions, and he had months of Potter torment to look forward to.

Yes, this was starting out as a fabulous beginning to a new year.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Alone together, Harry and Voldemort wasted little time. The Dark Lord summoned some hot tea for the boy and moved him to the couch, while he sat in the chair across from him. He didn't even have to prompt the boy to start talking, he was already desperate to be out with the story.

"I didn't think I'd find her alive," he said at one point, "Giant snakes don't take hostages, so how could she be alive? I had to try though. She's like a sister to me."

There had been a long moment of silence, the haunted look in Harry's eyes deepening into barely suppressed horror, before he chased what ever mental image or memory he was imagining with a gulp of hot tea.

Voldemort asked no questions, nor did he demand Harry look into his eyes while the story unfolded. This was a confession, more than anything, and the Dark Lord had no reason to doubt the boy's words. There were gaps of course, perhaps to conceal some fellow student's assistance in his escape from his dorm or some secret method used to reach the dungeons faster than his professors, but nothing Voldemort found particularly significant.

"... and then I cast a Disarming Spell, but it wasn't my wand at all. It was a sword."

Here, Harry paused to look over at the weapon laying docilely on the desk. McGonagall must have cleaned it off for it shown sparkling silver with rubies the size of eggs embedded in the hilt.

“Where do you think it came from? I mean, it has to be magical since it didn’t rust in that place, but why hide it there?”

Voldemort wondered that himself, and stood up to see if he might gather some clues. Yet when he reached out to touch it, it sparked violently, singeing his fingers.

“My Lord!” Harry gasped in alarm

“I’m fine. There’s a curse on this sword, a mild one. You say you touched this without harm?”

“Yes. So did McGonagall. I handed it to her in the dungeons.”

“Come here and see if you can still touch it.”

Harry, reluctantly, did as commanded. Nothing happened.

“It must not like you,” Harry said, earning him an annoyed look. Voldemort studied it closely in the child’s hands, though he didn’t try to touch it again. Just below the hilt of the sword a name was engraved that he hadn’t noticed before.

‘Godric Gryffindor’.

“Merlin,” Voldemort breathed out, reached out to take the sword again, but quickly stopped himself. “I don’t believe it.”

“What? You recognize it?”

Voldemort smirked.

“Recognize it? Oh yes, it is a very precious item. This is the Sword of Gryffindor, owned by Godric Gryffindor, one of the four founders of Hogwarts. It’s been lost for centuries.”

Harry blinked in disbelief down at his prize.

“Well... I don’t suppose anyone would go looking for it in a basilisk nest...”

“Unless, they’re a Gryffindor, of course,” Voldemort said, chuckling at the irony. Oh, this was deliciously unexpected. Well worth the destroyed basilisk eggs. And his Harry had found it, or it had found Harry as the case may be.

“What should I do with it?”

Voldemort smiled.

“There are no heirs of Gryffindor, so it would be best to keep it in the school. The Headmistress’ office holds quite the display of Founder’s artifacts. It will be safe there.”

Harry frowned at the thought of handing the beautiful sword over to that woman. Voldemort caught his irritated look.

“The Sword will always belong to Hogwarts, not the Headmistress.”

“Yeah...” Harry conceded, reluctantly.

“If it’s any consolation, I doubt it will like Bella any more than it likes me.”

The Gryffindor smirked. That was, in fact, a very good consolation.

They marveled over the sword for a bit longer, Voldemort providing more history and legends about the sword and then theories about how it may have ended up in the basilisk’s nest (although he never mention his other suspicion that it had sought Harry out specifically). The haunted look receded from Harry’s eyes, to be replaced by wonder and curiosity. The boy’s pale complexion even managed a blush when Voldemort suggested a portrait be painted to commemorate Harry’s defeat of the basilisk.

In fact, though Voldemort only mentioned it to illicit such a response, it was a good idea. Such an adventure that had transpired below the dungeons was the stuff of legends, and a significant event in the history of Hogwarts. Even if Voldemort had to wait a hundred years before he allowed anyone to know the truth of what had happened, he thought it prudent to record it all while the memory was still fresh. The Dark Lord quickly switched topics, setting aside but not forgetting the idea.

After that, Harry's story became a bit more lively. The running and the fighting came out in quick excited descriptions with the occasional gesture to demonstrate how he'd maneuver the sword or when he'd lost his wand yet again. He grew quiet again when he recalled his drowning, and Voldemort fell into his silence as well. This was not a part of the story he particularly cared for, the possibility of Harry's destruction so very close it seemed inescapable, and yet the child rose triumphant with the aid of his own personal guardian, returning from the lair of the monster with the fair princess in hand.

Oh yes, this would all make a marvelous addition to 'Hogwarts a History'. Normally when this sort of thing happened, everybody tended to die or be maimed horribly.

But one should expect greater things from a true prince..

Dear Readers

As you may notice this is not another chapter of 'Prince of the Dark Kingdom'. My computer has been attacked by nasty adware and spyware, rendering it useless for both writing and posting. A friend helped me get rid of these problem, but I had to reboot my system and lost the Corel WordPerfect program I was using to write, making it impossible to open and complete my last chapter of Book II. I hope to find the program online and install it soon so that I can update, but it probably won't get done today. Sorry.

Mizuni-san

P.S. Congratulations to those of you who graduated this last week and in the next few weeks that follow!

Book II:

Epilogue

Hermione looked exhausted when Harry visited her two days after her hospitalization. The stark white of her hospital pajamas made the shadows under her eyes more vivid. That was suspicious in the young parselmouth's opinion, as she could have been released the same day as her abduction but had been held much longer to 'rest' without visitors, except for Narcissa Malfoy.

He had passed the aristocrat in the halls after another failed attempt to see Hermione, and she had stopped him for a few moments. She hadn't said a word, merely pulled him aside gently with a touch to his shoulder. Her expression was neutral, but her eyes were intense when they looked down at him. For the life of him, he couldn't unravel the knot of emotions behind her gaze, but the soft touch on his cheek seemed to convey a sort of gratitude she would not or could not speak.

"I don't know why I'm so tired," Hermione groused, frustrated to have been separated not only from classes but the newspaper as well. She didn't voice her complaints directly, believing her stay practical and therefore beyond reproach, but the lack of mental stimulus didn't sit well with her.

"You're probably just bored," Harry offered, though he didn't believe it himself. "They'll release you tonight or tomorrow for sure. I heard Angelina and Colin will be back in class by third period."

"Oh, that's good," she said, curiosity peaked, "I'm surprised about Angelina though. I thought she wouldn't be back until next April. Did they find some acumantula anti-venom somewhere?"

Harry frowned.

"What are you talking about?"

"You know, the anti-venom?" she said slowly, as if it would make sense if he thought it through. He tried, but unless she was speaking in euphemisms (and it didn't sound like she was), he had no idea what she meant. "To cure the acumantula bite?"

Harry could only stare, until a sudden feeling of dread passed over him.

"Hermione... what do you remember about your attack?"

She huffed and rolled her eyes, impatience clear in her every gesture.

"Harry can me talk about that later? I've had to explain it over a dozen times already, and I'm going to have to explain it a hundred more times to the rest of school when I get out of here. Can we just wait until all of our friends are together? It's not that interesting a story anyway."

Not wanting to provoke her while she was already in a mood, he approached from a different angle.

"... I don't know. I've never seen a boggart before."

She shrugged.

"Lucky you. I thought poltergeists were bad, but that was ten times worse. I'm never going to be able to open a cupboard again without flinching... Harry, are you all right? Did I say something wrong?"

Her friend's expression was suddenly tight, almost pained. He shook his head.

"No, it isn't you. I skipped an appointment and now my watch is burning a hole in my pocket. Sorry, I have to go. I'll see you later."

He was up and out the door before she could even form a possible theory for his abrupt departure, and minutes later she could still think of nothing. Perhaps, indeed, he was running late for an appointment. After all, she couldn't imagine what she might have said to upset him.

It wasn't like he hadn't heard the story of the boggarts before.

Harry's entrance into the potion's lab was loud and melodramatic, and thus rather irritating to the already irritated potion's master. Snape had just finished up a rather abysmal session with his fifth year Hufflepuffs and Ravenclaws, who were still recovering from their holiday sloth and sifting through vials filled with varying shades of red (and in one instance purple, stupid Hufflepuff), when the cheeky little buggler slammed open his door.

Snape cast him a reproving glare, taking in the boy's ruffled and sweaty appearance. He must have run from the infirmary all the way down to the dungeons.

“What did you do?” Harry hissed, lower and more threatening and in Snape’s opinion rather silly. Basilisk slaying aside, the twelve year old had a long way to go before he could intimidate him. He smirked at the child, his eyes fierce in the gloom of his own lair. Predictably, the Gryffindor lost some of his nerve and stepped back a fraction. The door behind Harry slammed shut, startling him badly.

Harry grit his teeth, biting back his initial impulse to swear horrid things at the man.

“She has a right to know the truth. She almost died.”

“And how, precisely, Mr. Potter, do you suppose knowing that would help her in any way? Would the death-that-almost-was ease her heart, clear her thoughts, thrill her? Did your brushes with death leave you a better person? Or is it that you wish her to know that you saved her? Her brave prince come to her rescue. And here I thought your mother’s influence had smothered that Potter conceit.”

“You’re a fine one to talk! Screwing around with our memories and our free will for ‘our own good’! What a load of swill. You did it because it got you and yours off the hook!”

Snape glared pointedly at Harry, then checked his watch.

“Your first punishment wasn’t suppose to be until after dinner, but since you’re here already, why don’t we get started. Expelliarmus!”

Harry’s wand flew from his grasp and straight to Snape, who snatched it out of the air and locked it in a desk drawer in one smooth motion. The young Gryffindor had only a moment to realize the trouble he had landed himself in, before the potion’s master was stalking towards him. He retreated instinctively, but soon found himself trapped at the door. Snape loomed over him, his expression cold and menacing.

“Mr. Potter, despite your precocious behavior, you are twelve, not thirty two or even twenty two. Twelve. A child only. You lack both the experience and the understanding to accept full responsibility over yourself and your actions. If you did, you would have obeyed me when I told you to remain outside the Headmistress’ office.”

“You were going to let Hermione die!” Harry snarled angrily.

“I would have done nothing of the sort!”

Snape flicked his wand at the chalk board and two large red circles appeared about two feet from each other.

“I would have found and rescued my goddaughter without your meddling, regardless of the Headmistress’ orders. Instead, I was forced to pursue you without a true plan or additional assistance.

Take off your robe and your shirt, and place your hands on the circles.”

“What?”

Harry cringed, his anger fleeing in the face of Snape’s unexpected wraith. In his own self-righteous indignation it hadn’t occurred to the boy that his accusations would be met with any sort of retaliation. Before his horrified eyes, he watched Snape transfigure his wand into a bamboo cane.

“I promised you a beating, Mr. Potter. Don’t you recall? I certainly haven’t forgotten. I believe ten lashes should be adequate. Unless you wish to dally, I can always had another five or ten.”

“I saved Hermione!” he objected. Snape wasn’t impressed.

“You died, Mr. Potter. If I had been as apathetic as you had believed or even a mere minute or two late, you would still be dead and so might Hermione. Undress. Hands on the circles. Now.”

There was no talking Snape out of his course, and though Harry felt no regret for his actions he had no choice but to accept punishment for them. With trembling fingers, he unhooked his school robe, his vest, and the white dress shirt underneath, folded them roughly and set them on a lab station. His trembling turned to real shivers as the chill of the dungeon air seeped into his dampening skin. With one last hate fill glare at Snape, he placed his hands on the circles. The potion’s master moved behind him.

“Despite what you may believe, I’m not doing this out of vindictiveness,” Snape said coolly. Harry snorted, and scowled at his hands. “I appreciate what you tried to do for my goddaughter, but she was not your responsibility. You had no right to risk your life for hers.”

Harry twisted back to snap about his right to decide what do with his own life, but the cane came down with a harsh crack, the sudden burning pain robbing him of his words. He faltered, instinctively jerking away, but his hands would not come free of the red spots and he could neither retreat nor turn around. A second strike landed higher up his back brought out a startled yelp.

“Potter, hold still. Retain a little dignity.”

“Why are you doing this? I don’t get it! I don’t understand!” he cried, struggling to get free.

A hand grabbed him harshly by the back of the neck, stilling him instantly. Inexplicably, he was reminded of Voldemort and his random piques of temper.

“Hold still. When we are done I will try and explain it in a way any simpleton or a Gryffindor, which ever is dumber, might understand.”

The painful hold on his neck withdrew, and despite his renewed range of movement, Harry held himself still and tense. He didn’t have to wait long as the third strike landed, followed shortly by another and another. Gritting his teeth, he bore it as stoically as he could, holding his breath lest his choking sobs break free.

It was over faster than he would have thought, and his hands were suddenly free. He leaned heavily on the chalk board, the pain now secondary to a sudden weakness and nausea. Gently, he reached behind himself to touch his back, expecting to feel blood but found only bruises in the making. Snape moved towards him, and he scrambled away quickly

The bamboo cane was gone, his wand out of sight, and in its place he held out Harry’s shirt. The boy eyed him suspiciously for a moment before snatching it out of his hand. His back throbbed at the sudden movement, and protested when he lifted his arms to redress himself, but like hell he was going to ask Snape to help him.

The potion’s master watched Harry critically, determining how well this round of discipline had gone. Not well it seemed. Far from contrite, the child was angry now, perhaps angrier than he had been when he had first arrived. He let the child redress in silence and ignored the less than subtle swipe of sleeve under his glasses.

“Are you calm?”

The glare Harry gave him could have melted stone, but Snape continued anyway.

“Rules are made for a reason, Mr. Potter, as are my commands. We sent the students to their dorms for their safety, and I had you wait in the corridor for your safety. You disobeyed me, and you died. Do you understand that, Mr. Potter? Have you any concept of what that means, to be dead? You seem to think that means you got a little bump on the head and were knocked unconscious, but that isn’t what happened. You stopped breathing. Your heart stopped. Your spirit was slowly lifting out of your body to be lost forever.”

Harry swallowed. He knew that, all of it. He knew it but he couldn’t think about that. How could anyone expect him to sit through classes or laugh with his friends or just live in general with the knowledge that he had been dead?

“Things may have turned out for the better in this instance, but don’t you dare think such reckless behavior is always rewarded by fate. It will never be rewarded by me. If you ever find yourself in a position to disobey a rule or command laid down with the interest of your or anyone else’s safety in mind, I want you to remember what happened just now, and know that I will double the number of lashes for every time this lesson must be repeated. Is that understood?”

Harry, a bit more contrite now, nodded. Snape glared.

“Is that understood?”

“Y-yes, Sir.”

“Then you may go for now. You have another detention this Saturday at eight. I wouldn’t recommend eating much.”

His wand was returned along with the rest of his clothing. The door to the lab fell open as if opened by a breeze, and Harry scurried out as quickly as he could without actually running. The door slammed shut behind him, leaving Harry sore, angry, and more than a little bewildered about what had happened.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom oozed out from Slytherin's portrait with his usual grace, belying the nervousness he felt. Umbridge was dead, and he had removed all evidence she had left of his involvement from McNair's and Umbridge's quarters respectively. Granger still lived, which was regrettable, but he wasn't in any hurry to dispose of her before he had completely unraveled himself from the knot Harry had made of his scheme.

Voldemort had already called him to his office days ago, forcing him to wait in a virtual limbo within the painting as he completed his meetings with Lestrage, Snape, and then Harry. Tom felt his blood boil recalling the ease with which his older counterpart had charmed his 'mother' from his shell shocked state to one of a wide-eyed child. His anger only escalated when he saw the Dark Lord gently deny Harry's ownership of Gryffindor's Sword, which by all rights belonged to the child. So many things belonged to Harry that Voldemort had denied him, and Tom wanted nothing more than to pull the younger boy aside and explain all the wrongs that had been committed against him by the man he so admired.

But Tom could do nothing but wait and watch and seethe impotently. Today, wouldn't be any different. The Dark Lord was heading to London to oversee the Wizengamot's latest legal revisions (Voldemort had been tossing out so many old laws there was talk that the Book of Laws might be reduced to one hundred volumes from the twelve hundred it had been during the rule of the Ministry), and wished to see him for his latest batch of instructions or merely to be annoying.

"I'm having McNair arrested," Voldemort said, skipping over the pleasantries neither of them cared for. Tom raised a curious brow.

"Hardly a loss, but why?"

“Precisely because it’s no loss. Umbridge was supposed to be his guardian, and the fact that he needed one at all is a testament to his uselessness. Besides, without him here no one will question that woman’s absence, nor will I have to worry about his increasingly traitorous mutterings. Umbridge wasn’t the only one to report his attitude problem.”

Tom snorted. Only the Dark Lord would label psychopathic tendencies as an ‘attitude problem’.

“Quirrell will be returning. Unenthusiastic, but harmless and easily charmed. You might consider ‘befriending’ him. He would make a good spy. Lestrangle and Snape overlook him too easily.”

A twinge of discomfort ran through Tom, not at the prospect of using Quirrell, but at the similarity of his using Umbridge for the exact same thing. He studied Voldemort intently for signs of mockery or suspicion, but all he saw was a distracted boredom. He hadn’t even looked up from the document he was reviewing.

“I will keep that in mind. Is there anything else?”

“Just the usual. I should be back at the end of the year to see how things went.”

Tom nodded, and left without waiting to be dismissed. Once he had disappeared through the portrait, Voldemort smirked. From under his chair, Pettigrew scurried and climbed into a chair where he promptly turned back into a man. He eyed the portrait suspiciously, but settled soon enough.

“I don’t understand why you don’t just kill him,” Pettigrew muttered. “I told you what I heard.”

Oh, and what horrific things he had heard. The little line of conquests hadn’t been the worst of it (in fact Pettigrew had enjoyed that part of his spying a bit too much), nor had the long rants about mudbloods, Voldemort, Wizing Weekly, or the inventor of the floo network. No, what was worst of all were the moments Tom actually appeared sane, talking quietly to himself as he sketched out his plans of murder and betrayal and treason. Pettigrew had to sit soundlessly and listen to it all in excruciating detail, right down to the death of mudblood children and a slew of teachers. Whatever Tom was, and he was increasingly convinced the boy wasn't human, it was obvious he was ambitious, insane, and deadly.

Voldemort made an annoyed gesture, commanding him to silence, and ignored the question. There was no point to killing Tom at the moment. His death or rather his disappearance, could not be easily explained and would create more panic just as things were beginning to settle down. No, Tom was safe.

For now.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The biting chill of January and February gave way to a unusually early spring, and with it Harry felt released from the lingering anxiety of winter. Despite the death of the basilisk and the danger it presented, it took weeks for Harry to stop expecting mysterious voices and danger in the gloomy halls. His dreams had been unsettling, if not exactly nightmarish (though he had plenty of those too), filled with desperate searches for Hermione or someone else that never ended and whispers from the dark corners of the castle.

McGonagall had been hovering since his release from the hospital, and in a strange way so had Snape, except Snape's 'hovering' involved detentions. Lots and lots of detentions, just as he had promised. He thought they might have suspected his uneasiness, yet neither had said anything directly. But as the days lengthened, and Snape's restrictions were lifted, Harry found himself outside more and more often, enjoying the openness and freedom a ride on a broom or a walk around the lake presented.

"And Potter catches the Snitch! Gryffindor wins the match!"

Harry circled the arena, snitch in hand as the crowd cheered (or groaned in the case of the Ravenclaws) before landed. His teammates had him quickly surrounded, smacking him on the back.

Angelina gave him a peck on the cheek, which had the Weasley twins demanding kisses from her too.

A week after the death of the basilisk all of the petrified students had been cured, and their memories rearranged. Angelina was made to remember only stopping in the hall to check her make-up and a sharp pinch in her leg, supposedly the bite of an acromantula. Collin remembered nothing after leaving the hall, but that was explained away as the result of a concussion from falling down a flight of stairs. Even Myrtle had returned to her bathroom convinced she had been badly pranked, and Harry had been sure to bring her a bouquet of dried flowers to wish her well. He sort of wishes he hadn't, as she now seemed utterly infatuated with him.

"Wait to go, Harry!" Hermione called from the bleachers as he passed her on the way to the showers. She was smiling and waving beside Ginny, wrapped in her cloak against the last of the April chill. Harry smiled and waved back at her, though his expression dimmed a bit as he was pulled out of sight.

Hermione remembered nothing about the basilisk. And he literally meant nothing. Her attack was nothing more than an unexpected awakening in the infirmary and the second hand story of a boggart. The days previous spent searching through ancient tomes and old newspaper articles for the truth were simply gone. Stolen by her own godfather.

Harry had resented him for that at first. Clyde and Ginny might still remember, but it was Hermione whom he wished to have shared his adventure with. Yet, she had been happier since she'd forgotten, less stressed about the school and about Harry. Harry and his fellow conspirators had each attempted at one point to tell her the truth, but soon realized she had more to lose from the realization than gain. In the end, Harry let her be and hoped it was for the best.

Besides, there was one other he had shared the entire fiasco with... with a few tiny rearrangements to protect his friends' names. Voldemort now knew everything, and Harry hoped the man had shared everything he knew with Harry. The Dark Lord had been so proud, he had commissioned an actual painting to commemorate the event (even though it would have to remain hidden for another seventy-five to a hundred years). It hadn't been as exciting as it initially sounded. Serving three weekends of 'detention' in the Chamber of Secrets posing for said painting was not fun.

Although it did beat the next four weekends and half a dozen evenings of detentions under Snape's supervision. On the bright side, if such a side existed in the dungeons, Harry had found his Unsilencing Bell and was now the most skilled dissector of all things squirmy and slimy that could be used in a potion. He could render a flubberworm into all six useful components before half the class could identify the head.

Hogsmeade weekends, unsupervised extra curricular activities, reinstatement of the old curfew, and of course Quidditch all returned to Hogwarts. It was too late in the season for official tournaments to resume in Quidditch, but the teams had engaged in several mock tournaments with volunteer students as referees, commentators, and score keepers. Harry enjoyed several victories when Snape wasn't putting his growing skills with a parring knife to work in the dungeons, which meant Harry hadn't played a single one on one with Slytherin at all that semester.

Bastard.

Ron Weasley was now Junior Captain of the Dueling Club.

Spawn of the Bastard.

The title didn't mean much at the moment, since there wouldn't be any dueling tournaments until at least next school year, but that didn't stop the goon from gloating whenever he got the chance. Snape had not let them have a rematch, despite their mutual insistence. The Dueling Master said they set a bad example when they fought against each other. Harry assumed that meant Ron was a cheating little twat when a duel wasn't going his way. They were still locked in a Cold War, but the Slytherin Weasley was noticeably less reckless with his provocations. Draco, my contrast, was positively mutinous when it came to taking orders from his Captain. Their duels were almost as bad as Harry's had been. Almost.

Not all things returned to normal, though that wasn't necessarily a bad thing. McNair was gone. The official story was that he was dismissed because of his negligence in securing the boggart, as well as earlier instances of questionable conduct. No one inquired about Umbridge. They assumed she was dismissed with McNair and no one was sorry to see her go. Harry knew of her bloody end, and though he didn't pity her he wished Voldemort had spared him the details.

Quirrel took over DA&D class again. Rumors of his demise had apparently been exaggerated, and after half a year of retirement he was looking decidedly refreshed. It probably didn't hurt that the entire students body had stood up and applauded as if he were super star when his return was announced during breakfast. Harry had never seen the man look so flattered.

"Wait to go, Harry," Oliver Wood congratulated as he help secure their brooms in their special cupboards. "Too bad about all those detentions though. The substitute Seeker just isn't up to par when we face the Slytherins."

"Thanks, Captain," Harry said. "Next year, I'm following the straight and narrow. No more detentions for me. We'll win the Cup again for sure."

"No! Say it isn't so!" Fred cried, rushing from his shower with only a towel on, still covered in suds. "Our Lord of Chaos can't retire!"

"What's going on, Fred?" George asked, wandering over damp and still shirtless from his shower.

"It's awful! He's retiring!"

"NOOOOOooooooooooooo-"

"Guys, calm down," Harry begged.

"-ooooooooooooooooooooo-"

“Chaos will survive with out me.”

“-oooooooooooooooo-”

“George, will you...?”

“-oooooooooooooooo-”

“Please-”

“-ooooOOOooooOOoooOOooooooooooooOOOOOOOOOOoooo-”

“ALRIGHT, I’LL BLOW SOMETHING UP NEXT YEAR!”

“-oooooOkay.”

Fred turned to his twin. “You’re a genius.”

George nodded, and grinned smugly as he went to finish dressing, leaving Harry and Oliver to stare after him, dumbfounded.

Impending doom or not, some things never changed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Spring bloomed into summer, illuminating the Scottish country side in rich dark greens and splashes of wild flower color. Harry, Hermione, Clyde, Ginny, Draco, and Natalie abandoned the castle and the stuffy Great Hall for lunch down by the lake. It was only two days until they would all go their separate ways for the summer, and they decided to forego the mad dash of activity for what Draco described as ‘less plebian’ endeavors.

Harry wasn’t sure how hanging out with your friends by the lake was any different than hanging out with your friends in the Great Hall or the Library, but he wasn’t too concerned. They were all comfortable and drowsy, lounging on their giant checkered blanket after eating too many sweets. The Lacsa-Daisy tree (a magical tree that bloomed a different type of flower every ten days from May to August) provided them with shade, semi-privacy, and a gentle rain of soft blue petals whenever the breeze blew just right.

Hermione was currently lecturing Clyde on his abysmal (in her opinion) study habits and the need to improve next year or suffer the consequences, and he was dutifully ignoring her in favor of playing cards with Ginny. Harry was sketching Draco and Natalie playing chess and discussing, of all things, politics.

"I still have no idea what that press conference was all about," Harry lamented, "I mean, I get all the new jobs for unskilled workers thing, but exactly what are they doing? And what does 'British Assembly of Cultural Preservation and Defense' mean? Your father is now head of something or other in that division now, you have to have some idea on what he does."

"Not a lot. It's very hush-hush," Draco replied apathetically, destroying one of Natalie's ponds with his bishop. "My father oversees the training programs for the different sections, and it seems kind of like Sentinel training, but at the same time its sort of the opposite. I don't know. Not much was happening until after we left home again. Why don't you ask the Dark Lord directly? You two seem pretty chummy."

Harry made a face. True, he and Voldemort were getting along, but then they rarely saw each other either. The longer the man was away, the less certain Harry felt about him. During the holidays everything had seemed like a dream, bizarre and yet natural in its progression. At Hogwarts, he woke up and Harry was left analyzing the dream and all its strange and subtle meanings, uncertain and cautious.

Snape was still the center of his anger, second only to Lestrage, for his role in the basilisk affair, but after a month and a half of Voldemort's absence he was starting to see things a bit differently. Now he understood that the Dark Lord had a greater part to play in the matter, and all that Snape had done had been by his Master's behest or permission, including the Contract and the memory charms on Hermione. It left him uneasy about seeing him again.

"Forget it."

Natalie took out Draco's Queen with her Bishop, sending the young Malfoy into a cursing frenzy. She turned to Harry.

"I know what it is," she said smugly. "You're thinking too hard on it. Just ask yourself, what government based organization requires a lot of people, little or no prior work experience, and the word 'Defense' in the title."

Harry considered, and after a moment his mind brushed lightly against a possibility, but then retreated from it. Seeing it flicker and go from his eyes, Natalie sighed.

"It's a military. The Dark Lord is building an army," she explained.

"That doesn't make sense. I thought the Sentinels were the army?"

She shrugged. "They're a traditional sort of wizarding army, but really they're not much good for anything other than upholding the law within Britain. This new army is meant for bigger things, I think. Like defending against attack by foreign wizarding governments, or local muggle ones, or invading other countries."

Harry considered, and found it tasted like truth. But why would Voldemort need that kind of an army? True, Britain wasn't exactly the favorite country in Europe right now, but they weren't bothering anyone either. He thought to ask her and the others as well, but movement near the castle drew his attention.

"I'll be right back," he said, and headed over to the clique of seven Slytherins striding out of the castle towards Hogsmeade. At the very center of the group was Tom, smiling indulgently as the others prattled on about something or another. When they spotted him coming towards them, they all stopped and stared.

Harry hesitated.

One of the girls burst out laughing, and he felt his ears burn. Tom cast an annoyed look at the girl, before ordering them all to head out without him. Still, Harry hesitated. He hadn't spoken to the boy since that day in the dungeons, and was expecting him to be nothing less than livid about what had happened.

“Hi,” Harry tried, and then cringed at how stupid that sounded. Tom’s expression was neutral, but the corner of his mouth twitch ever so slightly.

“Hi.”

Harry looked at his shoes, realized he was looking dumber by the second, and rushed straight to the point.

"I'm sorry about what happened... stunning you and everything. I know you were only trying to protect me..."

Tom blinked in surprise. Of all the things he was expecting, an apology wasn't one of them. For weeks he had expected Harry to corner him somewhere and demand to know what he had been doing wandering the dungeons that day and what he had done to the Weasley twins, and had been diligently avoiding him until he could come up with a reasonable answer or Harry forgot about it altogether.

“As I recall, it was the Weasley twins who stunned me. You just squirmed around a lot...”

The pink of Harry's ears spread to his cheeks.

“Er... yeah... well, they were trying to protect me... kind of like you were only... yeah... Um, any way, I’m sorry about what happened. I just wanted to let you know before you left for the summer. Uh... no hard feelings?”

Tom smirked, and ruffled Harry's hair.

“No, no hard feelings.”

[illegible]

Snape ascended the staircase to the Dark Lord's private office with a barely detectable spring in his step. Never had the idea of a typical school year pleased him so much until it was disrupted. The students were back to their usual ridiculous past times and activities, House tensions had died down to a normal level, no one had been sent to the infirmary due to hexing for three weeks, and thanks to Potter his stores had never been fuller and he had more basilisk venom, blood, skin, and meat than he could ever possibly use to experiment with.

The Dark Lord had given him a house.

Okay, technically this was the second house he'd been given, but it was bigger and had a larger laboratory in the basement and a green house in the back yard. He had only been there to visit it once so far, but what he found pleased him. There were three bedrooms, a small study, a smaller living room, a good sized kitchen, and a laboratory in the basement that was larger than the rest of the house combined. He wasn't much of a fan of home decor, but even he could admire the rich architectural detail in the Victorian style house with the abundance of green marble accent pieces (conveniently inert to most acids and potions). It wasn't large, but it was dignified, a bit dark, and decidedly masculine.

It suited Snape just fine.

Best of all, Lestrage hadn't gotten a house. Alright, technically she already lived in a mansion and was obscenely wealthy after a mysterious wasting sickness took her husband, but that wasn't the point. She had inherited those things. Voldemort had given Snape his.

He hadn't told the Headmistress yet, and didn't plan to until it would cause her the utmost humiliation and/or frustration. Letting her know before then would only give her time to vent her rage on him, and she had been holding back since the conclusion of the basilisk debacle. She wasn't technically on the outs with the Dark Lord anymore, but neither was she in his favor like Snape was. If an opportunity didn't present itself (or she didn't create one) soon, she might still be reassigned to something... less demanding.

A cruel smirk slipped across Snape's face as he thought of it, but it slipped away to something more neutral as he entered the office.

"My Lord, you wish to see me?"

Voldemort looked up from his paperwork, and gestured casually towards an empty chair. He was sorting through several letters, a miniature knife made of obsidian was slicing through envelopes with the precision of a surgeon. He had only stopped by for a brief visit to check on the status of the school and its students (one student in particular Snape didn't doubt), before heading off to Ireland to give the latest recruitment speech for the Wizarding army or the BrAss Cult, as some were already calling it. No doubt he had also come to inform Snape of exactly what warranted his latest gift, as the potion's master doubted it was due to the events of January that he'd barely bungled through.

After Snape had made himself as comfortable as he could in the Dark Lord's presence, Voldemort set his paper's aside.

"How do you like your new house?"

Straight to the point, very unlike his Master unless he was expecting some sort of resistance that needed to be mercilessly crushed. Snape had a bad feeling.

"It is a very fine house, well suited to my needs. I cannot thank you enough-"

Voldemort made a sharp gesture, silencing the potion's Master's gratitude.

"It is not a gift."

"You do not give gifts," Snape conceded, "Only rewards."

"And you have not yet earned this one."

There was no arguing that... at least not without being permanently maimed or worse. He wasn't surprised, but relieved that the other shoe was about to drop.

"What must I do?"

Voldemort smirked, and settled back into his chair. Trust Severus to be quick on the uptake.

"Young Harry is in need of new residence. The Sleuws may have been enough for a muggleborn orphan, but my protégé needs... more specialized accommodations."

Snape's expression remained neutral, but inside he was cringing. He was a private man, and though he didn't begrudge sharing a giant castle with his students it was another matter altogether to share his home. It certainly didn't help that Potter was a Gryffindor troublemaker with a rather uppity disposition. The little bugger was STILL glaring at him in potions.

"If that is what my Lord wishes..."

"It is. Do not let it ruin your holiday, Severus. I have arranged for summer employment and etiquette lessons, as well as a week long excursion in August, to keep him suitably busy. You need only ensure that he is protected, completes his studies, and doesn't starve. I will consider this as fulfillment of your Community Service obligation in place of your usual WYRA responsibilities."

Well, that was something. Although, he certainly would have liked to have known all of this more than the day before the holidays began. He supposed it could have been a lot worse. With Potter around he wouldn't have to clean the house himself at least. He was exceptionally bad at housework yet couldn't justify making himself a house elf without any children to inherit it.

"As you will. Does Potter know?"

"I wished to speak to him tomorrow, over lunch would be most convenient. I shall tell him then."

"I will arrange it."

"Thank you, Severus. I knew I could count on you."

The potion's master stood, bowed respectfully, and left to see to his own affairs.

"You are too generous. He failed Harry once already," came Tom's impatient hiss, before Slytherin's portrait blackened and allowed him entry.

"Severus saved Harry's life," the elder wizard corrected, "And more importantly he taught Harry several spells that allowed him to protect himself. Besides, he has the most experience in dealing with him, and I trust his judgement."

"You should have let him stay with me."

Voldemort laughed, loud and mocking.

"With you? Oh, Tom I'm afraid that's impossible."

"Why? Who would question it?"

Voldemort smirked and stood, walking up to his younger counterpart. The boy took a surprised step back. They never touched, never got close enough where they might do so accidentally. It was an instinctive phobia they held for one another. Yet the Dark Lord seemed prepared to violate that taboo right there.

"It's not a matter of people questioning it," he said, and Tom started backing away, a sense of danger screaming at him to fight or flee. "It's simply that I can't trust my protégé with the person who nearly killed him. Did you really think I didn't know?"

Tom's eyes widen in surprise, his wrist flicking to draw out his wand from his sleeve, yet nothing appeared. He tried again and still nothing. The Dark Lord smiled malevolently.

“Missing something?”

He gestured back towards Slytherin's portrait where their ancestor's likeness twirled Tom's wand in one hand and stroked the head of a familiar with the other, his lips twisted in a mirror image of Voldemort's. He looked back to Voldemort only to be knocked to the ground with a savage backhand, rolled over to crawl away but was dragged underneath the Dark Lord. Voldemort straddled him, using his knees to pin Tom's arms to the carpet.

“What are you doing?! Get off me! You can't kill me, I AM YOU! Let go!”

Voldemort clucked his tongue, grinning with sadistic glee as backhanded him again, stunning him.

“I'm not going to kill you, Tom. That is, quite literally, self-defeating. But I can't let you live. You're too rash, too ambitious. Do you recognize this?”

From the folds of his robe, he pulled out a golden coin, ancient and shining and perfect as only a Wizarding coin can remain. Tom did recognize it. It was Merlin's death coin, one of two set over the revered wizard's eyes upon his death. One was taken by as payment to a death god, but as Merlin was part fairy, the other was given to his fae wife Nimue, who in turn gave it her daughter and down the line it went until it vanished three hundred years ago during a goblin rebellion. Its powers were a mystery, though the descendants of Merlin held onto it with the savagery of a mother protecting a beloved child.

“A gift for you, my brother.”

Voldemort shoved it into Tom's mouth, and held it inside with his hand. Tom choked and struggled and screamed, knowing what was going to happen next with a horrifying certainty. It was too late for resistance. The small obsidian dagger the Dark Lord had been using as letter opener was suddenly in his hands, and just as suddenly in Tom's chest.

Blood from the wound, shock silencing his victim's screams, but it was not enough to kill. Not yet. With savage glee Voldemort tore the knife free and brought it down again and again, the screams returned and then died away just as quickly, leaving the body still and lifeless. Voldemort took a few more stabs for the fun of it and then sat back, laughing.

It had been years since he had done this by hand, and he had forgotten the strange thrill of it, life and magic draining away through his blood-drenched fingers. And there Tom lay, wide green eyes slowly ghosting over, pale skin flecked with the red of his own blood splatter. He was almost pretty, and he was narcissistic enough to know and acknowledge it. All smooth and soft and still.

Or rather Tom's vessel was. An artfully composed golem made of meat and blood and magic. Most of all magic. It was a shame really. It was a magical item in itself, originating from no mortal flesh, and soon it would begin to rot.

Such a waste.

Unless...

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry entered Voldemort's office a quarter to one, hungry and a little intimidated. He had not seen Voldemort for months, and wasn't sure what this last minute visit would reveal. It seemed deliberate that the Dark Lord waited until the school was empty of students. His trunk, Elsbeth, and Inana were still in the entryway when he left, and when he had asked McGonagall if he should take them to the Sleuws, she had pointedly ignored the question and wished him a good summer.

"Ah, Harry," the Dark Lord greeted, dressed down from his usual formal attire to something more closely resembling Harry's outfit, and a traveling cloak draped over the back of his chair. The desk was gone, or perhaps it had been transfigured into the dining table that now occupied the office. A lunch had already been laid out, a simple meal made elegant by silver dishes. The delicious smell of Swedish sausages, fresh bread, and something he couldn't quite identify. "Come, take a seat. We have much to talk about and little time to do so."

Harry took his seat directly across the table, and after seeing Voldemort had already filled his plate, did likewise.

"It is good to see you again, My Lord," Harry said politely, not entirely sure how honest he was being. "How is your military coming along?"

Voldemort looked startled for a moment, and then smirked.

"It's coming along... gradually, but that's a discussion for another time. I am here to talk about your summer plans."

Harry paused, hand halfway to the breadbasket.

"... I don't really have any... that I've been told about."

The older man smirked.

"Best remedy that now, yes? I've taken some liberties in arranging alternative housing and employment."

Harry's jaw tensed, but he buttered his roll as if everything were fine. Voldemort waited for a reply, but when none was forthcoming, he continued.

"Professor Snape has agreed to house you for the summer. I believe it will be advantageous to the both of you. Your recent potion work has been consistently good. Perhaps he will allow you assist him in some of his more advanced work."

Harry bit into his roll to hide his grimace. If his potion work was good it was no doubt due to the fact that so many of his detentions were spent in the potion's lab slicing, dicing, organizing, and labeling the ingredients. The idea of doing all of that during his holiday, with the man who beat him with a cane no less, was utterly unappealing.

“That is, if you complete your summer assignments first. Oh, and etiquette lessons on Tuesday afternoons.”

“Etiquette?”

Voldemort nodded.

“Good manners are essential to successful diplomacy, between enemies as well as allies. It is good for confidence, as well. I have also been contacted by a large pharmaceutical and potion's company, who have offered to pay a hefty sum to make use of your parselmouth abilities. I thought it a good opportunity for you. Mondays, Wednesday, and Friday mornings only. Plenty of time left to finish your studies and play.”

“Er... what will I be doing for them exactly?”

“Snake venom harvesting. It'll be fun.”

Harry wondered if the Dark Lord did that sort thing for 'fun'.

“And one last thing. I have been invited to a summer festival by Fenrir Greyback for little over a week. I was wondering you might like to attend.”

At this, Harry's interest was definitely perked.

“Will my godfather's be there?”

“Yes. All the werewolves will be there. It's a very important festival for them. So are you interested?”

“Yes! I mean, yes sir. I would love to go.”

“Then it's settled,” Voldemort said, settling back to enjoy his own meal. He was quite pleased with this meeting. The boy had looked rather reluctant if not exactly reticent of his first intercessions, but the third, and really the most important matter, was accepted with real enthusiasm. He hadn't mentioned that it was essentially a pagan festival, but he doubted it mattered. No doubt Harry would have a wonderful time, and after seeing his own godfathers practicing it, he would be that much closer to accepting Her over Him. Marvelous.

Harry, distracted from his earlier misgivings by curious musings on his upcoming visit with his godfathers. And werewolves! Alright, his last experience with them was hardly ideal, but if he were under Voldemort's protection he was sure to be safe. What were they all like in their daily lives? What sort of festival were they celebrating? Would he be asked to join or merely watch? Did it fall on a full moon?

His thoughts dizzy with possibilities, he took a bite of his sausage. Ooohh... that was good. Just like Miss Agnethe used to make for Oktoberfest. Juicy, faintly sweet, with just the right amount of spice.

It took Harry only a moment to realize Voldemort wasn't eating the same thing. Rather than sausage or any of the other dishes on the table for that matter, the Dark Lord's plate was laden with some sort of red tinted meat, thickly sliced into diamond shaped cuts and drenched in a dark brown broth. Was that the delicious, yet unfamiliar scent he'd smelled upon entering? Why would Voldemort eat one kind of dish and yet serve another to his guest? His host noticed his curious stare and smiled, a clever and wicked and curved like a butcher's knife.

"You wouldn't like. Trust me," he said. "It's an acquired taste."

"Smells good," Harry said, feeling it was a challenge to sophistication more than a warning.

"It tastes good too, but when I say 'acquired' I mean it's toxic. It's made to my specifications, and no one else's."

This was entirely true. If the incompatible and rather malevolent magic that saturated the meat didn't kill someone, the venom it had been boiled in to soften the meat, certainly would have. Of course, though not technically the same entity any longer, Tom and he still shared the same magic and of course there were few venoms his own body was susceptible to.

And who would have thought it? Tom, the little prat, was yummy?

Venom and all.

[illegible]

British Assembly for Cultural Preservation and Defense BrAss Cult. Also named because their uniform buttons and insignia are made of brass, at least for the typical foot soldier. The higher the rank, the more expensive their uniform fixtures.

No, Severus was arrested for flying while intoxicated. Community Service in the wizarding world is a legal obligation all adult wizards have to perform or else pay an increase in taxes. Snape's CSO is collecting muggleborns for WYRA during the summer. Rich and powerful wizards like Malfoy and Lestrage usually just pay the increased taxes.

And yes, Voldemort did in fact, just eat Tom. No, Tom isn't actually dead. He wasn't really living to begin with. He was always a horcrux, just now he stuck in a different object.

[illegible]

READ:

I know this is bothersome, but due a rather inconvenient alterations of living, ie looking for a new job, new apartment, and a family vacation I may or may not attend, I won't be able to update for a while. I do intend to keep writing during this break, but won't be able to post anything consistently so I'm just going to wait until my situation settles. I might even have some time to go back and further proofread previous chapters. I should be able to start updating early this July.

I AM NOT ABANDONING THIS STORY.

It will get done. This is just an inconvenient blip. Thanks to everyone who has been so supportive! You guys are wonderful! I'll see you again in July!

Book III

Chapter 1: The Giant

“Potter! Where are you?!”

Harry grimaced at the sound of his wretched teacher and guardian came storming up the stairs from the potion's lab. He was almost done drying the dishes from breakfast, and had been looking forward to spending the rest of the morning exploring the acreage around the house. So far he'd barely stepped foot outside except to clean the windows and banish some gnomes from the garden, and though he didn't know if it was intentional he was getting extremely annoyed. It was summer vacation for the love of Merlin!

“In the kitchen,” he replied dutifully, biting back a sarcastic remark. Sarcasm got him nothing with Snape but more chores.

The potion's master stalked inside, an overwhelming shadow in the bright kitchen. He was dressed in his usual black robes, but his hair had been pulled back tightly and a cloth mask and goggles hung around his neck. Whatever he was experimenting with was obviously dangerous.

“What are you doing in here? Don't you have homework?” he said testily, stripping off his safety ware and tossing them in the sink beside Harry. Not bothering to wait for a reply, he rummaged through the cupboards. “Where is the bread? There was a loaf this morning.”

“It was moldy so I threw it away. Along with Thursday's leftovers. Milk is gone too, and I had to give Inana the last of the eggs. About the only thing left is tea and some potatoes.”

“A simple 'You need to go shopping' would have suffice.”

Snape set about brewing some tea.

“We need to go shopping,” Harry said pointedly. “If I'm going to have to cook, I need the right ingredients.”

"You have homework."

"I've done nothing but homework and chores since I got here."

"All five days, oh how you must have suffered. Besides, you start work tomorrow, you'll have less time to do it then."

"Just let me come or you're going to have to go to town every other day because you didn't know what to get."

Snape snorted.

"This is why I never wanted to get married. Nag, nag, nag."

Funny, I was thinking this is exactly why you need a wife, Harry thought, but wisely didn't say, continuing to dry the remainder of the dishes. Life with Snape was pretty much an on going battle of wits and wills. Snape would have been more than happy to order Harry around all day long no doubt, but Harry had plenty of experience at avoiding house work and sneaking about from his time at the Dursley's. Additionally, since Snape proved very quickly he couldn't scramble an egg let alone make a meal, Harry had the power of food. A tired, irritated Harry meant Snape would be left to forage for himself. How he had survived without a house elf (or wife) for this long, the Gryffindor had no clue.

Snape never did agree to take him along, but by the time he was finished with his tea Harry had already finished the dishes, made a grocery list, and gotten on his shoes. The potion's master gave him an annoyed look as he traded his potion's robes for a lighter (although just as dark and plain) robe, but said nothing when Harry followed him out the door.

The day was typical English summer, hot and sunny and the air thick with a subtler magic Harry would never have noticed before that winter. The acreage around the house was mostly wild field surrounded by a low rock wall, two gravel paths leading from the house, one to a dirt road on the other side of the wall and the second to the back of the house to the green house and some woods beyond that. The fields were thick with wild flowers, and their seedlings floated about the two travelers slowly, their defiance of gravity casting the place in a sense of time slowed. Harry peered about, feeling a strange sort of euphoria come over him.

“Potter! Stop daydreaming!” Snape snarled, crushing Harry's happy feeling. The sense of magic retreated, and the young Gryffindor scowled and trudged along unhappily after his professor. This was not the first time the strange distraction had come upon him, but it was always fleeting. He often wondered if his ability to sense magic was growing or he was imagining it. He thought occasionally of asking Snape, but one look at that scowling gob and he changed his mind.

They walked the mile from the house to the village of Elvenshire, just as the market was beginning to fill. Harry had only been through the village once while picking up supplies after leaving Hogwarts, and he had been too tired to take much notice of his surroundings at the time. It wasn't much different than Hogsmeade, with the exception of a collection of about eight stalls in the center of village. The witches and wizards wore simpler clothes than city wizards and his classmates, rough home spun material rich in needlepoint details as well as patches and stitches. If they weren't rich, they certainly weren't starving either, and the market was full of shoppers haggling for the best deals. Several of the merchants manning the stalls regarded Snape and Harry's gentlemanly attire with hungry eyes as they passed.

They stopped first at stall selling chickens. Live chickens. Now Harry thought he had a well rounded education, but no where in his school books or lectures had poultry come into play. Elsbeth didn't count. She wasn't for eating.

“A sickle for a dozen eggs,” the woman said, and despite being startled by the birds, he was aware enough to snort at the ridiculous price. Snape looked at him questioningly.

“You could buy a hen for that,” Harry said, though he didn't know if that was true, he did know eggs couldn't be worth more than a couple knuts. Snape turned a suspicious look at the woman, who paled and stuttered, then tried to laugh it off.

"Your son's a cheeky lad. Half a sickle for a dozen, just because I admire his spunk."

This clearly wasn't the right thing to say for Snape's expression turned from suspicious to down right livid.

"This," he hissed, pointing to Harry as if he were a malfunctioning house elf, "is not my son."

She looked flustered and a bit confused. After her absurd suggestion that he was related to Snape, Harry didn't feel the least bit sympathetic.

"I'm his father," Harry said, "Potion's accident, you know. I blame his mother for buying him the potion's set as a child."

"Potter, shut up!"

"Don't talk like that to me, young man!"

Snape slapped upside the head. It was almost worth it to see his professor cringe in embarrassment.

"Seven knuts," she offered, "Seven knuts for the eggs."

"Five," Snape said, clearly still irritated with her as well as his ward. "Five and I'll never bring him with me again."

"Deal."

The shopping trip didn't improve after that. For what ever reason, everyone seemed convinced that Harry was Snape's son and couldn't seem to comprehend any other situation where a boy Harry's age might be living with a man of Snape's age. Snape hated the presumption, but more so he hated explaining the same thing over and over again to strangers who didn't have any reason to meddle in his private affairs. Harry wouldn't have minded explaining, but the towns people's growing confusion was the most entertainment he'd had all week. So the Gryffindor said nothing except to point out something on the grocery list or to prod Snape into haggling (the man was a natural if a bit uncertain about when it was appropriate or not), all the while thinking how he wished the twins were there to make everything ten times worse.

An hour later, the little square was buzzing with bizarre rumors of Harry being Snape's son, father, nephew, apprentice, servant boy, and shape shifting golem sent to torment the man by an ex-girlfriend. Snape was in a perfectly foul mood as they trudged back home, and Harry was on the verge of laughter despite having to carry all the groceries.

"Potter," the man said as they entered the privacy of the house, "if you ever breathe a word of this day to anyone, it will be the last you ever breathe."

Harry had to turn away on the pretext of restocking the cupboard, biting his lip to keep a series of very cheeky comments from escaping.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry's first day of work started out as an exercise in well controlled panic. He woke up perfectly on time, and decided immediately it wasn't early enough. He hustled through his morning routine easily enough, until it was time to get dressed at which point he became inexplicably lost. What did one wear to a hospital for magical creatures? He had never even been to a muggle veterinarian's office, let alone a wizarding one. Should he dress in his nice school clothes or would this be a dirty job that required something sturdier?

Snape would probably have known, but if Harry asked him what he should wear he'd more than likely get a snarky remark like 'Anything that isn't blue. Blue makes you look fat,' or 'Do I look like the editor of Witch's Wardrobe?' He finally opted for a set of his older school clothes, but then had to spend an extra fifteen minutes ironing them out.

He set about making a simple egg and sausage breakfast, then remembered half way through that he hadn't made lunch for later. By then, Snape had come down and grumbled about preferring his eggs over easy, and immersed himself in a newspaper. After rushing through the rest of breakfast, he rummaged through the cupboards but couldn't find anything to put his lunch in, and the only response Snape had given him was 'they have a cafeteria, you know'. No, Harry hadn't known, nor did he know if he would have to pay for lunches there or if they were provided. He didn't want to ask either.

He grabbed a couple of sickles from school trunk, the last of his previous job's wages he hadn't sent to the bank, and hoped he wouldn't have to use it. No sooner had he closed his trunk then the door bell rang. Rushing to tidy himself in the mirror (and realizing too late he was missing a button on his shirt and his hair was messier than usual, so he looked like a hobo), he descended the stairs towards the entry way.

Snape was already there, interrogating a skinny little man in pressed white medical robes whom Harry could only describe as 'antiseptic'.

"Really, Mister-"

"Professor."

"Yes, of course, Professor Snape, is this really necessary?"

Snape stared at him stoically, until the antiseptic man bent to his superior professional egotism. He let out a mumbled jumble of words that must have been his approved password, though Harry could only make out 'baby hippo' and wonder where Snape's sadism ended and his sense of humor began.

"Very well," the professor relented, a reluctance in his tone meant to prolong the other man's torment rather than any true suspicion.
"Potter!"

"Here, sir."

"Behave yourself!"

And he stalked off. Harry and the antiseptic man stared after him for a long moment, then hurried out the door.

“Sorry about that, Mr.?”

“Healer Meldwich,” he corrected pointedly, then seemed to ease up a little. “It's quite alright. Important man, Professor Snape, but a bit high strung. I hear teaching does that to you.”

Harry doubted that Snape had been any less of a prat before working at Hogwarts, but didn't contradict. They walked at a clipped pace towards the road where the anti-apparation wards ended. Harry caught Meldwich peeking curiously at him several times, always on the verge of saying something.

“Did you want to ask me something, sir?”

The man became flustered, but his eagerness sparked like a wildfire.

“It is just... I never thought... Would it be... uh...”

Harry waited patiently. Finally, Meldwich seemed to put together what he wanted to say.

“My colleagues and I were so excited when we received approval from your guardians to have you work with us. You have a rare and magnificent talent, and so little is known about it. I feel like a silly little school girl when I think about it. Would you mind terribly...?”

Harry felt a blush coming on, burning at his ears and thought of declining, but couldn't think of why he should be so shy. It was just talking. No different than talking in English or German. Yet to describe anything of his as 'magnificent' was intimidating.

“Ah... yeah, sure. Um, is there anything in particular you would like me to say?”

Meldwich's grin was awkward, unnatural, and perfectly genuine all at once.

“Lets do something simple... today's date?”

Harry tried, but came up short as if he'd been asked to name the King of the United States.

“Er... I'm sorry but I don't think snake's have a word for 'June'.”

The healer looked startled, disappointed, and then delighted.

“Oh of course! Snakes certainly wouldn't use a Gregorian calendar to tell time. How silly of me! How about counting to ten? Do snakes count?”

Snakes apparently did count and Harry proved it easily enough, hissing out the requested numerals.

“Magnificent! So they do have a sense of numerical understanding. Healer Beets will be so pleased to have it confirmed! Marvelous! Learning something like this just walking down the road. What wonderful things we will accomplish, Mr. Potter!”

Harry wasn't so sure. He thought his job would be caring for animals they studied, but it seemed more and more that he was the animal they were going to study. He turned a bit to look longingly at the house, but all he got from that was the slightest glance at what may have been Snape watching from the window when Meldwich grabbed his arm suddenly and they disappeared.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape moved from the window and towards the lab, wondering idly if he would be given an excuse to curse the ratty little creature that afternoon or if it would take a few days. There was no doubt the man would need a lesson in 'boundaries' eventually. He knew Meldwich's type.

Curiosity without conscientiousness.

He'd poke and he'd prod, test and record and test and interrogate and test again and again and again without consideration for the subject he inflicted his curiosity on. Or the fact that his subject was on loan from a very temperamental and possessive Dark Lord.

His Master's own decision to 'hire' Harry out, was of course more for the dictator's gain than Harry's. Voldemort was a powerful man, but also a bit conceited. Parseltongue was an ability he prided himself on, and his wide subject knowledge was another. The fact that he knew very little about his own talent was no doubt irksome, even a bit embarrassing. Just the same, allowing scholars to study and experiment on him was too undignified. Ignorance had been preferred until Harry conveniently stumbled into the picture.

Snape didn't envy Harry for a moment.

If the brat were of a meeker disposition, he might have considered chaperoning for the first day, but he wasn't so Snape didn't. It was only four hours anyway. Certainly, a couple of eggheads were no match for the Black Cat of Gryffindor. In fact, he should probably be more worried about them. Yes, he better go check his stock of anti-venom potions right now. The silly boy might have smuggled out a cockatrice egg under his shirt or something.

Damn, Potters. Inconveniencing him even when they weren't around.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The 'veterinary' hospital Harry was led to was called a 'medical bestiary', more specifically Lanthrope University Medical Bestiary and Research Center, and more simply the LUMBAR Center. It was a four story red brick building, which would have looked perfectly at home in any English city but stood out like a sore thumb in the middle of a cow pasture three miles outside of the wizarding town of Bridges Burning.

A stable, a barn, and an aviary stood at three different ends of the building, housing the larger creatures in need of care and fresh air. There were several wizards and witches roaming about in white robes and heavy galoshes, carrying medical equipment, feed buckets, and the occasional injured creature.

Harry and Healer Meldwich entered through the lobby, where a several people were waiting with their animals. Some of the animals were perfectly normal, a cat or dog or rabbit, but others Harry had trouble identifying, such as the six legged goat-like creature or the monkey that could take off its head. He had little time to gawk before he was handed a white lab coat and an identity badge by the receptionist. It read:

Harry J. Potter

Research Assistant

Herpetology

The very adult sounding title gave him a distinct thrill. The unfamiliar term 'herpetology' made him feel like an idiot.

They took the stairs to the fourth floor, Meldwich rambling distractedly and in no particular order about each floor, it's departments, Lanthrope University (which apparently taught Bestial Medicine and funded the building and its research), Healers, scientists, students, research subjects, the cafeteria, bathrooms, kennels, laboratories, exam rooms, the apothecary, supply closets, the library, and various other things Harry couldn't keep track of. The healer was clearly eager to get Harry to the lab, but it didn't stop him from introducing him to every healer they came across in hopes of inducing some sort of envy.

It seem to work in several cases, and Harry was getting increasingly uncomfortable with the attention.

"Here we are," Meldwich said at last, stopping in front of a plain office door with a golden plaque titled 'Herpetology' on it. Beside it was another plaque with a list of four names, one of which was Melvin Meldwich. Melvin?

"Melvin! Is this him?"

A young man, stocky and eager, was standing before him and shaking his hand before he had stepped completely through the door.

"Hello, hello! I'm Jarod Beets. It's ever so good to meet you at last!"

"Er... nice to meet you too?"

"Healer Beets, please refrain from using such familiarity. It's unseemly in a professional," Melvin scolded, but Beets paid him no mind and dragged Harry over to meet the other people there. One was a woman, plain by all account but for slightly wicked tilt to her lips that reminded him of Natalie. He barely noticed her however, for the last man was so stunning, Harry couldn't help but gape.

He was HUGE.

Easily as wide as three men, and he had to crouch so his head wouldn't knock the ceiling. Unlike everyone else Harry had seen, he was wild looking with a mess of a beard and scraggly hair, that his pristine white robes could do nothing to hide. He fidgeted nervously, clearly uncomfortable in the room and the white robe with the tidy little people crowding around him. Harry felt a wave of compassion come over him.

"This is Healer Gabriela Coulter," Beets introduced. "She specializes in lizards."

"But I'm interested in all sorts of creatures," she said smoothly. Harry felt a shiver run through him, as he felt her categorize him into said creature category.

"And this is Rubeus Hagrid. Officially, he assists in caring for all of our...er... more dangerous specimens. Unofficially, he's a bit of a dragon expert. You'll be working together a lot in the milking room."

"Dragons? Milking room?" Harry asked.

Hagrid puffed up a bit, but bumped his head into the ceiling and had to go back to slumping just as quickly. When he spoke, his voice rumbled gently in a Scottish brogue.

“Aye. Ya more than like be see'in a bit o' both. I be gett'n a new clutch of Irish Blues with'n the week. You might'n luck out and see'm hatch, eh?”

“Really?!”

Harry had seen an Irish Blue once, at a great distance during one of the summer class field trips. It had been massive, and strikingly blue so that if it had taken flight it would have been impossible to see against the clear sky. But it didn't take flight, instead it snarled and rubbed its body against a grove of trees, snapping them like bread sticks to relieve some minor itch. It never would have occurred to Harry that he could get any closer to such a creature.

Meldwich let out an impatient cough.

“Yes, well... perhaps. You'll be quite busy here. Now let me show you what you'll be doing... ah, Hagrid, would you mind stepping out for a bit? I'm sure you have plenty else to do...”

Hagrid hesitated, looking between Harry and Meldwich, something so clearly on the tip of his tongue. Harry gave the man a smile.

“Would it be alright if I had lunch with you?” he asked. “I'd like to ask you a bit about dragons.”

Hagrid grinned, straightened a little, and bumped his head again on the ceiling.

“Aye, I'da be liken that. Meet ya at say, twelve-thirty or so?”

“Sounds good. I'll see you later then. It was nice to meet you.”

“It was good to be meeting ya as well 'Arry.”

With that, the giant man ambled out, squeezing through the door awkwardly. When the door closed, Healer Meldwich gave a snort.

“You needn't pander to the oaf out of politeness. He's a fool with a fondness for anything that kill a man. Treats them like misunderstood kittens. He didn't even finish his schooling.”

Harry looked sharply at the healer, his expression turning very cold.

“I haven't finished my schooling either, Melvin.”

The healer was so utterly shocked, he fumbled for several moments between embarrassment and indignation, before Beets jumped in.

“Why don't I introduce you to our lovely ladies?” he said, beaming happily, he led Harry towards another door at the far end of the room, past a couple of cubicles and assorted office and medical equipment. “They'll be delighted to meet you, I'm sure.”

Beets opened the door, and a rush of heat and humidity immediately fogged up Harry's glasses so he missed Healer Coulter's look of predatory amusement as she gazed at her still befuddled supervisor.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

By noon, Harry was more than just eager to escape to lunch, he was desperate. Healer Beets was an alright fellow, cheerful and pleasant, but either very insensitive or willfully oblivious to everyone else's feelings. He's introduced Harry to some two hundred or so snakes in the 'specimen' room, a large room that looked and felt like the outside of several different places in the world depending on where you were in the room. The snakes were kept in individual territories using some sort of magical boundary, rather like a miniature version of the ones Harry had helped set up last summer, that the snakes couldn't leave without being held by a witch or wizard with a Herpetology Security Badge.

The hot, and occasionally humid, room smelled of vegetative rot and the musky scent of reptiles, and the sound of softly hissed whispers gave the entire place an eerie feeling. The snakes themselves were alternately bored and resigned or temperamental and restless. All seemed quite pleased to meet him, though disappointed when he said he wasn't there to help them escape.

Meldwich and Coulter had followed Harry around as he greeted each snake, learning their names and their personalities. One snake, a highly venomous and imperious Rainbow Serpent from South America, even allowed him to help remove some loose feathers that were clearly bothering her, and Meldwich nearly fainted from the sight.

That all had been fine and dandy, if a bit disconcerting, but then they took him to the infirmary where they treated the injured and sickly serpents. It was awful. He was surrounded by broken and torn bodies, withering in pain and crying for relief that no one knew to give them. They were all already undergoing treatment, and there was nothing more Harry could do for them, but assure them that they would heal and be whole again soon.

Worst of all had been the questions afterwards, endless questions about each snake and their treatment effectiveness, and all Harry was hearing was a morbid curiosity about their suffering.

At noon, he quickly but firmly excused himself, and went to meet Hagrid.

"Eya, 'Arry, you alright'? Ya look'n a bit pale," the giant man said.

"Fine," Harry tried, "I'm fine, just... er..."

Hagrid nodded in understanding.

"It takes a some gett'n used to, all that suffer'n in one place. Breaks yer 'art, assum'n ye got one."

Harry smiled weakly. He knew what Hagrid was saying and he couldn't agree more. Hospitals were apparently unpleasant places regardless of species.

They chatted a bit inanely about this and that as they made their way towards the stables. Harry wasn't entirely sure what he was doing out there alone with this strange man. Supposedly, they were having lunch, but Harry doubted the cafeteria was behind one of the stalls.

The stable was about ten times larger on the inside than the outside, lined neatly with stalls and an exercise pen in the center. A few animals peeked out from their paddocks as they entered, gazing as curiously at Harry as he was at them.

“What are we doing here?”

“I was think'n ya'd be need'n a bit'o cheer. Thought ya might like to see Wind. She's good at that,” Hagrid said, his dark eyes twinkling in good humor.

Harry was led to the very farthest end of the stable to a stall door that was locked and encased in several security wards.

“She's a very precious creature. 'Ave to keep 'er safe from poachers.”

Inside the stall stood a creature of dazzling white, glowing in the dimness like a lantern though it cast no shadows. Harry had only seen pictures of unicorns before, and the real thing was as a like to those pictures as it was to a donkey.

“Oh...” was all he could manage, and spent several moments just gaping. Hagrid let out a chuckle.

“Yeah, she does that. She had a nasty run in with some rogue dementors. Came in looking about as bright and cheerful as an Irish bog. Ya can see she's doin better now, but the Court is still tryin' to round up the last of the dementors before they release her back into the wild, so she'll be here fer another month or so. Some things never change. Government still drags its feet where ever it can.”

As he was talking, Hagrid handed Harry a few sugar cubes, and after a few moments of hesitation the unicorn took a few timid steps forward. Harry held perfectly still and tried to radiate an air of absolute calm and innocence. Unicorns were attracted to innocence, but he wasn't sure he had enough left in him to appear at all appealing.

Eventually though, she took the sugar and nuzzled his palm.

A feeling of absolute joy ran through him, and in response Wind gave a sort of pleasant shiver and looked at him curiously.

"Ah, she likes you," the giant said, looking as if he'd just had a theory proven true. "I thought she would. Yer mother had a way with unicorns."

Harry gave him a startled look and the unicorn edged away.

"You knew my mother?"

"Aye, I did, and a fine lass she was. Yer father too. A brave and truer friend I've never known. I used to work at Hogwarts as the grounds keeper while they was getting educated. Of course, that was until after the war."

Harry's thoughts exploded into a thousand different directions. Who was this man? How well did he know my parents? Why isn't he the grounds keeper anymore? Did he fight against or for Voldemort during the war? Did he work with my parents? Does he know about my godfathers? How much does he know about me? How much should I trust him?

"Ya look just like your father, but you 'ave your mother's eyes," Hagrid said, then turned away, and sniffed rather conspicuously. It occurred to Harry that Hagrid wasn't capable of deceiving anyone.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry arrived home at exactly one fifteen. He was tired, distracted, and completely ignored Snape's snide comment about his new white robe and badge. Instead, he went upstairs to shower and then pulled out his sketchbook. Yet his mind wouldn't let him concentrate on a single subject, and he found himself doodling and abandoning each doodle randomly. An hour later he gave up, and went to his trunk to get something else.

The wooden box he'd received during his last birthday was still there. He sat on his bed and studied it for a long time, running his fingers over the engravings. The password, his mother's favorite flower, still escaped him, and none of his memories of his home in Germany brought it to mind. Had she even had a favorite flower? Listing off several flowers that came to mind yielded nothing, and finally he set the box aside as well.

Why did it even matter?

His parents were gone, nothing more than memories and stranger's stories. In the wizarding world, a world they had denied him, he doubted they would have recognized him at all. Wizard, monster slayer, quidditch champion, duelist, black cat.

Prince.

And yet they remained a part of his life, trailing behind him as he looked ahead. Dogging his steps, hinting at a mysterious path that not only lead him away from the wizarding world but also back into it.

Where would their secrets take him next?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Herpetology is the study of reptiles and amphibians. Serpentology is the study of snakes specifically.

Book III:

Chapter 2: The Prince and the Moon Goddess

“Potter, stop fidgeting.”

Harry threw a mutinous glance at his potion's professor. He didn't know how the man could expect him not to fidget. Wizards had always seemed a very...er... proper(?) sort of people. For all their bad taste in fashion, one could rarely find a witch or wizard 'under dressed' or 'inappropriately revealing'.

Werewolves apparently couldn't be expected to adhere to the same unspoken dress code. Harry had understood this when he had met Sirius and the other werewolves, minimally clad in in leathers and furs.

Or at least he thought he had.

After two years of nothing more casual than a white button-up shirt, Harry had habituated himself to wearing layers outside of the bed and bathroom. Wearing only a pair of black drawstring shorts, his leather gauntlets which held his wand, and sandals left him feeling utterly naked, and standing in front of his potion's professor no less. Inana's cool, smooth skin encircling his throat and chest did nothing to distract him from that feeling.

He had been told not to wear anything else and to bring nothing but his wand and Inana, if he chose. It was disconcerting and thrilling and in this case a bit embarrassing. He was keenly aware that he looked scrawny despite his Quidditch exercises and his skin was pale and unhealthy looking from the neck down.

“Won't I get cold?” he asked, feeling strangely chilled already despite the summer heat.

“You will be provided for, as the Dark Lord's guest, but don't make a habit of whining about every little thing. They'll see it as a weakness.”

It had been two weeks since they had been informed of the date of the werewolf festival, and Snape's usual criticism of everything Harry had gradually morphed into warnings of Harry's doom at the hands (claws? teeth?) of his future hosts. As with all things Snape, Harry took it all with a healthy dose of indifference and skepticism.

There was a loud pop, and an unfamiliar wizard appeared on the road. After a moment, there were several more pops and more wizards, and amongst them was Voldemort himself. The Sentinels were all dressed in their usual uniforms, but there was nothing usual about the Dark Lord's attire.

He was stripped down to a pair of black leather pants, and a leather gauntlet on each lower arm. Around his body was a length of dark cloth that appeared black and then blood red and then forest green depending on how the light caught it, and secured in place by a garnet brooch inlaid with a silver serpent. He was decorated from the top of his head to tip of bare foot with ornaments of bones, tooth, leather, and feathers. In his hand, he held a spear in place of his wand, ashen white with symbols burned into it and armed with an obsidian spearhead. Nagini lay at his feet, coiling loosely around one of his ankles so that he might slip from her grasp easily enough.

Shaman.

The word flitted through him, not from his mind, but deeper to the part of him he knew belonged to the Earth.

He scampered ahead, while Snape followed more leisurely behind, eager to leave and face his fears and see his godfathers and whatever magic werewolves practiced. Voldemort greeted him with a patient indulgence, ruffling his hair when he came close. Without warning, he plucked off Harry's glasses and handed them Snape.

"These won't survive where we're going," he said, and Snape pocketed them and waited. "How are you, Severus?"

"Very well, my Lord."

"Any problems? I trust Harry is behaving?"

"Well enough, though he takes a firm hand, like all children."

Voldemort didn't doubt Snape's ability, but he did find it a bit amusing that the man thought he had some sort of control over his protege, especially when said protege didn't hold back the series of nasty looks the potion's master's comment earned him.

"No doubt you'll be enjoying your ten day reprieve. I wish I could stay longer to talk, but I am expected soon. Good day, Severus."

"Good day, my Lord," he said dutifully.

Harry was about to say something, but his words were lost when Voldemort's hand suddenly seized his shoulder and they apparated away. They reappeared without the entourage in a forest Harry recognized, despite his sudden blindness. The scent of it all was familiar to Harry, warm and sweet and earthy all at once, and the birds and insects sang out in a familiar tuneless song. A few paces away, he could make out a glowing green line in the shadows of the trees marking off the border of the werewolf territory.

Voldemort took a moment to gather up Nagini, who flickered her tongue curiously, but was otherwise limp and sedate. Inana reared up and flared her hood as they became more level, but the larger serpent merely chuckled mockingly. The Dark Lord smirked.

"Come along, Harry, they are expecting us."

They passed through the barrier effortlessly, and once inside a feeling of being watched came over the young Gryffindor. He scanned the surrounding vegetation, but heard and saw nothing.

"They are there," Inana reassured him. "I can taste them."

Voldemort nodded.

"Low level pack members only. They are here to alert their alpha when we arrive, and too timid to show themselves."

Try as he might, Harry could find none of them, although he felt their presence as they walked the two miles to the werewolf commune. Voldemort held light conversation with him along the way. He was appraised of Healer Meldwich's research and the progress that had been made in deciphering the limits of Parseltongue-to-English and vice versa translation.

"Healer Meldwich is an idiot," Harry said at last. "He goes on and on about how little a snake can understand in comparison with a human, but that's a lot less than what a snake understands that a human can't. He never listens to me when I try to explain this. Just bushes it off as unimportant or changes the subject. If you ask me, Hagrid understands animals a hundred times better than Meldwich ever will."

Voldemort started, but he recovered so quickly Harry didn't even notice.

"And who is this Hagrid?"

"He's... a sort of magical creature enthusiast. He takes care of the really big or dangerous or troublesome animals, and not just the snakes. He's raising a clutch of Irish Blue dragons and a unicorn, and he showed me how to ride a Hippogriff. I don't care how educated all those healers think they are, Hagrid's the one that got it right. Well... except for this odd idea that all creatures, especially dangerous ones, are all misunderstood babies, but... well every wizard seems to have his quirks."

It had been years since the Dark Lord had heard the name Rubeus Hagrid, and he could still recall him both as a boy and a man with this extreme love of any creature with a nasty disposition. He wasn't quite sure what had made him spare the oaf, for he was an abomination and worse yet, an idealistic and naïve one. Ah well, he was harmless.

They continued to chat for another twenty minutes, when the sound of people caught their attention. They crossed a narrow creek and found a road of compact earth, along which was the occasional man or woman or child bedecked in leathers, ivory, and fur. The werewolves all paused when they spotted the two, and bowed low when they passed and didn't look up until they were well ahead of them. Harry squirmed under their reverence and hoped none of it was directed at him.

At the end of the road, the werewolf commune appeared as a crowded mass of merchants, buyers, musicians, dancers, fighters, and riotous children. Many of the werewolves were painted with bright blue or red paint, some with runes, others with celestial symbols, and even more with shapes that seemed to signify some sort of status or occupation. The air was thick with the smell of cooking meats and somewhere a fiddler played a dancing tune over the merchants hawking their wares and the snarls of two young men boxing bare-fisted in a tight circle of spectators.

Harry tried to take it all in at once, but the commune was too crowded and quick and his vision too lousy to keep track of one thing let alone all of it. He was spared his dizzying assessment by the arrival of Fenrir Greyback. The Alpha was just as monstrously large and intimidating as Harry remembered him, and even Voldemort's solid presence couldn't keep Harry from retreating a few steps at his approach. The werewolf, dressed similarly to Voldemort, but for a sword rather than a staff and a fur of bright red in place of the shimmery tartan. Behind him followed some half a dozen other werewolves, attendants of some sort. Greyback's yellow eyes lingered on Harry's petite form for an intense moment, before he turned his attention to Voldemort. The two men, kings in their own right, greeted each other as friends and embraced as best the man eating snake between them would allow.

"Greetings to you, Lord of Snakes," Fenrir said in his growling rumble. "Arrangements for your stay have all been prepared. We are glad to have you. The moon will be in a powerful alignment this year."

"It is good to be here, Lord of Wolves. And yes, I have done the calculations as well. The signs are promising."

The two men turned away from their entourage and began walking towards the Western end of the grounds, discussing astrological alignments and goddesses and pack politics and various other things Harry could make neither head nor tails of. He hung back with the troupe that had accompanied Greyback to meet them, and noted that a few of them were familiar. Athena, for one, who now carried a young infant in a sling on her back, and snarled at all who crowded too close to her and her fragile charge. Also Jackal, who flashed a hungry grin at him, before turning his attentions to a lanky female.

He was looking for his godfathers, but they still managed to take him by surprise. One moment he was scanning the crowd around a fighting circle, and the next he was seized by either arm and practically carried away.

“Prongslet! Fancy seeing you here!” Remus greeted.

“And without your robes on. How scandalous!” Sirius laughed.

They pulled him along so quickly, that he was dragged clear out of sight before either Dark Lord or Alpha could be notified, let alone interfere. Harry pondered any potential trouble he might be in later, and dismissed it in favor of playing with his family.

“Oh, no, I've been abducted! You're not going to eat me, are you? I'm terribly bony. You might choke.”

“Well, since you aren't very appetizing,” Remus said, looking thoughtful, “we could initiate you into our pack. What do you say?”

“Would I get to stay up late?”

Sirius and Remus laughed and released him, letting him follow them behind a tent. There a girl, no older than Ginny, sat surrounded by buckets of red and blue paint. Both his godfathers bowed respectfully to her, and she gave them a distracted smile and gestured toward a stool in front of her. Harry took it as an invitation or possibly a gentle command and sat.

“Harry, this is Luna Moonshine,” Remus introduced, “She's... ah... she's a ?”

“I'm a goddess,” Luna offered, “A minor one.”

He blinked at her, and couldn't help but stare. She was very pale, but not from ill health, for she glowed just as Hagrid's unicorn had with implacable and incorruptible magic. Stone beads of every color were woven into her pale yellow hair, and dangled from her ears and her neck and arms and just about anywhere her skin was bare enough to be decorated. A cloth of the same material as Voldemort had worn was wrapped around her body in a tunic and held together with crescent moons carved of ivory. Pale blue eyes stared at him and though him and beyond him not with intensity, but a sort of benevolent indifference.

He did not doubt her claim for a moment.

"She acts as a conduit for her mother, the Moon Goddess, during the festival. She will paint your markings to describe your position in the Moon Goddess' favor," Sirius explained and gestured at the red triangles running up each of his arms and the thick red stripe that ran from his forehead to his navel. "These mean 'leader' and 'equally balanced'."

Remus' were different. His markings were blue and covered only the right side of his body, consisting of three bands around his arm and a series of interlocking loops from the tip of his toe to the top of his shoulder and down his back again.

"Mine mean 'mediator' and 'faithful'."

Harry nodded and turned back to Luna, who had already selected a bucket of red paint and was sorting through a variety of brushes. Having made her selections, she gently unwound Inana from his neck and placed her around her own, and the serpent went without protest.

"You are many things," she began, lifting her paint laden brush to sweep over his eyelids. "Your present is composed not only of your past, but of your future. Your future defines your past. Your past reveals your future. Your life is composed of destiny."

She was silent for a long moment, concentrating on the mask-like band of red she was creating over his eyes. Every so often she would pause to blow the paint dry, and Harry could feel magic in her breath, tingling like pins and needles. When he could open his eyes, his vision was perfectly clear.

“You are many things, more than destiny too. King and usurper. Truth seeker and conspirator. Soldier and ambassador. Earth and Heaven. In all things defiant. In all things defined.”

Her brush moved from his face to his neck, and he opened his eyes to watch. Luna was looking beyond him, looking to something he could only sense as the faintest touch of cool air at the base of his neck. Yet Inana was alert and focused on him, her majestic indifference replaced by a sort of fascination. Harry could not begin to guess what she made of all this. It might well be that she understood these symbols and Luna's words far better than he did. As a Queen of the Nile, she held some claim to the divine herself.

“Do you have any questions?” she asked, moving down to paint over his nipple. He felt himself darken with embarrassment and tried to think of something to distract himself.

“What is my destiny?” he said, though truthfully such a thing struck him as bit absurd.

“To succeed or to fail.”

“To succeed or to fail in what?”

“Too soon for that,” she said, moving along. She stopped for a moment, and looked him in the eyes. It was very brief, but for a split second her unfocused gaze found his and there was a sort of kindness. Or was it pity? “You will discover it on your own, but it is not a destiny to be shared. Even I have not been told.”

And he said no more and she said no more, and behind them Sirius and Remus guarded their privacy and shared concerned looks over this latest non-revelation. Luna worked steadily, but even so it took her almost an hour to complete her painting. Unlike his godfather's markings, his were not simple or easily defined, but a true piece of art. In the Celtic style, a dragon twisted and knotted its way up his right arm and a lion mirrored the pattern up his left, while a circle with an unfamiliar design rested over the center of his chest and a similar yet different symbol rested on his back. Finally, she painted a tiny little 'L' on his right pointer finger and then kissed it.

“She calls you Twilight Seeker, searching for truth in the light of day and the dark of night, but never becoming one or the other,” the strange little goddess said, smiling, and her eyes suddenly very definitely focused on him. “But I shall call you Harry.”

Heat blossomed from his cheeks and headed in every direction, darkening his skin like a evil storm cloud of embarrassment. He had thought Natalie very bold in her attentions at times, but even Natalie hadn't been so brazen as to paint her initials on him!

“Ah... I.. um... er... thank you?”

She laughed, and it sounded the same as the beads clacking together as she moved. Water and moonlight over stones. And somewhere the fiddler had been joined by a flute, and Luna leaped to her feet. She twirled around him, and with infinite grace replaced Inana around his neck and danced away. Harry could only sit and stare after her, befuddled, charmed, and embarrassed all at once.

A pinch to his cheek drew him out of his stupor.

“Ouch!”

Sirius laughed.

“Oh, if only your father could see this. His little Prongslet picking up girls. Ha ha!”

“Hey, I was not! I have no idea what just happened!” he protested, his face becoming even darker.

Remus wasn't at all helpful.

“I believe the muggle equivalent is 'she gave you her number'.”

He took Harry's hand, dangled the besmirched finger in front of his eyes. Harry quickly took his hand back and sat on it, scowling at the both of them.

"You're both being stupid! Why would a goddess flirt with a twelve year old?"

Sirius was grinning, so pleased by the turn of events and even more amused. Luna was an odd duck, there was no doubt about it, but she was beautiful and gentle and seemingly unreachable. Yet there she went, reaching out to his godson herself.

"A goddess wouldn't," Remus said, smacking Sirius upside the head when it appeared his musing were taking control of his reality. "But Luna is also a girl."

Harry gave him a confused look. Remus took pity.

"How to explain it? Well, lets just say that before Luna became a werewolf, she was completely normal... er... completely human, I mean. It wasn't until after she was bitten that she was able to commune with the Moon Goddess. Just like Sirius and I are part wolf and part human, so too is Luna part girl and part spirit."

"Guess which part likes you?" Sirius leered.

Harry petulantly ignored him. Seeing their godson's mood quickly souring, they dropped it for the time being, though there would be a more serious discussion between themselves when they were alone. They might be making fun, but the love of a goddess wasn't anything to snub, and could have serious implications later in the festival. Before that though, they had to properly prepare Harry for what he would see and do while there and what dangers to look out for.

"Come on, Seeker," the darker werewolf called, slapping his shoulder to get him up and following. "We need to get you some proper clothes. It wouldn't do to have my godson walking around looking like a weirdo."

"You're one to talk!"

Sirius just laughed and walked on, knowing both his mate and pup would follow.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort and Fenrir had reached the Dark Lord's temporary domicile, a large tent lavishly decorated without a trace of magical illusion, when they finally noticed the absence of Harry. The serpent king felt a vague thrill of alarm, but his host just let out an annoyed grunt.

“Blackbone, that over grown fox,” the alpha muttered.

Voldemort's alarm was now replaced with irritation. He had wanted Harry with him during the ritual preparations of the Marking and the Naming, and to ensure that all the werewolves present saw the boy with him and knew not to handle the human child too roughly. Yet the boy's godfather had run off with him. He was thinking very seriously about laying a curse on Sirius Black.

He passed the next couple of hours cleansing his tent with incense to entice spirits that associated themselves with the night, more specifically night times spirits that were affected by the cycles of the moon. Bird, insect, and flower spirits were the most common, and the weakest, yet they still had their uses. As did the demons, but he would need more than incense to entice those clever creatures into his claws.

From a particularly chatty dragon fly spirit he learned his ward had visited the child goddess and priestess Luna, and had been granted his pack name. Yet for all the spirit's cleverness it couldn't tell Voldemort what markings Harry had received, for dragonflies understood little about art or abstracts. The Mona Lisa would have held about as much meaning as a stop sign to it.

An owl spirit informed him that the boy was already mingling with some of the pack's children by starting a game of football. The boys, though the same age, were larger than Harry and leery at first of playing too roughly with stranger of some mysterious rank, yet Harry was more than up for some rough housing. He fought over the ball savagely, and though he was knocked over several times, he didn't whine once and leaped right back into the game. Two adult male werewolves were refereeing the match, one urging more playing and less fighting and the other urging the exact opposite.

The owl understood abstractions, but all of the boys had been half covered in mud from their play and Harry was no exception.

Voldemort had no sooner decided to let the child be and meditate on greater powers when the boy appeared at the entrance of his tent. He was dirty, bruised, and looked roguish with his tattoo-like markings. The Dark Lord gave him a thorough once over, unsure of what to make of them. The dragon and lion tattoos were easily enough to interpret, but the symbol for 'heaven' on the boy's chest was a bit baffling.

"I'm sorry I wandered off," Harry offered politely, though not the least bit contrite.

"No doubt. You seem to be enjoying yourself. The packs are treating you well?"

"Yeah, they're pretty normal accept for being half naked and all."

Voldemort's mouth twitched in amusement.

"Go to the creek we crossed earlier and wash up. There will be feast in a short while and I want you looking presentable while eating beside me."

"Yes, my Lord."

Harry disappeared, revealing the symbol for 'earth' on his back as he went, but a moment later he returned.

"Um, my Lord... do you have a pack name?"

Voldemort's smile was all teeth and malicious glee.

“Why yes. They call me God Eater.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry hadn't felt so excited since he'd gotten his wand and a whole world of possibilities, most beyond his imagination, had opened up to him. Now amongst a people, at once alike and utterly alien to his own, he felt yet another world opened, if not a door, a window through which he could see clearly. He found himself rushing from place to place, conversation to conversation, idea to idea, and soaking it all up without stopping to consider.

He knew if he stopped and thought about any of what was happening around him, he would be afraid. The werewolves were not as savage as most witches and wizards thought, but they were by no means gentle. They were hunters and gathers, as untamed as the land and its creatures. Adults and children alike were quick tempered, prone to bullying, to teasing, to testing for weaknesses.

Harry had to act assertive, more than would have been tolerated among more 'civilized' company. He could not stop to think about his chances of winning a fight against one boy or whether that particular woman expected him to pay for the meat she offered him. He had to throw punches and accept them and get up and eat and run away before the woman noticed he was done. If a strange girl dragged him off to a dance he didn't know, he would just have to do the best he could until he figured it out. If a strange man snapped at him, he had to dodge rather than freeze.

These instincts came naturally, from out of no where, and as Harry finally had a quiet moment to think about it, he thought it might be due to Luna.

“Do you think she... I dunno... blessed me?” he asked Inana, as he washed, knee deep in the creek. The cobra was sunning herself on a near by rock, and hadn't paid much attention to him after his meeting with Luna.

“Probably,” came the disinterested reply.

“Am I her boyfriend now?”

Inana snorted. Feeling stupid for asking, he concentrated on his washing for a long time. The mud came off easily, but the paint remained completely unaffected, as it would until a special oil was used to remove it at the end of the festival. When he was done, he sat down on a rock beside Inana and waited to dry enough to dress.

A sudden awareness of presence filtered through to his senses, much like it had when he'd first entered the werewolf territory, and he quickly threw on his shorts and stood up to look around.

Fenrir Greyback stood some twenty feet behind him, his expression dark and unreadable. Harry found his eyes riveted to the alpha's bright yellow gaze, but then realized such an act was considered a challenge to a werewolf and looked away. The werewolf king stepped forward. Harry stepped back.

“Don't run,” Greyback growled, “If you run, I'll have to chase you, and you won't like it when I catch you.”

Harry froze and the werewolf closed the space between them. The young Gryffindor struggled with himself not to look the man in the eyes, not to run, not to fidget, not to do anything other than stand straight, motionless, and staring straight ahead (which was left him level to the head of the skinned animal and its empty eye holes).

“Don't wet yer self, pup, I only wanted 'ta see for myself.”

The alpha grabbed his arm, relatively gentle considering he could have ripped it out of its socket, to inspect the lion, and then took the other to inspect the dragon. He spun Harry around to look at the symbol for 'Earth' on his back, and finally released him once his curiosity was satisfied.

“Luna's doing, then?”

Harry nodded.

“Your name?”

“Ha- I mean, 'Twilight Seeker'.”

Greyback grimaced.

“Awful name for a werewolf.”

“I'm not a werewolf,” he blurted, and wished he hadn't. The man glared at the boy, but he already looked contrite so there was no point in smacking him and he let it slide.

“True enough. Pity too. Luna doesn't take to very many, and never a man,” Greyback said offhandedly. “Are you afraid of her?”

Harry looked up at him in surprise, then looked away quickly again.

“No... should I be?”

“Yes.”

Greyback didn't elaborate. He walked off and within seconds disappeared completely. Harry didn't try to call back, despite the many new questions he had left behind on his brief visit. Why should he be afraid of Luna? Why didn't Luna get along with others? Had she done something that had scared the others? He didn't ask, and if it meant spending another minute in Greyback's dangerous company then he'd rather not know.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The feast took place outside in a large clearing, with a series of low tables laid out in a spiral, at the center of which a stage had been built for performances. There were no chairs, but furs and pillows had been laid on the ground so that everyone might sit or recline comfortably. Greyback sat closest to the stage, with his wife and brood of young but fierce looking offspring to his right, and Voldemort to his left. Harry was placed next to Voldemort, though he was allowed to wander to other places since he was still too young to be bound to the etiquette of rank.

He found himself near his godfathers more often than not, listening to their wild tales and meeting their equally wild friends and associates. Yet even they couldn't hold his attention all night, and he found the company of children closer to his age alluring. They had seen him sitting fearlessly beside Voldemort, and were eager to hear about the Dark Lord and Harry's mysterious position by his side. Harry couldn't define the relationship exactly, but he was amused enough by their fixation that he told them he was Voldemort's apprentice and deemed it accurate enough in his own mind.

Eating was a very small part of the festivities, though it was all as lavish as any Hogwarts' banquet. There were succulent meats of every kind, some Harry had never tried before and still some he had never even heard of before, prepared in a variety of manners—barbequed, baked, broiled, boiled, roasted, grilled, fried, stewed, seasoned, unseasoned, stuffed, shredded, whole, minced, curred, and raw. More surprising was the array of breads and fruits and vegetables available as well. Some of the berries and unusual roots were clearly gathered from the surrounding forest and gardens, and some of them held magical properties (or else got everyone thoroughly drunk very quickly), but just as common were imported items from other countries. Pineapples, oranges, lemons, peanuts, seaweed, rice, and various other non-native foods. When he had asked, Voldemort had told him that werewolves permitted to do business directly with muggles, and much of their monetary wealth came from acting as middlemen between muggles and wizards. Despite their unassuming dress and lifestyle, the werewolves were actually quite rich.

Or at least Greyback was. There was a heavy tax on the trade, which went to the alpha to determine how it might best be used to benefit all werewolves.

Still, the food played a minor role, serving only to satiate and energize those gathered for what followed. There was a tournament for wrestlers and another for boxers and still another for knife fighters (and there were almost as many women involved as men), all of which were fought in one round and were to be continued the next evening after the winners had rested and tended their wounds. Then there had been performances; dances, singing of ballads, acrobatics, fire jugglers, and a comedian who had Harry choking on his food.

It had lasted long into the night, and at some point Harry had leaned back into his pillows and nodded off. His dreams were strange, disjointed and abstract, filled with unfamiliar symbols and half-familiar places.

At one point, he dreamed of Luna, completely naked but for Inana wrapped around her shoulders, dancing on something that mirrored the three-quarter moon and the stars, but not Luna herself, who shone brighter than all of them. She danced and swayed and raised her arms to the sky and lowered them to his cheek, his eyes, his mouth.

When he woke up the next morning, he was exactly where he had fallen asleep, on a mound of pillows not far from the stage. What was not exactly the same was Luna curled up sleep beside him.

Completely naked.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Author's note: Firstly, yes, Luna Moonshine is Luna Lovegood. With a name like 'Luna' I don't know how she didn't end up a werewolf in Rowling's stories. Secondly, no, she did not have sex with Harry. She just has no sense of modesty or propriety.

Book III:

Chapter 3: The Prince and the Wolves

"It's nothing to be embarrassed about."

Harry gave Sirius a look that screamed teenhood was well on its way, along with the belief that all adults were idiots. Waking up next to a strange naked girl alone was awkward and embarrassing enough. Waking up next to a strange naked girl and having several hundred people there to see it as well, meant that the world was quickly coming to an end. He would never be able to look anyone in the face again.

So he had left, quickly and quietly, without waking Luna or a majority of the werewolves. Voldemort was nowhere in sight, but Greyback was, and though he didn't bother getting up from the comfortable pile of bodies he was lounging against, his yellow eyes followed Harry's retreat intently. The boy couldn't go far though, knowing he couldn't leave the territory and completely unfamiliar with the terrain. His godfathers had found him early, and sensing his anxiety, had taken him deep into the forest to talk and think in private.

"Look, Harry, it's just a werewolf thing. I've woken up several times next to naked people and not remembered how... in fact, I was the naked person on several occasions," Sirius supplied unhelpfully.

Remus slapped him upside the head, and tried himself.

"What the big idiot is trying to say, Harry, is that no one is going to think it was odd or sexual or anything like that. Luna just had one of her... 'conversations' with the Goddess that inspired a good dance- which is too bad you missed because it was really something- and then was exhausted afterwards. She might have laid down anywhere, but it just happened to be beside you. Nothing to get embarrassed about. Alright?"

"Mmm."

Harry never really considered himself a sulker, and found the behavior extremely annoying in others, but try as he might he couldn't stop thinking about that morning and since none of his thoughts were particularly happy he wasn't either.

Sirius sighed.

"Harry, you can't stay out here forever. You're going to have to return eventually and face this. You'll just get teased more if you run away."

"I'm not running away!" Harry snapped, pride prickling. "I'm just trying to figure this out. I mean, how am I suppose to act? What is Luna gonna do? What does she expect? Why does she even like me? And what about the others? How are they gonna act to some outsider running around with their goddess? I mean, isn't that kind of... taboo? Or something?"

Sirius waved it off as insignificant.

"She won't be goddess for much longer. The fact she's showing you attention is just a symptom of that. She'll just be a regular girl soon."

"What?"

"Luna's divinity is fleeting," Remus supplied, "Once she... ah, becomes a 'woman'. Then her body becomes her own to do what she will, and the goddess inhabiting her body will move on. Treat her like you would any other girl. I imagine that's all she wants. She wants a boy, who hasn't looked at her as goddess all her life, to treat her like a regular girl."

Harry thought on Remus' words, found that they fit, and aside from the embarrassment of that morning, they cured most of his worries. He could be friends with a girl. He had several girlfriends...er... girls who were friends already.

"Will Greyback be alright with that?" he found himself saying, recalling the alpha's intent gaze that morning and the day before at the stream. "I mean... even if she isn't a goddess, she's still a werewolf of his pack right? Like a niece or a cousin twice removed or something? I know he doesn't like wizards any... except for Voldemort of course, but he's... well...Voldemort."

Sirius and Remus shared a look, and Harry caught it easily and frowned.

"What? What did I say?"

Remus looked away, and Sirius stood up and paced, trying to think of what he wanted to say. It made Harry nervous.

"Yes..." Sirius said darkly, "He is Voldemort. You have nothing to fear if Voldemort doesn't allow it."

The hatred in his godfather's voice was earth shaking. Not even Greyback had earned that depth of venom and scorn. It brought back to mind that Sirius and Remus were a part of Greyback's pack, not as an eccentric lifestyle choice, but as a punishment for treason. Treason against the Dark Lord that had overthrown everything they had known, likely killed friends and family, chased his own family from their native land, and whom they had risked their lives to fight against.

And Harry had spent Christmas with him.

A great unease came over the young Gryffindor, a fear of what his godfather's must have heard about him and Voldemort, and what they thought of him because of it. He wondered what they would have thought if they knew the entire truth of what happened between them since that fateful meeting at the Welcoming Feast.

They hadn't accused him of anything, hadn't even asked, and he had naively assumed it wasn't important to them. But now Sirius was pacing, and Remus was looking anywhere but at Harry, and this was obviously something that was important to them.

After an awkward silence, Sirius spoke again, this time more calmly and looking directly at his godson.

"Harry... are you alright?"

The boy was baffled.

“I mean, are you alright with your situation? Are you unhappy or... scared? Does he treat you well? Does he make sure you are treated well by others?”

Harry fidgeted. He wasn't entirely sure how he should answer that, but he didn't want his godfather to hate him. What did he want to hear? That Harry was safe and happy and perfectly content with his excellent education, his new clothes, his chance to see his godfathers? That he was miserable, frightened, and hated the Dark Lord for trapping him in his own private library of lies where curses and monsters lurked in the aisles? Neither was true, neither was false, but his shelves were starting to creak under the weight of his falsehoods so he told the truth.

“I suppose I'm... happy and unhappy and scared and excited and... I dunno. There are some things I don't like... like having to lie all the time.. because I do you know. I have to lie to everyone, even you, even when I really don't want to. And I don't like living with Snape, cause he's a crotchety old bat...”

Remus' lips twitched, but Sirius remained oddly stoic.

“And some of the things I've seen Voldemort do... I hate it. He frightens me... but also... I sort of... he's shown me other things. Not all of it was bad. He showed me about where magic comes from and he gave me Elsbeth and this really neat compass thingy and let me write to you and visit this summer and I love all of that, so I'm grateful too. And the school, oh I love Hogwarts, even though it frightens me sometimes, just like Voldemort does. I have these great friends, and they're all so clever and interesting and brave in their own ways. We have so many adventures, and not just those little kiddy adventures you pretend to have when your small, but real, dangerous adventures that get to be put in books and newspaper articles. And Quidditch! I love flying in Quidditch! And Dueling Club too, even though Ron the Prat got selected as Junior Captain because of that bastard Snape. But... yeah. I guess I'm happy, except when I'm not. But everyone is like that, aren't they?”

Sirius said nothing for a long moment, simply staring down at Harry and weighing his words, his body language, and his scent in equal measure to discern the truth in that jumble. It was his duty and his privilege to protect his best friends' son, and not the law, his alpha, a Dark Lord, or Harry's own reluctance to worry him would get in the way of that. Yet he could sense nothing amiss. His godson, despite his admittance of being a liar, was being completely honest at the moment.

Yet, Sirius still felt ill at ease.

"Yes, I suppose that's true... but things can go bad real quick, especially when you're surrounded by powerful and arrogant people like Voldemort and his Death Eaters. Remus and I, we've been thinking long and hard about it, and we wanted you to have a way out if you had to or if you simply decided to."

Harry's eyes widened.

"A way out? Of what?"

Sirius hesitated, but Remus gave him a reassuring look and nodded at him to continue. They both looked around intently for a moment, wary of spies despite the unlikelihood of anyone sneaking up on the two lycanthropes.

"Out of Britain. If things turn ugly, you'll have to leave the country all together. There's no where safe here, if the Dark Lord turns on you..."

Harry felt a shiver run up his spine. He knew that wasn't true. There was nowhere safe anywhere if the Dark Lord turned on him. No where on an Earth that loved him more than anyone else.

Sirius gave him a sympathetic look, and continued.

"Anyway, I have a house, or rather I had a house. It's probably half rotted away by now, but it's under a spell so that no one can find it unless I want them to. I want you to know it. If you ever need a secret place to stay, go there, and no one will ever be able to find you. I have a wizarding friend I've managed to give some items to. If you get to the house, look in the ice box, and you'll find everything you need to get to Europe, including a list of some people that would be willing to take you in, old friends of your parents as well as some of my own."

Harry could only stare at his godfather. It was true he had thought about possibly escaping Britain before, but that was a long time ago before Hogwarts had become a home and before he had made himself a sort of family. Now the thought of leaving was sad, terrifying, and lonely.

But if things went bad like Sirius said, they would go very bad, and wasn't it better to have a last resort than no options at all?

"Okay. What should I do if I... have to leave?"

Sirius sighed in relief, and gave him his plan.

oo
oo

After the revelry of the day and night before, morning in the werewolf settlement was relatively lethargic. Many of the pack had moved from the feasting area to the shade of a tree or a tent to nap or do some mundane task in the shade. Fenrir Greyback was no exception. He and his entire family had moved to their private lodge.

Among them was Luna.

She did not have a lodging of her own, nor anywhere she stayed regularly, but of the places she liked best she supposed her alpha's home was it. It was crowded, dark, and smelled of earthy things. The children were napping upstairs, so it was less crowded, but that was good too because she needed to think.

Most people who watched her at all, thought all she ever did was think, but the opposite was true. Very little of Luna's mind was devoted to considering herself or her environment at all. Of course, as a goddess, she never had to figure things out. She just knew. Most of the time anyway.

Today she didn't know something, and now she had to think about it. It was quite a wonderful experience. Full of strange emotions like uncertainty, frustration, and wonder.

It was almost enough to make her get up and pace, but Athena was sitting behind her on the kitchen bench, brushing her hair. That was wonderful too. Funny how she had never realized it before. The alpha female's rough, calloused hands threading through strands of hair, easing the knots away at the barest touch, and singing the only lullaby she knew.

"I'd put my own sweet childie to rest... In a cradle of gold... In the bough of a willow... To the sholuen sho of the wind of the west..."

It was slow and peaceful and so full of affection, and Luna felt herself giving as well as accepting it all for once.

"And the lullo-a-lo of the soft sea-lil-low... Sleep, baby dear... Sleep without fear... Mother is here, beside your pillow..."

Athena stopped for a moment, undoubtedly surprised, but a moment later she joined in and they sang together.

"Sleep, baby dear... Sleep without fear... Mother is here, beside your pillow..."

This was the happiest Luna had ever felt since she'd become a werewolf and a goddess. In fact, it was perhaps the only thing she had ever truly felt for herself.

And it all started with Harry.

Oh, it wasn't because of Harry. This transformation was inevitable, and she understood that, but it had begun with the boy. That strange boy with the pretty eyes and the proud mouth and the fearless body and that secret fate. It had to have been the secret that made her feel this way. Nothing had ever been kept a secret from her before. Even when she prodded her mother for answers, the secret remained.

She had felt curiosity, and that in itself was curious, and thus this feeling of self awareness had grown. Then came the awareness of others. Awareness that some people were stronger than others, braver, more beautiful or handsome or fierce or kind, and then that she liked certain traits better than others. She liked the curious children more than the obedient ones, and the women who smiled over the ones who were more beautiful, and the men who laughed more than they fought.

She liked Harry most of all, she thought. He was curious about everything, smiled over everything, and laughed at everything. He wasn't afraid of the pack, though he was smaller than most and smelled of prey, and reminded her inexplicably of a young male buck. Proud, graceful, and energetic.

That's how she liked to think of him. As her 'Deer' one, and it was her first joke, even if it were only to herself.

Her singing trailed off, her rush of thoughts suddenly just too much and she felt herself sliding back into the all-knowing state that was the goddess.

That's when she noticed Greyback was watching her, and she knew what he was thinking too. He was thinking about her becoming his daughter when the goddess finally left, about Harry's hold over her, over Blackbone and Silvermoon, and over the God Eater. He was thinking about missed opportunities and opportunities to come. His thoughts were hot and slick like the blood she could always smell on him when he passed close to her.

Something in her trembled, beneath the goddess, and whether it was fear or pleasure she wasn't sure.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The days passed with sun and rain in equal measure, and Harry found himself extremely busy and yet floundering for something to do. The werewolf boys around his age had taken a strange sort of liking to him, which very much resembled hate. They pranked him constantly, or tried to anyway, to see how many tricks he would or wouldn't fall for and to see just how he might trick them back. Harry, having the benefit of a wand and two years under the tutelage of the Weasley twins, won out more often than not.

The girl's weren't any better, and kept teasing him for being a 'cute little boy', kissing and pinching his cheeks, before running off in feigned terror when chased after them. It wasn't uncommon for him to be minding his own business, when some random girl would suddenly grab hold of him and drag him into a dancing circle he didn't know the steps to or tossed into a wrestling match over some one he'd never even heard of.

Sirius thought it was hilarious and slipped in a few jokes of his own. Harry was not at all pleased to find Inana missing and then found only when several woman came screaming out of the communal bathhouse.

He left the retaliation up to Remus though, whose experience ran decades over Harry's paltry two years.

Their talk that morning in the forest was not mention again, and by all appearances had never happened, but Harry recalled his instructions perfectly. It was suppose to reassure him, he knew, but it did exactly the opposite. Suddenly, he had a new option he had never considered before, and it was an unpleasant choice in response to even more unpleasant possibilities. Exile or worse, was what it boiled down to.

And yet another secret, this one he would have to keep from Voldemort and Snape, who specialized in uncovering other people's secrets.

He wished his godfathers had said nothing.

Perhaps he should have put ink in their flasks.

But there was nothing for it but to distract himself. The craftsmen and women were not secretive of their trade, and if ever he stopped to watch them work they readily explained. The leather smiths showed him how to use every centimeter of skin for something. The glassblower how to handle the hot glass so it didn't shatter, and what minerals would change the colors once melted. The weapon's smith showed him how to carve an arrowhead from obsidian, flint, and bone. Remus taught him how to care for a bow. Sirius taught him how to shoot with it.

Perhaps Harry's only true regret in coming to the werewolf settlement was that he couldn't bring his sketchbook with him, for everywhere he looked there was something he wanted so desperately to commit to paper. To make up for it, he tried his hand at some other crafts he thought to make gifts of.

Jewelry of turquoise for Hermione, green malachite for Natalie, and red carnelian for Ginny, all done in richly complicated patterns with the help of several of the more vain she-wolves to offer him tips. With Sirius and Remus' help, he was able to construct another two sets of personalized leather gauntlets for both Clyde and Draco, and while they were at it, his godfather's took measurements for a breastplate and leg guards for Dueling club. It turned out to be simpler than he thought to manipulate the leather, and the only really tricky part came when they had to varnish the leather so it would be waterproof and stiffen to provide the intended protection without chaffing.

After a hard day of working and playing and avoiding being played with, Harry would settle down beside Voldemort on the feasting grounds, and they would eat and watch the stage performances and talk of the day's events. Voldemort rarely had much to say, at least to him, but Harry suspected much of what the Dark Lord did involved earth magic and lots of meditating.

Even as the end of the festival drew near there was still much to see and do, and with each passing night the werewolves became more and more wild and unpredictable. The familiar traditions of fighting and merry making were gradually replaced with more mystical rituals. Bards that had sung of the seasons and love and foolishness began singing of ancient legends, hunts, sacrifices, the moon and all her many faces. The stage had been torn up and mangled in a seemingly mad pique by several young adults, who set it alight so that they might dance around it late into the night, singing and howling and kissing and biting.

Tensions finally culminated with the hunt. One minute Harry and the rest of the pack were huddled together in their shelters during an afternoon shower, and then suddenly there was a sound from some sort of horn, and all the adult men and women moved out into the rain and into the forest without a word. Harry was too stunned to do anything for a moment, and when he finally realized something was happening, he got up to follow.

He didn't make it far before Voldemort stopped him, just outside the settlement. He did not look alarmed, but the grip he took on Harry's arm was firm.

"This is not an affair for men," the Dark Lord said, turning his ward back towards the shelter of the settlement. "The moon will be full tonight. You will remain with me for the rest of our stay."

Harry seemed disappointed, but that hardly phased the man. The lycanthropes would be at their most savage today, and tonight that savagery would peak in a transformation of both body and mind, so he could not risk having the boy wander the camp freely. He had seen too many interested in Harry to risk leaving him unattended.

"I would like your help," he said, hoping to turn Harry's disappointment into interest. It seemed to work. "I am going to set up a barrier so that we might observe the transformation safely, and I need to prepare it before tonight."

"We're going to see that? Won't they try to kill us?"

"Hence the barrier. This will be a time of intense magical resonance, and I intend to tap into that. You recall last winter?"

Voldemort watched interest turn into excitement at the prospect of another round of Earth magic, and felt a stirring of enthusiasm himself.

The Dark Lord always enjoyed those brief communications between he and the Earth, but before Harry he had never particularly cared to share the experience with anyone. Yet here was a pupil who understood the beauty of the magic itself, and not just the intended after affects of magical sensitivity and increases in power and otherwise unattainable knowledge.

For the first time since they arrived, they spent their time together in uninterrupted company. There was a brief stop at Voldemort's tent, which Harry was startled to find full of ... things. At first they appeared to be little more than random puffs of smoke, sometime in different colors and sometime moving around, but the longer he studied them the more they seemed to take form. In fact, if he stared at any 'puff' long enough it turned into something. A bird. A spider. A fairy?

"They're spirits," Voldemort explained. "If you grant them enough of your concentration, they can take more solid forms. The trick is getting them to come near you. Communing with the Earth helps a great deal with that. Come on, I will teach you that later."

They went back out into the rain, and into the field were a charred pile of rubble marked the former location of the stage. The tables and cushions had all been removed, leaving the area clear to work with.

First, Voldemort cast a spell to keep the rain out of the their work area, and then they both worked for almost an hour scouring a fifteen by fifteen foot area for litter and debris. Another hour was spend scouring the area clean of impure spirits, accomplished by burning a fragrant bush of some kind. Harry could feel the difference in the air afterwards, and marveled at how clean the air felt and tasted.

At last came the barrier itself. It was not the same one they used that winter. The outline was of two squares over-lapping each other at forty-five degrees, creating a perfect eight pointed star. In each of the eight points they buried a silver coin, each marked with a different rune and a moon at a different phase.

"This is what will keep the werewolves at bay. If even one coin were incorrectly placed, the barrier would fail."

"I've seen this before," Harry said, his brow creased in concentration. "In arithmancy class, but I didn't realize this is what it was used for."

Voldemort smiled, pleased that the boy had made the connection.

"Arithmancy as a study arose much later than the use of the geometric patterns themselves. The study was originally intended to explain how such symbols worked, and later how to create new symbols for different purposes. It wasn't until about the sixteenth century before it incorporated things like numerology, and its true purpose was muddled."

He let the possibilities of what he was saying sink in, and set about making the next symbol. Octagons were hard to work in because they lent themselves poorly to purposes outside of barriers and tended to disrupt the magic of circles. So he drew another square first, and set the four main elements to each side: a candle for fire, a bowl for water, a tiny sapling for earth, and a butterfly safely ensconced in a basket for air.

"These will counteract the magical disruption within the barrier, without affecting the magic of the barrier itself. Now for the hard part."

For this Harry had to wait outside the barrier, in the rain unfortunately, but he didn't utter a peep of complaint. He simply watched intently as Voldemort drew a circle and within that circle a pentagram, and within that pentagram a crescent moon surrounded by some twenty or so unfamiliar symbols.

Then Harry was called back into the barrier, and together they pricked their fingers on Voldemort's obsidian spear, and let their blood drip on to the ground

Nothing happened.

Voldemort laughed at Harry's crestfallen look.

"Don't look so upset. We're communing with the Moon tonight, not the Earth. She has to come out first. Come. There is still more to do."

When the werewolves all came back late that afternoon, Harry was ready to run out and greet them, but Voldemort held him back. It was a good thing too, for when they got closer, Harry could see they were all covered in blood.

Harry nodded, unable to speak as Luna, the most blood drenched of them all, saunter past them towards the main lodge. She offered him a bloody grin as she went, and still none of her ephemeral luminosity faded.

How Voldemort remained above such hungry regard, Harry couldn't fathom, but where ever the man went the wolves slunk away or bent to his demands, from oldest to youngest, omega to alpha. Only Greyback was unintimidated, though he too remained respectful.

“Yes,” Voldemort agreed. “I’ve sensed it too.”

Greyback's yellow eyes spun to Harry.

“Can he handle it?”

Voldemort didn't even bother to answer. Harry's defiant glare at the Alpha spoke for itself.

The rest of the day passed in a tense quiet, the werewolves busy securing their belongings from their own inevitable rampage of destruction, and preparing places to rest and recover for the morning after. Harry and Voldemort kept mostly to themselves, the elder teaching Harry how to give the spirits solid shapes. The boy was still too inexperienced to hear what the spirits said or to summon them, but even this faint relationship he formed with them pleased the Dark Lord immensely. More and more his knowledge made Harry closer to the Earth, and her hold over his soul strengthened.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The rain stopped well before evening, and the clouds retreated to the south, leaving the sky clear for the rest of the night. The only two humans in the settlement went to the barrier an hour before sunset, and half an hour before the packs swarmed into the clearing like ants. The barrier was already active, and though they hadn't transformed yet, no one but Harry and Voldemort themselves were able to enter their fifteen ft² of space.

And that was a very good thing, because even before their shift, the werewolves were thrumming with latent violence. Fights broke out everywhere, between aggravated males, females savagely guarding their children, and the children bullying each other, and were suppressed even more violently by the pack alphas. Around their barrier, several men and women were pacing, and Harry could feel his heart hammering against his chest.

At last the sun sunk behind the trees, and a quarter of an hour later a fat yellow moon rose to take its place. The affect was instantaneous, and even if Harry had been deaf and dumb, he would have known something was stirring. The hairs on the back of his neck stood up and goosebumps shivered down his body. The barrier beneath his feet started to glow, and a sort of humming started, like electricity through a power line.

The awareness sprung up through the souls of his feet, different than before. It was awareness from a different perspective, he realized. The Moon was not the Earth, and She felt and experienced things differently.

For one, She rather enjoyed insanity.

There was plenty to go around. The awareness was more focused as well, and it lingered around the mass of bending and breaking bodies crowded into the clearing. Hundreds of cries of agony and the crunch and snap of bone, failed to convey what it felt like. Harry felt as if his own body were changing, while at the same time perfectly aware that it wasn't, and the insanity brought on by the pain was nothing compared to the mad blood lust that soon followed. Screams gave way to howls until every werewolf, from the tiniest pup to the most wizen and frail called out in a deafening exaltation to the the sky.

Harry fell to the ground, convulsing in pain and fear, every part of his body and mind resonating and resisting the power of their savagery. But the Moon was not finished, for no sooner than he thought he was going to die of pain, it all retreated like tsunami back into the ocean. He lay there, wrecked and baffled by what had happened. Weakly, he turned his head to Voldemort.

The man was still standing, though leaning heavily on his spear, expression tight. His eyes were luminescent red as they found their way to Harry.

"Wait for it."

And it came. Gently at first, like a soft breeze, warm with affection and tenderness. The werewolves around them shifted, feeling it as keenly as they, their muzzles pointed fixedly on the Moon. The feeling grew stronger, becoming joy and another jolt of awareness, bringing in to stark clarity all that hid from the sun. Night birds and beasts, the shadow fae, ghosts, and most vibrantly of all- dreams. Thousands and thousands of dreams, all with their own unique scent and flavor, floating in the wind or caught in the boughs of willows and the blossoms of moon flowers.

Harry lifted his hands, wiggling his fingers as a nightmare slip through them, tingling and smelling vaguely of sulfur.

And the feeling grew and the awareness, spreading over wider grounds and delving deeper into things Harry had never conceived of. Love and blood lust and freedom from fear found in bondage to rage and the Earth sighing blissfully under the Moon's passionate touch.

The werewolves knew only a fraction of it, but that was enough to have them trembling with power and need. Quickly, they dispersed, forming into smaller packs to scour the surrounding forest for food and enemies, in the back of their primeval minds the Moon ran Her fingers through their fur affectionately and urged them on.

At last, the field was empty of all but handful of females with pups too young to follow and...

Luna.

Harry knew her immediately. Of all the werewolves, she was the most beautiful. Brilliant white with silver eyes that stared with curiosity rather than hunger as she trotted towards the barrier. He was aware of her, and yet he was only aware of her enough know that she was hiding from his awareness. She was not open like the other werewolves or the rest of the world or Voldemort who was now as keenly interested in her approach as Harry was. Still, she was so beautiful, and his body hummed with the special love the Moon felt for its daughter.

He sat up, swooned a bit, but managed to climb to his hands and knees and crawled a bit closer to meet her at the barrier's edge. He watched her sniff at the ground, the air, huff in annoyance, then trot away, circling the perimeter.

"What is she doing?" he asked.

"I don't know."

Voldemort was uneasy. Harry could feel it through their connection, not as deep or loving as it was in the Earth Circle, but clear and telling just the same. Luna was a goddess after all, and despite his pack name, Voldemort wasn't entirely sure he could defeat her while she was in her most powerful form on the second most powerful moon of the year.

This uncertainty should have bothered Harry, but he was finding it hard to concentrate on anything other than how beautiful and graceful Luna looked as she circled. At last she stopped and sat down in front of Harry and waited. He smiled at her. She smiled back, and that made Harry laugh riotously. Luna just kept smiling and wagging her tail, asking to play, and Harry wanted to.

Everything was tilted and skewed. The word 'lunatic' stumbled through his brain like an answer searching for a mystery to solve.

Was that what was happening? Was the Moon driving him insane?

It must be, because he was crawling closer to the barrier's edge to Luna, reaching out towards her.

"Harry, stop."

It took a moment for Harry to realize it was Voldemort who had spoken, which was funny, because he was supposed to be aware of him, but the only thing in his attention was Luna who he wasn't aware of at all. His didn't stop, possibly wasn't able to, and his hand touched fur and sunk deep into it. It wasn't very soft, but it was thick and warm and so bright against the dark of his skin.

Luna just kept smiling at him as he ran his hand over her shoulder, her neck, her ears which were the softest part, and finally towards her face. She nuzzled his hand affectionately, her mouth opening to lick his palm, to nibble gently with her great white-

Voldemort's hands pulled him away harshly, and Luna snapped after the retreating hand. She snarled when Harry moved completely out of range, snapping and clawing angrily at the air. Gone was the playful pup, and in her place raged a scorned goddess. The barrier rippled under the force of her magic, and the Dark Lord spun quickly to defile the crescent moon symbol with the obsidian head of his spear and draw a new one. Dazed and finally frightened, Harry could only shuffle out of the man's way until it was complete. Immediately, the barrier strengthened and cackled with renewed magic, causing Luna to yelp and retreat a ways.

Voldemort and Harry could only stare at one another and wonder what had just happened.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry arrived at the house shortly after noon. He was bone tired, and wanted nothing more than to take a real shower and go to sleep till the beginning of the school year. He dragged himself up the gravel path to the house, a satchel full of souvenirs slung over his shoulder that felt like it was full of bricks. The front door was lock when he tried it. Unsurprising since he was a day earlier than expected.

The full moon had left everyone exhausted and several injured, which meant the festivities were officially over. Voldemort hadn't wanted to linger after Luna's botched attempt at turning Harry into a werewolf, and told Greyback as much. The Alpha couldn't really argue, although even Harry could tell he was disappointed that the young goddess had failed. Harry would have liked to have said goodbye to his godfathers properly, but hadn't been able to muster the effort in the face of the Dark Lord's insistence.

He shook his head, bringing his thoughts back to the present. Everything else could be dealt with after he slept. He rang the door bell. A moment later the door opened.

Harry blinked in surprise.

Hermione blinked back.

"What are you doing back so soon?" she said, moving so he could step inside. "And what in Merlin's name happened to you?"

He was too tired to be embarrassed, but he could just imagine what she saw. Harry, sun-baked, half dressed, still in his paints, laden with all sorts of primitive ornamentation, and without his glasses no less.

“Bloody hell, Potter, did you go to visit the werewolves or go undercover to spy on them?!”

“Good to see you too, Malfoy, now what are you both doing here?”

Draco was too busy ogling Harry to bother with a reply, so Hermione explained.

“Narcissa always sends us to spend a week with Uncle Severus in the summer. We were going to surprise you when you got back. Ah... surprise?”

“Yes, Hermione, yes it is.”

oo
oo

Since Harry's surprise was spoiled, they decided to surprise Snape instead. The man spent the entire afternoon in his potions lab, leaving Harry plenty of time to shower, nap, and then tell both his friends a little of what had happened before he appeared.

“That's insane,” Draco said, and the story was only half way through. “You're insane. Your first girlfriend was a werewolf?”

“Technically, she was a goddess and also, no, she wasn't my girlfriend... I don't think...”

Hermione had pulled out her quik-quotes quill and was scribbling down everything he said, completely enraptured with his tale.

“Oh, I never dreamed werewolves lived such magically rich and complicated lives. I don't think I've ever read even half of this stuff before.”

“Well, I doubt this sort of thing was normal before the Snake and Wolf Treaty. After all, werewolves didn't live in communities before that, did they? At least not in the last couple of centuries. I bet a lot of this stuff they just developed recently.”

“I suppose your right, but even that is interesting. Imagine building an entire culture in less than a generation? I would love to read a case study on their cultural anthropomorphism.”

Draco yawned.

“Oh, shut up, Draco!”

“What? I didn't say anything. Besides, we were talking about Harry's girlfriend. The one who happens to be goddess, not cultural ants, ropes, and morphisms. So what was she like?”

Harry thought for a moment.

“Well, she was nice I suppose, until she tried to eat me.”

Snape had chosen that exact moment to wander into the living room and find his godchildren sitting around a savage looking creature who happened to sound like the bane of his existence. He hesitated in the doorway just long enough to hear Draco's question and Harry's answer, before turning around again in search of the liquor cabinet.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. This is a real lullaby, called An Irish Lullaby with words by Alfred Perceval Graves and music by Charles Villier Stanford.

Book III:

Chapter 4: The Huntress

“That's enough, Shuref.”

The viper obediently pulled away from the 'milking jar', drops of his precious venom pooling at the bottom. Harry hissed words of thanks and praise to him, caressing the top of his head in the way he liked best, before returning the snake to its enclosure. He turned to Healer Coulter and handed her the jar with barely a glance.

“That's the last of it, I think.”

The woman eyed the jar and then Harry with a sort of fondness he didn't reciprocate.

“We'll miss you around here, Harry. You're a very interesting young man.”

Harry wasn't sure what she wanted, but he had made his dislike of her clear from the first day and if she thought he was going to change his mind now she was sorely mistaken.

“Goodbye, Healer Coulter.”

“Aren't you going to say goodbye to Healer Reed and Meldwich?”

He didn't bother to reply, but left the artificial jungle without looking back at her. After half a summer of being treated like a particularly clever guinea pig, there was only one person in the bestiary that he felt he owed a proper goodbye to. He descended the stairs, dropped off his lab coat and security badge at the front desk, and headed out to the recently added dragon nursery, little more than a dome of fireproof stone with a massive steel door. Hagrid was there, using his break to read the newspaper to his clutch of three tiny Irish Blues. The half-giant insisted that even though they didn't understand a word, they loved to listen to the sound of their 'mama's' voice. Harry thought this true, but only because the babies had very poor vision and liked to know in which direction they should blow their flames.

“... and despite the Sentinel's diligent search, no trace of the prisoner has been found. It is believed, that as an Auror of the old Ministry, Moody had inside knowledge of the workings of Azkaban and law enforcement procedures, which were used in his escape- oh! Hey, there 'Arry!”

“Hey, Hagrid. What'cha reading?”

The man smiled and showed him the article. The paper was badly singed, evidence of the Irish Blues enthusiasm for their 'story time', but Harry could make out the picture of a rather frightful looking man with a dirty eye-patch and a headline reading:

FORMER AUROR ESCAPES 'UNESCAPABLE' PRISON

“That there is an old acquaintance of mine, and your folks too. He was part of the Old Crowd. His name is Alaster Moody, but we all called him Mad-Eye. One leg and one eye and still causing the Dark Lord's cronies hell,” Hagrid chuckled, and Harry smiled.

All summer the half-giant had been telling him tales about the war, and some of the adventures he and the 'Old Crowd' had while working for Dumbledore to stop the Death Eaters. It was strange to hear names of people he knew and liked or at least respected being cast as both heroes and villains, but with Hagrid telling the tales it had all the wonder and believability of a child's fairy tale. It was fun, like making his mother Snow White, Headmistress Lestrage the evil witch, and all his friends as the dwarfs.

“It's a strange world, 'Arry,” Hagrid continued, turning to stop a scuffle between two of his dragons, who thanks him promptly by setting his beard alight. The half-giant had it out again with practiced ease in a mere second or two. “Used to be men like Moody going around catching men like Malfoy. The whole place goes topsy turvy in a year, and half the time you can't even tell the difference.”

“Is it like that saying? You know, 'the more things change the more they stay the same'?”

Hagrid thought for a moment and then nodded in agreement.

“Aye, tha'd be it. Just like that. You're a clever one, 'Arry. You'll do good in life. Speaking of which, it's almost time for school again, ain't it? Ya ready ta go?”

“I can't wait. I haven't seen my friends since my birthday and then we only went shopping for school supplies. Plus, no more living with Snape for the summer or those silly etiquette lessons or Healer Meldwich or... is it bad that I enjoy the school year more than the summer break?”

Hagrid burst out laughing.

“Nothing wrong with liking school. It's probably more of a home than anywhere else at the moment. You wouldn't be the first to think so and you won't be the last.”

oo
oo

Harry straightened his tie as an excuse to look at his reflection in the station house window, looking for any remainder of the pale band of skin over his eyes that marked where his ritual paint had been. After nearly a month, the untanned skin had mostly darkened to match the rest of his complexion, but underneath his shirt Harry could still quite clearly see where the symbols had been. He wasn't intending to make his vacation into werewolf territory public knowledge, and trying to explain his markings might prove a bit awkward.

“Mr. Potter, if you don't stop fidgeting with your tie, I will be forced to strangle you with it.”

Harry looked over at his potion's professor, standing stiffly ahead of him. The man was just as dour and unpleasant as ever, and despite spending almost an entire summer with him, Harry couldn't say he was any more or less fond of the man. Snape, it seemed, would forever be Snape, regardless of his setting.

“Yes, Professor.”

“I trust you can make it the remaining twenty steps to the passenger cars without falling into mortal peril or starting a riot?”

“Yes, Professor.”

“I should like to see you demonstrate.”

“See you at the Welcoming Feast, sir.”

He rolled his trolley over to the baggage handlers, leaving his trunk and Elsbeth's empty cage in their care, and took only his school satchel and Inana in her basket to the first available car. No mortal peril or riots presented themselves, and feeling quite proud of his success, Harry went in search of his friends.

The train was only half full, and Harry had the benefit of leaving his clunkier luggage in the baggage car, so he was able to navigate fairly well. Perhaps the only impediment was the number of school mates who stopped to greet him and ask about his summer and what his plans that year were. It was a bit odd since no one had seemed nearly as interested the year before, but the narrow and busy aisle of a train wasn't the place to ponder it so he focused on finding the right compartment.

He was coming towards the end of the passenger cars, when his way was obstructed by a woman heading in the opposite direction. Something about her immediately caught his attention. She was pretty with pale skin and chocolate brown hair cropped just under her chin in Parisian chic. She was only in her early thirties, but carried herself like a confident professional, vaguely arrogant and daring anyone to stand in her way.

Harry didn't particularly feel like taking up that dare, so he looked for a place to move out of her way but before he got the chance, she had spotted him.

“Harry!”

The Gryffindor jumped in surprise, and looked quickly behind him, but there wasn't anyone there but Colin Creevey and his brother. Turning back towards the woman, he found she had moved much closer, and he nearly stumbled back in surprise but she caught him by the hand and shook it firmly.

"You must be the infamous Harold Potter. I've heard so much about you!"

"Um... hello?"

"Oh, excuse me, I didn't mean to startle you. I am Professor Vesper Larousse, your new DA&D instructor."

Harry took another moment to reassess her. Still quite pretty, but on closer inspection he could spot a faint scar over her lip and one of her fingers didn't close completely over the case she was carrying. Her outer robe was a fashionable lavender color, but under that was a courser black set, and she wore boots with steel toes and short heels. Her dark brown eyes were alert, examining him while he examined her.

"I see. Well then, it's nice to meet you, Professor Larousse. I hope you enjoy your time at Hogwarts."

"No need to be so formal, Harry. I suspect we'll be good friends before the end of the year."

"Er... yeah, perhaps we will. Um..."

"If you are looking for Ms. Granger and Mr. Malfoy, they are three doors down and to your left," she offered, and neatly moved into one of the compartments to let him pass.

"Oh, yeah, thank you, Professor."

He hurried past her, and straight to the indicated compartment, barely making sure it was the right one before shutting the door behind him. Hermione, Natalie, and Draco looked up when he entered.

“What happened to you this time?” Draco drawled, fully prepared to accept a story involving unicorns and Viking invaders.

“Creepy new professor. She called me 'Harry'.”

Hermione expression was condescending. “Well, that is your name. I don't think you should go around calling people 'creepy' just for that.”

“Hermione, she called me Harry, she called you, Ms. Granger and Draco, Mr. Malfoy, and knew that I was looking for you without me saying so. And then she said we'd be 'good friends' by the end of the year. She was definitely creepy.”

Natalie laughed.

“Presumptuous woman. I'd like to meet her.”

“You'll get your chance. She teaches our Dark Arts and Defense class. Have any of you ever heard of Vesper Larousse?”

Hermione perked up.

“I remember her. She used to come to our Christmas parties. She scared McNair silly. I remember wanting to be just like her, but then I haven't seen her in years.”

Draco and Natalie just looked blank, nothing coming to mind.

“Well, if she can scare McNair, at least she must have some clue about what she's doing.”

“What ever happened to McNasty anyway?” Natalie asked.

“Azkaban, last I heard,” Draco said, “Lets hope he doesn't pull a 'Moody' and escape.”

“That isn't funny,” Hermione scolded. “Moody is very dangerous. The newspaper says his cell was covered in pictures of him killing Death Eaters in all these horrible ways. A lot of people are really scared he'll decide to come after them. Lucius included.”

“Father isn't afraid of anything. Besides, if the man is really clever enough to escape from prison he should be clever enough to get the hell out of Britain.”

“That' sort of the point, Draco. He's crazy, but he's clever too. Who knows what harm he could do if he isn't caught?”

Neither Draco nor Natalie were impressed, and Harry didn't understand her concern either. A crazy escaped prisoner was interesting, but hardly a concern at Hogwarts. He doubted she was worried about Lucius.

oo
oo

“Hi, Harry!”

“Hi, Dean.”

“Natalie, you curled your hair!”

“Horrid, isn't it? You'll have to help me straighten it again, Pamela.”

“Good to see you again, Harry!”

“You too, Oliver.”

“Hermione, did you know when our first meeting is again?”

“Probably tomorrow! You'll get a note in the morning!”

“Welcome back, Malfoy!”

“See you on the pitch, Hughes.”

“Nice tan, Potter!”

“Thanks, Jacobson.”

"Can I have your autograph, Harry!"

"Scram, you stupid twit," Draco snapped, sending the second year Hufflepuff scurrying. They hadn't been off the train for even a minute, before they had been inundated with friends, classmates, acquaintances, and complete strangers all wanting to say hello or chat. It took another five minutes for Harry to realize half of these were directed at him specifically, and twenty minutes later as he walked though Hogwarts's entry hall he still didn't know why.

"Who was that?" he asked, not recognizing her.

"Who knows?" Natalie said, clearly uninterested in finding out. "Just another silly little girl with a crush. You're going to be quite popular this year, you know."

"No, I hadn't known," Harry admitted, "Why?"

His friends all gave him a disbelieving look. Clyde, who had shown up with Ginny shortly after the train left the station, was the most flabbergasted.

"Humility is grand and all, Harry, but now you're just being stupid."

"Hey!"

Ginny interrupted before a fight broke out.

"We talked about this last school year, Harry. You remember, right? Nice clothes, good at sports, special talents, Voldemort's favorite little tyke. Oh, and Jacobson was right That's a really nice tan... oh wait, all that blushing has gone and ruined it. You look like a tomato now. So much for your exclusive in Witch's Wardrobe."

They laughed as Harry turned darker and darker. He really didn't understand what they were talking about. Sure he was good at Quidditch and Dueling, but the rest of it? Parseltongue was little more than a party trick. Political associates? Voldemort? Did they really admire or envy his time spent with the unpredictable dictator? Most readily admitted that the man was terrifying. Why would they want to associate with him? Why the heck would school kids care about that sort of thing anyway?

The cloths... nonsense. There wasn't anything cool or sexy about his cloths. Aside from a few of his formal things, most of what he wore was just generic school things. His new tailored clothes definitely fit better, but he didn't think they made him look any less like a geek. Frankly, he was afraid he resembled Percy Weasley a little too much. Most of the other guys opted for t-shirts and jumpers and jeans under their robes, and he thought those looked cooler than his mini-accountant look.

Oh, Merlin, who was he kidding? He did have a lot going for him, but he knew something his new admirers didn't. He had twice as much going against him. Things that could send him fleeing from Britain or living as a werewolf or ...well, dead.

"Hurry up, Potter, or you'll have to sit next to the first years," Draco said, breaking him from his thoughts. "We'll see you in class, tomorrow."

With that Draco and Natalie moved ahead to crowd into the Great Hall and towards the Slytherin table. Harry and his remaining friends moved to their own house table, and squeezed in with their fellow third years, except for Ginny who went to sit with a group of second year girls who giggled and glanced at Harry furtively.

He ignored them in favor of checking out the teacher's table. Voldemort was there this year, looking particularly mysterious and intimidating in blacks and blood reds. They hadn't spoken in a month, and Harry still had no idea about what had happened at the full moon. He wasn't going to ask either, and unless he was expected to return the following summer he didn't see a reason why it should matter. He would just prefer to forget about it all together. Besides, the Dark Lord wasn't there to answer to Harry. He had learned from Snape that Voldemort had taken time out of his busy schedule to make an important announcement regarding the school, and he would leave immediately afterwards.

Speaking of Snape...

He found his potion's professor a little ways down the table.

Along with Professor Larousse.

Who was smiling at Professor Snape. She seemed to be engaging the taciturn man in conversation, and despite his obvious displeasure it seemed his usual insults were not successful in ending her interest in him. In fact, judging by the way Snape somehow choked on his tea, Harry suspected the woman had gotten in a few successful jibes of her own. She had just graduated from 'creepy' to 'scary' in his young mind.

"Wow, she's cute!" Clyde said, beside him.

"Who?" Harry and Hermione asked in unison.

"The new teacher, of course! What's her name again?"

"Larousse," said Hermione.

"No, I mean her first name."

"Why would you need to know that? You think you'll ever be in a position to use it? She's a teacher."

"I'm only curious."

Apparently, he wasn't the only one. Several other boys at their table were asking the same thing, and commenting on how pretty she was. No one but Harry seemed to notice that she her taste in men seemed to lean towards tall, dark, and unpleasant.

The girls were all amazed that a teacher would have such a daring haircut and bright red lipstick, which was like sticking a rose in a bouquet of daisies. Striking and completely out of place.

It was such a silly topic, he thought, and turned to Hermione to say so, but she was staring at the other woman, completely smitten. Oh, for Merlin's sake...

Finally the Welcoming Feast began with the sorting of the first years. Harry tried to stay interested, and looked for any potentially interesting new students, but they all looked the same. Young, timid, and... short. Really short. God, had he been that short two years ago?

Soon enough the seventy or so new students were sorted and settled at their House tables, and Headmistress Lestrangle made the usual announcements, warnings, and introduced their newest teacher.

“... Professor Vesper Larousse-”

And there was a round of very enthusiastic clapping, as the woman stood and smiled at them.

“- will be teaching Dark Arts and Defense this year. She has a very extensive resume, but as this is her first year of teaching I expect everyone to demonstrate why Hogwarts students are renown as the elite of the wizarding world.”

Lestrangle gave a brief, but very pointed look in Harry's direction. The Gryffindor fought the urge to shove his finger up his nose and drool into his dinner, but just barely managed to contain himself. Another teacher, Professor Mothman, part of a completely new class for seniors involving ancient magical texts and artifacts, was introduced and received with considerably less enthusiasm. He didn't seem to notice, but then if he coke bottle glasses and the funny little funnel he held up to his ear was indication, it was probably because he could neither hear or see well enough to tell the difference. A few more trivialities were addressed that Harry left to Hermione to worry about while he searched the student body for familiar faces. There was Horace McGunny, the Hogwarts Herald's editor and chief and Hermione's (recently usurped) hero, scribbling in his notebook at the Ravenclaw table. Cedric Diggory, the most popular sixth year boy (and that said something coming from Hufflepuff, long regarded as the dorkiest of houses) and Harry's potential friend ever since last year's Sweetey debacle. Further down his own table were Fred and George, strangely reserved since the train ride and thoroughly behaving themselves as they appeared to listen to the announcements. Several students had been inching away from them, fearing the calm almost more than the storm they knew was coming. The twins spotted Harry, and broke character to offer him a mischievous smirk.

So many familiar faces after months of disassociation brought a feeling of warmth in his chest.

And yet, there was someone missing. Harry scanned the Slytherin table from one end to the other, but no sign of his friend Tom Rook could be found. Tom's usual cluster of friends seemed unnerved by their leader's absence. He turned to Hermione, but before he could ask her anything the Great Hall became deathly quiet.

Voldemort had stood and was preparing to speak.

"Ladies and gentleman," he said, his fierce gaze making it a command for quiet obedience as much as generic titles, "You are all aware of your schools importance to wizarding Britain, both historically and contemporary, as a sanctuary of learning for our country's magical community. What many of you do not realize is the state of decline the school has undergone for the last three hundred years."

This brought a confused murmur, and even Harry found the idea disturbing. Hogwarts was the finest school in Britain, some would boast in the world, and after centuries of magical advancement it was somehow declining?

"Do not be alarmed. I do not mean to say that your education is somehow lacking or the structure of school is deteriorating. Hogwarts' students are as bright as ever, and her walls are the strongest and the most numerous they've ever been. However, in the last three centuries, with the emergence of alternative schools, the number of students has greatly declined even as the school itself has expanded from the absorption of excess magic. To put it simply, compared to three hundred years ago, Hogwarts is four times as large with one fifth the number of students."

Another excited murmur, much of it confusion. Harry didn't understand much of what was being said either. Hogwarts was growing? Not being expanded, but increasing in walls due to magic it absorbed? From what? The students? Britain in general? And there was suppose to be more students? Certainly, the school had always seemed excessively large, and there were dozens, perhaps even hundreds of unused rooms, but had the school really held... he paused to do the math and the exact number escaped him, but it was well over two thousand students.

Two thousand students?

He looked again to Hermione. She didn't look surprise, and in fact was scribbling things down on a napkin. After giving the students a moment to absorb what he had said, Voldemort continued.

"I believe this to be an incredible waste of Britain's resources, and have decided to expand the school into a preparatory two-year college, accepting approximately one thousand students and seventy new professors."

The students started to panic. If Hogwarts was going to be a university, where would they go to school in the meantime? The Dark Lord glared, and everyone quieted.

"Hogwarts will continue as a secondary school, with very little change on the part of her students or teachers. There will be a rearrangement of classrooms, some expansions to the library, several renovations, and a few other minor accommodations, but little else will change. The college level students will have their dorms in Hogsmeade, and should not interfere with your usual pattern of living."

"All of this in fact, will take several years to accomplish, and the college itself will not be opening for another five to ten years. I am only bothering to explain this to you now, because of the engineers that will be roaming the school making measurements. You will not get in their way, and if one finds need of your assistance, you will be courteous enough to provide it. More specific instructions will be provided by the Headmistress and your Heads of House as the need arises. That is all that need be said, I believe. Have a nice school year.”

The 'or else' hung in the air as the Dark Lord stalked off through one of the side doors, leaving the students momentarily struck speechless. It was broken by Fred and George's suddenly excited exclamation.

“COLLEGE GIRLS! YES!”

The Great Hall broke out into peels of laughter, and then into excited gossip. The Headmistress, finding no reason to break the festive mood, snapped her fingers to begin the feast. Hermione was on her feet before she had so much as a nibble of dinner.

“Harry, I need to go talk to McGunny. This news is HUGE!”

The young Gryffindor didn't doubt it, and he was interested, but there were several other things that he found more concerning. Like, where was Tom? and what was with Professor Larousse?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

There were no opportunities to learn the answers to his questions until the next morning, on the first day of classes. Hermione, who had spent most of the Welcoming Feast with McGunny and the newspaper crew, organizing for the first issue of the Hogwarts Herald, had heard nothing of Tom and had no idea what he meant about Larousse. The other Gryffindors were equally unhelpful.

“You can ask Professor Snape about Tom after potions,” Hermione said during breakfast. “He's the Head of Tom's House, so he would definitely know.”

“Do you think Draco would know?”

Harry would much rather ask his friend, than Snape and the cranky potion's master would probably prefer the same thing.

"You can try him, but he'll only know the rumors and hearsay. They weren't friends, so I doubt he knows anything concrete. Your most reliable source is definitely Professor Snape, and we have potions just before lunch today so it's would be convenient."

There was nothing convenient about the snarky man, but Harry wasn't going to try and argue with her. The first class of the day was History of Magic, the worst sort of class to have first thing in the morning, even with a professor as zealous as Toure. He managed to keep awake through the first lecture of the day by worrying about his next class. Dark Arts and Defense, one of Harry's best subjects, loomed like an ominous storm cloud, threatening anything from a light drizzly to raining down fire and brimstone.

He was nervous, perhaps more nervous than he had been when Hermione had told him about McNair, and he couldn't say why. Larousse hadn't been threatening when he met her, quite the opposite in fact, and he was good enough in Dueling Club and his previous DA&D classes to feel confident of his skills. Still, there was something about the woman that made him uneasy.

Hermione on the other hand, couldn't get to class fast enough, and despite his misgivings he followed her into the lion's den and straight to the closest seats at the front. They were not, to Hermione's displeasure, at the very front, for several boys (including Clyde) had shown up even earlier than they to snag the choice spots. Larousse was already there, cleaning up after her previous class, which had something to do with the importation of non-native dark creatures, and hopefully wasn't a subject they would have to learn until seventh year. She had been ignoring the students until he caught her attention entering the room. She offered him a bright smile and wave.

It was odd enough that even Hermione seemed surprised, while the others turned jealous eyes his way. Harry shifted uncomfortably in his chair, and pretended to look over the text books. They were good books, Harry thought, emphasizing practical applications rather than theory or history, but he still had his misgivings about the woman that would be teaching them.

At last, the rest of the students shuffled in, and class began.

“Good evening, class. As you know, I am your new DA&D instructor, Professor Vesper Larousse. It is very nice to meet you all. Before I begin, I am afraid I need to rearrange you all a bit. Oh, do not sulk. It is only for a week until I can put all of your names with your darling faces,” she said, her smile so charming no one could muster up any resentment.

She had a paper with her and a pile of folders, and every time she assigned a seat, she placed one of the folders with that student's name on the desk. There appeared to be no rhyme or reason to where anyone sat, but Harry (and the boys who had arrived early) couldn't help but notice how very close he'd been placed next to the teacher's desk. At the very least, Hermione had been placed right next to him, and she was quite happy to be there.

“Now then,” Larousse began once everyone was settled. “I have given each of you a folder, and in each folder is your syllabus and assignment list, as well as an assignment journal and score card. Each of your folders are unique and keyed to you specifically. It will inform you everyday what we will be studying, what assignments are due, past assignment grades, study progress, and various other statistics and useful information. Do not lose it, it will be vital for your final grade and you will be completely lost within a week without it.”

Everyone immediately started browsing through the folder. Sure enough, it was crammed with information. Not only was there everything that she had mentioned, but also an announcement sheet for tutoring schedules, extra credit assignments, recommended reading material, and class ranking (Harry was number three).

“Rather than waste time handing out papers and returning assignments, they will appear in your folders at the very front. Check your folder everyday just before and after class. Further more, these folders are for you only. Do not show or share the contents with your fellow students, and do not ask to see or borrow them from others. I will deduct five points from each student I catch doing so. In case you are wondering, I am modeling this system after the Court Executive and Judiciary system, which emphasizes confidentiality and thorough record keeping. Many of you will go on to work at the Court after graduating, and will be happy to have familiarized yourself with the system before hand."

"Oh, that's clever," Hermione murmured to herself. Harry wasn't so sure. It just seemed like a whole lot more paperwork to keep straight to him.

Professor Larousse gave them all a few more minutes to look through their folders, before beginning her first lecture on protective clothing. She called up Harry and Hermione to be her volunteer demonstrators. She transfigured them both a closet and had them change into some dueling gear they were both already familiar with.

"Most of you should be familiar with these," the professor said, gesturing up and down Harry and Hermione's uniforms. "They are used during official Duels. Now can anyone tell me why leather is preferred over metal?"

"Because it is lighter?" a Hufflepuff girl offered.

"A good guess, but no my dear. Metals can be magicked to be much lighter than even leather. Anyone else?"

Harry and Hermione both knew, but as volunteers they knew they weren't suppose to supply the answer. Snape had lectured them on it on the first day of Dueling Club, but even Clyde and one of the Hufflepuffs who attended didn't seem to recall it. Larousse, however, was prepared for that.

"Let's do an experiment then. Mr. Potter," she crooned, causing him to blush like a fool. "Would you cast a light stunning hex on each of the dummies over there."

She pointed to two dummies at the end of the room, quite the distance away in fact for a hex, one dressed in typical leather dueling armor and the other in a knight's metal armor. He did as she requested and hit each perfectly in the middle of the chest. The dummy in leather shook a little, but remained standing. The dummy in metal however, spasmed and sparked from head to toe and fell off its post.

“Wonderful aim, Mr. Potter! Three points to Gryffindor. Now can anyone tell me what happened? No? Well, you see, metal conducts most magics just like it does electricity. The hex traveled from the chest through the entirety of the armor, causing more harm than good to the body it was suppose to be protecting. The leather armor, however, is organic, magically neutral, and non-conductive, so it keeps the effect of the hex localized, even absorbing some of it.”

The lecture continued similarly, with Harry and Hermione changing into various articles of protection, some they were familiar with and much of it they weren't, and Larousse explaining how it all worked and why. Then they played a game, mixing and matching armor and protective pieces to see what would stand up best against certain spells and hexes. The combinations looked pretty ridiculous on their models, but Harry and Hermione took it all in good humor and laughed along with everyone else.

“Alright, everyone settle down,” Larousse said finally, looking more energized than when they had started. “That was an excellent practical, but now we must move on to theory I'm afraid. Please applaud our gracious volunteers.”

She gestured at the two Gryffindors, who bowed playfully as their classmates clapped and whistled. They changed back into their school robes and took their seats. The remainder of the class was notes and some assigned reading.

“Before you go, check your folder for today's assignment. You will all be given a scenario, a list of protective clothing and items, and you must select three items from the list you would wear or use and give your reasoning. One foot minimum and don't try to cheat off your classmate. You've all been given different scenarios. It's due Wednesday and be prepared to demonstrate your choices as well. Dismissed.”

There was some token grumbling, but it had been a good first class and everyone was feeling cheerful. Harry and his friends were already comparing scenarios, laughing at the examples that were used. Who on earth would leave a three-headed dog to guard a bread box? Or a place a Hairy Hands curse on a bath tub?

“Oh, Mr. Potter, would you stay a moment?”

Harry and his friends stopped abruptly, looking over at Professor Larousse. She didn't seem at all upset about anything, but Harry couldn't fathom what she might want. She had been extra complimentary of him during class, subtly so, but he could tell every time she patted his shoulder and praised one of his spells. Not that she had ignored Hermione or anyone else, but there was a difference. Harry wasn't entirely sure what that difference was, but it was there.

“Uh, sure, professor.”

“We'll wait outside for you, Harry.”

“Thanks Hermione.”

Once alone, he approached the teacher's desk, and she smiled encouragingly.

“You look nervous, Harry. Don't be, you're not in any trouble, quite the contrary in fact.”

She had just called him Harry again, when during class she had referred to him as 'Mr. Potter', and it made him even more uncomfortable than before.

“You know I was looking over the students records- to better design the student curriculum you see- and yours caught my attention. You've had a very exciting couple of years, Mr. Potter.”

“Er... yeah, I guess so.”

“And Professor Snape is now your guardian?”

“No... well, sort of. He looked after me this summer, but I pretty much belong to the school.”

"Mmm... is that so? How interesting. I don't suppose you've made any plans for your future? You and Professor Snape?"

"Why would Sna- I mean, Professor Snape make plans for my future? I'm only thirteen anyway. Graduation is a long way off."

"Not so long, my dear. Besides, next year you'll have to take electives, and those will have a serious impact on your continued education and job opportunities. I only say this to make you aware of your situation. I know you do not have a parent to explain it all, and I wasn't sure if your Head of House or Professor Snape would do so."

Harry had to concede her point. Neither Snape nor McGonagall or anyone else mentioned it. He suspected Hermione would pretty soon, but certainly an adult should have made it known to him first.

"Thank you, Professor, for bringing it to my attention."

She practically sparkled with happiness.

"You're quite welcome, Harry. Now I don't want you to stress. You have all year to think about next year's classes and what sort of job you'd like, if not the specific field. You have excellent grades in all your classes so far, and your club activities increase your options, so I doubt you'll find yourself limited. In fact I think you'll have too many options available. If you find yourself stuck, I want you to know I'm here to help, if you ever need it."

"Oh... I... Thank you. That's very generous of you. Are you sure Professor McGonagall won't get mad at you?"

Larousse didn't look the least bit concerned.

"I don't see why. After all, she has all of her students to supervise in class and an entire House to supervise outside of class, and could use the help, I'm sure. Plus, didn't you say it yourself? You belong to the school? It's the entire staff that is responsible for your wellbeing, you know."

Now that was a bit of twisted logic, but Harry wasn't really in a position to argue with her. She was just being helpful after all, and he'd be some kind of jerk for fighting with her over that. So he smiled as best he could, thanked her again, and left to rejoin his friends in the hall.

"What did she want with you, Harry?" Clyde asked, obviously suspicious.

"She didn't want a date, if that's what you think."

The other boy turned pink around the eyes, then turned away to sulk.

"So what did she want?" Hermione picked up.

"Nothing really. She just wanted to remind me to think about what classes I want next year. She said, she didn't know if anyone else would bother to tell me since I don't have parents. Which they haven't...yet, anyway."

"Oh, so it was just a pity thing? Maybe that's why she's mother henning you?" Clyde said hopefully, earning him a hearty Hermione slap.

"So you noticed too? I don't know, maybe it is just a pity thing. Maybe she's sucking up to me to get in good with the Dark Lord. I don't know."

"Harry, I really don't think she's the sort to 'suck up'," Hermione insisted. "She seems pretty straight forward. Maybe she just likes you. A lot of the teachers do."

He didn't think a lot of teachers liked him personally, though he got along with them all well enough, and he didn't think Professor Larousse could have decided she liked him before they even met without an ulterior motive. He didn't say anything though. Larousse hadn't done anything or said anything that he could use in an argument one way or the other, and only time would tell if he was just being paranoid or if she had something up her sleeve.

“Well, lets find a teacher who doesn't,” Harry said instead, “Professor Snape is going to skin us alive if we're late to the first potion's class of the year.”

Book III:

Chapter 5: The Huntress

“What's wrong with him? Is it serious?” Harry asked worriedly. He had stayed back after Potions had ended, just as Hermione had suggested, to ask the Slytherin Head of House about Tom. Snape wasn't at all pleased to have him linger, especially over something as frivolous as 'friendly concern'.

“Mr. Potter, it is not my habit to break teacher/student confidence by releasing medical information to random students. Suffice to say, Mr. Rook was sick long before attending Hogwarts, and he suffered a relapse over the summer. Perhaps he will return later this year or perhaps he won't. If you wish to know anything more, I recommend writing to him yourself. Now if you'll excuse me, I have another class to prepare.”

Harry was in no position to fight with the professor, and stalked out of the classroom in a huff. Hermione, Draco, and Natalie were there waiting for him, but Clyde had seemingly disappeared.

“Any luck?” Natalie asked.

“Just that Tom is sick again. I'll have to write him myself if I want to know what's going on. At least he's alive, though. Where's Clyde?”

“He said he was hungry,” Hermione offered.

“Well, I am too,” Harry said, “Want to have lunch outside today?”

“Naturally,” Draco said, “We can't have a real conversation with all the plebs squawking in the Great Hall.”

Hermione shook her head.

“Sorry guys, but McGunny called an emergency meeting. You'll have to go on without me.”

"I don't know how we'll survive," Natalie mocked. So Harry went to the lake with Natalie and Draco, laden with a basket of sandwiches and apples. It was a little strange to be together without Hermione, but soon enough they were talking comfortably about this and that.

"You should show Natalie your tan lines. I bet they're still there, aren't they?"

"I'm not taking off my shirt to show her that. What if someone saw?"

"I don't mind," the Slytherin girl grinned, but then frowned again as she looked over Harry's shoulder towards the castle. The boys followed her gaze and spotted Hermione hurrying towards them. "Oh, bother."

"Do you think something happened?" Harry asked. Draco shrugged.

"We'll find out soon enough. What's wrong, sis?"

Hermione looked frazzled, although not quite panicked. In fact, she looked more indignant than anything.

"This is so utterly ridiculous, and to call an emergency meeting over it is... ridiculous!"

"We gathered that," said Draco, "Now what is so ridiculous?"

"Sara Bella Parker said she wanted to discuss rearranging the paper's format, but all she really wanted was more room for her gossip column, or more specifically, a new section of it."

Now here Hermione actually looked embarrassed and was having trouble meeting Harry's eyes. The Gryffindor boy was starting to catch on.

"It involves me, doesn't it?"

Hermione grimaced.

"Involves you? No, Harry, it is you. She wants to add a Harry Potter column and call it something stupid like-"

"If Only You Were Half This Cool?" Natalie offered.

"Read If You Have No Life'?" was Draco's suggestion.

A witty come back escaped Harry at the moment, being smothered in an overwhelming feeling of dread and embarrassment. Hermione picked up the slack for him.

"No, more like 'The Prince of Hogwarts' or something lame like that. Even worse is I think McGunny might do it. He kept saying things like 'human interest stories' and 'increased market appeal'. For once, Weasley and I were on the same side. I think we managed to scare Parker into dropping it, but now McGunny seems to have picked up the idea. I'm really, really sorry Harry, I didn't know what else to do."

Harry just nodded, unable to say anything. Increased popularity, he could handle that, but a newspaper article? He was too young to deal with paparazzi! What if they started following him around? What if they learned some of his secrets? About his parents, his godfathers, Voldemort, Sweetey?

"Maybe... maybe we can get Professor Toure to stop it. I mean, she has the final say about these things, right?"

Hermione's eyes widened.

"Of course! I can ask her after dinner... or perhaps you should ask her, since you're the 'victim' so to speak. It might be awkward for one of the reporters to object to doing a story."

"Er... yeah."

"There, there, Harry," Natalie said, patting his shoulder. "It was only a matter of time. What with you being Voldemort's potential 'love child', this sort of thing was bound to happen. Think of it as practice for the real world."

"I would have you know, I know my real father, and I look just like him. From my impossible hair to my knobby knees. I wish people would stop implying Voldemort as the alternative."

"Perhaps he's your grandfather? You could always ask Ms. Parker to investigate."

"Natalie..."

"It was only a suggestion."

"In the mean time, Potter," Draco said, "Be as boring and uninteresting as we know you can be."

That, despite being utterly rude, was probably the most helpful advice anyone could offer.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Unfortunately, it was also impossible. Harry's life simply wasn't boring or uninteresting. Even the avoidance of the newspaper article was an adventure. Asking Toure to put a stop to it was like asking the Pope to worship Satan. When he had asked, she went into a very long spiel about the rights of the public and uncorrupted news flow, and Harry understood within the first thirty seconds she wasn't going to help and was crazier than he had thought. Despite Hermione and Ron's attempts to block the article, it had gained popularity with the rest of the staff and it was decided to officially incorporate it into their first issue of the school year by next Monday.

Defeated on one front, Harry had to battle for his privacy on another. He asked all his friends not to answer even casual questions about him, and talked to Fred and George about possible ways to discourage the reporters from asking. He should have known better than to ask, because they took his request for assistance a little too enthusiastically. They followed him around when ever they could between classes and meals, acting like bodyguards and frightening the reporters and his classmates alike.

The Hogwarts Herald crew, however, took on the challenge with a fervor. At least one person (usually Parker, who was the same year as him and was in several of his classes) followed him around, sometimes asking him questions, sometimes asking his friends questions, sometimes asking complete strangers if they knew anything. Harry had taken to using the Maruader's Map to sneak in between classes and avoided the Great Hall whenever the weather permitted. When it became clear that Harry wasn't going to be offering any information himself, the crew turned to McGonagall, who had nothing to say but 'student files are confidential' and listed the many possible punishments should anyone think to violate that privacy.

In the end, the Hogwarts Herald had to resort to scavenging off of Wizinging Weekly articles to put together an article of their own, but even so, much of it was speculation rather than facts. Monday's article took up almost half of the gossip column (which had already been expanded), and brought into question several assumptions about Harry. Everyone knew that Harry had lived in Germany, but few knew the reason why or how he had ended up in England. Fewer still knew about his parents, if he'd even been raised by both or one or neither of them, or if they had been from England themselves and fled during or after the war or originally been from the colonies, or if they had even been wizards or not. In addition to Harry Potter's mysterious origins, lay his mysterious abilities. Parseltongue, excellent flying skills, and unusually strong control of wandless magic. Where had these skills come from? Were they inherited by the mysterious parents? Innate? Or from something stranger? Certainly, Harry Potter had had strangely numerous run ins with danger. A kidnapping no one seemed to know the specifics of except for Morgenson and Whitehall, who had mysteriously disappeared after their expulsion. The closure of a business Harry worked at for the summer (now where had they learned about that connection?). Then of course, the attacks at the school that Harry had finally put a stop to. The relationship between Voldemort and Harry was equally as mysterious, and the only thing confirmed was that Harry spent last Christmas and a portion of that summer with the Dark Lord.

It all read like a Spanish soap opera commercial to Harry. Hermione didn't know what a Spanish soap opera was, but agreed that it was poor journalism.

"It's just a bunch of teasers. Parker is trying to get people hooked on 'The Mystery of Hogwarts', before she starts giving out any real information if she even has any. It even sounds like a cheesy mystery novel not a real article. 'The Mystery of Hogwarts'. Ppffftt."

Harry almost laughed at the sound from the normally very articulate Hermione, but he wasn't really in a laughing mood. They had gotten the paper that morning, and were now on their way to Potion's and pretending to ignore the whispers and speculative looks the students were sending his way.

"This is stupid," he said at last, "They all knew most of what she said before. Why is everyone so interested now?"

Hermione couldn't offer any answers, and the rest of the walk was spent in silence. If only Potion's class had been so uneventful.

"Potter! Detention!"

Harry blinked in confusion, turned to Hermione, who looked equally surprised. They hadn't even taken their seats yet. Class hadn't even started yet! The potion's master must have found something to get pissy about though, because his expression was down right livid.

"And see me after class, as well."

"Er..."

"Shut up."

Disoriented from this latest surprise attack, he let Hermione pick a seat and perform most of the potion work, while he tried to figure out what exactly he had done to earn Snape's ire. He could think of nothing, however, and nearly ruined the potion due to his distraction. The great bat snarling something at him every five minutes didn't help matters at all. After a grueling hour of uncertainty and annoyance, the class finally finished and Harry found himself standing before Snape's desk. He told his friends not to wait up, since the potion's master often took his time with tormenting him, and Hermione left with her Slytherin cohorts to get lunch. For once, Snape didn't ignore Harry for the first five minutes like he usually did, but glowered behind his desk the moment they were alone.

"I trust you know why I am so angry?"

"You're angry, sir? Sorry, it's hard for me to tell."

Harry couldn't see Snape's eye twitching, but he could imagine it very clearly. The man startled him, however, when he suddenly slammed his hand on to his desk, bringing forth a copy of the Hogwart's Herald. Harry groaned. God, as if having every student in Hogwarts read that tripe wasn't enough, now Snape was getting into it.

"I demand an explanation."

Harry just stared at him. Snape stared back, and after a moment realized Harry really didn't have any idea about what he was talking about.

"About the article."

Still, completely blank.

"Involving you."

Nothing.

"Oh, come on Potter, I know you're a conceited little snot but I didn't think you were so conceited as to have it set down in paper."

Not so blank now, and quite thoroughly angry, just like Snape wanted.

"This," Harry hissed in what may or may not have been parseltongue, "was not my idea. I went to Professor Toure to put a stop to it, but she refused. I avoided being interviewed, despite being hounded everywhere I go, and asked everyone I knew to keep to themselves too. What ever is in there is just speculations taken from common knowledge and old newspaper articles. As if I want everyone snooping into my business.”

“Don't lie, Potter. I've already heard about the 'exclusive' interview you promised Ms. Parker. You're playing a risky game, and you're a fool if you think you can win it.”

“I didn't promise that! Who said I did?”

“A source from inside the paper,” he said vaguely.

“Does this source have a name that bears a remarkable resemblance to 'weasel'?”

“Don't take that tone with me, young man. I-”

“Hellooooo?”

Teacher and pupil stopped, mid-argument, to turn their attention to the unexpected interruption. There was a light tapping on the classroom door, and then it opened to reveal Professor Larousse. She had relinquished her teaching robes for a set of light green ones, and in her hand she held a picnic basket. Both wizards tensed at the sight of her beaming face.

“Oh! I'm sorry. Am I interrupting something?”

They shared a brief look, deciding how much was worth giving away and how much to keep to themselves. Snape took the lead.

“No, I was just discussing an assignment with Mr. Potter here.”

Harry just nodded. Larousse looked approving.

“Hogwart's staff has always impressed me with its willingness to help their students,” she said, completely missing the glare Snape sent at Harry, who looked as if someone had punched him in the gut. “Well, since you've been working so hard, I was wondering if you'd like to accompany me outside for lunch? The weather won't be this nice for long, after all."

"As much as I would like to madam, I am in charge of supervising my House during lunch," Snape said in mock regret.

"Oh, I know. I had Professor Vector take over for today. He owed me a favor."

"Oh..."

A moment of silence, while the dour potion's master mentally scrambled for an excuse to back out. Harry decided to leave the man to his fate, and turned to leave with a cheerful spring in his step.

"Enjoy your picnic, Professor Larousse, Professor Snape. I'll see you-"

"Why don't you join us, Harry dear?"

The boy stopped abruptly.

"What?"

"Since Professor Snape is your guardian, why don't we all have lunch together? We could discuss some of what we talked about last week. Have you thought about it at all?"

"Er..."

"That is a good idea," Snape said quickly, coming up to stand behind Harry, placing a firm hand on his shoulder. "I should like to know what you have been up to this week."

"But-"

The dark man leaned in and said more quietly than the other professor could hear.

"You can serve your detention now or tonight. You choose."

“... Sounds like fun.”

“Wonderful!” she said, and led them out onto the grounds. She found a nice little spot by the lake very near to where Harry liked to go with his friends. Summer was already starting to give way to autumn, and despite the heat of the day there was a cool breeze flowing down from the north, smelling of potential rain for later that evening. Harry and Larousse settled on the cheery little checkered blanket easily, and after an awkward moment of uncertainty, Snape sat down as well, albeit stiffly. Larousse wasted no time to start up a conversation.

“You know, I used to have picnics under this very same tree with my husband. He gave me my first kiss here, too. We couldn't have been much older than Harry when we started dating. It makes me quite nostalgic.”

“Fascinating,” Snape said blandly, accepting a roll from her, followed by some blueberry jam.

“Of course, you might remember it, Severus. You cursed this tree to throw its apples at every boy that got underneath it. It gave Jonathan a rather nasty black eye. Oh, I was so mad at you,” she said, laughing at the memory.

“I assure you, I wasn't aiming for your boyfriend. It just so happened this tree was very popular with several individuals with whom I was feuding at the time,” he replied evenly, although there was a touch of amusement. “As I recall, you unleashed a plague of maggots in my cauldron and ruined a perfectly good batch of Coughing Drought. Very nearly cost me my top spot in Potions that year.”

“You went to school together, Professors?” Harry asked curiously. It hadn't occurred to Harry that they might have known each other before, or even that Larousse had gone to Hogwarts. He couldn't recall anyone having mentioned it.

“I was in Ravenclaw and a year behind Severus, and my boyfriend, Jonathan, was a Hufflepuff and a year ahead of him. We were all in Dueling Club together, before the school dissolved the club anyway.

Some nonsense about encouraging House rivalry and violence. It was all pretty hypocritical since they kept quidditch, which caused ten times the number of injuries Dueling club did.”

“You threw quite the hissy fit over that as well,” Severus recalled, something very close to a smile tugging at his lips. “I was surprised you didn't go into politics. You seemed to enjoy arguing so much.”

“I very nearly did join the ministry, but those were bad times and I was very pregnant with Tony. Jonathan didn't want me caught in the middle of all of it in my condition, for all the good it did any of us in the end.”

There was a tense silence, and Harry felt the conversation had stumbled into a very sensitive subject, and anything he said might make it worse. So he waited, and at last Snape spoke again.

“I'm sorry about Jonathan. He was alright, as far as Hufflepuffs go. Very down to earth. And Tony, of course... so young.”

“Oh, shut up, Severus,” she said, not harshly, but firmly. “You never gave either a second thought after you first heard about them. So many people were dying left and right, what did a couple you barely knew matter? I can't say I thought about you or anyone else after glimpsing them in the paper. Our names never even got that far. The Ministry made sure of that.”

“ ... ”

“Poor Harry, you have no idea what we're talking about, do you?”

“I think I have an idea.”

“Half an idea is worse than no idea at all. My husband and I were making money as Harvesters- we caught and disassembled animals for potion ingredients- and someone told the Ministry we were performing dark rituals with animal sacrifices. About ten aurors barged into our house in the middle of the night without announcing themselves, and we both assumed we were being attacked by Death Eaters and tried to defend ourselves. Jonathan and my little Tony, not even a year old, were killed. I spent almost a year in St. Mungos trying to recover. Even when everything was cleared up, the Ministry never apologized. Never acknowledged their mistake. I suppose that's why no one was really that sorry to see it go. It was rotten to the core by then... no, it was rotten long before."

Harry could say nothing. It was such a personal and tragic story, and bore uncomfortable familiarities with his own. A sole survivor of a murdered family and even after the truth is revealed, justice fails, and they're left alone to make the most of things. Even Snape's vile insensitivity was held at bay by the aura of loss that hung around his companions. Larousse took a deep breath and shook herself from her melancholy.

"Why are we even talking about this? I came out to enjoy the weather, not reminisce on old wounds. Let's change the subject. So Harry, decided what you want to do with your life?"

"... not die?"

Snape rolled his eyes and Larousse laughed, the bitterness in her eyes retreating instantly.

"That isn't as funny as you think," Snape said. "I'm quite skeptical of Mr. Potter's survival into adulthood. Frankly, I doubt he'll survive puberty."

"... that pretty much sums it up," Harry agreed, taking a bite of his peach. "I think there are bets going around about how I'll die. I think I'll get eaten, but Hermione's quite convinced it will be the result of a quidditch accident."

"I put 20 galleons on poisoning."

"No one will accept a bet you could help bring about."

"Ah well..."

"Severus! That isn't funny!"

"Of course not," he agreed as blandly as he had every thing else. "How else am I to reach early retirement, now?"

"I'll bequeath my glasses to you," Harry offered, "You could auction them out to the fan girls."

"How generous of you. Who gets your cloak? The one that changes colors?"

"Natalie. Hermione has a thing against furs."

"Severus, Harry, enough. That really isn't funny," Larousse said, any humor she'd had before completely evaporated. Harry looked away, staring at his fingers, shiny and sticky from the peach. No, it wasn't really funny in a 'ha ha' sense, but it was rich in irony. He wasn't kidding about the glasses or the fur coat. In fact, he had his very own little will written out and magically protected at the bottom of his trunk. Only Clyde knew about it, and he was the only one Harry intended to tell, but it was legally binding and should automatically submit itself to Robert Reiger, the lawyer whom he had met at his first adoption party and whose card was still settled snugly between the pages of a school book.

Larousse sighed as the silence stretched after her admonishment.

"Honestly, you two really are such boys."

"I believe I still have a birth certificate around here somewhere, if you doubt it," Snape said.

"I could get a note from the nurse."

"Now you're ganging up on me. Play fair, won't you? I'm only one woman after all."

"Maggots," Snape reminded her.

"Maggots aside, no ganging up on a lady. Besides, we've gotten off topic. We were suppose to help Harry figure out what he wants to do."

Snape gestured toward Harry to answer, already surmising what the boy would say.

"I really don't know. Am I suppose to? I mean, I haven't even gotten into the upper level courses yet. I don't know what I'm really good at. I don't even know half of what kind of careers are out there. I know most of the court positions and about teaching jobs and some research jobs and construction, but there has to be a lot more out there. Like... who collects all the ingredients for potion's class? Who runs the floo network? Who makes up all these spells and potions we learn about in class? If there are lawyers and doctors and veterinarians in the wizarding world, are there dentists and real estate agents and normal jobs like that too? What about art school? Or trade school? Should I-"

Snape held up a hand to stop him.

"The 'I really don't know' was sufficient."

"It seems you really have thought about it, Harry, and you've got a lot of questions too. I think you might try some aptitude tests to narrow down your search."

"They have those here?"

Snape shuddered. "Yes, but don't give them too much weight. I took one once."

Amused, Larousse asked what it suggested.

"Teaching."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Harry, are you alright?"

In the lamp light of the common room, Ginny Weasley was half shadows and half concerned friend. The subject of her concern was curled up in the windowsill, looking out into the rain that had blown in shortly after nightfall. There had been rumors going around all afternoon that Snape and Larousse had both been absent from lunch and were secretly on a date, but Ginny knew from Hermione that Harry was with Snape, so that was impossible. Something must have happened with the potion's master, because the boy had been acting strange. Harry had returned from his meeting with Snape, very quiet and withdrawn, and despite his friends attempt to cheer him up, he had remained listless.

"Oh, hey Ginny. Why aren't you in bed?" he said, startled from his introspection.

"I could ask the same of you. What's the matter?"

"Nothing, really. Just thinking about things."

She moved to the adjoining windowsill and pressed her hand against the glass, feeling it cool and vibrating from every drop of rain that struck it.

"Sad things?"

"... Yes, I suppose so. I've been thinking about parents."

Ginny had suspected as much. She did not know all the details, but certainly more than the Hogwarts' Herald could claim. She knew Harry was an orphan at the very least, though not what had taken his parents from him.

"About how they died?"

"No... not that. Not just my parents. I was just thinking about all the kids who don't have their parents, and parents who don't have their kids. Like me and Hermione and all those boys and girls in WYRA, and how all their parents are either dead or don't remember their kids ever existing. Or all those people who lost their families during the war. Did you know Professor Larousse had a husband and son? I don't think even Hermione knew that. They were both killed by the old Ministry by accident. How awful is that?"

Ginny didn't say anything for a long time, taking in what Harry had said and how he had said it, his vibrant green eyes haunting in the white-gray reflections of the glass.

"It's very awful. I know how you feel Harry. I know my situation isn't the same because my mum's alive, but in some ways I think it makes things worse. After dad..."

She had to stop for a moment. It had been years since she had thought about it, locking the pain of it away for the sake of both her and her mother. But she would unlock it for Harry, and it was as shiny and sharp as it had ever been, kept safely in that little cabinet in her heart.

"After dad was arrested, everything fell apart. It wasn't just that he was gone, and that really hurt by itself, but there was no one to help mum. We all tried, we really did, but what could we do? Mum wouldn't let Bill get a job because he was in Hogwarts then, and that was really the only safe place to be at the time, and none of the rest of us were old enough to work or really take care of ourselves. I wasn't even old enough for kindergarten yet. But we tried to make things at least easier for her, but it wasn't enough. Everything so expensive after the war and jobs were hard to come by, so when she could find work she had to work really, really hard and still couldn't pay all our bills and keep food on the table. No matter how hard we tried to keep out of trouble and keep clean and help with chores and not eat much and look after each other, mum was always working and tired and cried at night when she thought we were asleep. I remember thinking once it would be better for mum if we all got taken away... and then we did."

Tears were falling, fast and hard, a dam released, and Harry's arms were suddenly around her, pressing her against his chest. His heartbeat pounded loudly in her ears, drowning out her own sobbing and he was trembling as hard as she was.

"Oh Merlin, I can't forget it," she wept, "I can't forget how those men and women came to our house to take my brothers away. Mum was screaming and screaming, and we all tried to run away from them, but they cast stunning charms on us and mum just kept screaming. And when I woke up, she was crying and my brothers were all gone, and she couldn't stop crying and I couldn't stop either, and I still can't stop."

They were on the floor now, Harry rocking her against him as she sobbed into his chest. It was so strange and painful and wonderful. She hadn't told anyone about that day, about the days that had led to it. Her mother and brothers knew already, and she had figured that was enough, but this was so much better. Harry was warm and kind and so strong, and she knew he understood. And after a while the tears stopped, and she felt calm and strangely clean, her head still resting against his chest.

"You know, it's strange," she said, "But eventually, it did get better. It's still hard, it still hurts, but it's better. Mum misses my brothers a lot, but we still get to see each other, especially Charlie and Bill. They come over all the time and help around the house, and Percy has started coming over more often now that he learned to apparate. I don't know what's wrong with Ron though. He can be so sweet, he really can, especially to me and mum, but he's so angry too. Do you know why he's so angry?"

Harry said nothing for a moment, just continuing to rock her gently.

"... I can make a few guesses, but I don't know him that well."

"Do you ever get angry about it? I mean, that your parents died and left you behind?"

Another silence, and he stopped rocking her for a moment. She pulled back a little to look up into his eyes. Still so incredibly green even in the shadows and half light of the lamps, and burning even in their grief.

"Yes... sometimes. I know they didn't want to and they would be here if they could, but... there's a lot of things they never told me. Really important things, and now I'll never be able to ask. I think that's what really gets me some times. I should have grown up knowing I'm a wizard. I could have been so much more prepared for things that have happened to me, but they... they wanted to live as muggles, even though they weren't, even though they must have known I wouldn't be one either. I feel cheated. That makes me angry sometimes."

Ginny nodded, wiping away the remnants of her tears. She sensed their time was coming to an end. She was all cried out and Harry was withdrawing into himself again. She wanted so badly to kiss him then, to draw him back into their brief moment of closeness, before it dissolved into the thing of dreams.

But she couldn't. Despite her House's boast of bravery, she couldn't bring herself to risk his rejection. It seemed impossible that he would accept her like that. There were already two beautiful, proud, and confident girls in his life. What would he see in a dumpy, broken little thing like herself other than a friend?

"You should get some sleep. Tonight's a school night," Harry said, helping Ginny to her feet.

"Yeah, you too," she finished lamely, finding herself now unable to look him in the eyes again. "Goodnight, Harry."

"Goodnight, Ginny."

She was half way up the stairs when he spoke again, just barely audible over the pattering of the rain.

"And Ginny... thanks."

"For what? You're the one who listened to me whine, not the other way around," she said meekly.

"For telling me... for telling me it gets better. That's what I really needed to know. That it will all just keep getting better. And that I'm not the only one who gets mad at dead people, even though it's a silly thing to do."

They chuckled softly, and she could look him in the eyes again.

“Your quite welcome, Mr. Potter.”

“Until tomorrow then, Ms. Weasley,” he said with an exaggerated bow, then retreated to his dorm. Ginny stood on the stairwell a long time, feeling all a flutter. She hadn't thought she could love Harry anymore than she did, but what she felt at that moment made any previous affection seem pale and frivolous.

“Until tomorrow...” she sighed happily.

Book III:

Chapter 6: The Siege

September was an awkward month for Harry. The transition from summer vacation to school, from one school year to the next was always a bit jarring, especially for someone as active as him. The classes all seemed to have increased their work load, complicated their subject matter, and given less time to study for it all. Professor Larousse's warning of next year's scholastic decisions were repeated in several other classes, and hung over the students' heads like a guillotine's blade, waiting to drop on anyone found guilty of slacking.

Extra curricular activities took a turn as well. With Oliver Wood's entry into seventh year, he was desperate for another Gryffindor victory, convinced his choice of university depended on it. The team practiced at least five times a week, usually more, with much of the team sacrificing their Hogsmeade weekends to do so, and their captain drove them like beasts. Dueling Club was facing a similar situation. Snape had submitted the Dueling Club's application papers to the League of Young Duelists, the official dueling league for students, and they were expecting a representative to visit in November and determined if they were skilled enough to qualify for competitions. Junior Captain Ronald Weasley, an utter prat to begin with, was now a prat with a mission, and bullied and harassed his 'subordinates' mercilessly towards some impossible ideal of perfection. It didn't help that there were twenty new members who were way out of their depth. Harry had unofficially taken them under his wing, and Ron was more than happy to let him while he focused on the more experienced members.

Harry was surprised at how much he enjoyed teaching his classmates, but the extra work load did little to ease his growing stress level.

And then of course there was the newspaper. Avoiding it took too much energy, and soon Harry had to resort to simply ignoring the students reporters. That was easy enough. Ignoring the rest of the students whispering and pointing and wondering every time he passed them was a bit harder. There was a particular group of students, most of them second or first year girls, who had formed a sort of informal club and seemed to spend most of their time following or gossiping about Harry. They were called the Harriettes as a joke. Harry wasn't laughing.

Making things worse and occasionally better, was Professor Larousse. It was quickly discovered that the DA&D professor had a soft spot for Harry, which might have earned him a lot of enemies among the male students, if it weren't so obvious that her romantic interest lay with Professor Snape. Whenever he was feeling particularly strained or tired, she had a tendency to pull him away from what ever he was doing to have a 'chat'. It was awkward and rather annoying, yet strangely comforting. Despite being surrounded by teachers and friends, she was the only one who seemed interested that he not work too hard, and let him know that it was alright if he didn't take everything so seriously.

Nevertheless, Harry was immensely happy when November finally rolled around, and things began to settle into a workable routine. Even better, the Quidditch season had started, and wonder of wonders, Gryffindor's first match was against Slytherin.

"How you feeling, Harry?" Oliver Wood asked, looking him over from head to toe, making sure nothing was missing apparently.

"The same as I was the last time you asked. And the time before that. And before that. Not much has changed in the last five minutes, Wood."

"Oh, er... yeah."

"I hope that wasn't your motivational speech for the match," said George, coming around a row of lockers with his brother. Fred wore a matching grin and laughed.

"Oh, shut up, you two!"

"I've got motivation for everyone!" Fred said, then turned to the rest of the team. "If we win this match, less practice!"

“Hey, I didn't agree-”

Too late. The team all let out a cheer, Harry among them, and hurried to finish putting on their gear and headed out to the pitch. Clyde met them before they reached their destination, looking aggravated.

“They've tricked us!” the Gryffindor said by way of greeting, catching everyone's attention. “They switched out their Seeker, and get this, it's Malfoy.”

That actually made Harry smile.

“Really?”

“How can you be happy about this, mate? He's your friend and he lied to you! This could screw up your entire game plan!”

Harry just kept smiling and shook his head.

“It was a bad move on their part. Malfoy doesn't have any experience playing in a real match, so even if he's better than their last seeker, it wasn't very bright to have him play his first match against us. Everyone knows Gryffindor-Slytherin matches are the trickiest.”

George was quick to point out they did the same thing with Harry.

“Yeah, and we barely came out of that match alive.”

Oliver rubbed his eyes and thought for a moment, then sighed.

“Nothing to be done about it now. Just do your best... or I'll double your practices.”

They continued on towards the pitch, but Clyde grabbed Harry's arm, still clearly bothered by the turn of events.

“You're not mad at him?”

“Who? Malfoy? Why would I be? I didn't tell him when I got on the Quidditch team, so I can hardly hold it against him. Besides, I've wanted to see if he's as good as he says he is for a while.”

“But what if he wins?!”

Harry looked at him oddly.

“Gryffindor loses, I guess. We've lost before, you know.”

Clyde still didn't look happy, but Harry had more important things to worry about. Chances were if he won the match, his friend would be happy again anyway. He took to the field with his team, waving at the crowds cheering at them from the stands. With brief glance at the Emperor's Box, Harry was surprised to find that Voldemort had actually shown up. The Dark Lord nodded to him in acknowledgment, before turning back to talk with Lestrangle.

“Eyes forward, Potter. I want to see your face before its run into the mud.”

Harry smirked as he looked over at Draco, standing amidst his teammates, broom in hand. The Slytherin offered a smug smile of his own. It was rare that they had direct competition, but as Harry's popularity had grown, Draco had been increasingly eager to test himself against his Gryffindor friend and Harry felt the same. This match promised to be quite exciting.

“Players, mount your brooms!” called Professor Grimm, drawing their attention back to the game. “Release the snitch!”

Draco was fast. Harry was faster. But the Slytherins were prepared for Harry's speed. Harry had just inched past the other Seeker in pursuit of the Snitch when a bludger caught him in the side. The force of it knocked him clean off his broom and sent him careening into the ground. Luckily, he had only been hovering a few feet. Draco had been so close behind him that he had been forced to break away. Both lost sight of the Snitch. Breathless and disoriented, Harry hurried back onto his broom and took to the air.

“Didn't I say you'd be face first in the mud, Potter?” Draco laughed, hovering nearby as they searched the arena for the snitch.

“Marvelous, Malfoy. You're assured a job as a fortune tell after this. A good thing since professional Quidditch player is out of the question.”

“I'll show-”

“Found it!”

Harry was off and again Draco followed closely, but now Harry was more conscientious of the other players and easily avoided the bludgers and the Slytherins. In fact, Draco was having more trouble evading his own teammates than he was Gryffindor's, and barely avoided two bludgers meant for Harry. He was tenacious though, clinging closely to Harry and blocking much of his maneuverability whenever the snitch made an unexpected turn.

“Both seekers are clinging tight to one another, making it difficult for the beaters to get a clear shot with their bludgers. Gryffindor Seeker Potter is renown for his agility on a broom, but it seems he may have met- and Slytherin scores! Forty points to Slytherin!”

They dived and spun and twisted and pitched and just plain flew with all their might, the crowds and stands and players mere blurs as they rushed past so the only thing in focus was that little glittering ball flying even faster than they were. It was intense and liberating, and even if he lost, Harry didn't think he could have been any happier on a broom. His limits tested and exceeded and the danger of crashing sent his heart pounding and sharpened his senses, bringing his awareness of his body and his magic and Draco's magic and the hundreds upon hundreds of bodies of magic surrounding him into stark clarity.

His joy lasted only for a brief minute, when the snitch suddenly flew low over the stands. Draco bulked, pulling back to keep from careening into the spectators, but Harry had more confidence. He kept going, and sent several of the people below him ducking for cover.

Unfortunately, those several people who ducked didn't include one Colin Creevey with his ever present camera.

The flash of the bulb caught him squarely in the eyes, stunning and blinding him simultaneously. He pulled up sharply, only half in control of his broom. He was caught by one of the twins before he ran himself clean into the wall.

"You alright, Harry?"

"Argh! No! I can't see!"

"Give it a sec, it should clear."

"Where's Malfoy?"

"Oh..ah... just about ready to win the game..."

Harry squinted and managed to make out Draco's blurry form rushing towards the Emperor's box. The Slytherin Seeker took a sharp downward turn and reached out. Harry grimaced and turned away, not wishing to see his team's inevitable defeat.

Said defeat was interceded by a rather unexpected turn of events, most important being that the stands exploded. There was no fire or heat, but the sound of shattering wood blasted through the pitch. Draco had been the closest player, and was hurled from his broom and even higher into the air. Harry quickly focusing eyes locked onto the boy's falling body, unable to move or look away. Even before impact, the shock had gone straight to terror, and the screaming began.

From somewhere in the crowds Harry thought he heard Hermione's, but it was for her brother.

"Levi corpus!"

Draco's fall stopped abruptly, not by the ground, but by the spell that caught him a mere hand's length from certain death. Harry's line of sight brought him to a red head, but he didn't linger on which Weasley Draco now owed his life to. His attention now turned to the shattered stands, the supports destroyed, the whole structure was starting to tilt forward onto the pitch. The men and women trapped there were thrown from their seats as it started to lean, scrambling to gain purchase and their wands. As abruptly as Draco's fall had stopped, so too did the collapse, and Harry felt the familiar electric tingle of Voldemort's most powerful magic pervade the air.

"Come on! We have to help get them down from there!"

Harry pulled himself out of the twin's arm and flew straight for the stands. Behind him, he heard some of the flyers rally the rest of their teammates to follow. Harry reached the stands first, taking hold of woman who had slid almost completely off the platform and was clinging desperately to Professor Vector's outstretched hand.

"I've got her! Let go!"

Harry and his passenger struggled for a moment as she tried to climb on in a dress not meant for movement, but at last they could pull away and move to safety. As he retreated, he could managed to glimpse Voldemort, standing perfectly balanced, both hands and one wand held out before him, eyes closed and chanting something that definitely wasn't Latin.

He dropped his passenger beside Draco, who had been levitated to the other side of the pitch. Ron was beside the blond, checking to make sure his former friend was merely unconscious and not as dead as he looked. They caught each other's gaze briefly, but Harry didn't have time to speak, and flew back to the stands for another passenger. The rest of the teams had cleared out most of them, leaving the least panicked for last. McGonagall mounted his broom with perfect poise, as if it were a mere bicycle ride and not a a rescue, and once on the ground she hurried off to help return order. Snape followed shortly after, not bothering to be rescued, he transfigured his robes into a set of black wings and glided down, Professor Larousse riding calmly in his arms. No sooner had everyone reached safety, then the stands collapsed into a cloud of dust.

Harry gasped. Voldemort had still been in there! He made to run for the wreckage, but Snape caught him before he got far.

“Wait, Mr. Potter,” he said, holding firm. Harry hesitated, his eyes still locked at the other side of the pitch, unable to see anything. It was likely only a few seconds that had passed, but to Harry it may as well have been an hour. Yet the dust did clear, and slowly the form of a man began to appear, becoming clearer and clearer until at last the Dark Lord strode from the cloud of dust, perfectly at ease and perhaps a little annoyed at being coated with a layer of dirt.

“My Lord!” Lestrangle called, striding quickly towards her master. Snape released Harry and followed suit, Larousse right behind him. Harry stayed where he was, unsure if his presence would be needed or welcomed at the moment, but close enough to hear most of what was said.

“Bella, I want you and Larousse to go ahead to the school and check for any curses or traps that may have been laid. I doubt anyone could get passed the castle's defenses, but I don't want to take any chances. Severus, I want you and the rest of the Hogwarts' staff to gather up the students, and take them back to the castle as soon as the all clear has been given. I will go to Hogsmeade and meet with my Sentinels. No doubt they are already on their way. We should have the culprit within the hour. Go.”

“My godson...” Snape said quickly, as the rest hurried off to their assigned tasks.

“I will send a healer on ahead to the castle. There will likely be several amongst the Sentinels.”

“Thank you, my Lord.”

Snape moved away quickly, snatching up Harry as he went.

“Professor, what just happened?”

The man didn't even glance at him, shoving him towards McGonagall and the students that had begun crowding around her. Harry lingered though, watching the man head towards Draco and Ron and a now very distraught Hermione, holding her brother's hand. He turned away, finding wreckage and a rather lovely view of the lake peaking in where the Emperor's box had once stood.

"What just happened?"

oo
oo

"Mad-Eye Moody," Ron Weasley said knowingly, surrounded by a crowd of students. Harry was amongst them, but kept towards the back of the Great Hall to listen. "I overheard some of the Sentinels talking while I was up in the hospital. They said 'This was definitely Mad-Eye's doing.'"

"But why?" someone asked.

"Why do you think, stupid? To kill Voldemort, of course. The papers all say he promised he would. They think he might have already gotten a Death Eater in Nottingham."

Harry turned away and headed towards the tables to join the rest of the Quidditch players huddled into one corner. For once, their team rivalry had been put aside as they tried to make sense of what they had seen.

"Ron have anything to say worth repeating?" Flint asked as Harry entered their circle.

"There's a suspect. Mad-Eye Moody, the escaped convict, right? But I'd wait till Hermione and Draco get back before spreading that rumor. Ron's been known to latch onto an idea, even if it's a bad one."

There was no need to explain what Harry was referring too.

"Know when they'll be back?" Angelina asked.

"I've been concussed before," Fred said, "They kept me for a night and let me go."

"Assuming a bump to the head is all that's wrong with him," a Slytherin chaser muttered.

"Weasley might know," Oliver suggested.

"He's sort of busy right now..."

They all shared an exasperated look at the redhead, shoveling out as much bullshit as the other students could swallow. Harry shook his head.

"Was anyone else hurt?"

"Some bangs and bruises when everyone tried to evacuate, but nothing as bad as Malfoy that we know about," Flint said. "We'll just have to wait till the teachers tell us what happened."

"Maybe we'll luck out and they'll tell the truth," Harry muttered, earning him a few curious looks. Deciding he'd said more than he should, the young Gryffindor wandered away, but there wasn't anywhere to go really.

"Potter."

Snape stood at the side entryway. After everyone had been herded into the Great Hall, the potion's master had left, presumably to help secure the castle with the rest of the Heads of House and several Sentinels. Harry glanced around to see who was watching. The Quidditch players had noticed, but Ron's audience hadn't. He moved quickly before they did.

"What is it, Professor?"

"Come with me for a moment."

Snape stalked off before Harry could question, and the Gryffindor had to jog after him to keep up. He didn't know why he had been called out, but he never would have thought the ruined Quidditch pitch to be his destination. Sentinels were scouring the remaining stands and debris, crawling over it all like ants on the prowl. On the green stood Voldemort, Lestrage, and Chief Sentinel Morgan who watched Harry's approach expectantly.

"Um... how can I help you?" he tried.

"Do you have your wand, Potter?" asked Voldemort.

Harry nodded.

"I want you to cast a Lumos charm, making it as dim as possible and gradually making it brighter and brighter. You may begin at any time."

Confused, he did as instructed. He did not have a lot of practice with controlling the flow of his magic through his wand, but if he concentrated on the result he wanted his magic tended to regulate itself. Sure enough he managed the dulllest of sparks which slowly grew brighter, until it was about as bright as a votive candle and a ringing sound distracted him. He turned to Sentinel Morgan, who was holding a metal ball with all sorts of dials around it, spinning their hands this way and that. The man nodded, and looked to the Dark Lord.

"It didn't take much. Young Malfoy must have picked up some residual magic from Potter and that's what set off the explosion."

Harry's eyes widened in alarm.

"What? My magic set off the explosion? How?"

"The specifics are rather beyond your education level to understand," Snape said easily, "Besides, the better question would be 'why'?"

"To blow me up, I assume," Harry said tightly, then shook his head. "That doesn't make sense either. Why set it up in the stands? Wouldn't it have been easier and more certain if the bomb... spell? were in the locker room?"

Voldemort patted him on the head, and smiled vaguely proud, vaguely indulgent.

"You obviously weren't the only target. I, too, was probably an intended victim. A witness said they heard one of my private Sentinels send away someone trying to get into the stands. If that person was the culprit, they may have succeeded in killing everyone during the explosion. Well... everyone but myself. I am not so vulnerable as mortal men."

It would have sounded extremely conceited if Harry hadn't seen the truth of it himself. Voldemort was no mortal man.

"What about the sentinel?"

"He was very near the explosion."

Harry decided the details weren't really necessary.

"So someone is trying to kill me again, along with the Dark Lord... what now?"

"I haven't thought that far ahead. I only wished to confirm whether or not you were the trigger for the explosion. We knew it was someone, and Malfoy has already been tested. You were the next most likely person." Voldemort said, then turned to Morgan who was clearly thinking. "What do you intend?"

"The castle is secure still, and I intend to keep it that way. Potter shouldn't leave the premises without an escort, and only when it's absolutely necessary. Hogsmeade weekends and outdoor activities are on hold. I would recommend keeping your distance from the school as well, my Lord. The boy is only a secondary target, but he'll be more vulnerable to any attack meant for you."

"How serious of a threat do you think he poses?"

Morgan looked over to the pile of obliterated wood meaningfully.

"Fairly significant."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Chief Sentinal John Morgan had a love/hate relationship with anarchy. On one hand, he hated it. Plain and simple. On the other hand, he loved destroying it. Had made a living, a reputation, and even a few slots in history conquering it. So he liked to keep a fairly positive view when faced with the newest threat to wizarding society.

He was having a tough time with this case though.

There had of course, been worse acts of terrorism in the course of his career. Relatively speaking, this rated a meager 7 on the one to ten scale, but it easily had the potential to turn into a 1. Voldemort had been present, along with a generation's worth of Britain's most powerful children. Things could have gone very, very badly.

“Chief?”

He looked up from some documents to see one of his least experienced officers standing nervously before him, behind her was a familiar face.

“Ah, Chief, this is Professor Vesper Larousse. She says she's the Dark Arts instructor at Hogwarts. She said it was important she speak with you.”

“Do you believe everything someone tells you? I don't suppose you asked for identification?” Morgan asked, and the girl paled. He waved her off. “Check next time before you escort a potential assassin across the premises. I'll talk with her.”

The young Sentinel rushed away, and Larousse took a seat. It looked rather cozy with the lace table cloth and little vase of carnation sitting between them. The Court had temporarily requisitioned Madam Puddifoot's as base of operation until something more appropriate could be constructed. The rest of the village was empty, its inhabitants currently rounded up for questioning as their homes and shops were rummaged for additional suspects and clues.

"You look well, Vesper. Civilian life seems to agree with you."

"At least something agrees with me," she said, coyly, "But I'm not here to talk about the past. I want to offer my help."

Morgan felt uncharacteristically amused by that. He almost smiled, in fact. Almost.

"What sort of help are you offering?"

"I want to help guard Harry," she said. She was all smiles when she said it, but the glint in her eyes was hard. Morgan's amusement evaporated.

"What makes you think Harry needs to be guarded?"

"I know you called him out to the Quidditch pitch earlier, and I know you passed on instructions to Minerva that Harry should not be allowed out of the castle afterwards. That means he is either a suspect or a potential target. I'm going to go with the later. Am I wrong?"

"No, you are not wrong, but you're not honest either. How much snooping have you done to make you feel you needed my cooperation for this task?"

"Just enough, obviously."

He snorted.

"You don't need my permission to watch over the boy. He's your student after all."

"But I do need information on whom I'm supposed to protect him from. Who ever set that explosion was very good."

Morgan leaned back in his chair and thought about it. Larousse was good. Really good. If she hadn't been so vocal about her disagreements with certain Court policies, she likely would have become his second in command by now and he would have been happy to have her. It wouldn't hurt to have another person looking after Potter, someone less obvious and more flexible than the Slytherin's Head of House. She understood discretion as well. Chances were, no one was even aware she was missing from the castle yet.

"Alright, I'll bite. Just tell me why? Are you trying to get back into the Court?"

She shook her head.

"I'm not interested in that sort of life any more. Like you said, civilian life agrees with me. I've been thinking about starting a family again."

That certainly surprised Morgan. Larousse was a beautiful, capable woman, and for as long as he had known her there had been men lining up at her door to be with her, and she had always kept the door firmly shut. He was not a family man himself, but he had seen enough tragedy in his life to know how the loss of one could damage a person. Larousse's damage had seemed unrepairable.

But that wasn't really the important thing at the moment.

"You didn't really answer my question. Why do you want to protect Potter?"

"Have you read his file?"

"Yes."

"Sad, isn't it?"

He hadn't thought about it at the time, but he suppose it was.

"I keep thinking Tony would be about his age now. I keep thinking about Tony living through what Harry had to. It really is too sad. I can't stand it. I want him to be safe and happy the way my baby should have been. Nothing more than that."

He didn't believe her, but he knew better to expect any more from her. Her discretion was just one of the things he admired about her, even when it was inconvenient. He turns to one of his men studying a map of the surrounding area.

“Crichton, get over here. I want you to take Professor Larousse and have her fill out a Civ-2-60 with level 2 clearance. Debrief her on our progress and then let her go. I want her back in Hogwarts within the hour.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Thank you, John.”

“Just don't make me regret this.”

She nodded once and left him to his work.

Ooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Book III:

Chapter 7: Poison

Sunday morning found most of the Hogwarts' students huddled over copies of Wizard Weekly's front page, looking for answers and the names of people they knew. Harry had tried and failed to resist the temptation, and retreated into one of the deserted hallways with Ginny and Clyde to read aloud.

"... Thanks to the quick action of Hogwart's students, only a Sentinal guarding the stairwell of the platform was killed by the explosion. Despite the misfortune of such an attack occurring at a school event, Great Britain should feel proud of its young people. They showed great bravery and poise blah, blah, blah Britain's number one and everyone else sucks."

"Harry!" Clyde laughed.

"I think we can all do without the ego stroking right now. I just wanted to make sure Draco was okay and see if they have any leads."

"They said it was Moody just like Ron did."

Harry shrugged.

"I'd rather ask Hermione and Draco myself. They're better at telling when the paper is just throwing out ideas and when they've got something to back it up."

"You're just grouchy because they canceled quidditch," Ginny said knowingly. "We should see if McGonagall knows when they'll be back."

They did as she suggested, but it turned out to be unnecessary. Hermione was just stepping out of the Head of Gryffindor's office when they arrived. She gave each of them a warm hug, even Clyde who looked rather embarrassed.

"How is Draco?" Harry was the first to ask.

"A bit shaken, but perfectly alright. He was quite thoroughly irritated that he didn't catch the snitch before he was nearly killed. Boys! Honestly!"

Even Clyde found that pretty funny, and they laughed as they headed towards the library.

"Seriously though, it was a close call. If Ron hadn't..."

She sighed.

"I've been giving him grief all year and now he turns around and saves my brother's life. I've been a real snob to him, and I didn't realize how much of one until yesterday. I'm definitely going to have to apologize to him."

Harry grimaced at the thought. True, he and Ron weren't fighting anymore and had fallen into a tense sort of neutrality, but both knew the other was just waiting for someone to falter, to push, and they would be back to warring as if they'd never stopped. A subject change was in order.

"Did you learn anything about the attack?"

"Moody is still a strong suspect, but with all the parents coming in through Hogsmeade, no one has been able to figure out who or how he disguised himself. It would have to be difficult to cover up a lost leg and eye."

"I don't know," Harry said, "Muggles are pretty good at that. I've seen men with these really neat metal legs that they can run and even jump in. If they're wearing pants you can't really tell they're injured at all. And glass eyes aren't uncommon. Surely magic can make better ones than those."

"Maybe..." Hermione conceded, her thoughts drifting off to new theories as Harry presented her with a completely foreign idea. Wizards hiding amongst muggles? What a fascinating concept!

The library was fuller than usual, but not enough to discourage them from finding a table to themselves. They cast a silencing charm and checked for ease-droppers, and continued.

"I was the trigger," Harry said immediately. His friends were, unsurprisingly, startled. "The explosion was linked to my magical signature. It was suppose to go off when I got close enough to the stands, but Draco was flying so close to me he must have picked up enough of my residual magic to set it off himself. That explosion was meant to kill both me and Voldemort."

Everyone was quiet for a long moment.

"Why you?" Ginny asked, almost in a whisper. Harry shrugged. He really didn't know either.

"I think," Hermione began. "I don't think it was about killing Harry per se. I mean, for the explosion to be set off without killing the culprit, he'd have to... no, he could have used a timer. Setting it to a quidditch player's magical signature was much riskier. You all fly around so quickly and randomly he risked blowing himself up. But how do you know it was set to you, Harry? It could just as easily have been set to Draco or one of the other players."

"I got called out and they tested me. They were certain my magic was the trigger. But they didn't say why I was chosen. If he intended to use a quidditch player to begin with, it might just have been bad luck."

Clyde shook his head.

"No way your luck is that bad. I bet Moody believes all that stuff in the paper. You know, like you possibly being the Dark Lord's illegitimate son or grandson or something. He probably wanted to kill off the man's entire line."

"That's just silly. What good will killing a kid do? It's not like he's listed Harry as his heir or anything," Hermione said.

"Crazy person," Clyde pointed out. Hermione conceded that with a shrug.

"Do you think Harry's still in danger?" Ginny asked anxiously.

That was a rather good question, and no one seemed certain of the answer.

"Don't worry, Ginny. There are Sentinels crawling all over the place from Hogsmeade all the way to the Great Hall. Plus Voldemort would be his main target, and he's gone back to London. I'll be fine."

"That's right. And don't forget we've all got your back, Harry. Ain't no one who'll sneak up on you while we're around, right?"

Harry smiled.

"Thanks, Clyde. I appreciate that."

"Welcome, mate. That's what friends are for. Although that reminds me. Where are Cypher and Malfoy? Shouldn't they be hearing this too?"

Hermione sighed.

"Can't be helped. Draco was talking with Ron last I checked and Natalie decided to stick around to watch for potential bloodshed. I think she'll be disappointed. They both looked pretty mellow."

"Do you think they're making up?" Ginny asked hopefully.

"It'd be the gentlemanly thing to do. Ron did save Draco's life after all. Draco might even owe him a life debt."

A pang of guilt hit Harry. It should have been him who saved the boy. He was the Slytherin's friend and would have been happy to help him without calling on any compensation for it. Instead, he'd frozen like an utter fool and nearly allowed his best friend's brother to die. He might even have been responsible for it.

"Harry, stop thinking morbidly," Hermione said, rolling her eyes. "You look utterly silly when you mope."

“I was not moping.”

“Fine, festering in internal torment then. Just stop. It's not like any of this is your fault. You didn't set up that explosion. You didn't hurt my brother. So stop feeling bad about it. Look on the bright side. Perhaps you can use this opportunity to try and get along better with Ron. He is the captain of the Junior Dueling Club, and you're probably his best duelist. It wouldn't hurt to be on better terms.”

That sounded about as much fun as testing potions in Snape's class. He forced a smile anyway.

“Sure. I can try.”

oo
oo

Harry had plenty of time to practice his diplomacy skills on Ron in the following weeks. Without quidditch practice eating up so much of his free time, he found himself filling it studying and practicing for Dueling Club. Professor Larousse had offered her time to supervise practice duels on Mondays and Tuesdays, which is exactly how Harry enjoyed spending his afternoons. The young Gryffindor did not really consider himself much of a scholar, but he loved the practice of magic itself. The entire art of dueling held many elements that he enjoyed; competition, challenge, unpredictability.

However the duel turned out, long, short, victorious or defeated, Harry felt energized at its conclusion and eager to try again. During the spare time between matches, he drew sketches, working on his technique for action rather than the still lives he was used to. Some of the better ones had been framed and placed in the new display cases, filling the spaces where their trophies would go once they began completing with other schools.

The Weasley twins were happy to lend themselves to him for private tutorials, as well. Their spell repertoire was second to none amongst the student body, and their ingenuity was geared toward offensive and defensive reasoning to begin with. Hermione had accompanied Harry on one of his tutorials, but she was too focused on the mechanics of their techniques to really understand the art of them and was mentally overwhelmed within minutes. Harry on the other hand had the problem in reverse. He fell into the art of it, their speed, their ingenuity, their mind games, but lacked the knowledge of their specific techniques. Unlike Hermione, however, this didn't intimidate Harry, but merely motivated him to finding the answers.

"Oh, Lord of Chaos, exploder of things and maker of mayhem" Fred gushed after one session that had Harry on his back, "You make us so happy. If I could feel my arms I'd hug you."

Fourteen spells that could keep that from ever happening immediately popped into the younger boy's head. Not that he wasn't grateful. Thursday club meetings held little practice value for Harry, who was still overseeing the rookies, and the only ones who held a real challenge for him in the junior division, Draco and Ron, never attended Larousse's practices. Harry suspected Snape was tutoring both of them in private, but couldn't muster the energy to be resentful. He didn't fancy anymore time with Snape after last summer anyway.

He did, however, miss Draco. The Malfoy heir wasn't around as much, having found Ron's company somehow more agreeable this year than last and Harry finding the exact opposite. They sat together during classes, smirking and joking to each other whenever the teachers' backs were turned, and pranked the younger students in the halls and meal times. Whenever the Slytherin Weasley caught Harry watching them, his obnoxious little smirk would get just a little bit smugger.

It might have been a bit petty, but Harry was really starting to wish Ron's wand would blow up in his face. Yes, he had plenty of opportunity to practice diplomacy, but he didn't. Perhaps he couldn't. The only tried and true technique for keeping peace between them was avoidance.

Even when they were standing right next to each other.

"Allbright is still struggling on shields. How can we get an endorsement when our duelists can't make a simple blocking charm?" Ron growled, staring directly at the struggling first year.

"You're asking too much. He's only had a wand for two months, of course he's struggling. He knows the spell, just give him a bit longer to control his magical output."

"We don't have that time. The representative from the dueling league will be here in two weeks."

"They're not expecting miracles," Harry said, impatience quickly descending. He didn't know why Ron was scolding him for this. He wasn't the captain. He wasn't even the vice captain, despite Ron's insistence that he was going to pick someone before the end of the month. Harry didn't get his hopes up that it would be him, even though everyone said he was perfect for the position. Draco Malfoy was a fine duelist himself, and if he wasn't exactly the sort of leader the other club members were hoping for, he certainly worked with the captain a lot better than he did.

"This is Hogwarts, they damn well better be expecting miracles."

The red head stalked off, snapping something at Hermione about being more aggressive with her hexes. Harry glared at the boy's back, but catching Snape in the corner of his vision, he headed over to assist the rookies. Allbright saw him coming, and looked pointedly at his shoes, fully prepared to be reprimanded for his shields that kept failing.

Harry just patted him on the shoulder. Allbright was the only first year Hufflepuff in Dueling Club, and the Gryffindor thought him very brave for staying after what must have seemed like failure after failure.

"First years over here," Harry called, "The rest of you can keep practicing your shields or go over to practice your aim with the others."

They all moved quickly and without question to do as he said. After two months, he had finally started getting used to that.

"Alright everyone, I've noticed you've been having trouble using the proper amount of magic in your spells."

"You mean Allbright is having trouble," grumbled a Ravenclaw girl, causing the boy to flinch.

"No, you've been doing it too."

She looked startled, then embarrassed, then predictably angry.

"I have not!"

"You're over exerting yourself on your offensive spells. How many Disarming Spells can you get out before you're exhausted? Three? Four tops. You should be able to get out a dozen before you even feel the strain."

She couldn't refute it. Hadn't even realized she was doing anything wrong in fact. She just assumed she needed to work on her stamina. Seeing she was suitably chastised, Harry continued.

"We are going to practice a very simple exercise that will help you learn to control your body's release of magic. You are all familiar with a Lumos charm?"

They nodded, it was one of the very first spells they learned in charms class.

"I want you to cast the spell, and then I want you to practice controlling how bright the light is. Stay aware of how the magic flows out of your body and how it affects the spell. I want you to practice this in and out of practices. It's perfectly safe and you'll find it helpful in your other classes as well as in duels. Any questions?"

Allbright raised his hand.

"If we can't do it... um... are we going to get kicked out?"

"Of course not. But don't worry about not being able to do it, until you've tried first. Go and-"

"HA! HA! HA! HA!"

All eyes turned towards the other side of the dueling hall and the source of the scornful laugh. Hermione stood, arms crossed, and sneering haughtily at an infuriated red head. Apparently, Ron had done or said something that had made the girl forget completely about her attempt to be nicer to him, and reminded her just why she had hated him in the first place.

"As if you're captain for any other reason than because you're Slytherin. Harry is twice the leader you are and a better duelist too!"

"As if! I could beat that little goody-goody any time, any where. I've done it before!"

"No you didn't! You dropped your wand and fought like an over grown monkey, not a wizard!"

There was a scattering of snickers. Ron's face darkened in anger.

"You think I can't do it? Are you really so sure? Care to make a wager on it?"

Hermione hesitated.

"What's the matter? Don't you believe what you're saying? Or are you really just full of it? The Great Hermione Granger of Malfoy, just another spoiled little girl hiding behind her money and family name. Well?"

"He could beat a horrid little toad like you in a heartbeat!"

"How much you willing to wager on that?"

"Gambling isn't-"

"Of course, I'd never suggest anything as- what's Draco's term for it?- 'plebeian' as money. Let say we make it more interesting? If Potter can beat me I'll acknowledge it and give him vice captaincy, but if I win, you have to go to the winter formal with me as my date."

For once in her life, Hermione looked completely without words. She just kept staring at Ron with a mixture of disbelief, horror, and embarrassment.

"I... um..."

"Well, if you think you'll lose, you could always just admit right here and now that you were just full of hot air, and Potter really isn't a better duelist than me. Don't worry, I'm sure everyone will understand. It was just a moment of female hysterics. It happens to woman all the time, I hear."

"Ron, you're such a pig. I can't wait to see Harry turn you into one!"

"I take it we have a deal then?"

"Fine!"

"Fine!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Harry, I'm really, really sorry," Hermione said, pursuing her friend as he stalked down the corridors towards the common room. "I don't know what came over me!"

Harry stopped abruptly, turned to tell her exactly what came over her, then thought better of it and continued on towards his destination. He was madder than he had ever been at his best friend. After months of relative peace, Hermione had shot it all to hell in less than five minutes. She'd started a fight and dragged him in to it, not thinking of the consequences. And there were consequences.

He couldn't turn down the challenge without being seen as a coward by friend and foe alike, and any respect the rookies gave him would likely go up in smoke. The humiliation of conceding would be worse than defeat or victory. If he lost, Ron would never let him live it down. If he won, Ron would never forgive him, and he'd have Harry as a direct subordinate to take his revenge on. The club members would become confused on who was in charge. He didn't like the Slytherin, but he certainly didn't want a mutiny. Snape would kill him.

Snape might kill him anyway. It was clear to everyone who had seen his and Ron's first duel that their club supervisor had been keeping them from dueling each other since then and showed no signs of ever letting them face each other again. Snape certainly hadn't been happy about the wager being made in the middle of club practices, but he hadn't interfered. It wasn't his habit to interfere with student intrigue unless some school rule was broken and, technically, none had.

"Hermione, just... I understand losing your temper," he said, still not looking back at her, "But I really don't appreciate you backing me into a corner here."

"I know, I know. It was unfair of me to volunteer you without asking, especially about this. God, I'm such a hypocrite. All this time I was telling you to get along better with Ron and that you should avoid risky situations and here I go sending you into a fight with Ron, the one guy who might really be your match on the platform. I'm so sorry!"

Harry sighed.

"I know. It's fine. It was probably going to happen eventually anyway. At least now I have some forewarning."

"I'll help in any way I can."

"Well, do you think..." he paused, and looked up and down the corridor. It was almost deserted excepted for man in a green hard hat. The engineers Voldemort had warned them about had arrived at last, and were making themselves known by their hard hats, security badges, and their ability to show up everywhere and anywhere without warning, tape measures and schematics in hand. Everyone had started referring to them as 'the Green Ghosts' or 'GG's'. They never talked to the students and their sole interest seem to lay in the stones of Hogwarts, but Harry was a bit paranoid about anyone eavesdropping. He pulled Hermione a little further up the corridor.

“Do you think you could keep this out of the paper?”

She looked doubtful.

“Yeah, I guess not. Do you think you might get a reporter who isn't going to turn this into some sort of 'fight to the death' story?”

“I think I can do that. There's a Ravenclaw girl who I think has a pretty good head on her shoulders, but the decision is really up to McGunny. I can't do it because I'm already involved. This is so embarrassing. I hope they don't print that.”

Harry couldn't help but smirk at that. It would certainly serve her right.

oo
oo

“I really don't know what she was thinking,” Snape grumbled as Larousse poured him his tea. The staff room was currently overrun by the engineers who, being the opportunistic bastards they were, had decided it was easier to 'share' with the teachers than set a break room for themselves in the hundred or so unused spaces. This had lead to the acquisition of one of the towers for his own personal use. He hadn't told anyone else about it, and so far only Vesper had caught on, and he suppose she was plenty.

The tea set was hers. The tea was his. They were quite complete without the twenty or so other people rampaging about with their clumsiness, their bad jokes, their complaints, or their god awful coffee.

“You can insult a girl's honor as easily as a boy's, Severus,” she offered, taking a seat across the little round table from him. “No doubt she was very flustered. Cream? Sugar?”

"A little cream, thank you. Then why drag Potter into it? I've been very careful about keeping those two from each other. Do you know anything about their last duel?"

"I've only heard a few rumors, and mostly how it ended. However, if Harry's current skill level is any indication, they both must be quite gifted for their ages to have lasted so long. I am quite interested to see it for myself."

"No doubt it will be fascinating, but it's also problematic. An open feud between Slytherin and Voldemort's favored? I could ring my goddaughter's neck right now."

He took a sip of his tea and leaned back in his chair, trying to clear his head. This was hardly a crisis situation, he reminded himself. Pride was at risk, not lives. He would be there to make sure things didn't get out of hand, and Vesper would be there to back him up.

It was strange to trust someone after so long, especially a woman, not just for her support but for her competence in supporting him. The last woman he had truly trusted had been Lily Evans, and that had ended badly. Vesper was no Lily though. That was probably for the best. She was not as naive, not as idealistic as his childhood love, and she understood loss and sacrifice just as much as he did and was stronger for it. She had unnerved him at first with her straight forward approach, but he was starting to warm up to her. He already respected her.

In the warm sunshine of the tower, sitting as poised and elegant as the porcelain tea cup in her hand, he could even admit he found her attractive.

"She's a smart girl. No doubt she is regretting her hasty words already. Perhaps some good might come of this. Do you suppose Harry would make a good vice-captain?"

"Certainly. Weasley is good at pulling the others after him, and Harry pushes from behind. They would make a great team if they could look at each other without bursting a blood vessel."

She smiled at that.

“Do you suppose Ms. Granger and Mr. Weasley would make a good couple?”

Snape choked on his tea, and she laughed at him.

“Woman, what are you thinking?!”

“I think they like each other already.”

“You're mad. Hermione hates that boy more than even Potter does.”

“She doesn't hate him. He just frustrates her, and she him. Have you ever noticed them watching each other? I've seen them do it during meal times. They're always curious about what the other is doing or saying. They seek out each other's company just to fight. It's really cute.”

Snape made a face that stated clearly that he didn't agree.

“A cobra and a mongoose would get along better.”

“At least you don't have to worry about her virtue then, or about rumors that she's secretly Harry's girlfriend. I know her father is looking into potential betrothals and that sort of thing could be disastrous for her.”

Clearly, Vesper was better at optimism than he was, for she did make some very good points. He raised his cup to her.

“Perhaps you are right. There's no stopping it at this point in any event.”

They spent the rest of their break in silence, enjoying their tea and their quiet company.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

By that Friday night, the entire school knew about Harry's duel with Ron, scheduled for that Monday. By Sunday night, Harry just wished it was over and done with. He hadn't bothered studying a lot so close to the day of the duel, knowing any attempt to integrate a new technique so soon would hinder more than help his cause, and the extent of his preparations were a few brief practices with the Weasley twins to keep him mentally prepared without exhausting his magic and double checking his equipment.

He would have been perfectly satisfied with that and spent the rest of his weekend on assignments and hanging out with his friends, but it seemed everyone else was bent on 'helping'. Every one seemed to have some sort of advice or secret spell they felt would ensure his victory. Finnegan had insisted aiming for the knees was perfectly legal (it wasn't) and impossible to block (it was). Hermione informed him Ron dueled like a chess player, thinking at least three moves in advance but was easily frustrated when the set up failed (true, but not really helpful to Harry who improvised rather than planned). Diggory said Ron didn't have as much endurance as Harry, so he should focus on that. Harper, his arithmancy partner, pointed out that just left him vulnerable until the Slytherin boy was tired.

To make matters worse, the paper hadn't assigned the girl Hermione had suggested, but a rather vampirish looking boy called Hadrian Greystoke, who stalked him relentlessly, asking questions and taking notes on every little thing he did.

“Mr. Potter, do you feel training with older students gives you an unfair advantage?”

“Mr. Potter, I see you have specialized body armor. Did you purchase them yourself or were they a gift?”

“Mr. Potter, what made you decide to challenge your club's captain? There are rumors that he insulted Ms. Granger, and you rose up to defend her honor. Is it true? Or do you believe him incompetent? ”

“Mr. Potter... Mr. Potter... Mr. Potter...”

More than ever, Harry wished he could have gone outside. It was unusually cold for November and a heavy snow had been falling all weekend, leaving the outdoors pristine and empty and an excellent place for him to escape for a few hours. If he wore his Baluvian cloak, anyone following him would have lost track of him within minutes.

His professors had been insistent, however. No outdoors. No escape.

"You alright, Harry?" Clyde ask at Sunday dinner, peering at his rather glum looking friend. "You're not getting sick are you? That'd be lousy luck the day before the fight."

"Duel," Harry corrected. "It's not a fight. It's a duel. A game. No big freak'n deal everyone is making it."

"Yeesh, sorry I cared."

Harry sighed.

"Look, I'm sorry. I'm just sick of this thing and it hasn't even started yet."

"It's fine, man. I get it. I won't mention it again."

"Thanks."

He reached for his glass, hoping everyone else around him would have heard them and just let him have his dinner in peace. The glass disappeared the moment his fingers brushed it.

"Hey!"

"What is it Harry?" Hermione asked.

"My glass disappeared. What gives?"

"That's odd. Was it empty?"

Harry tried to think on it, but honestly couldn't remember. His cup reappeared, full of pumpkin juice, and decided it must have been.

House elves were known refill cups like that, although they were usually more subtle. He took a drink, choked, and spit it back out.

"That isn't funny!" Harry yelled at the Weasley twins, two just looked at him with innocent confusion.

"What did they do?" Clyde asked.

"They switched my drinks. Tasted like swamp slime and vinegar."

Hermione grimaced.

"Lovely."

"Ugh, I'm going back to the common room. I'm not going to be able to eat anything until I get this taste out of my mouth."

"Alright, Harry, we'll save you a potato."

"Thanks."

Once Harry had disappeared, Clyde look disapprovingly at his uncles, who were still acting innocent and went back to talking with Angelina.

"We should turn them in you know. They get away with this stuff so often they don't think they can get caught."

"Too late," Finnegan said, pointing to the cup which slowly emptied itself of contents before their very eyes. "Damn, they're good."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry's pranked drink was the beginning of a string of unfortunate events that lasted through to the next evening. While trying to brush the bad taste out of his mouth, he accidentally dropped his tooth brush into the trash can, and then swallowed his tooth paste while he was cursing. This resulted in a vomit fest and no toothbrush to boot. He was not in the mood for dinner afterward, so he stayed in the common room to read his Quidditch magazine, only to find it had disappeared and wouldn't be found. To make matters worse there was a draft in the tower, and the fire place was blown out. Harry tried lighting it with his wand, only to have his wand catch fire. He managed to save his wand by dunking a vase full of water on it, but got drenched himself.

Frustrated, cold, wet, and still slightly nauseous, he gave up any hope for the remainder of the evening and went to bed.

He might have given up on the day, but the day was not finished with him. He was missing a blanket on his bed, making it too cold to sleep, and when he called on the house elves to get him some more, they put it on the wrong bed. The bed's owner walked in just in time to see Harry 'blanket stealing' and a thirty minute argument resulted. At last allowed to retire , he realized that his dorm mates weren't ready to sleep so early, and he could hear them for several hours before they came up stairs, turning on too many lights, and still not shutting up. When at last they had settled, Harry thought he would finally get some peace and quiet.

It wasn't so.

One of the boys had congestion, and the series of snorts, whistles, squeaks, chuffs, huffs, and snuffles that emanated from his nose was enough to leave Harry staring wide-eyed at his ceiling until dawn. His silencing charms all failed after thirty minutes regardless of how strongly he cast them.

Morning brought no relief. One misfortune after another strove to kill Harry or make him want to kill himself. He lost everything he could conceivably lose, from his wand to his socks to his book bag, two of the three showers Harry tried sprayed him with cold water, he lost two buttons, broke a shoe lace, lost his wand again, tripped down the tower stairs and ripped his school robe, snapped at his friends when they laughed, missed breakfast, and of course Toure decided to start the day with a pop quiz. He forgot his homework for DA&D, and couldn't recall anything they had studied. Half way to potion's he realized he had lost his wand again and gone back for it, and was late for class. That earned him one detention with Snape that night, and the potion he ruined meant he had to stay during his lunch break to finish if he planned to get a grade, which he did, but not a good enough one to justify missing another meal over.

And so went his entire day, one mishap after another, everything that could conceivably go wrong short of a dragon falling through the roof. By the time his afternoon duel had rolled around, he had six detentions, failed two pop quizzes, lost all of his assignments, ruined a text book, fought with all of his friends, was sporting several bruises, a stubbed toe, a twisted ankle, and was ready to kill God.

"Christ Potter, what the hell happened to you?" Ron said upon his opponent's arrival at the Dueling Club. The entire Dueling Club, seniors and juniors and professors, as well as several others who really didn't have any business being there were milling about anxiously. Harry flashed Colin Creevey a glare that probably would have melted his camera if he'd been pointing it.

"Shut. Up," he snarled, stalking straight to the supply closet.

Ron merely sneered and waited, already prepared. He took Harry's brief absence to irritate Hermione. She too, had had a fight with Harry, for the stupidest reason now that she thought about it, and she was starting to worry about her friend now.

"I want you to wear a red dress," he said.

She glanced at the Slytherin, before looking back to where Harry had disappeared.

"What are you babbling about?"

"On our date. I want it red. You're a Gryffindor, you like red, don't you?"

"Only covering my enemies."

"Ouch. So you really are a Malfoy, after all."

She gave him sour look, and he felt deeply satisfied to have earned it. Harry appeared dressed in his usual white with brown leather. If possible his scowl was even deeper than before and he was clenching and unclenching his hand, as if it were bothering him.

“Someone left their dueling knife in the closet,” Harry remarked sourly as he passed Snape. The potion's master studied him for a long moment, and was becoming increasingly disturbed with his semi-ward's state. He was clearly exhausted, hurt in some manner, and in a bad temper. None of this was particularly unusual for Potter, but it wasn't an ideal state to be in just before a duel.

“I will see the culprit punished. Do you wish to have the match delayed?”

“God no. I can't take another day of this.”

Larousse came around from the other side of the platform to have a look at the boy herself, and what she saw disturbed her.

“Harry, are you-”

“I'm fine. Let's get this over with,” he said shortly, and stalked up to the platform. The third step collapsed under his weight, sending his foot clean through the wood, while the rest of him stumbled forward, smacking the platform with his head.

There was startled scream and several gasps by the on lookers.

“Harry!”

The Gryffindor groaned, but lifted himself up. Gingerly, he pulled his leg free.

“I'm fine.”

His leather leg braced had protected him for the most part, but a large splinter had found an opening in the back and causing a trickle of blood to stain his white pants. Irritated, he pulled it out sharply.

"Potter! Stop that," Snape snarled, coming forward to inspect the wound himself, but Harry pulled away from him and up onto the platform.

"It isn't bad. We can fix it after the duel with whatever other injuries I might get."

"You can't be serious."

Harry's reply was to turn his back on the man and face his opponent. Ron was looking a bit confused, but eventually smirked.

"Good to see your balls have dropped. Fighting little kids just ain't sporting."

"But you'd do it anyway."

"Fuck you!"

"Gentleman, positions!" Snape demanded, determined to get this all over with as quickly as possible so he could find out what was going on. Both boys dropped their argument, and rearranged themselves. They placed their wands in front of themselves, their free hands behind them, saluted, and turned their bodies sideways, their wands ready.

"Begin."

The left lens of Harry's glasses popped out.

"What the fu-"

"Fastidium facio!"

The Nausea Curse hit Harry dead center. If he had had anything in his stomach, he would have been sick, but at this point it only left him slightly disoriented.

"Comprimo!"

The Squeeze Curse missed, more from Harry's lack of vision than Ron's dexterity in dodging.

"Aracnisortia!" he tried, sending out a wave of spiders crawling towards Ron. The vaguely squirming motion of the hundred little bodies had the unintended effect of making him dry heave. The Slytherin bulked for a moment, but then destroyed them with a Fire Hex that Harry barely managed to block. The curse bounced off his shield and hit the wooden chandelier above them, setting it alight. Another curse, this time one Harry didn't recognize, forced him to dodge rather than block. Unfortunately, when he jumped out of the way, his foot landed on his missing lens, causing him to slip. He smacked face first into the platform, and his mouth was instantly filled with blood.

There were shouts for Harry and shouts to stop the match and shouts to keep it going. Not knowing who would win the argument, he rolled to avoid any curses Ron might have sent at him, just in time to see the chandelier collapsing down on him. He rolled again, falling off the end of the platform and onto the stone floor. A deafening crash, a wave of debris, and several screams later found Harry alive and surrounded by his professors and several less welcome individuals.

"Potter, are you alive?" Snape demanded.

Dazed, and choking on the blood from his possibly broken nose, Harry couldn't come up with anything more witty than, "No."

"He needs to be taken to the infirmary, Severus," Larousse said, "Will all of you back up?"

The students retreated from Harry's blurred vision. He felt himself being lifted, not levitated, but actually carried, and it was so utterly strange and nostalgic that if he didn't feel like he were dying Harry might have enjoyed it.

"Potter, tell me quickly, have you ingested anything strange recently? Food or drink that didn't taste right?"

Harry merely turned his head and spat out some blood, not even bothering to answer the question. He didn't think he had, but he couldn't think of anything at the moment. Everything was spinning and painful. Hermione, sweet, quick thinking Hermione, was there for him though.

“Wait! Something odd happened yesterday. His pumpkin juice disappeared and then reappeared, but it tasted bad! We just thought the twins...er... I mean, someone, had played a joke on him! He spit it out though! Why?”

“I'll tell you later, but right now I need to get Potter to my lab. Clear the way for me, Professor Larousse, Weasley, go inform the headmistress of what has happened, and Ms. Granger I want you to inform Madam Pomfrey. The rest of you... go do your homework or something.”

Harry closed his eyes, nauseated and unable to see clearly any way, and focused on breathing around his discomfort and listening to what the professors were saying.

“What's on your mind, Severus?” Larousse asked, flicking her wand this way and that to open doors and move aside obstacles as they strode quickly down the hall. Snape didn't speak until all the students were safely out of ear shot.

“The knife in the closet, the broken stairs, the glasses lens, the chandelier... there were several complaints during lunch about him misplacing homework and generally being an utter spaz before this too. It's too much coincidence working against him. Either Potter is the focus of a very clever and discreet prankster or he's been poisoned.”

Book III:

Chapter 8: Discord and the Prince

"Poisoned? How could this all be due to poison?" Harry heard Larousse ask.

The air suddenly became very cool, and he knew they had entered the dungeons.

"You have heard of Felix felicis?"

"Yes... it's illegal, but hardly a poison."

"No, but its lesser known counter part, Infelix misera is."

"I've never heard of it."

"That's why you're not a potion's master."

"Severus," her voice warned. There was the sound of opening and closing doors, and Harry felt himself set down on what was probably a couch. Snape moved away, and Larousse moved in, bringing a tender touch and some cloth to stem the flow of blood from his nose. "What is Infelix misera?"

"A bad luck potion. Just as Felix felicis distorts one's magic to align with favorable lei lines, creating good luck for the drinker, Infelix misera aligns one's magic with unfavorable lei lines. Potter has been, ironically, rather fortunate. If his magic had come too close to a particularly hazardous lei line, he would be dead."

There was a tense moment of silence, and Harry could hear Snape ruffling through his cabinets and drawers, and Larousse's hand was softly running through his hair.

"Do you have an antidote?"

"Not exactly," Snape said, "It's a rare enough poison I haven't had to brew an antidote in years, and that batch is still probably stored somewhere in St. Mungo's, and there's no guarantee it's any good now or hasn't been used already. Potter will not last another day at this rate."

"But you have an idea?"

"Of course. I can't neutralize the potion, but I can neutralize Potter's magic to keep it from aligning with lei lines. Are you listening to all this, Potter?"

"Yeah... someone's trying to kill me again?"

"It's getting rather redundant, isn't it?" Snape said, and Harry felt his presence replace Larousse's again. "Chew and swallow this."

Something touched his mouth, and he reached up to take it. It was some sort of vine with little berries on it. He bit into it and the closest thing he could describe the experience to was eating grass-flavored licorice rope. Even as hungry as he was, it was an incredibly unpleasant experience.

"Japanese Soul Eater? How on earth did you get it? It can't be imported."

"Professor Sprout has an entire green house dedicated to Asian plants. She is very generous in giving me her left overs from pruning and harvesting. This should be enough to hold him over until the potion breaks down in his system."

"And the rest of his injuries?"

"None of Madam Pomfrey's potions will work with this running through his blood, but first-aid spells should help with some of it. Potter, don't fall asleep. You need to finish it."

Harry made a face, but kept chewing. Snape and Larousse talked for a long time about what they should do next. Larousse wanted to take Harry out of Hogwarts altogether, perhaps to St. Mungo's, but Snape thought re-securing Hogwarts, already a necessity, would provide enough protection. Besides, St. Mungo's was a quack shop in his opinion.

There was more talk about where to keep Harry until things were considered secure, then irritation about what was taking Lestrage so long, and several reminders to Harry to keep eating. Harry couldn't help but be reminded of his younger years, on the rare occasion when he was sick enough to be stuck in bed. His mother would touch his hair just like that. His father would pace and ponder and plan just so. And he, he got to just lay there and trust them to look after him, miserable but safe and cared for.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

At some point he must have eaten what was required, for he'd fallen asleep and no one had woken him for several hours. He was roused by someone calling his name, and opened his eyes to something crimson and blurry. A pair of glasses were slipped over his nose and his vision cleared.

"My Lord?" he said sleepily, and slowly sat up. He had been cleaned up while unconscious and stripped down to his slacks and shirt, bandages sticking out through the tears in the fabric. He felt around his person for his wand. He found it up a sleeve, but it felt strangely lifeless. Voldemort watched quietly as Harry slowly pulled himself together.

"How do you feel?"

"Alright. I've lived through worse."

That brought a hint of a smile to the Dark Lord, but it became neutral quickly enough.

"What are you doing here?" Harry asked.

"I came to see you as soon as I heard. I was worried."

Harry wasn't sure if he should be moved or suspicious, so opted for polite.

"Oh, thank you. I'm okay now. Professor Snape made me eat this nasty thing so I should be fine. Did you catch the person, yet?"

Voldemort said nothing for a moment. Slowly, he lifted a hand and lightly brushed a dark bruise on Harry's face. Most of his face was purple and blue from multiple face plants, his lip split, a cut just above his eye, and a nose Pomfrey said just barely avoided being broken. There were more injuries beneath his clothes, bruises and cuts and abrasions he had acquired throughout his night and day of misfortune. Harry looked to all the world as if he had been assaulted, and despite his protege's nonchalance, Voldemort found the current state of affairs unacceptable.

"No, he has evaded us again," he said at last, when Harry looked away nervously.

"Again?"

"We suspect it was Moody. I don't know how he breached the castle's defenses, but I have my Sentinels scouring every corridor and room from tower to dungeon. He will not be making fools of us again."

Harry 's silence spoke volumes about his skepticism. The Dark Lord could hardly blame him after the debacle with the basilisk the previous year.

"So now what?"

"Now, Professor McGonagall is going to escort you back to your dorm room. There will be several Sentinels standing guard throughout the tower, so you'll be perfectly safe. You're excused from classes until your magic returns and the rest of your injuries can be healed properly."

With a little help, Harry managed to climb to his feet. Voldemort handed him a set of crutches, and together they moved out of Snape's parlor and into the corridor. Snape, Larousse, and McGonagall were there talking to Chief Sentinel Morgan and some underlings, but they broke off once they spotted Harry. The boy hobbled over to them and managed a tired smile, and Voldemort stayed back to observe what he would do.

“Evening, Professors.”

“How do you feel, Harry?” Larousse asked.

“I look worse than I feel.” Undoubtedly a lie, but a Gryffindorish one. “It seems you're out twenty galleons, Professor Snape. I appreciate your sacrifice.”

The dour man didn't have a witty come back for once, and nodded slightly in acknowledgment. McGonagall fretted over him for a bit, but the boy's cool disinterest made the attention seem rather ridiculous and she had to give it up in order to lead him back upstairs. Harry turned back to give him a tired wave goodnight, before hobbling up the stairs with her help. Once he was gone, Voldemort turned to his men.

“I will not have a repeat of last year. Discretion is not an issue here. I want Moody's crimes to be made as publicly abhorrent as possible and his capture equally as glorious,” he said sharply. There was no opposition, but no one seemed to know what he intended them to do, and indeed it seemed to take the Dark Lord a long moment to come up with some ideas. When he did, however, a rather wicked grin found its way across his lips.

“This requires creativity. Something the old Ministry would never dream of doing, that Moody would never expect. I want to use the werewolves.”

“My Lord, in the castle?” Lestrangle asked, seemingly nauseated by the very idea.

“In and out of the castle. Hogsmeade, the Hogwart's Express, London, Bristol, Canterbury, everywhere . They will sniff out his scent through every corridor, every secret passage, every safe house, and hostel from here to the sea. And if he tries to flee the country, the Dementors will destroy him along the coast. He won't get away."

"Will Greyback agree though?" Morgan asked, tumbling the practicalities of the idea around in his head.

"If the payment is sufficient... He's been complaining about a lack of females for several years. They seem to have an unusually high suicide rate."

Of those gathered only Morgan seemed to be seriously considering the idea. Lestrangle wasn't being vocal, but her body language was fidgety and irate, while Snape and Larousse remained completely blank faced. Voldemort could guess what they were thinking though. Both had a special hatred reserved for those of the lycanthropic persuasion, each for their own reason, but they would never oppose him. Snape because he was obedient and Larousse because she wouldn't risk her position at Hogwarts like she had at the Court. He gave them both a condescending smile.

"Of course, if you're able to find him before I have settled negotiations with Greyback, then releasing werewolves won't be necessary. I would be most impressed if you were able to accomplish this all on your own."

They shared a look, a quiet agreement, and nodded.

"Delightful," he laughed. He was starting to feel a sort of thrill that came with a hunt and the expected destruction of an enemy. His adversary was clever, dangerous, and doomed the moment he persisted on his protege's death. When he finally tracked Moody down, the man would look back on his time in Azkaban as a paradise vacation.

oo
oo

Harry spent the next two days in his dorm amidst several get well tokens and jokes about 'princesses and towers'. He smiled for all his visitors and dorm mates, made a few jokes of his own, and pretended to enjoy the lack of homework, but when he was alone he'd curl up in a window sill and wonder when the next attack would occur.

Not 'if'. 'When'. He had no doubt there would be another attempt, and while that frightened him, the thought of his friends and classmates getting caught up in it was heart wrenching. It didn't even have to be Moody necessarily. This wasn't the first attempt that had been made on his life, and some how he didn't think it would be the last either.

He was, for the first time, seriously thinking about leaving Britain.

It wasn't quite the situation his godfathers had been expecting, but it was close enough. He told himself the only reason he hadn't left already was because he was helpless without his magic and still in too much pain to play fugitive. The truth was that he was just as afraid of leaving as he was of staying.

He could remember last year, while under the affects of McNair's phobia curse, how his friends had suddenly disappeared as if they had never existed. If he left Britain, wouldn't the result be the same? His last attempt when he was ten, his escape from the Dursely's and the discovery of how truly helpless he was shortly after. He had since made huge leaps in self proficiency, and magic seemed to make all things possible, but if he did end up outside of Britain would he be any less helpless? He knew no one and nothing about witches and wizards abroad, and if he found himself in trouble where could he go? Would he be any safer in France or Germany as he was in Hogwarts?

Being alone again was just too painful.

Then he would remember Hermione laying unconscious in the infirmary and how afraid he was that she was going to die, and some how it hurt even worse.

So what should he do? What could he do?

Footsteps on the stairs drew Harry's attention, and he checked his watch. Classes should have still been going on. He snatched up a quidditch bat, a gift from the twins, from beside his bed and moved to the side of the entrance way. The person who stepped through did not have their wand drawn, and the brilliant red hair was the only thing that kept him from smashing the person over the head. When Ron turned around, Harry sort of wished he hadn't noticed.

"Jesus, Potter!" the Slytherin yelped, stumbling back several paces. Draco's head popped into the room, looking over at Harry in amusement.

"I knew it was a good idea to have Ron walk ahead of me," he said, striding in confidently. It was then that Harry noticed both Slytherins were wearing Gryffindor badges.

"Did you steal those?" he asked.

"Of course not. Malfoy's don't steal. We file lawsuits."

Harry checked the stairs for any other possible visitors, then turned back to the intruders. They were wandering around the room in blatant curiosity, making comparisons with their own rooms.

"It's a bit small," Ron said.

"That's the drawback of living in a tower," Harry said, "The view makes up for it."

The Slytherins went to the window, and managed to look mildly impressed. From their vantage point they could make out the Forbidden Forest draped in its autumn colors and the lake reflecting vibrant sky blue.

"What are you doing here? How did you even get past the guards?"

"Don't get your knickers in a twist," Ron said, moving along in exploration, fingering through the various cards people had left on his bedside table. "We just wanted to see what all the fuss was about. The guards let us through when we told them we forgot our homework assignments. Rather pathetic security you've got, Potter."

Harry laid his bat across his shoulder, a clear reminder that his pathetic security nearly smashed the other boy's head in.

"If you're done gawking then, you can leave."

"No, give me another minute. I'm still gawking."

And Ron proceeded to just stare at him for several moments. Draco rolled his eyes.

"I came to get the story straight from the source. What gives Potter? People are saying you got curse, other people are saying you got poisoned, and some even say you're dying. Looking at you now I'm voting on the last one. You look like shit."

Harry shook his head and moved back to his bed, laying down. His ankle was starting to bother him.

"I was poisoned, but it's the sort of poison that acts like a curse. Some sort of bad luck spell. Everything that could have conceivably gone wrong, did. Snape made me eat some nasty plant and now my magic is shot to hell, but I'm not dead at least. I can't have any more potions until they're sure the poison is out of my system, hence the dying look."

"I think it suits you," Ron smirked.

"Care to try it on yourself?" Harry smirked back.

"Now, now, you two. Lets not fight. I came to check on you, but Ron has something important to say."

Perhaps to think of his next words or perhaps just to be annoying, the redhead turned his back on Harry in favor of another window, this one overlooking the roofs of Hogwarts.

"I've decided to make you my vice-captain," he said at last. "I'll need you to come to Dueling Club next meeting to make it official. The YDA representative is coming tomorrow, and I'll need you there to meet them. Can you do it?"

Harry just looked at him blankly.

“Potter, am I being unclear on something? You're my new vice-captain. Meeting tomorrow. Can you come?”

“... yeah, as long as you don't expect me to give a demonstration... what the hell, Weasley? I didn't win the duel. Technically, I lost spectacularly. Shouldn't Draco be taking over?”

Draco shrugged.

“I've got other ambitions. Did you hear I'll be taking over as Seeker for the Quidditch team?”

“No, I hadn't. Congratulations... well, congratulations when we're all actually allowed to play again.”

Draco waved it off.

“Flint is graduating next year, so there'll be an opening in the team captain's position. You might be the youngest Seeker in a century, but I fully intend to be the youngest captain ever. If I'm going to do it, I won't have time to look after all those little idiots you seem so fond of.”

Harry couldn't help but smile at that. So Draco was going for the gold, rather than settling for the silver? He had to admire that, despite the arrogance.

“Wait a minute, if Draco was never going to accept the vice-captain position, doesn't that mean... You asshole, you lied to Hermione!”

Ron laughed at that.

“Slytherin, remember?”

Harry looked to Draco.

“And you're ok with that?”

"I lost at chess. He gets one date with her without me spelling his nuts off. I'm amazed he even got the date."

"She's still going to go out with you, even though the match was ...sorta... rigged?"

"Yeah, you Gryffindors are a weird lot. She figured if I was big enough to let you be my vice-captain, she'd be big enough to go to the Christmas ball with me. So, thanks for all your help mate."

"Weasley, Draco may have promised not to curse you, but I didn't."

"Club meeting at five o'clock sharp. Don't be late."

"See ya, then, Harry."

With that, the Slytherins left on their merry way, leaving Harry exasperated and amazed all at once. It also made him realize he couldn't leave. It wasn't just the new responsibility he'd received, but the reminder that he had a life at Hogwarts. A life worth fighting for, perhaps even dying for. What would he have if he left?

What would he be?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

London had not seen a werewolf in seven years, but even before that it certainly hadn't been in the numbers gathered in The Iron House, Sentinel headquarters. There were nearly a hundred, men and women all strong and proud in their baring. Hunters, alphas, each and every one. Voldemort observed them closely from beneath a Notice-Me-Not spell as they explored the conference room and one another, sniffing and watching, but saying very little. Fenrir had been very generous.

But then again, Voldemort had been very generous with him as well. WYRA would hardly miss a couple of little girls, always harder to adopt away than the boys, but the sudden abandonment of a squib work house would hardly go unnoticed by the local wizarding population. He had to be quite clever with his cover-up and it cost him dearly to keep everyone quiet.

The current selection was more than worth it. He could spot several werewolves he knew by sight and reputation. Alexis Bloodclaw, killed her pack's old alpha female by ripping open her neck with only her claws. Jackal, lanky and unassuming, but once he found prey he never lost it. And of course, Sirius Blackbone, next in line for Head Alpha.

Currently, he was moving through the crowd like a shark through water, target locked in his sights. His beta and mate, Slivermoon, kept close behind to protect his flank and snarled every so often if anyone moved in too closely. Now what was their goal?

Bitefirst, formerly the Slytherin Morgenson, and Hawkeye, once Whitehall, were the youngest werewolves present, and kept together in the corner. Voldemort hadn't thought much about them since their exile, but he couldn't help but feel vaguely pleased that the former Slytherins had both survived to become alphas. Very young alphas, little more than particularly ornery betas in fact, but alphas nonetheless. The two tensed when they noticed the approach of considerably stronger opponents.

They both shrank away as Blackbone stopped, towering over them.

"This them?" Blackbone asked his beta. Slivermoon nodded, glaring at the two.

"Yes, I recognize their stink. I could never forget it."

Hawkeye was soon all but cowering, while braver, more arrogant Bitefirst let out a warning growl. It had both larger werewolves laughing at him, before Blackbone snarled at him.

"Watch it, pup. I could gut you in the middle of everyone and it'd be in my right."

"What do you want?" Bitefirst snarled.

The blow Blackbone landed sent him sprawling to the floor with a pained cry. The other werewolves all turned to look, and one of the females broke off from the rest to step in front of Blackbone.

“What are you doing, Blackbone?” she demanded.

“Get out of my way, you mangy bitch,” he snarled back. “I’m within my rights!”

“You’re not Head Alpha yet! Until then you can’t go around beating up other packs’ members. Back off!”

Blackbone moved to shove her out of his way, but she knocked his arm aside and snarled back. Several other werewolves were starting to move in to assist their own, but the man’s next words made them hesitate.

“They tried to kill my godson! He was just child, only eleven! I’ll cut off my own arm before I let them get away with that!”

“Liar! We’ve never been near your mangy pack!” Bitefirst snarled, touching his bruising cheek gingerly.

“Eleven years old. Glasses. Messy black hair. A little bit small for his age. Ring any bells?!”

Hawkeye looked vaguely nauseous at the reminder, and Bitefirst eyes widened.

“That doesn’t count! We were all normal kids! And it’s not like he was hurt!”

Slivermoon, whom the female hadn’t been keeping track of, slipped by her to smash his fist into young werewolf’s stomach and then his uninjured cheek. Other werewolves joined the melee, pulling Slivermoon and Blackbone away from the clearly outmatched juveniles, but the two godfathers were incensed and their strength was nearly impossible to restrain.

A loud explosion rocked the conference room, sending the wolves scattering in different directions before turning to face the possible attacker. In the center of the room stood Voldemort, God Eater, and general nightmare of all those gathered. Most had the man to blame for their current condition, and as much as they hated him, they feared him even more. Of that fear, came a respect rivaled only by their Head Alpha, Fenrir Greyback.

"Tut, tut, Blackbone," the Dark Lord chided, wagging a finger at the volatile man, "You should be saving your energy for the hunt. Your godson has a more dangerous enemy now than a couple of arrogant little boys."

The hatred in the werewolf's eyes was positively delicious. Voldemort could feel the wild energy permeating towards him from all the way across the room. He strode forward, and not to be outdone, Blackbone came forward to meet him. At last they stopped before each other, scant inches apart. Voldemort all dark amusement and Blackbone all dark rage.

"Do you have something to say to me, boy?" Voldemort asked.

"This is all your fault."

The Dark Lord's hand shot out, faster than Blackbone could dodge, latching onto the werewolf's neck and squeezing. The werewolf struggled, digging his clawed fingers into his aggressor's arm, but his strength was more than a man's, more than a werewolf's. At last, Blackbone's legs collapsed beneath him, and Voldemort released him.

"My fault? Maybe so," he said, as the werewolf sat gasping on the floor. "But I'll take responsibility. So must you, Sirius Blackbone, once Sirius Black, godfather to Harold James Potter. You have failed him miserably so far."

That earned him a growl from both Blackbone and Slivermoon, who was moving steadily towards his mate. This only amused the Dark Lord more.

"I require some werewolves to search Hogwarts, ones who are familiar with the castle. Now that leaves either you and Slivermoon, or Bitefirst and Hawkeye. Since I've warned the other two of their immediate death upon nearing young Harry, I believe you both would make better choices. Am I wrong?"

Blackbone was looking at the floor by now, just as angry but more controlled. After a moment of silence, Voldemort smacked him upside the head to regain his attention. The werewolf glared up at him.

"Am I wrong?"

"No."

He patted the werewolf on the head, ruffling his hair affectionately.

"Good boy," he said, then moved away to face the rest of his new forces. Blackbone was easily the strongest and most dominant wolf among them, and having defeated him the others bowed to his authority without question. "The rest of you will be working in pairs under the supervision of a Sentinel. Obey them as you would me or I will take it as a personal insult and punish you accordingly. Line up. You two, follow me. We are leaving now."

The werewolves did as instructed, and Blackbone and Slivermoon snarled at the two pups as they slunk by them before following the Dark Lord. Neither were happy with their position, but James' legacy, the closest thing they would ever have to a child themselves, was in danger and needed them. Even if it meant following the lead of the devil himself, they knew they couldn't turn away.

Worst of all, the devil knew it.

Book III:

Chapter 9: The Huntress and the Wolves

"The herbology quiz focused a lot on explosive plants, so I hope you reviewed chapter seven. Also we have a transfiguration practical today, but you'll probably be able to get out of that. Did you do your DA&D homework? Of course not, you couldn't get to the library. I should have offered, but you did need your rest-"

"Hermione," Harry sighed. He was heading down to breakfast with their house mates, having finally rid himself of the ineffectual poison and finally gotten the potions needed to fix the rest of his injuries. His wand still felt lifeless to him, but Pomfrey assured him his magic would begin to return by that weekend. Now he found himself assuring Hermione that his academic life wasn't over. "Chill out. I missed two days... okay, three days because of the 'Unlucky Day', but still not a crisis situation. My magic is still shot to hell, so I'll just catch up on everything instead of going to dueling practices. It'll be fine."

"What about that meeting tonight? Don't you have to come?" Ginny reminded as she came up from behind with Clyde. Clyde was looking his usual sunny self, grunting occasionally when he ran into something and mumbled something that was either 'good morning' or 'sock puppet'.

"I'll show up for a bit to help set things up and greet the inspector, but I'll duck out after that. Like I said, my magic isn't working. My reputation will have to be enough."

Hermione frowned.

"Harry, you're the vice captain now. All of the rookies look up to you. What are they going to think if you skip out early?"

"That I need to take my medication?"

"Harry!"

“Hermione!”

“Harry Potter!”

He turned around just in time to get a face full of recorder and Sara Bella Parker, tabloid terror and bane of his anonymous existence. Following like the ever eager puppy was her photographer Colin Creevey, who looked more like a kicked puppy when Harry sent a warning glare at his camera. Parker was less easily intimidated.

“Mr. Potter, now that you've recovered from your injuries would you mind answering some questions?”

“... I'm hungry. That's all I have to say at the moment.”

With that he turned and moved purposefully towards the Great Hall. He was cut off once again by Parker and her recorder.

“You're going to take my eye out with that thing one of these days,” he said, shoving the recorder out of his face. If only he could do the same to the girl.

“Please, Mr. Potter. All of Hogwarts, all of Wizarding Britain, in fact, is buzzing about Monday's attack. Won't you confirm some of the facts? Rumors are-”

“Listen, didn't Lord Voldemort,” there was a gasp somewhere, reminding Harry that he was one of the few to use the dark wizard's name out loud, “already make a statement?”

Parker hesitated.

“Er... well, yes, but-”

“Well, I'm hardly going to contradict him, now am I?”

And with that he moved around her and Colin (or rather Colin fled upon his approach), and ducked into a secret passage behind a suit of armor. They couldn't follow him because the entrance locked for thirty seconds automatically, and by then he had exited at the bottom of a staircase.

“You should probably give her an interview,” Hermione said, waiting patiently as he emerged. “She'll just keep annoying you until you do.”

“Can't you do it?” he grouched, brushing off cobwebs from his robes.

“Conflict of interest. The paper would lose credibility. If you want, you can decline to answer certain questions, but you shouldn't deny all of them. It just makes them hungrier for answers.”

“Then let them starve. It's none of their damn business.”

Hermione was about to contradict him, but then wisely refrained. As much as Harry disliked his secrets, he guarded them fiercely. And who was she to say he was wrong?

“Just promise me you aren't going to punch anyone for asking?”

The silence that followed was not encouraging.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It was a long day for Harry, who hadn't realized quite how much magic he performed in his daily life until he couldn't use any at all. The teachers were sympathetic for the most part, and the students predictably oblivious and insensitive. Parker hadn't given up, and hounded him mercilessly, but also ineptly. Harry had plenty of practice at evasion.

He supposed one day he would have to give in, but he didn't want it to be too easy. He wouldn't have her annoying him constantly with meaningless inquiries, so if she were intending to ask him something she had to expect to work for the answer.

By far the best tactic for keeping her away was Slytherins. It didn't matter how young or old, male or female, unfriendly or ... less unfriendly they were, if Harry found himself around them, Parker found somewhere else to be. Slytherins were more tolerant of Harry and Hermione than they were of the other Gryffindors. Harry because he was in with Voldemort, Slytherin king as far as that house was concerned, and Hermione could play the perfect little pureblood sister to their up and coming golden (silver?) boy to a tee.

So if he happened to ask Flint if he had heard when the Quidditch pitch would be repaired or tolerated Ron's obnoxious smugness to discuss that evening's club meeting for a few minutes, no one could describe his behavior as unusual or suspicious. And when it came to Snape, nothing could send Parker further, faster, than an irritated glower. So it was with a some what more congenial mood that Harry entered Dueling Club, ready to impress (or ready everyone else to impress) their observer.

"Potter," Ron said by way of greeting, "check the supply closet to make sure everything is up to code. Make sure no one from the senior club left their knives in there again."

Cedric Diggory, Captain of the Senior Dueling Club, gave the other captain a rather unflattering look at the insinuation. It was technically a Junior Club practice, but since the inspector was coming to rate both divisions they were sharing space for once and were feeling a bit territorial. The seniors were congregating near the platform, while the juniors remained by the practice dummies.

"On it. How much time do we have?"

"Fifteen minutes, tops. Hurry it up!"

"Only because you asked so nicely."

The supply closet was unusually empty with the entirety of the club having donned their equipment, and while Harry changed into his own, he did a once over. No one had left out their knives or any other dangerous equipment, and aside from a few fallen gloves and boots, everything was in its place. Satisfied, he turned to go but found his way blocked.

"Natalie," he said, startled by her sudden appearance. She gave him an apologetic smile.

"Hello, Harry. I just wanted to see how you were doing. I haven't seen you since..."

She shuddered, recalling Harry covered in his own blood as Snape carried him away. She knew he had been seriously injured before, but never had she seen anyone so damaged up close. And for that first time to be Harry...

"Yeah, about that. Sorry if I frightened you. I'm told I was quite a mess."

She rolled her eyes.

"Idiot, you don't apologize for getting injured unless it's your fault. Which it wasn't, so... yeah."

He was bemused by her sudden lack of haughty eloquence, and she could feel her cheeks burn from the warmth of his smile. She was starting to feel silly, and if she didn't get her feelings off her chest quickly this was quickly going to turn into something horribly awkward and embarrassing.

"Listen, Harry," she began, "I know I can be kind of blasé about a lot of things even when they're serious, so everyone thinks I don't care, but I do. I really do. Especially with what happened to you."

It was Harry's turn to darken a few shades as Natalie took his hands into hers. Her expression was so uniquely serious and brave and beautiful.

"I suppose what I'm trying to say is," she said, stepping closer, her eyes locked to his so that she was so close he could feel her breath on his face. "I'm so happy that you're-"

His lips were suddenly pressed to hers, and he was stunned to realize it was he who had leaned down to kiss her, and it was another shock when he felt her chest press against his own as she gasped. He nearly keeled over dead when she kissed him back.

Neither was very good at it. Their lips never aligned quite right after first contact and both were too timid to try anything with tongue, but it was thrilling and electric and vaguely dangerous too. She pulled back first.

“... okay...”

He smiled at that and she laughed breathlessly, and soon they were both laughing softly, giddy from the experience. A sound from the doorway simultaneously drew their attention and sobered them completely. A familiar figure stood, wide-eyed and pale, one hand holding her wand and the other covering her mouth. Harry felt his insides sink at her horrified expression, and Natalie's previous mockery of the younger girl's affection danced around his head.

“Ginny...”

She disappeared, and he instinctively went to pursue but Natalie grabbed his arm.

“Leave her be,” she said, and he would have ignored her, perhaps even blamed her if she'd adopted her usual aristocratic disdain. Instead she was reserved, staring at the spot where her common target of mockery had just been. “It won't do her or anyone else any good to cause a scene in front of the entire Dueling Club.”

“Shit,” he muttered, dragging his hand through his hair.

“Don't think about it for now. You've still got to go out there and give the rookies their little pep talk and make nice with the inspector... and pray to whatever pagan god you worship that no one else noticed.”

“I'm not a pa-”

She shoved him out of the closet before he could object, and he was forced to compose himself very quickly. No one seemed to be paying him any mind, except for Snape who was watching him suspiciously.

Harry avoided eye contact and looked for something else to do. Quickly enough, his attention was directed to a man in rather fancy dueling robes, covered in shiny brass fixings over deep purple leather. He seemed rather foppish to Harry, but he seemed to hold some sort of importance judging by the attention Ron and Professor Larousse were giving him.

This man must be the inspector, Harry decided, and made his way over to greet him before he talked to his rookies. He looked around for Natalie, but she still hadn't come out and he supposed she wanted rumors flying as little as he did. Or she was just being considerate to him. Which was sweet of her... or very politic. Oh, God, what if Luna found out about this? She wouldn't hunt them down in the middle of Hogwarts, would she? Could she? Crap. Did this mean Natalie was his girlfriend? Should he have learned to establish this sort of thing before he went around kissing girls or sleeping naked with them?

Okay, really he should be concentrating on the more pressing matter.

And just as he decided to do just that and attempt a convincing smile as he approached the inspector, he received the second surprise of the day. His only forewarning was a sudden jolt of unease when the inspector's dark eyes locked onto his, and the briefest lifting of the man's arm. Magically defenseless and caught off guard, he froze.

And everyone else around him burst into chaotic motion.

Two bodies, large and faster than the average human burst out from the shadows of the hall, careening with the inspector, and sending Larousse, Ron, and several other students scattering in surprise and fear. As the majority fled away from the attack, Harry could see his rescuers clearly, but for the life of him couldn't process the reality of it.

Remus.

Sirius.

Beating the living shit out of the man.

“Stupefy!”

Remus paused only long enough to bring up his wand to block Larousse's spell and snarl in warning. By now a third person had appeared, a Sentinel looking as horrified by their violence as every one else. He lifted his wand, as did Larousse, and from the corner of his eye he spotted Snape doing the same and knew Remus couldn't take them all on at once. At last, he found himself able to move.

"Sirius, Remus, stop! Stop, stop, stop!" he shouted, moving his body between the werewolves and wizards. "I think you've got him!"

Sirius and Remus both paused, looking over to Harry questioningly, before Sirius dropped his prey and jaunted over to his godson. The young Gryffindor found himself encased in a bear of a hug.

"There's my pup! We've missed you!"

"Phlaa..." was all Harry could gasp.

"Put him down this instant and step away!" Larousse commanded. Sirius ignored her, instead setting him down to get a better look at him.

"You smell a bit off, Harry. Are you alright? I heard you had a bad couple of days."

Harry could only blink at him dumbly.

"What are you doing here?"

The werewolf pouted.

"What kind of a greeting is that?"

"I would consider Mr. Potter's greeting worthy of your entrance, Blackdeath or Dogbreath or whatever they call you now," Snape snarled, stalking past Larousse and the Sentinel. "Is there a reason you're assaulting the YDL representative or did you just get an itch?"

"Bite me, Snivelus," Sirius growled. His distraction was enough for Larousse to grab Harry and quickly pull him away. The students were all recovering from their surprise enough that they had pulled out their wands in preparation of defending themselves and their professors, which made Harry extremely nervous for both werewolves. He knew they had attacked in order to defend him, but they needed to let everyone else know that as well.

"Please, Sirius, just explain. I'm kind of confused too," he begged. There were murmurs amongst the students, unsure of the situation and how one of their own could possibly know these crazy people. The alpha shrugged and wandered back to his mate who stood guard over the battered and bloody man. He was still conscious, flinching and cowering as Sirius grabbed him by his robe to drag him over to the other adults.

"This isn't a YLD or DLY or whatever you call it. This is a supposedly dead man making trouble," he growled, circling his terrified victim. "Meet Torence Quick."

Remus flicked his wand, and immediately the man's sleek appearance morphed into something haggard. There was an instant recognition amongst the adults, but the students were even more baffled than before. Who was Torence Quick? Snape took charge of the situation.

"Alright, everyone, it seems our debut into the Young Duelist's League has been postponed. You're all dismissed."

No one moved.

"Get lost, ya little punks!" Sirius snarled, and they all went scurrying. Snape and Remus both rolled their eyes. Larousse spoke to Harry, but kept her eyes and her wand directed at the werewolves and Quick.

"Harry, you should go with them."

"No way. I deserve to know who's been trying to kill me, and why," he objected.

Her voice turned hard with warning.

“Harry...”

He wasn't moved in the slightest. Sirius chuckled at his stubbornness. The Sentinel who had been watching things unfold, finally took charge.

“Professor Larousse, I believe it is best that you over see the students and then report to the Headmistress. The rest of us, including Mr. Potter, will report directly to the Dark Lord with... Mr. Quick here. He wished to be informed the moment we made progress, and I dare say that moment is now. Professor Snape, if you wouldn't mind leading the way?”

Harry watched in fascination as Larousse's normally beautiful face, hardened with anger and hate as she turned to his godfathers, softened into something akin to worry when she turned to him, and then disappeared into a blank neutrality as she went to attend the other students. Amongst them were all his friends and Natalie, as confused and unsure as the rest. He offered them a reassuring smile, before following his party out of the Dueling Hall and into the castle's corridors.

“I'll be damned, Snivelus, you've found a woman almost as annoying as you,” Sirius quipped, pulling Quick to his feet and shoving him after the potion's master.

“At least I found a woman,” Snape countered, staring pointedly at Remus who just stuck out his tongue at the other man. To diffuse, or at least distract, any further arguments, Harry started asking questions.

“Who is Torence Quick and why is he trying to kill me? I thought it was Moody who wanted me dead?”

Sirius answered first. “The only one of those questions I have the answer to is the first. Torence Quick, the ornery little shit, was a former Death Eater. More specifically, the Death Eater who caught me and Remus. I spent nearly three months in Azkaban before being thrown to the wolves because of him. Pay back's a bitch, ain't it, Torence?"

The man didn't even attempt a reply, merely limped along. Looking at the sniveling little man, Harry couldn't help but feel disappointed. This was who had nearly succeeded in poisoning him? To be nearly defeated by such an enemy tore at his pride.

They continued on through the castle in silence, passing the occasional student and teacher who all gaped and wondered at the odd procession. As they drew closer and closer to Voldemort's office, his godfathers began to pull back a little further from the others and more towards Harry. They obviously did not like where they were going and they liked taking Harry there even less. There was no avoiding it, however, and eventually they all crowded into the Dark Lord's office.

The Dark Lord himself did not look surprised, so much as pleased. Whether it was occlumency or cleverness, he could already tell something significant and in their favor had occurred. Sirius and Remus pulled Harry over to the couch nearest the door, sitting down so that their godson was safely ensconced between them. This seemed to amuse the Dark Lord, but he let them be for the time being.

"So what have we here?"

The Sentinel saluted sharply before speaking.

"My Lord, this one is Torence Quick, former Death Eater, believed to have been killed by Alastor Moody on September 3. Mr.'s Blackbone and Slivermoon discovered Mr. Quick impersonating a representative of the Young Dueling League sent to inspect Hogwarts' Dueling Club for qualification into said League, and... subdued him... before any harm could be done."

Voldemort smiled, darkly pleased that after less than a day he was already making progress using the werewolves. Already another assassination attempt appeared to have been thwarted. It was not Moody, yet that didn't exclude the convict as a suspect. He knew Quick well enough to know he wasn't clever enough to come up with all of the attacks on his own.

"Thank you, Lieutenant. Have you anything else to add, Severus?"

Snape nodded.

"Yes. I would like to say their actions were completely unnecessary," he said sharply. "Professor Larousse and I already suspected something amiss. She was moving in to confirm her suspicions and I was standing a distance to cover her in case he tried something. We could have handled this without all the theatrics."

Sirius made a very audible snort, but Harry believed his professor. He trusted the man, probably more than he deserved, but trusted just the same. Voldemort acknowledged his servant, but looked unconcerned.

"And you, Blackbone and Slivermoon? How did you know he was an assassin."

"We could smell the enchantment on him, and the stink of the man underneath it."

"You didn't explain this to your Sentinel?"

Sirius just shrugged, and Remus wouldn't speak out of turn.

"What about you, Harry? Anything to say?"

"Thank you for not letting me get killed?"

"You're welcome," the Dark Lord chuckled, before turning to Quick. The man was quivering pathetically, looking at the floor, unwilling or unable to move from where he had been dropped. Voldemort sauntered... yes, sauntered around his desk to stand before the man, smiling pleasantly. It was so strangely surreal Harry couldn't even blink. A pale finger slid under Quick's chin, lifting it so that he was gazing directly into crimson.

“And, of course, Mr. Quick, I haven't forgotten about you. Is there anything you would like to say? Some sort of explanation? You have to admit that your current predicament is very odd.”

Quick could only shake mutely. Harry looked around him and saw only cold regard amongst the adults, and felt a strange sort of empathy for the man. He was not sorry the assassin had been caught, and he wasn't sorry to be alive, but he wished they wouldn't torment him. It didn't serve any purpose Harry could see.

Voldemort's benign expression didn't change, but his grip on his prisoner's face did. He seized his jaw, holding it steady as Quick tried to jerk his head away, keeping their eyes connected. Suddenly the resistance ceased, turning instead to violent shaking. It only lasted a few seconds, and Voldemort released him, letting the man collapse onto the carpet and continue his seizure there.

“Severus, make sure he doesn't bite off his tongue,” the Dark Lord instructed, turning back to his desk. As the potion's professor knelt beside the spasming body, shoving something into his mouth and holding his head, Voldemort pulled out some paper from his desk and scribbled a couple of quick notes, sealed them magically, and handed them back to the young Sentinel. “Give these to Chief Sentinel Morgan. I have made some preliminary discoveries he will find of interest, but I want a professional interrogator here within the hour to uncover further details. From here on out, this is to be considered a Class X national security case. Go.”

The Sentinel saluted sharply, and sped out of the room. The room was tensely silent, the only sound was the choking gasps coming from the floor and Snape's grunts as he struggled with his task.

Voldemort wasn't smiling anymore, more thoughtful than anything, and at last he turned to Harry. He said nothing, and neither did Harry, though he was filled with questions and barely restrained horror. Was that what Voldemort had done to him during his second year? Harry didn't recall seizing, but he couldn't recall much of anything really. He felt his godfather's hold on him tightened protectively, pulling him back to himself. At last, the Dark Lord turned away.

"It would appear your services are still required."

"Harry's still in danger?" Sirius growled.

"Indeed, but the threat is greater than I realized. It appears as though Moody found some powerful allies."

"Quit being a dramatist and just spit it out. What did you learn?"

Crimson eyes flashed at Sirius's impertinence, causing the werewolf to flinch. Sirius recovered quickly, but the slip was enough to satisfy the Dark Lord.

"Quick neither set the explosives during the quidditch match nor poisoned Harry. In fact, his presence here is not entirely of his own free will. His mind has been tampered with. I couldn't fish out all the details I wanted without destroying him utterly, but I caught a few essentials. Moody kidnapped him out of his home and made it appear as if he'd killed the man, and has been holding him for just such a purpose as today. However, he wasn't alone. He had help from a very old friend of ours."

"Santa Claus?" Sirius suggested. Voldemort flicked his finger at the werewolf. Sirius made a panicked sound, then went very quiet. The anger in his eyes screamed his hatred loud and clear though.

"No, Fido," the Dark Lord hissed, "Dumbledore."

There was a palpable shift in the atmosphere. Even Snape, busy keeping Quick alive, turned sharply towards Voldemort in surprise.

"Impossible," Remus said. In the quiet of the office, even his whisper could be heard clearly.

"You think so? Do you really think so?"

Sirius was on his feet in an instant, and at first Harry thought he was going to attack, but instead he merely pulled Harry to his feet as well. Unable to speak, he made a sharp gesture to Remus, who rose as well. Harry found himself being shoved towards the smaller werewolf, who caught him easily. Sirius made another gesture for them to leave. Voldemort voiced no objection, and the atmosphere was far too tense for Harry to voice any of his own. Remus offered his mate a reassuring nod, before escorting their pup out to the relative safety of the halls.

Voldemort smirked as Sirius turned his attention back to him. The werewolf's black eyes had gone yellow, dominating and delightfully feral.

"Don't tell me you're surprised, Blackbone? After twenty years of raging war upon me, do you really believe your old general is above destroying one little boy? He abandoned hundreds of his allies and their families to death, including you and the Potters, just so he could escape to continue the fight that he had already lost. Look around you. Britain is stronger than she has ever been, her people just as safe and happy and satisfied as before the war... and yet still Dumbledore sends his assassins and saboteurs. And for what? To fight against evil? Ha!"

Sirius said nothing, couldn't after Voldemort's hex shriveled his tongue into non-existence, but neither did he interrupt.

"All he does is fight against me and peace and being proven wrong after all this time. And if he is to do that, he must destroy the symbol of our nation's success. Harry is the new generation, Blackbone. He's the ideal. He's everything every generation past wished to aspire to, but were always unable. Brave, noble, talented, strong. He's the slap in the face of every ignorant fear Dumbledore and the Ministry ever planted in the minds of the people should they aspire for change, for greater things than what came before. Do you understand? The greatest threat to Dumbledore is Harry, and the greatest threat to Harry is Dumbledore?"

oo
oo

Larousse and Lestrange were half way up the stairs with a contingent of some twenty Sentinels when Sirius Blackbone, alone and unarmed came storming down to meet them with a wordless snarl and a look that promised death. Lestrangle was the only one amongst them bold enough to issue out an answering hiss as he shoved passed her, though Larousse had a curse on the very tip of her tongue and watched the broad target of his back intently until it disappeared behind the curve of the staircase.

At the top of the stairs, the painting that led to Voldemort's office was slashed open, as if by claws. Inside was further destruction, consisting of the Dark Lord's beautiful mahogany desk laying in splinters on the wrong side of the room, having taken out an entire bookshelf in its flight. Amidst the wreckage stood Voldemort, laughing hysterically, and the only witnesses to the madness that had just transpired, Snape and the catatonic Quick safely pressed against a wall.

Larousse let out her held breath when she saw Harry was no where in sight.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Merlin's beard, are you telling me there are werewolves in Hogwarts? How did this slip under our noses?” McGunny shouted at the thirty or so students crowded into the Journalism office. An emergency meeting had just been called upon word of the attack during the Dueling Club. Aside from Hermione and Ron, there had been other reporters there to cover the event for the sports section of the paper, and they had rushed to inform their editor of their far more exciting story the moment they'd left the hall. A little more digging had turned up the identity of the men as werewolves who may very well have just caught Moody. Soon however came even more information and speculation until the truth was quickly becoming addled and uncertain.

Some were saying that the werewolves were part of a planned ambush. Others that they had simply attacked and gotten lucky. Still others were saying the man that was attacked was really Moody, others that it wasn't Moody but someone under Imperius by Moody. After that things got weird. Several witness said they heard Harry Potter and the werewolves greet each other by name, and some even insisted that it was Harry who set the werewolves on the possible assassin. Others were saying they saw Ginny Weasley leave the supply closet Harry had been making preparations in a hurry and thought she had been sent by Harry to get the werewolves, but no one had been able to find the girl to confirm it. No one was brave enough to find the werewolves themselves, and Potter was proving as elusive as ever.

"This was an executive order from Voldemort himself. It had to be. He's the only one who could authorize the use of werewolves according to the Snake and Wolf Treaty. He probably kept it hushed up until the very last minute. You know, so as not to warn Moody. I bet they were released into the school sometime this morning while we were in classes, and have been hunting the castle all day," Hermione said, the only one who hadn't been saying anything without something to back it up.

"Does anyone know where Voldemort is?" McGunny asked.

There was silence all around. The Dark Lord's location was never made public knowledge, and even on those occasions he visited the castle, few could testify to his presence unless he intentionally made himself known.

"I overheard that Sentinel say they were taking the prisoner to Voldemort first, and then ordered Larousse to get the Headmistress. I figure he's somewhere in the castle. Either his office or the dungeons," Ron said.

"We can't print that unless we're certain," she pointed out.

"Whose talking about printing anything? We're just getting trying to sort it out. Jeez, lighten up."

The Gryffindor looked ready to do the exact opposite and verbally punch Weasley into the ground, but McGunny, quite used to their antics, cut her off.

“Both of you knock it off. You both were there. Is there anything you can confirm? Was the attacker Moody? Did you get the werewolves' names? What about the Sentinel?”

Granger looked hesitant. It set off warning bells in McGunny's mind. She was one of his most diligent reporters and assistants, but when ever a topic arose that involved Harry Potter she froze up like Antarctica. Fortunately, Weasley had no such compunctions.

“Yeah, I got some interesting stuff. The guy wasn't Moody. Get this, his name is Torence Quick, the guy everyone thought Moody had killed.”

Oh, that was perfect, the editor thought, but still didn't explain Granger's hesitance.

“Excellent, anything else?”

“Yeah, the werewolves... they called Potter their 'pup' and the big one even hugged him. I think we might now know why we never hear about his parents now.”

“Fucking hell, no!”

The silence that followed could be attributed to either Weasley's suggestion or the fact that Hermion Granger of Malfoy actually swore. She gave a polite little cough afterwards, and explained herself more eloquently.

“If you had been paying more attention, you would recall Harry called them each Sirius and Remus, not dad or anything. 'Pup' is probably just an endearment, like 'sonny' or 'kiddo', only you know... werewolf.”

Good points, but no one was buying it. If anyone knew Potter's secrets it was Granger, and few doubted that she knew the boy's connection to the werewolves and possibly the secret of his origins altogether.

“Hhhmmm... Any other insights you might have, Granger? Like say, how Potter would even know werewolves to begin with?”

She looked away. Parker sent her dirty looks. She had always been jealous of Granger, over various things, but her closeness to the Black Cat of Gryffindor was at the top of the list.

“Oh, fess up. Everyone knows you know everything about everything, including the Mysterious World of Prince Potter, enigma of the universe,” she sneered.

The Gryffindor's response was typical aristocratic disdain.

“If I were ever to tell secrets, it wouldn't be to the Queen of Melodrama and Tripe, and certainly not the secrets of the person who saved my life. So you can take to your sass, swallow it, and send it back out with the rest of your crap.”

“Eloquent as always, Granger. I think we get the point. I don't suppose you could convince him to do an interview willingly?” McGunny tried. It was worth a shot. Here she had the decency to look a bit exasperated and apologetic.

“He's shy.”

Everyone looked at her as if she'd grown a second head. Ron was first to put all their thoughts into words, in his usual succinct manner.

“You're fucking joking.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Remus followed silently behind his enraged pack mate on their way to Sentinel Headquarters. Whatever spell Voldemort had cast to silence Sirius had since faded, but the man had yet to speak beyond asking about Harry and informing him they were leaving the castle. Their godson had been left with McGonagall, and the beta was glad the child hadn't been forced to accompany them to London. The press had already caught wind of a man taken into custody and practically stormed the castle and headquarters in a quest for further information and juicy pictures. Sirius, despite his bad mood, hadn't torn any of them to pieces as he made his way through the throng, but nor did he slow his pace and more than few people had been knocked over and nearly trampled as he shoved pass them.

Remus followed close behind until at last they squeezed through the doors and into the reception area. The press was still limited to the outside, and though they could still hear them, both werewolves were relieved to have escaped the overwhelming scents and heat of so many bodies crowding around them.

They only had a moment to relax before a new threat made itself known. Snape and Larousse were there as well. Not really surprising, but hardly welcome. Neither professor looked particularly pleased to see them either. Ideally, they should just avoid each other, but Sirius was an alpha and in their own ways so were Snape and Larousse, and both had been caught encroaching onto territory they each considered their own. They both stepped forward to meet in the center of the lobby.

"You know there's a 'no dogs allowed' sign on the front door," the woman said.

"Then how'd a bitch like you get in?" Sirius countered, meeting her head on. Remus normally wouldn't approve of his mate's behavior towards non-werewolves, but Larousse's reputation preceded her. He would support his mate completely against her.

"Cute. Where's your handler?"

Sirius just smirked. He didn't have to answer to her.

"Oh, my Dear," Snape said, sidling in. "They don't need handler's anymore. The Dark Lord has tamed the mongrels into his well trained pets. They obey all his commands. Come, sit, fetch... attack. I dare say even Potter would be impressed. The little one that is. The big one probably would have killed himself if he weren't dead already."

Sirius' clawed hands were at Snape's neck almost simultaneously with Larousse's wand pointed at Sirius' chest, and Remus' own wand was at her breast as if it had always been there.

"All I have to do is squeeze," the alpha warned, but Snape's smirk never wavered.

"Yes, that's all you have to do. But you won't, because after all is said and done, you're one of us now. Another servant of the Dark Lord. Just like me. Just like your beloved godson."

Sirius growled, but his words were close enough to the truth that he couldn't follow through with his deepest desire. Who would protect Harry if he was executed over a puppet like Snivelus? Larousse was looking a bit confused, and he decided to take advantage of her weakness.

"Didn't you know, woman? Harry Potter is my godson. I'm his only family. He's the only reason I'm even here. You can call me Voldemort's pet or puppet or whatever you want, but in the end I'm doing this for Harry, and when he learns the truth about him and you and all your black hearted schemes I'm going to be the one he turns to. And then we'll see just how strong your master's leash really is."

Her face was perfectly blank, but Sirius could see her emotions flitting across her dark eyes and smell them coming off her like olfactory message board. Anger, hate, fear, despair... jealousy?

"You speak treason," she hissed, and he merely laughed at her.

"Greyback is my king, not Voldemort. You might know that if you ever bothered to learn about werewolves outside of how to kill them."

"Harry will never be yours."

And that, as far as Sirius was concerned, was a declaration of war.

Book III:

Chapter 10: The Serpent King and the Huntress

Voldemort lingered at Hogwarts for another day, a calculated risk given the latest security failures, but there were some issues he wished to address before he left and the day before was too chaotic. Besides, he needed the night to analyze the many facets of the lies he had told, and how he might exploit them.

And there were so many wonderful ways to exploit the situation, so many different people he could manipulate.

But there was also the danger of the truth. Not that his lie would be exposed, but the truth was as frightening to Voldemort as the lie must have been to Blackbone.

Dumbledore wanting Harry dead? No, the old bat had found a better use for the boy. Or really, he had stolen Voldemort's idea. The man was slipping in his old age.

Quick had indeed been kidnapped, but he had never so much as glimpsed Moody. Some traitorous citizens had taken advantage of the fugitive's escape to kidnap the former Death Eater, and after several weeks of meticulous applications of occlumency and potions and simple torture, Quick had broken. The man had been sent to contact, not kill, young Harry, on behalf of a 'family friend' and lure him out of the castle so that he might have been kidnapped and presumably slipped out of the country and into Europe. And there the Wizarding World would wait to hear how 'horrible' and 'evil' and 'hopeless' life in Britain had become, and how the young boy just barely managed to survive against incredible odds and finally escaped to beg their aid in overthrowing the tyrant king.

The idea, though clever and manipulative, brought on a powerful rage in the Dark Lord. Harry belonged to him, not anyone else. That anyone would attempt to steal his protege and use him against his mentor, against his own countrymen was unforgivable. After taking Britain and rebuilding her in his image, he had been content with his successes. His deepest hatred for his old nemesis had dissipated into smug indifference. Now it rose and burned like a phoenix from the ashes once again.

A gentle chime drew him out of his internal storm, and upon checking the magical signature of his visitor, swept the mental maelstrom away. He would save his rage for the traitors once they were found, but right now his audience required a far gentler touch.

“Enter,” he said, and Harry stepped into the office. This was the second time Harry had come to him alone and of his own accord, and though he looked a bit unsure, it pleased the Dark Lord. It saved him the hassle of summoning him.

“What happened to your desk?”

The beautiful mahogany desk Sirius had destroyed required more than a simple repair spell, and was currently being pulled back together by Industrious Sprites. They are a wizard made creature vaguely resembling sprites and about the size of female termites, whose sole purpose was to repair antiquities made of wood, bone, or leather. Voldemort could easily understand why the pile of wood covered in these creepy-crawlies in the middle of the office might draw the boy's attention, but he doubted it was why he was there.

“Never mind that. You wished to speak with me?”

Harry hesitated, then fidgeted for a moment, before finally sighing.

“Yeah... I... I'd like a favor.”

Voldemort felt a peak of curiosity. Harry never asked for things.

“I don't give gifts, Harry,” he reminded, “But tell me what you want and I'll see what I can do.”

Again he hesitated. He looked around the office for a moment, and finally reclaimed a mostly intact chair from the pile on the floor, brushing off a few of the irritated little sprites before sitting down. To Voldemort's amusement that seemed to calm him, sitting in a chair across from his desk, however little remained of it. It was comfortably familiar.

"I'd like the taboo on my parents' names removed."

It was to the point and not particularly unusual or extreme as favors go, which Voldemort liked, but the reasoning behind the timing was elusive enough that he wanted a bit more of an explanation.

"Any particular reason you want this now?"

"I've got a lot of reasons... mostly... well, you're going to have to do it eventually any way, aren't you?"

"Why do you say that?"

"Everyone wants to know who my parents are now, and I... I'm not ashamed of them. There isn't any reason why they shouldn't know, but I can't tell anyone until the taboo is lifted. Everyone is just going to keep thinking I'm your illegitimate son or grandson or Sirius's son or any number of weird ideas, unless I set the record straight."

"I'm rather fond of the 'Grandson Rumor'," Voldemort said, which was true, "It resolved several other rumors about my sexual orientation." Which wasn't true, but making Harry blush was fun.

"... are you going to do it or not?"

Darn, the boy knew when he was being teased. Should he oblige the request? It was true he was going to have to do it eventually, and with Dumbledore's latest move, perhaps now was the perfect time. After all, if the public wasn't outraged by the attempted assassination of a child, they would certainly be disgusted by the assassination of the child of one of the old coot's own supporters. Perhaps this could even be seen as a symbolic reconciliation between the past and present. Ah, there were definitely benefits, as long as he could keep his own followers' outrage at being socially usurped by the enemy's child out of the papers. If the Court officials kicked up too much of a fuss it could cause some serious setbacks in his plans for Harry, and perhaps stir up even more enemies against his vulnerable protege than were currently plaguing him.

It was a risky move. It grew riskier every day, but that was as good of a reason to do it now as any. Harry would at least have public sympathy on his side with the attempted murders and no one could accuse him of 'fraternizing' with an enemy that wanted him dead. The situation wasn't going to get better than this.

However, Harry didn't know any of this. It was the perfect opportunity to demand compensation for this 'favor'. He let out a put upon sigh, and settled in his own chair across from the boy.

"Very well, but on one condition."

"Which is?"

"You sit through an interview with the press."

For a moment it looked as if Harry were going to retch, but he quickly composed himself.

"Why?"

"It doesn't really matter does it? That is the price you must pay."

Harry thought for a bit.

"What will they ask me? How will I know which questions I can even answer? I know there are a lot of things you don't want me talking about."

"The questions should be limited to recent events and probably inquiries about your life with your parents and how you ended up at WYRA and then Hogwarts. I will have one of my people there to safe guard against any... inappropriate questions. I'll try to keep the number of interviewers down to half a dozen."

"The Hogwarts' Herald?"

"It would be appropriate to invite them, but I won't if it bothers you."

"No... so long as it isn't Parker... or Weasley, I'm fine."

"So you agree?"

"Yeah..."

Voldemort made an annoyed sound.

"'Yeah' is such ridiculous word. It implies a lack of resolve and enthusiasm. On paper it expresses a lack of character. I recommend you refrain from using it during your interviews, along with any other vague and unclear words such as 'sure', 'whatever', and 'ya know'. Don't shrug either. It drives the interviewers crazy and makes for very boring quotes."

"Yes, my Lord," Harry said, sulky from the reprimand.

"Good. Now, have you been informed of the current circumstances?"

"You mean that a lot more people than we thought want me dead? Yeah... I mean yes, yes, Remus was very thorough in his explanations. I can't say I understand though. What did I ever do to this Dumbledore guy?"

"Nothing. Absolutely nothing. However, now that we've caught him with his hand in the cookie jar, I doubt he'll make another attempt for quite some time if ever. Even the Europeans, who despise the British, draw the line at murdering school children. He can deny any involvement once, but he'll lose all foreign support if he's caught trying again."

Harry just shook his head. Politics escaped him, especially foreign politics. That was just how Voldemort preferred it.

"Was there anything else?"

Harry considered for a moment, then smiled a bit impishly.

"Can I...er... May I have access to my family vault?"

That was a completely different subject the Dark Lord was not willing to address yet.

"Ask again after you graduate."

This didn't seem to surprise Harry, who just shrugged, then remembered he wasn't suppose to do that and replied, "Yes, sir, I'll do that."

Voldemort was far more amused than he probably should be, but he didn't question it. He wasn't a masochist or a dramatist. He liked feeling good. Which reminded him.

"How are you feeling, Harry? You appear to be handling all this stress admirably, but if you require a few days away you are welcome to join me London."

Harry shook his head ruefully.

"Just a little tired. Nothing to skip school over. Besides, I still have make up assignments and detentions from my last brush with death."

He climbed to his feet, preparing to depart without being dismissed first. Poor form, but Voldemort saw no point in scolding him a second time. He didn't want to become a nag. Harry surprised him by asking one more question.

"You... you've had to deal with this... this constant danger for years, decades even, right?"

Voldemort nodded.

"How do you... deal with it? Knowing that someone is trying to take your life? To undo everything you've made for yourself and everyone you care about?"

The Dark Lord thought for a long moment, deciding between the truth or something more appropriate for Harry's age. The truth won out, as a fuzzy platitude might lower the boy's guard and ultimately result in his death or injury.

"I killed them first."

oo
oo

Afternoon tea in the tower was unusually tense. Snape supposed it was too much to ask Vesper to remain unfazed by the last couple of days. He wasn't feeling particularly focused either. Betrayed was more accurate. Hypocritical to be sure, but the potion's master couldn't help feeling as if he'd been conned. With the announcement that Dumbledore was trying to kill Potter, still nothing more than a precocious child, his world was tilting, shifting unpredictably.

Snape wasn't a man who put much faith in the good versus evil, light versus dark as a way of the universe. He figured that was just how the naïve or the philosophically lazy defined the nature of the world simply enough for them to understand and explain to their offspring. After all this time it was humiliating to discover he was guilty of the same stereotyping.

Dumbledore was the good wizard of the light. Voldemort was the evil wizard of the dark.

But now the evil dark wizard was the only defense an innocent boy had against the good light wizard. And Potter was innocent. He was innocent, as only children and the stupidly idealistic can be.

Snape was, himself, a dark wizard, yet he never denied the importance of light wizardry either. It was a balance not a competition, but now Dumbledore had gone and thrown it all out of whack. This was more than disappointment he felt. This was uncertainty.

Now what?

"Severus..."

He looked to Vesper, twisting her napkin in an unusual display of nerves. The last couple of days had stressed her, her strange affection for Potter coming in conflict with her deep hatred for the werewolves he seemed to love. She hadn't let it interfere with her classes or responsibilities, but quiet leisure time like now demonstrated a serious lack of her usual poise.

"Yes, madam?" he said cautiously.

She was quiet for a moment, then looked him directly in the eye. Even as a skilled legilimens, Snape couldn't interpret her piercing gaze. Whatever she saw seemed to calm her a bit, and she set the napkin down.

"... What are your thoughts on marriage?"

He looked at her blankly for a long moment, then set down his tea cup.

"A noble idea, and thusly unrealistically romanticized, and generally a disappointment in the context of everyday life. Why?"

"I want to marry you, Severus."

He was suddenly very glad he put down his tea cup else he would have dropped it in his lap.

"What?"

"I think we're as perfect a match as either of us will ever come. We're close in age and maturity. We share similar interests, politics, and education levels. I find you attractive, and I believe you feel the same. I think we should get married."

He just looked at her for a long moment. She had good points, but he hadn't thought of marriage in all the time he had spent with her and wasn't sure if that meant he should think on it more or refuse her right out of hand.

"This is sudden... and rather suspicious. When did you make this decision?"

"When I read your personnel file over the summer."

She had decided she wanted to marry him before they had even met? Well, it certainly explained her aggressive courtship thus far, but it didn't explain why.

"That's very pragmatic. I trust you shopped around first?"

"Three years of 'shopping around'. You're the first one that's held my interest at all."

"I'm flattered."

And he was, strangely enough. He had never considered himself particularly attractive, physically or personally, but for a woman as charming and lovely as Vesper to imply he was after a rather extensive search was an interesting sort of compliment. Rather cold blooded, but he was a Slytherin and could appreciate that. Aside from some juvenile fantasies of marriage to Lily, he had never really entertained the idea of marrying as more than long-term business contract.

"And why do wish to marry me? Why do you wish to marry at all? I doubt it's for love."

That was perhaps a bit cruel to say, but Vesper didn't seem bothered by it.

"I think I could love you, Severus. I don't think that would be hard at all, but you're right. I have other reasons. More than being your wife, I want to be a mother again. I want children, and I don't have many more years left to make that possible."

Severus relaxed a little in to his chair. So that was it? Not so cold blooded as he first thought, after all. A tad admirable even.

“And you think I would be a suitable father? You should be well aware of my impatience with children, particularly young ones.”

“You're an honorable man in your own way, Severus. Strong and honorable, if a bit bad tempered. I don't think it's necessary for our children to like you, so much as respect you. I know you would protect your family. I've seen how you are with your godson and goddaughter.”

“What would I get out of this?”

“The same thing you would get out of the arranged marriage the Dark Lord will eventually demand of you, only you'd know what you were getting. Heirs from a woman with a long line of powerful witches and wizards, a rather sizable inheritance, complete fidelity, and I'm told I'm actually quite pretty.”

Severus chuckled at that. He wasn't looking for a bride, but he'd known for a long time now that Voldemort was looking for him. The Dark Lord had been called hypocritical for his policies on muggle-born adoption after decades of tormenting them, but he had been just as vigorous with pure-blood restoration. The general consensus amongst pureblood families had been one male child and heir per household, a risky policy should said male child die unexpectedly or prove incapable of continuing the line. With stricter and simpler laws on inheritance, tax breaks for multiple child households, and a propaganda campaign supporting the large family as the ideal family, the birth rate had nearly tripled over the last ten years. The percentage of single adult wizards and witches was less than half of what it had been.

There were government plans to aid single wizards in finding suitable life partners, but when it came to Death Eaters, Voldemort liked to meddle personally. If he thought a particular pair was suitable, he would 'suggest' it. If he thought the pair wasn't, he'd right out forbid it. Severus had avoided the last two 'suggestions' the Dark Lord had given him thus far; one committed suicide (luckily it had nothing to do with him) and the other eloped while he was busy teaching at Hogwarts. Voldemort hadn't given up, but he was very careful with his selections, and they were not his first concern while running the country. Severus supposed he might as well marry on his own terms before a third 'suggestion' came along.

But there was something he needed to know first.

"And where does Potter fit in all of this?"

She looked startled, and then rather nervous.

"What do you..."

"Let's not start a potential betrothal with games, my dear. You came to this school with two people on your mind. One was me, apparently, and the other was definitely Potter. What plans have you made for him, I wonder?"

She conceded with a nod. Severus was a very observant man, one of the things she respected about him, but she was going to have to learn to conceal her thoughts and motives better if they were going to marry. Until then she would have to gamble with point blank honesty.

"I want to adopt him."

Severus laughed at that, earning him a rather dour frown from his companion. After almost a minute, he managed to compose himself into reserved amusement and they continued.

"Have you any idea what you're saying? You can't adopt Potter. That's like saying you want to adopt the Dalai Lama."

"Oh, please, Severus, I'm not a fool. I know the obstacles. There's really only one. If I can convince the Dark Lord-"

"Or Satan. I think you'd have better luck with Satan."

"Now you're being melodramatic. Honestly, Severus, what is the harm in asking? We're already his guardians. We're perfect choices for his parents."

"We?"

Severus shuddered. Potter as his son? He'd rather set up his potion's lab in the Hogwarts' sewer.

"As if it would be any different than things are now. You already see him regularly with classes and he spent the summer with you too. I think you feel some affection for him."

"You overstep your bounds. My concern over Potter's wellbeing is directly related to my concern over my own wellbeing. In case you forgot, the Dark Lord entrusted him to me and I will be the one punished for the child's every misstep."

She smiled knowingly.

"That's not the only reason though, is it? He is his mother's son, after all," she said.

Severus' froze, staring at her blankly, before rising to his feet and heading for the door. She panicked when she saw him escape, and quickly rose herself to stop wait.

"Wait, Severus, I'm sorry, I'm sorry. That was completely uncalled for. I won't mention her again. I promise. Just wait."

Pity was not a feeling he was prone to, but felt inclined to show some modicum of mercy, however undeserved. He stopped at the door, looking back at her, waiting for her to convince him or blow her chance once and for all.

"Alright, you don't care about Harry," she said, "but you're stuck with him, one way or another. Wouldn't it be better to reap some benefit? For yourself? For your children?"

He turned back to her and leaned against the door frame, saying nothing, but showing some vague interest. She took a breath to calm herself and continued.

"The Dark Lord has a personal investment in Harry's safety. Safety that a young family such as ours would benefit from. We've both come from pureblood families with prominent names, but those were lost to me when I married and to you when your mother married. You managed to gain a reputation through your talents with potions and your service to the Dark Lord, but that isn't inheritable. With someone like Harry in the family, we would be guaranteed the Dark Lord's protection and our children would benefit by merely associating with him."

"Or be assassinated for associating with him. He has a rather bad track record of that. Come now, Vesper, surely you've got better arguments than this. You did very well with the marriage one."

"I wasn't expecting to defend the idea so soon," she admitted, and sigh. "I don't suppose you'd give me a week to come up with better ones?"

He considered.

"Just tell me one thing. If you had to choose between marrying me and adopting Potter, which would you choose?"

She barely even hesitated.

"I'd marry you."

"Then I accept. You still have to convince me about Potter though. I'll give you a week," he said, and then wandered out the door. He smiled in amusement at the muffled 'YES!' that drifted through the door.

Really now, what was he thinking? Marriage? To that crazy woman? Perhaps he was just disoriented from Dumbledore's latest plot, or perhaps she had put something in his tea. Whatever the case, he felt strangely happy as he descended the tower steps. Thoughts of dashing all those young boy's delusions of romance with their DA&D professor almost had him giggling.

It was definitely the tea.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The first people Harry wanted tell about the removal of the taboo were his godfathers. He thought they would appreciate exactly what he had accomplished more than his friends would, and even that they would be proud of him. So he searched for them, but he may as well have been searching London. There were so many places the werewolves could be, hunting the halls and grounds for would-be assassins, and Harry couldn't go to half of them under his current restrictions.

The only thing he managed to find were some seventh years snogging in a classroom and a couple of GGs. He finally gave up and decided to head back to his common room when he was grabbed from behind and pulled into a secret passage way. He immediately screamed and kicked and elbowed his abductor in the ribs and bit the hand cover his mouth.

“Ow!”

He was immediately dropped, and he bolted for the exit, but was grabbed again by someone else.

“Hold on, Prongslet, it's just us! It's just Sirius and I!” Remus whispered quickly, and Harry immediately relaxed. He pulled out his wand and cast Lumos to see them better. Sirius was inspecting his wounded hand, but flinched away from the light.

“Tone it down, Harry. I just got my eyes to adjust,” he said, and Harry made the light as dim as he could and still see. The boy let out an aggravated sound.

“Bloody hell, what were you two thinking grabbing me like that? You nearly gave me a heart attack!”

“Serves you right for wandering around the castle alone. We've been following you since you left Voldemort's office. Did you know we weren't the only ones following you?”

Harry looked startled. He hadn't even thought to look, he had been so focused on his search. How could he be so stupid?

"Who else was following me?"

"Either it was one of the school reporters or the youngest pervert I have ever seen," Sirius said, "Nice bite by the way. You're lucky I'm wearing gloves or you might have spent the last month sucking down silver nitrate and wolfsbane."

Harry peeked out of their hiding place, a rickety corridor that followed the entire east wing of the fourth floor, the entrance hidden in the shadows of a support column. Sure enough, Greystoke came floating down the hallway like some sort of dementor in training, his eyes shifting about for his lost prey. Eventually, the older boy disappeared down the corridor, and Harry turned back to his godfathers.

"Sorry, I wasn't thinking clearly. I'll be more careful."

Remus patted him on the head, and lead him back out into the open halls, Sirius bringing up the rear. Sirius cuffed him upside the head.

"Damn well better be. Why were you even out here by yourself? Did Lord Creepy summon you?"

Harry rubbed the back of his head, but still managed a smirk.

"No. I went to ask him a favor."

His godfathers looked more worried than he thought was strictly necessary.

"I didn't ask him to kill anyone, geez!"

"It's not that Harry," Remus said, "It's just we don't like the idea of you making deals with that... man."

"Don't worry about it. I'm not making a habit of it, but this was important and only he could do it."

Neither of his godfathers looked pleased.

“Dare I ask?”

“I got him to take the taboo off of mom and dad's names.”

“What?!”

Harry couldn't help feeling a bit smug at their discomfiture. They both seemed to be struggling to understand what he was saying, and then whether or not they could still scold him or not. They didn't seem to making much progress, though the expressions that passed between them were pretty funny in Harry's opinion.

“How?” Sirius said at last.

“I pointed out how he would have to do it eventually anyway. He couldn't have people thinking I was his illegitimate kid forever. All I really had to do was agree to an interview, which gag me, isn't so bad. It's a small price to pay to reclaim my family's honor.”

Sirius paced the width of the hallway, running his hands through his hair in agitation. There really wasn't any way to argue with Harry on that point. When Voldemort had taken power, and the name of Potter fell into disgraced anonymity, it had pained Sirius more deeply than the end of his own family's name. The Potters had virtually adopted Sirius after he was disowned, and amongst those kind and noble people he had finally felt the pride of being part of a family that fifteen years of rhetoric hadn't instilled in him for his biological one.

Yet to have the name of Potter returned by the very man who destroyed it smacked of its own sort of dishonor. Sirius didn't doubt Harry's intentions, but his godson was still just a child, and he felt perhaps he was confusing honor with pride. It wasn't something he felt qualified to lecture Harry on. To a werewolf pride and honor were the same thing, and though the wizard in him knew the difference, he wasn't eloquent enough to explain it to a thirteen year old. Remus, a beta by standing and an omega by nature since childhood, hadn't had pride or honor for all the years Sirius had known him. Loyalty and gentle nobility were as close as the man came, and though he loved him for it, they didn't qualify him to explain either.

"I thought you would both be happier," Harry said, disappointment clear.

Sirius sighed, and ruffled the boy's hair affectionately. Who was he to belittle what Harry had done? It was certainly more than most men would be able to achieve, and in the end the honor of the Potter name lay in Harry, not Voldemort, to dishonor or glorify. He managed a smile.

"I am. And I'm proud of you, and I know your father would be very proud too. Do you think you're ready to uphold your family name all on your own? It's a big responsibility."

"I can do it, I think. I just have to do the right thing, don't I? Like obey the law and don't sleep with other people's wives and stuff like that, right?"

That earned him genuine laugh from both werewolves. Such a simplistic answer, like saying babies came from a cabbage patch. Naïve and sweetly innocent.

"What's so funny?"

"Nothing," Sirius said, "That's close enough to the truth for now, I suppose. You'll figure the rest of it out as you go. Just concentrate on doing the right thing for now, and we'll help you out if you get stuck."

Harry was perplexed. What exactly was he expected to do? It couldn't be too hard. Draco hardly did anything at all, and still managed to make the name of Malfoy seem like some sort of demi-god all should lay down to worship.

Sirius put his arm around Harry's shoulder, and started leading him down the hall, Remus following behind with his wand drawn and one eye always checking behind them.

“Lets get something to eat from the kitchen, and you can tell us what else you've been up to aside from reclaiming your name from Lord Doom and Gloom and avoiding another brush with death. Do you have a girlfriend yet?”

Harry blushed, earning another laugh from the werewolf. He had forgotten how embarrassing Sirius could be. It was still nice though. Walking and talking about the menial and extravagant of everyday life with adults who not only cared but could be trusted.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

They spent the hour before dinner making nuisances of themselves in the kitchen, requesting dishes from the house elves that didn't exist and then daring each other to try the mystery concoctions that ended up in front of them. Harry told them about Natalie, who he liked but didn't entirely trust, and Ginny, who he trusted but hadn't really thought of romantically. He told them about Ron's trick on Hermione, and how he became the vice captain, and how this was the second time quidditch had been canceled for a season. He told them about Professor Larousse.

Then, they told him about Professor Larousse.

“She's a serial killer,” Sirius said, bluntly, “The werewolves' public enemy number one. She's killed at least a dozen that we know about, and most of those weren't in their wolf form either. We don't know how many she's done in and never gotten caught. If it weren't for the Snake and Wolf treaty, she would probably still have kept killing, but even she's not crazy enough to come into our territory without Court support. As it is, I'm having a serious problem being within sight of her. I can't swear to either of our safety if we find ourselves alone together.”

Harry was horrified. He knew Larousse didn't like werewolves, a lot of witches and wizards didn't, but hadn't realized her position was so extreme. She had seemed so nice!

“Why? Why does she hate werewolves so much?”

Here, Remus cut in before Sirius went on a tirade about her being a stupid curse-happy whore. His mate had a problem with objectivity when it came to certain things, and Larousse was one of them.

“Most of use believe it's a revenge thing, others believe it's a sort of crusade. You know her husband and son were killed by the old Ministry?”

Harry nodded.

“Well, after that the only family she had left was her brother and his wife and daughter. They were very close. Her sister-in-law contracted a severe case of lycanthrosis. No one is sure if she was raped and covered it up or she had an affair, but she must not have realized she was sick until it was too late. The full moon came around and she went crazy. Killed her husband and daughter. When she realized what she had done, she hung herself. So whether Larousse is trying to avenge her family or trying to prevent it from ever happening to anyone else, I couldn't tell you, but her views were extreme enough that she got kicked out of the Sentinels for it. I'm amazed she was allowed to teach in Hogwarts.”

A heavy silence fell over them. Harry felt ill. He liked Larousse, he even trusted her a little. She had been looking out for him all year, and though that was awkward it was also kind of nice. Now he found out she was homicidal, and her ideal target was people like his godfathers? Like Luna or Athena or any number of the men, women, and children he had spent time with over the summer?

Her story was tragic, losing not only her husband and son but what remained of her family shortly after. It had to have been unbearable, but to murder... How many husbands had she killed? How many wives, fathers, mothers, sons, daughters, brothers, sisters?

“She never said a thing... I didn't even know she didn't like werewolves until she met you. Jesus...”

“Are you alright, Prongslet? You smell kind of... off,” Remus said, rubbing his shoulder soothingly.

“I don't know... It's just...”

He didn't know what he wanted to say or how he should feel. His teacher was a mass murderer. What was the appropriate response to that?

“Come on, pup, we'll take you back to your room,” Sirius said, helping his godson to his feet. It hadn't been their intention to upset him, but there were some things they felt he had to know.

Not to trust homicidal maniacs was one of them.

Although, they might have been three years too late for that lesson.

Book III:

Chapter 11: The Phoenix King

Far away, across the Channel, an elderly wizard stared out from a run down, but quaint little shop. From this particular window he could stare out at row of muggle restaurants, cafés, and boutiques covered in snow and Christmas decorations. If he went to another window he could stare out at an almost identical row of buildings inhabited by witches and wizards with their own brands of holiday decorations. He liked this particular shop because when ever he held meetings, the men and women who gathered there could look out with him, and see for themselves how both peoples were as human and beautiful and flawed as the other.

It was an important reminder, for him as well as they, exactly what they were fighting to preserve.

Days like today made theses reminders necessary.

“You have read the papers? The English ones?”

He half turned to acknowledge Tonks, noting with some amusement that her hair was flaring red with her bad temper. Tonks was one of the youngest members of the Order of the Phoenix, but also the most zealous and proactive. She had only been a child when her family fled England, but she was old enough to know what was being lost and why, and the years she had struggled as a refugee in the elitist German school system had hardened her resolve. He had picked her up at a wizarding university, intrigued by the woman's student movement for the liberation of Britain and sympathized with her frustration at everyone's lack of interest. Were they really so naïve as to think the Dark Lord would be satisfied with only Britain?

“I have read them, Miss Tonks. Paint a rather poor picture of us, don't they?”

“It's ridiculous the lies this creature can spread about. I'm surprised he doesn't blame the German Minister and declare war!”

"We're lucky he did not," he said, stroking his beard. "Or perhaps unlucky. I fear what he will be capable of once his military is fully organized. The Germans are playing a dangerous game waiting for him to attack first. They assume their allies will come to their aid, but we thought that too, didn't we? And look what happened?"

Her expression was so clearly frustrated, but she couldn't say anything. What could she say that he didn't already know? Their silent tension was broken by the tinkling of a bell from the down stairs as someone entered and was followed by a quick "ello!"

"We're up here, Gilfred," Tonks called out. A handsome man in his mid-thirties came up the stairs, followed by a younger man with a severe countenance. The handsome man immediately greeted both, while his dour companion remained near the stairs, watching both the door and a window for signs of their companions or potential danger.

"Hello, Lovely and you too Tonks," he smiled, earning him an eye roll from his partner.

"Not now, Gil, I'm not in the mood."

"Well, that makes two of you. Johnny has been in an outright snit all morning. And considering how he normally is, it says something that I am able to even tell."

"Mein Name ist Johan, nicht Jonny, Sei Idiot!"

"See what I have to put up with?"

There was another ring of the bell, followed by a burly young man who looked as if he should be in school still and a raggedy looking woman, so dirty it was impossible to tell her age.

"Timmons and Fredric took another lap," the boy said, his English through his heavy Bulgarian accent. "Fredric thought he saw something."

"Are the pigeons after him again?" Johan asked nastily, falling into English now that his temper was in check.

"That's enough of that," Dumbledore chided. "How are you Viktor? Phoebe? I'm sorry to bring you out in this cold weather."

"It is a fine spring day in compared to my village," Viktor said. His home town was a quaint little settlement hidden between two alpine mountains, renown for the quality of its brooms and the abundance of bears.

"Speak fer yerself, sonny. I can't feel me toes," his companion huffed.

"Come and take some tea," Dumbledore offered. "It will occupy us while we wait for the others."

They all gathered around the table at the center of the room, except for Johan who remained stubbornly guarding the door, and poured themselves and each other tea. There was a pile of newspapers in several different languages at the table as well, and a few of them shifted through the stack, but most knew what they would say already.

The British paper went on a verbal rampage against Dumbledore's latest attacks on the peace of a recovering nation, going so far as to attack school children to invoke a response. Pictures of Hogwarts' quidditch stadium partially demolished and some of young Harry, dressed in his Quidditch robes and a layer of dirt from the explosion and then later ones of him, bruised and battered as he stood between his werewolf bodyguards, chatting easily.

The German papers had a counter rampage of their own, accusing the British of manipulating events that were of their own making and incompetence, and blaming it on Light wizards in order to finish off the last of the Dark Lord's opponents. They had pictures too, smuggled out of Britain over the years through hijacked newspapers and illegal missives. One was of Moody's before his incarceration standing proud in his Auror robes and another of his wanted poster, looking deranged after ten years of incarceration. There were a few of Harry as well, one from the year before after the attacks at Hogwarts and another of him talking to the Dark Lord outside of some Court building.

The French papers lamented the lack of intergovernmental cooperation, pointing out the war had been over for ten years and that it was a time for restoration not antagonism. So condescending in their righteousness.

The Spanish paper had only a brief blurb about the recent incidents in Britain on the third page, but for the most part were keeping their heads buried in the sand.

Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria were clueless, but who knew what they'd end up printing over the next couple of days? Likewise, the Eastern European countries were tentative about putting anything in their paper, afraid of contradicting or conflicting with their neighbors, and Italy was keeping with its stance that Britain belonged to the devil and shouldn't be spoken of let alone spoken to.

It seemed things were beginning to stir again, and Dumbledore wondered if that was bad or good. On one hand, this was likely the precursor to much more serious events. On the other hand, it might also mean Europe would quit twiddling their thumbs in regards to the Voldemort issue. War had its horrors and left its wounds, but this willful complacency had a rotting affect that was just as devastating.

"They're here," Johan said, and a moment later the bell rang. Timmons, fatter than was strictly fashionable for a middle-aged man, came up first, huffing and puffing.

"I tell you, why in Merlin's name did you drag me around the block again? I could have gone with the Gil and John."

"It's JOHAN! What is with you English wizards? Must everyone use your silly names?" the dour man grumbled, but was ignored.

"Sorry, but that cat really did look suspicious. Besides, you could use the exercise," said Fredric, an elderly gentleman with a neatly trimmed mustache and beard.

"Welcome, my friends," Dumbledore greeted. "Come have some tea. We have matters to discuss."

"You mean this 'assassination' rubbish?" Fredric said. "Nasty trick the Dark Lord pulled there. Has the Minister of Magic confronted you about it?"

"Yes, but only to reprimand how badly it was botched. I already informed him of what we intended to do. I needed his approval to bring Potter in Germany after all. This is the only country that wouldn't extradite him right back. Everyone else is still afraid of instigating war."

Tonks snorted.

"Yes, if you'd brought him to France, they would have invited the Dark Lord to tea before they sent both of them on their way."

Phoebe let out a snort of her own.

"Don't get all indignant Miss Rainbow. The aristocrats might control the paper, but you better believe the proletariat knows what's what. France got all them refugees to remind them of all the tricks You-Know-Who used to tear down the Ministry."

Dumbledore nodded.

"You're both right, my dears. The general public is suspicious and fearful of Voldemort and we shall find many allies amongst them. However unlike most of the wizarding world, France is still governed by an aristocracy and, however unofficially, they have come to see the Dark Lord as a king rather than a dictator. It will be difficult to convince them to help overthrow a government that most resembles their own. We must tread cautiously there."

"So what do we do now?" Timmons asked, "Quick failed miserably and we've compromised our people in Britain. The Dark Lord is probably laughing at us right now."

A despairing silence threatened to descend, but Dumbledore was quick to rally them again.

“Mansfield is already in Spain. I pulled him out as soon as Harry failed to show at the rendezvous point. He's the only one who can connect Quick with the others, so they'll be safe for now. It's imperative that we get the boy out of Britain though. I've left orders for our people to try again as soon as they are able.”

Viktor pulled out a paper from the pile, staring at the picture of the boy they were risking so much for and wondered why. This particular picture showed him talking to the Dark Lord, confidently, as if to friend or family member.

“He does not appear to need our assistance,” Viktor said, scowling with disapproval. “He is the Dark Lord's protege, a dark wizard by all accounts. What do you want from this little viper?”

Dumbledore smiled a bit.

“It is true, young Harry has fallen under the influence of Voldemort, but I think it is rather unfair of you to judge him a 'little viper' from across the sea. He's just a child. Without family to look after him he is vulnerable to manipulations from others, particularly for someone as skilled at manipulating as Voldemort.”

“But I have hope for him. His parents were very good people, I knew them well, and as he was sorted into Gryffindor I would say he is inclined to resist corruption where he sees it. It's a gamble, but even so that boy cannot remain in Britain. He's already being used shamelessly to gain national support for Voldemort and his cause. With a little freedom and a more rounded view of the situation, I hope Harry might have a change of heart and aid us of his own free will.”

“And if he doesn't?” Viktor persisted.

“Then at least he will be removed from a position where he can aid our enemy.”

The young Russian let the subject drop. The meeting moved on to other things; new political allies and hurdles in various countries, the current state of their spy network in Britain, the counter-intelligence they were running against Voldemort's spies and Sentinels, and suppositions on when it would all come to a head. There was a great deal to discuss, but their meeting was called to an abrupt end by Johan.

"Someone is coming."

Several of the group immediately went to the window, and sure enough there was an elderly woman on the wizarding side of the building. She was shabbily dressed, clearly too poor to be shopping the district, and yet she begged no money of those that passed her. It appeared she was meandering here and there at first, but it soon became apparent she was heading straight for them.

Dumbledore sighed, and nodded to the others.

"Take the muggle street exit. I will send you all coordinates for our new meeting place in a couple of days. Johan, Gilfred, would you both deal with our visitor? Nothing too violent, please. She may just be a reporter."

They all readily agreed with his plan, and went about doing as he said. While Dumbledore cleared all evidence, physical and magical, of their presence in the house, the rest left quickly through a different door than the one they had entered.

Johan and Gilfred stayed behind. They pulled from their pockets a black scarf and a tiny wizard's hat that grew to the appropriate size when they shook it. They used these to disguise themselves, the enchantment on the items distorting not only their appearance but their voices and magical signature as well.

"I'll leave the rest to you, gentleman," Dumbledore said, removing his hat and turning his robed inside out so that appeared as nothing more than a muggle trench coat, and strode out into the cold.

"I don't think they like me."

Harry chuckled.

"Actually, they do. They just don't like your brother."

"Oh."

For once, she didn't seem to know what to say. This wasn't the sort of situation they covered in etiquette lessons. Harry took pity on her.

"I'll talk to them later about lightening up. They're just a bit on edge with everything that's happened. They're really quite laid back once you get to know them."

Hermione didn't look convinced. In fact, she looked a bit nervous. She had respect and curiosity when it came to werewolves, and had always wished to see and learn about them. However, when she had thought about how she would go about doing that, it was usually from a safe distance or with some sort of barrier between them. Harry's almost reckless disregard for the harm they could do, however unintentional, was a bit worrisome.

They finished their breakfast in silence, despite everything Hermione wanted to say and the only opportunity for privacy they'd had since Monday. When they were done, the werewolves appeared out of nowhere and escorted them to their first class. It was History of Magic and as Toure was out and the werewolves remained outside, the rest of the students in the class quickly huddled in close to Harry.

"Bloody hell, are those guys really werewolves?" Finnegan asked, obviously the question everyone was most interested in. Harry's reply was matter-of-fact, hoping to keep the sensationalization down to a minimum.

"Yes. The dark one is Blackbone and the other is Slivermoon. They're protecting me until Moody is caught... at least I think that's how long they're staying."

It didn't work. Everyone was amazed to have the truth confirmed. A few were actually angry.

"What were they thinking? Sticking werewolves in a school? That's fucking retarded," a rather belligerent Ravenclaw boy snarled.

"What if they bite someone? I mean, have you seen them? They barely look human."

"I'm going to write to my father about this. There's no way let-"

Harry slammed his hands down on his desk, and stood abruptly.

"How can you all be such stupid bloody cowards?!" he snarled, shocking everyone into silence. "They're not animals, they're people. People I trust to protect me and you and this school. And since I'm the only one out of any of you who have actually spoken with them, eaten with them, fucking lived with them, I think you can all shut up and keep your ignorant load of tripe to yourselves. Good god, you're the future of this country?"

Harry was not a violent person. He wasn't really a very intimidating person either. There were a few instances where he was known to get snippish or grouchy, but no one had ever seen him direct his temper at the world in general. So whether everyone was suitably chastised or just stunned wasn't entirely clear.

Regardless, before anyone could even think to say or do anything in response to his outburst, Professor Toure walked in and ordered everyone to their seats. Hermione herself was glad she was sitting already, or she might have keeled over. Even in her vaguely dazed state, it didn't take long for her to notice several whispers drifting through the class, as their professor began to lecture. Harry remained stubbornly focused on what Toure was saying, but Hermione found her attention drifting to the gossip floating about.

"What's got Potter so defensive? Does he actually like werewolves? How weird is that?"

"He said he lived with them, how does that work? No one is allowed to live with werewolves unless they are one already."

"Do you think he really knows them? That's bloody awesome!"

"The Dark Lord works with the werewolves a lot, maybe he introduced Potter?"

"I bet we don't know who his parents are because they're werewolves. Why else would he care?"

"I wonder if Potter got lycanthrosis and is covering it up?"

And so it went through the entire class, until at last Toure dismissed them. Harry was up and stalking through the door, leaving Hermione rushing to catch up. By the time she spotted him again in the hall, Sirius was leaning over him, talking quietly. After a moment, Harry replied loud enough that the werewolf and everyone else in the hall could hear.

"Let them make up stories until they're blue in the face. I don't care. I'm not ashamed of you."

It sparked a flash of guilt in Hermione. She might not have been as vocal about her misgivings on Harry's relationship with his godfathers, but she had been guilty of the same prejudice. Her friend had perfect faith in these men, did she have the right to question it? He deserved her support more than anything. So, stiffening her back, setting her shoulders, and swallowing her anxiety, she marched right up to the nearest werewolf, who happened to be Remus.

She was glad it was him, for he was definitely the less intimidating of the two. He tended to guard the back rather than lead upfront, and from this she gathered that he was the submissive of the pair. Nevertheless, he was very strong in appearance with muscular arms and a bit hairier than most of the wizards she had met, emitting an animal-like vibe whenever he moved..

"Ah, excuse me, Sir."

He looked at her blankly for a moment, then around him as if suspecting a trap, then back to her again with a little trepidation.

“Yes?”

She tried to remain calm and keep herself from fidgeting or stuttering, and it took all of her Malfoy decorum to keep herself under control.

“I... Well, Harry is my best friend, so I thought it would be appropriate to introduce myself to you. I'm Hermione Granger of Malfoy. Pleased to meet you.”

She held out her hand. He stared at it curiously, then moved his gaze to study her face. He smiled, without a trace of the usual aggression, and took her hand. She noted that he wore gloves, just like his companion, despite the warmth of the castle and wondered if it wasn't a precaution to prevent accidental scratches with their claw-like finger nails. Rather than shake like she thought he would, he actually kissed her hand, sending a bolt of anxiety through her at having her bare skin so close to his teeth. She ruthlessly crushed the irrational fear.

“Charmed. I am Remus Slivermoon of the Goddess Clan.”

Now she was stuck. She hadn't thought about what to do after introducing herself.

“... We should probably catch up with Harry,” she said, and hurried along, followed closely by a very amused Remus. They caught up at the DA&D classroom, but before she could introduce herself to Sirius, the man had disappeared. When she turned to ask Remus where he had gone, she found him missing as well. Perplexed and vaguely relieved, she entered the classroom.

Harry wasn't in his usual seat near the front of the class, but the one closest to the door.

“What's up, Harry? I hope you're not trying to pass notes to your bodyguards during class,” she teased.

“Don't worry about it,” he said, making an effort not to be snippish towards her. He had seen her talking with Remus, and was touched that despite her nervousness she was making an effort to get to know them. “I just... don't feel like sitting up front today. You can if you want to. I'm not going to be good company for a while.”

She wasn't sure what to make of this latest bit of weirdness, but decided she'd have to wait until after classes to get any answers and not to push until then. Professor Larousse also seemed a bit disturbed by Harry's movement, but he was pointedly not looking in her direction.

Her friend's reclusive behavior lasted through the entire class. Normally eager to volunteer for demonstrations or to answer and ask questions, he remained strangely reserved, not looking up from his notes or his text books even when his name was called. It could have been the whispers from the last class following him to his next that left him so guarded, but that didn't seem quite right either.

When class was over, her chance to speak with him was denied by the professor, who told him to stay after class for a moment. In the hall, both Sirius and Remus had reappeared, disturbing the flow of the students who took great pains to avoid coming in contact with the savage looking men. The werewolves ignored them, however, in favor watching the door, perhaps even listening in the conversation occurring within. It was not a good time to introduce herself to Sirius, she decided.

Something clearly had him agitated.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“What is the matter, Harry? You've been acting strange all class period,” Larousse began, once the rest of her students had left the class. Harry stood, looking ready and even eager to leave, and still refusing to look at her.

“Professor...”

There was a moment's hesitation, in which his expression darkened considerably.

"Do you want to kill my godfathers?"

She was stunned. His question came out of nowhere. Why would he think that? Even if it was true, why would he... Oh, no. He had been speaking with the mongrels. With them so close by they must have found the opportunity to spread tales of her exploits, biased and maligned to make her appear some sort of monster. She would have to undo the damage somehow.

"I only want to protect you."

"And would you think killing my godfathers would do that?" he persisted.

Smart boy.

"... You are too careless with each other. Too rough. I doubt they wish to harm you, but it would only take one scratch, one nip, one accidentally shared cup of tea and you would be undone. Everything you are and could be destroyed by your trust in them."

Harry still wasn't looking at her, and his expression had not softened at all. If anything it had grown more resolved. His eyes suddenly met hers, such brilliant color she would have thought him a werewolf right off the bat, if she hadn't known they had always been like that.

"They are my family. They are protecting me, putting their lives on the line to do so. I will not hesitate to do the same for them, regardless of who their enemies might be."

She could only stand there, stunned by his threat and by the resolve he had shown in making it, as he stalked out of the classroom.

Now what?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Horace McGunny, school newspaper editor, Ravenclaw, and all around hard-ass was giddy. Giddy. He hadn't felt this pleasantly excited over anything since he'd first received his invitation to Hogwarts. He had received a Court Owl at breakfast, and with it was an invitation to interview one Harold James Potter. He had forced himself to confirm this with Professor Toure before he let himself get carried away with what might be a Weasley prank. But no, it was authentic and scheduled for Friday, a mere two days away.

He called an emergency staff meeting.

The rooms they used to organize the paper was a strange mixture of business office meets factory meets medieval castle meets study hall. Their printing press, a very old but fine machine capable of printing three hundred pages of magically enhanced print and pictures an hour, looked more like a giant factory loom that spanned the entire thirty feet of the back wall. For safety reasons, they put up a cast iron gate, specially warded so that only Professor Toure or McGunny could unlock it. On the other side of the gate were several cubicles, and in each cubicle was a small wooden table with a type writer. Every member of the newspaper go their own cubicle, regardless of their job, and what they did there was represented by the state of their assigned space.

Colin Creevy's cubicle was lined with photographs, mostly his own, but a few he had collected from elsewhere. Hermione Granger's cubicle was a perfectly tidy little space, with appointment calendars, academic schedules, files for articles she had completed and ones she was working on, and various other knickknacks. Ron Weasley's work station existed only in myth, hidden in the realms of absolute chaos beneath his piles of notes, interviews, old papers, paper planes, photos, and probably homework that was months overdue.

For the meeting, McGunny decided to keep it brief, and so let everyone stand in their cubicles, while he stood in the hall where everyone could see him.

“Alright, everyone I've got an announcement,” he said, keeping his expression serious, when all he felt like doing was giggling. He held up his letter. “We received an invitation this morning to attend a small press conference Friday evening in London with five of the leading newspapers in Britain.”

Everyone looked surprised except for Granger, but that was hardly unexpected, and then the questions started.

“What's the conference about? Who's going to go?” Weasley shouted out first, above everyone else's confused murmuring.

“Harry Potter has finally agreed to an interview.”

There was a stunned silence, followed by a hoot of joy from Parker.

“Finally!”

“We have to go all the way to London for that? What the fuck?”

“Watch your mouth, Weasley,” McGunny snapped. “It's for security reasons. They won't allow the press into Hogwarts after what happened with Quick, so they're holding it in the Iron House. This is big news, after all. All of Britain wants to know about these attacks, and this isn't the first time Potter's name has ended up in the paper. This will be the first time he's answered questions directly. Considering how many things have gone unanswered since he's gotten here, I think we need to exploit this opportunity for everything we can. I want a special edition out by Sunday.”

There were numerous protests.

“That's a week ahead of schedule! I don't have my articles ready!”

“I can't proofread an entire edition in four days! I only have half a paper's worth to begin with!”

“It's a Hogsmeade weekend! I've got Christmas shopping to do!”

“Why don't we just drag Potter in here and get the interview now?”

“But what about my interviews?”

“How come-”

“That isn't-”

“No way-”

“SHUT UP!”

Everyone immediately silenced under McGunny's harsh command. He glared at all of them, disgusted.

“What is wrong with you all? This isn't a crisis! The best in the business are going to handle this thing, and we've just been handed the opportunity to count ourselves among them. You should be proud. You should be excited. This is the real thing! We've got a classmate in this school making history as we speak and we don't know a damn thing about him. Our school has been attacked by an escaped convict and foreign terrorist group, and we don't know why. Every student in Hogwarts deserves to know what is going on, and it is our responsibility to inform them. So I don't want to hear anymore whining about how inconvenient it is or how hard. Let's pull together like the professionals I know you can be and get this thing done. What do you say?”

A resounding cheer, and this time even Granger and Weasley seemed enthused. Satisfied that he had rallied his troops, McGunny moved on to more practical matters.

“Good. I want all of you to write a list of questions you would like to ask Potter and submit them on my desk. I'll sort through the ones I think relevant, and bring them to the interview. Creevey, you'll be going with me as the photographer, but go easy on the flash, will you?”

“Wait a minute!” Parker interrupted, “What about me? Potter is mine!”

There was a scattering of giggles, and she turned a bit pink.

"That's not what I meant and you guys know it. The Potter articles are mine."

"You said they were mine now," Greystoke pointed out, crossing his arms and glaring at her.

McGunny shook his head.

"The gossip column belongs to you both, but this isn't going to the gossip column. This is front page material. It's also a risk. I'll be traveling with Potter to London, and the possibility of another attack is high, so I'd rather go myself than risk one of you. Creevey's already proven himself willing to come under fire, which is the only reason I'm bringing him."

He made a good point, and since the only person there brave (or just plain rude) enough to contradict him publicly was Weasley and he didn't want to go, no one argued. The truth was less selfless. He wanted to go. He wanted to sit down and talk to Potter one on one, and learn for himself what made him so special. Why had the Dark Lord picked him? What, exactly, had he picked him for?

There was an aura of purpose that surrounded Potter, as if his existence held a destiny beyond that of normal people. McGunny had heard of such people before, but the closest he had ever come to seeing one himself were brief glimpses of Britain's dictator. He had never thought he would meet for himself such a person before their significance became known to the rest of the world.

So now was his opportunity. If he was very careful, perhaps he could gain some trust from Potter. When he graduated from Hogwarts at the end of the year and took up journalism in university, he might just be able to continue a repertoire with the Gryffindor. People like Parker and Greystoke were too hungry, too aggressive in their pursuit and it didn't surprise McGunny a bit that they hadn't gotten anywhere with the boy. Yet, Granger was a trusted confidante, despite her position in the paper, and guarded his secrets savagely.

He wanted something in between. He was not expecting Potter's darkest secrets, but he wanted to be trusted with his truths. Trusted not to distort what ever Harry said into something sensational for the sake public appeal, and in turn told openly and honestly what could be said.

He wanted to write history as it happened.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Natalie had hoped to find Harry alone, but with his two new pets following him about, that was impossible. So after dinner, she waited for him by the stairs, and when he finally arrived she pulled him aside in full view of the werewolves and put up a silencing spell so they couldn't hear.

"You've been avoiding me," she said right off the bat, and Harry looked momentarily embarrassed before shaking his head.

"No, I've just been busy and I've had a lot on my mind."

From over Harry's shoulder, she could see both of his guards watching intently and gave them a rather nasty look. The lighter one had the decency to look elsewhere, but the darker just grinned at her toothily.

"I don't suppose I was one of those things on your mind?" she said, smirking a bit. She stopped when he didn't say anything. He wasn't looking at her anymore. That was definitely not a good sign.

"Harry?"

"Natalie... you know I like you, right?"

"Sometimes I wonder."

"Don't. I do like you. I like you a lot, but... I can't... I can't be with you right now. Too much is happening and we're both so young, and I don't-"

The slap cut him off effectively. Which was good, because she couldn't stand to listen to him awkwardly rambling on about how he loved her and couldn't be with her. She didn't want excuses. She left him standing stunned, and stalked past two equally stunned men as she made her way to the dungeons. Her eyes were burning and her teeth were clenched, but she would hold back her tears until she safely out of view of everyone.

She'd be damned if she started acting like Ginny.

Book III:

Chapter 12: The Prince and the Scribes

Friday afternoon, Harry left for London. Hermione had dressed him semi-formal in an outfit he hadn't seen since his stay at the Dark Lord's lodge, and wrapped in his Baluvian cloak for his journey to Hogsmeade. The journey was something of a parade, with Horace McGunny, Colin Creevey, Professor Snape, and himself placed into a carriage and surrounded by a large contingent of Sentinels on the ground and on horse back guarding them. Even more Sentinels wandered the streets of Hogsmeade, while curious onlookers peered out their windows at the person responsible for so much security.

It was all eerily quiet to Harry, peering out over the snow covered country side and village with only the sound of the carriage wheels and horses to break the silence. McGunny, a formidable boy in Harry's estimation, had said nothing more than a few polite greetings, and Harry wasn't sure if it was his own sense of professional courtesy or Snape's presence that stayed his questions. Creevey, normally a flash happy fool, seemed to be waiting for McGunny's permission to do anything and Harry was glad for it. He didn't think he could stand his picture being taken just yet.

He needed the time to think. Snape knew what he would be allowed to talk about, and they had practiced signals to help them communicate what to do if the questions were to be avoided, ignored, lied in response to, or told plainly. That still left the things Harry didn't want to talk about, and wasn't obligated to indulge. He resolved not to discuss his friends. He didn't want attention drawn to them with potential assassins wandering about. He also couldn't discuss the basilisk debacle even if he wanted to. That left a lot of other things he wasn't sure he wanted known or not.

How much was he willing to talk about the Dark Lord? About his parent's death? His relationship with his godparents? His relatives? Who knew what everyone would start asking?

It all came down to what he was willing to let complete strangers and acquaintances know about him. Strangers and acquaintances who could be potential friends or enemies. It all made him hyper aware of his vulnerabilities.

They stopped the carriage at Madam Pudifoot's and from there took her floo to a security check point in the Iron House. Sneezing out floo powder and soot, Harry stumbled into a lobby of some sort, with high vaulted ceilings and columns engraved with iron gargoyles staring down at them accusingly.

"Step this way Mr. Potter," ordered a Sentinel, looking as intimidating as the gargoyles that surrounded them. She handed him some water to drink, while she ran her wand over him to check for unauthorized paraphernalia. The only questionable items she found were his watch and cloak, which she let him keep.

As they were being checked over, several other people arrived. Harry assumed they were the other reporters and photographers. This was confirmed when one of the wizards who just entered immediately tried to take a picture and was tackled to the ground by several Sentinels.

"Andy, you have to wait for security to clear you first!" the woman who preceded him admonished. She would have been quite pretty if her dress and make-up weren't so gaudy, and she didn't try to turn her every gesture and expression into some sort of sexual tease. At first, she looked totally ridiculous to Harry, but when she turned her attention to him he found himself terrified. He was very glad there were several Sentinels and a Snape between them.

"That would be Rita Skeeter," Snape informed him. "A remarkable specimen of newspaper media. Her natural habitat ranges from political scandals to the sexual misconduct of pop idols, where she grazes on the babble of men unprepared for her vulgar innuendo, only to regurgitate misquotations and fragmented statements later for the rest of her pack back at the Wizarding Weekly. She is the finest of her species."

Harry was not comforted. Snape smirked.

“Just pay attention to what she is saying, not how she says it. And if she leans forward, for Merlin's sake, don't look down.”

What did he mean by... oh. Oh. Eww.

“Potter,” McGunny greeted, “Mind if we get a picture?” He gestured towards Colin waiting anxiously behind him.

Harry's first instinct was to say no, but then remember this was what he had agreed to and nodded. He didn't smile though. In wizarding pictures, you could always tell when an emotion was fake, because after a while the people would fidget in the image and give themselves away. So he stood still and serious, and hoped he would look less nervous than fake smiling would reveal.

Colin barely got a shot off, before another reporter shoved him rudely aside to get one of his own. Harry's wand immediately snapped up, muttering a hex. The camera was encased in a sphere of darkness. The photographer panicked, and dropped it. There was a very tense silence.

“I didn't give you permission,” Harry said stiffly, though in truth he was most irritated by the man's callous act towards his classmate. He might not have liked Colin, but he hated adults bullying children. He helped the younger Gryffindor to his feet, and checked to make sure both boy and camera were unharmed. The photographer, a burly young man, was flustered.

“Er... s-sorry... didn't mean to...”

“You took too many liberties. Now you know better. Now you all know better,” Snape growled at the room.

Harry had expected to be scolded by his professor, but the man seemed to approve. He would have to ask him about that later. The Sentinels went back to checking the people and their equipment, and the reporters just watched young Harry, re-evaluating their approach. They weren't used to dealing with children, but had assumed automatically that he would be easily intimidated. That clearly wasn't the case. It also didn't escape their notice that Harry and Snape had both been allowed to keep their wands while the rest of them had not.

Everyone remembered to ask before taking his picture after that.

A woman, not a Sentinel though, appeared from a side door to escort them to a drawing room. The room itself reminded Harry of a cheap knock off Malfoy's drawing room with a large fire place, dark furniture, and a wet bar set just so. Harry was instructed to sit in the Master chair, a wing-backed monstrosity positioned dramatically by the fire, while the reporters took up the surrounding sofa's and love seats. A few Sentinels guarded the doors and directly behind the reporters, while Snape set himself directly across from Harry in a slightly smaller replica of his own chair. From his position, Harry could see all of Snape's little gestures and expressions that would guide him through the interview, while to everyone else he was completely hidden.

The hostess-like woman set out some tea and snacks, bid them all to keep their questions 'civilized', and left. There was a very tense silence. Harry looked around at their anxious, eager faces and wondered why no one had started. He paused at McGunny, who looked vaguely amused at the other reporters.

"May I ask you some questions, Mr. Potter?"

Harry smiled a bit. It seemed that of all the reporters there, the only one who knew how to start was the only one who knew how to be polite.

"Of course."

"Your name has appeared during several events of public interest, yet this is the first time you have agreed to a formal interview. Can you tell us why?"

There was a pause as Harry thought of his reply, then "I'm a private person. I don't like being gossiped about, but lately that's been impossible to avoid with all the time I've spent with Lord Voldemort-" there were a few little gasps "- and with people trying to kill me.

There's a lot of ridiculous ideas floating around, and I thought it was time to set things right. I still don't like being gossiped about, but the truth is better than a fantasy. At least, I think so."

Another reporter spoke up.

"Ah, Mr. Potter, if I may," he asked, and continued when he received a nod, "There's been a great deal of speculation about your origins. We know you were picked up by WYRA just shortly before you came to Hogwarts, but can you recall anything about your parentage?"

Harry took a deep breath, looked to Snape for reassurance, and nodded.

"Yes, I-" he swallowed thickly, "I was born in England. My father was James Potter and my mother is Lily Evans. Both attended Hogwarts where I go to school now, and married after they graduated. I was born a few years later, but we fled to Germany before I turned one. We lived as muggles for all the time they raised me. I didn't even know wizards existed until..."

He had to pause, and poured himself some tea. No one dared rush him, though he could read a savage hunger for his every word. Only McGunny remained respectfully reserved, encouraging him to continue with the most minute of gestures.

"Until they died when I was eight. They were killed by a burglar while I was at school. I was sent to live with my mom's muggle sister and her family in Surrey, still thinking I was just..."

He almost shrugged, but caught himself.

"... unmagical. I didn't perform any magic until I was ten, and then WYRA came and got me. Actually, it was Pro-"

Snape made a gesture for him to stop his line of explanation, looking rather alarmed.

"...probably the best thing that ever happened to me," he finished.

“Are you telling us both your parents were British-born wizards?” a bespectled man asked.

“Yes. My father was a pureblood and my mother was a muggleborn. And you didn't ask permission first. If you do that again, I'll ignore your question.”

Rita Skeeter, finally took her opportunity to attack.

“Harry, if I may call you Harry?”

He didn't even look at her to see if she was leaning forward. “No, you may not.”

“Oh... might I ask what your relation to the Dark Lord might be? Familial perhaps?”

“No, we aren't related. At least not closely... I don't think. I suppose we both come from Salazar Slytherin descendants, because of the parseltongue and all. My great grandfather was a parselmouth, but I don't think my dad was. Probably skipped generations in the Potter line. You all knew I was a parselmouth, right?”

Everyone nodded.

“So, no we're not related. We just... do stuff together. I'm not sure how it got started really.”

“How did you two first meet?” she continued.

That was one of those questions Snape had told him to avoid explaining and Harry was more than happy to. So he ignored her and turned to one of the reporters who hadn't spoken.

“Do you have a question?”

She seemed surprised, and struggled for a moment before spitting out, “What are your thoughts on foreign wizards attempting to kill you? How do you feel about it?”

He smiled at her. "Probably the same way I'd feel if British wizards were attempting to kill me. I really wish they wouldn't. It's hard to have fun from a hospital bed and I'm way behind on my schoolwork."

There were a few chuckles, and even Snape managed to smirk.

The next couple of questions were about the last three assassination attempts, which Harry could answer honestly and openly enough. Yes, he helped rescue teachers from the collapsing stands. No, he didn't rescue Malfoy, the Dark Lord, or help keep the stands aloft. Yes, it made him very angry that so many innocent people could have been hurt. No, he wouldn't be playing Quidditch that year. The poisoning was very unpleasant, but he was very happy to have a potion's master on hand who recognized and remedied the problem. It was in his pumpkin juice. No, he doubted a classmate did it. Yes, it tasted awful. Yes, werewolves rescued him from the third attempt...(and after a dirty look from Snape)... but his professors would have done so if they weren't there. Their names were Sirius Blackbone and Remus Slivermoon. No, he wasn't afraid of them. Yes, he trusted them (despite the dirty look Snape gave him).

"They're my godfathers," Harry volunteered. The only information he'd volunteered. "My father named Sirius as my godfather when I was born. I would be living with him right now except for the whole werewolf thing."

"How did they become werewolves?" McGunny asked, and despite not waiting his turn, Harry answered anyway.

"Remus was a werewolf since he was a little kid. My dad was a good friend when they went to Hogwarts together, even after he found out. Sirius was my dad's best mate, and they were aurors together during the war. After he got captured, Remus vouched for him and Greyback turned him into a werewolf."

"Your father actively fought against the Dark Lord?"

"Yeah... I mean, yes. Yes, both my parents did."

Skeeter raised her hand, and reluctantly Harry acknowledged her.

“How do you think your parents would feel about your relationship with the Dark Lord, especially after losing the war to him?”

Harry tensed. He did not like that question, having wondered himself many times over the year. Would they be proud? Horrified? Sad? He looked to Snape, but he merely lifted a brow. Well?

“... I don't know. I loved my parents very much, and I'll always respect that they fought for what they believed in, regardless of whether they turned out to be right or not, but I never knew them as well as I thought I did. I only knew them as my muggle parents, not the wizard and witch and warriors that they were. I can't say if they'd be happy or angry about the decisions I've made. They couldn't be here to help me make them, so I have to accept that I'll never know. All I can do is make decisions I can live with and be proud of, and hope they'll understand, where ever they are.”

The reporters scurried to write down what he said (quik-quotes quills had been banned from the interview), except for McGunny who looked at Harry and gestured towards Colin waiting anxiously behind him. He nodded and Colin grabbed a quick picture of him, still caught up in the melancholy of his thoughts. It startled everyone else, a few even snapped their quills. The other photographers scrambled to get the same shot, but Harry was already distracted with fixing the damaged quills and the shot was lost.

“Do you have any plans after graduating?” McGunny asked.

“Nothing concrete. I have a lot of things I'd like to try, but they're not really plans. I'd like to travel some. Explore the Britain beyond Hogsmeade. Take art lessons. College, though I don't know what I'd study. I've got time to figure it out though.”

“Do you think you'll go into politics or a Court related job?” someone else asked.

“I hope not. That all sounds really boring.”

That earned him a few chuckles. From there, the topics were much lighter. How did he like school? What was his favorite subject? What activities did he participate in? What about his summers? What did he like best about the wizarding world? Simple and menial, there were very few questions he had to avoid (Where do you stay for the summer? Who is your best friend? Do you have a girlfriend?) and at long last an invisible clock chimed the end of the hour and the end of their questions.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape managed to make it to his rooms a quarter to nine and was considering turning in early for the night, when the appearance of Larousse threw his plans to the wind. He suppose he should have expected her, but honestly he had been too relieved his responsibility for the night was over to think of other obligations. Harry had done far better than he had thought he would, and his early establishment of magical dominance was pleasantly unexpected and insured control over the reporters.

“How did it go?” she asked, as he drew near.

“It went well. The Dark Lord will be pleased, so long as Wizard Weekly remembers their place. I don't trust that Skeeter woman not to twist everything into something insipid and melodramatic. How was your evening?”

“... I've lost the werewolves.”

He stiffened.

“I was keeping track of them until I had to supervise Sr. Dueling Club, and then they just disappeared. I keep getting this feeling that they've been stalking me though.”

She did not seem overly concerned, and he thought her rather careless for that. The werewolves were not as logical or as afraid of the Dark Lord's wrath as a typical wizard, but relied heavily on their instinct.

And their instinct was to kill her, the wild cat to their wolf, their natural enemy.

The only thing staying their hand was probably Harry. If they learned of her intention to adopt him, then all bets were off. He would have to remind her.

"Do you wish to come in?"

"That wouldn't be appropriate," she said, although she looked tempted.

"We are well beyond the age where chaperone's are necessary, madam. We will behave ourselves, and there is no one here to imply otherwise."

He stepped into his private rooms and she followed. She had only been there once before, when Harry was injured under Infelix misera, and took a moment to gage her surroundings more closely while her host set about making them tea. There was a sitting room connected to a kitchenette and hallway that must have led to his bedroom, bathroom, and study. Everything was masculine and a bit messy. The walls were lined with shelves, crammed with tomes and scrolls and even then a few stray items had to be stacked on top or piled beside or between the shelves, and a display case of silver and glass and more protections spells and wards than a Gringrotts' vault stood nearby. There was a large fire place, always lit even in summer to fight the dungeon's constant drafts, and above it a collection of swords she knew him to be proficient in. There was a sitting chair for reading and a couch for napping most likely, comfortably ragged and probably having seen very little company.

"Does it meet with my lady's approval?" he asked from the kitchenette.

"It's a bit gloomy without windows, but it suits you."

"I strike you as gloomy?"

"Of course not. You're much too aggressive a personality for that. It suits you despite being gloomy. Can you tell if the mongrels followed me down here?"

"Can't you?"

"I thought they might have, but the dungeons at night make me paranoid."

He was smirking as he brought over the tea, setting it on a small end table.

"They did not follow. They could not follow. I have the entire floor warded against them. You and your confidences are safe here, but I will escort you back to your rooms when we're done."

"That's very chivalrous of you, but I-"

"It's is the duty of a husband to look after his wife's well being. I may as well practice it now."

She smiled, and he felt strangely pleased with himself. Damn tea.

"Is there anything in particular you wished to discuss? Aside from Potter's romp down memory lane?"

"Yes. I think I figured out why you should adopt Harry."

"Oh? Does it involve free manual labor?"

"Severus, really. This is much better. I feel like a fool for not thinking of it sooner."

"Well, you managed it in the nick of time. You had less than three hours before you had to abandon this enterprise altogether. So what did you find?"

"The Potter Vault."

Snape stared at her for a moment, a bit surprised, then sighed.

"As much fun as it would be playing pirate with my old nemesis' wealth, I don't think the Dark Lord would approve of the misappropriation of young Potter's inheritance."

"Of course not, and I don't think you'd be dishonorable enough to do such a thing. I'm not talking about galleons and gemstones, I'm talking about knowledge."

"Knowledge?"

"Books, Severus. The Potters are a very, very old family. Their wealth is accumulated, not in money, but in books and scrolls and magical artifacts. I did some research, as much as I could on such short notice, and did you know they have the eighth largest collection of Book of Shadows in Britain? That's a lot of never before duplicated spells, Severus. Spells that haven't been seen in centuries. And best of all, you don't need to steal them. Only borrow them long enough to make copies. When Harry is legally an adult, he'll keep the originals and you'll keep the new ones."

Snape's interest was definitely peaked. He could easily confess to being an all out bibliophile, and a great deal of his wealth had gone towards the accumulation of rare and valuable books. He had kept all of his college text books, written three of his own, collected over two hundred in different languages while traveling abroad, and raided more antique stores and auctions than he could remember, but what he did not have were Book of Shadows. The Prince family books had been sold in his youth to pay for his education, and such books were near impossible to pry from their rightful owners. Most preferred them burned rather than have them passed to someone outside the family.

"And then, of course, there is the dowry."

"Dowry?"

"It should be quite substantial for Harry. You're entitled to a percentage as the head of the family, you know? And of course, there are those who will pay handsomely just be given permissions to try and court Harry when he comes of age."

"It would be the Dark Lord's-"

"He trusts your judgment. He'll let you manage the matter just as he let you manage Harry's press conference and formal outings. Just think of it this way Severus. You would have all the same responsibilities that you have now, only you'd receive much greater compensation."

Snape let out a rude snort.

"That isn't true and you know it. The title of 'Father' entails a whole world of new responsibilities that 'guardian' does not. For every failure, misdeed, embarrassment, and lapse in judgment Potter commits, I will be judged in turn."

"And every success, accomplishment, and honor will bring glory to you. You will finally be acknowledged as you deserved, but never were because of your father. You will be the head of a family of purebloods, as strong and influential as Lestrangle or Broadwick or Prince. You will be the pater primo of the Snapes, the next great family of Purebloods."

"By following Potter?" he asked, bitterly.

"Or by leading him. It's up to you."

Snape remained quiet for a long time, mulling over everything she had said. Some of it sounded over idealistic, but workable. It all appealed to him on some level. It was true that no Pureblood could turn him away without turning away Potter as well, and that would be a slap in the face of the Dark Lord. Unforgivable. Life threatening. Infinitely satisfying to Snape.

Plus it would piss off Black and Lestrangle something fierce.

He sighed.

"Very well. You've convinced me."

And she kissed him. She caught him by surprise, but... it was a pleasant sort of surprise. She was very soft and warm, and tasted of the tea they had been drinking. Her breasts pressed against his chest, and he could feel them rise and fall with her quickening breath, and he was sorely tempted to stand and seize her and...

He pulled back, flush and flustered.

"Per..perhaps you needed that chaperon, after all," he managed.

She looked utterly unrepentant.

"Thank you, Severus. You've made me so happy."

"Don't thank me just yet. I said you convinced me. Now you have to convince the Dark Lord."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Natalie walked into Tuesday dueling practices hoping to see Harry, but he was as elusive that day as he had been since Friday. Aside from a few glimpses during classes and in the halls, she hadn't seen him hardly at all, but then no one else had either. He was feeling extraordinarily shy since the interviews, and the unusually high influx of newspapers hadn't helped matters. Every where she went there were students and teachers reading or talking about him, and she would be quite annoyed if she weren't just as bad.

She had read the articles. At least a dozen of them anyway. Aside from the Hogwart's Herald, the only paper most anyone read was the Wizard Weekly, but alternative newspapers such as Newts & News, Pellington's Inquisition, and the Third Eye Tribune had been smuggled in with the morning mail, as well. Much of what was said was contradictory to the other papers.

Some portrayed Harry as a young tyrant, casting spells this way and that for the most minor of offenses, while others described him as mild-mannered and chivalrous, fixing broken cameras and helping some one up when they tripped. Still others suggested he was uncertain of himself and snippish, others that he was unusually self assured and humorous. She didn't really care about any of the paper's opinion's regarding his personality, as she knew him better than any of them could ever boast.

What she did care about was that his parents were really wizards, his body guards were really his godfathers, he didn't want to work for the Court, and that she hadn't known any of that before. Oh, she had suspected his past was traumatic, that he held secrets, and liked his privacy, but she felt she should have been privy to at least some of it. Hermione must have known. She probably knew all of it.

God, she hated that girl.

Since she was already there, Natalie decided to work off some of her frustration in a duel. She wasn't the best duelist in the club, but she did well enough that at least the girls were afraid of her. There was one other person in the supply closet changing into their combat robes, and she couldn't help but smirk a little when she saw who it was.

"Hello, Ginerva."

The younger girl spun around, startled, and her alarm didn't waver when she recognized her company.

"It's been a while. I was beginning to think you were avoiding me," Natalie teased, step towards her and then past her to where her uniform was hanging. Ginny stiffened, but didn't reply, instead securing her leather armor. "I hope there aren't any hard feelings."

Ginny glanced at her, then back towards the exit, but didn't speed up her pace. Gryffindor pride cracked, but not broken. Natalie's smirked widened.

"We shouldn't let something as silly as a boy come between years of... history. We girls have to stick together, after all."

The younger girl finished strapping on the last of her armor, and walked out. Natalie knew it was petty and futile and stupid considering Harry had only been hers for the briefest of moments. At least he had been hers, and if it meant reminding one silly little girl she'd had even less in order for her to be content with that, then it was all fine and dandy.

One day Harry would be ready, and she would be there to snatch him up before anyone else. Or perhaps he would come to her.

He was unpredictable like that.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Book of Shadows- a handwritten book of spells collected and sometimes created by an individual or family/coven.

Literally, it's Latin for 'first father', and I use it as a term indicating the first of a genetic line. Like Salazar Slytherin would be a pater primo because no one knows anything (we assume) about the Slytherin line before him.

Book III:

Chapter 13: The Prince and his Honor

When the first article hit the breakfast tables on Saturday, Harry thought he would never be able to look anyone in the eye again. The interview had gone well. Snape would have mocked or scolded him otherwise, but afterwards everything was left to the discretion of the reporters.

They had none.

There was no consistency in what each article had written. Some pieces were ridiculously over dramatic while others printed bare facts that somehow misled even more thoroughly than the former. Only McGunny's article held anything resembling accuracy, but that may have been because the school would have known he was full of crap if he started rambling about Harry being a miniature Voldemort or some frightened little orphan.

That might have been giving the student body too much credit, because by Tuesday his embarrassment had dissipated into full blown irritation with all of them. After two and half years he thought everyone was pretty clear about who and what Harry was. Yet everyone was treating him like a stranger. Not necessarily rude (except for the Slytherins who all seemed to have gotten their nickers in a twist) but a nervous uncertainty, as if they did know if he was going to wave hello or cast Cruciatus on them. Some people had developed an annoying habit of adding 'mister' or 'sir' in their greetings, reminding him inexplicably of house elves.

"Sorry, Mr. Potter, I didn't see you there."

"Do you think they'll have the pitch fixed by New Year's, Mr. Potter sir?"

"Sir, you can borrow my notes."

Very aggravating, but snapping at them would only have made it worse. When he asked Hermione how long she thought it would last, she had only given him a stricken look. He didn't find it at all reassuring.

To make matters worse, his stress was affecting Sirius and Remus. They were all very careful not to take their unease and frustration out on each other, but their bad tempers were obvious to everyone else. Sirius insisted the extra aggression was justified, swearing he had been hearing Slytherins plotting since Saturday. Remus could neither confirm nor deny this, his senses dulled due to a mild cold, but Harry wasn't going to take any chances until he could talk to Draco in private. Draco had been scarce Monday, but a note at breakfast was enough to secure some time during lunch to speak.

Unfortunately, the reality of Sirius' paranoia revealed itself between his morning classes.

He had just climbed the stairs to the third floor and was heading towards Arithmancy when he found his way blocked by a group of Slytherins. Their leader was a skeletal girl with fingers like spiders, but the rest of them were large and brutish.

Sirius was not with him, having wandered off to investigate an unusual smell, leaving Remus who wasn't half as intimidating. Hermione walked right past them, but Harry found himself cut off when he made to follow.

"Where do you think you're going, kitty cat?" the bony girl sneered.

He knew instantly that he was in trouble, but he wasn't sure of how much trouble until Remus' soft growl alerted him to the three other Slytherins coming up the stairs and blocking his retreat. Other students began to realize something was happening and the hallway and stairs began to congest heavily with gawkers. Beyond the Slytherin goons, Hermione was struggling to get back to him with little progress.

"What are you doing? Let me through!"

"Don't lose your tiara, princess. Barlow just wants to have a little talk, ya?"

It was such an obvious lie, Harry wondered why he even bothered.

“What do you want?” he asked, more to buy time than out of curiosity. The smile she gave him was Cheshire wide and complete with little fangs.

“What does any modern woman want? A diamond necklace. A cute boyfriend who adores me. A summer house on the beach. But mostly, I want my parents back.”

Her expression went blank.

“But I can't have those things anymore, because of what those bloody fucking aurors did. Hell, maybe it was your father that killed them and sent me to live with a useless aunt and uncle, and let them burn through my trust fund like they'd won the lottery. I don't know and I really don't care, but I believe I'm due a little compensation, don't you?”

Under normal circumstances, he might have been sympathetic. But these were abnormal circumstances and he was only half listening, his mind running a mile a minute, sorting through potential battle scenarios and means of escape, until he settled on a plan. It was risky, but if successful it yielded the best results. He was ready before she even finished speaking.

“You're right,” Harry said calmly, startling everyone. “And I will give you the chance to avenge your family. Remus, would you come here a moment?”

“What are you up to, Harry?”

“Trust me.”

With everyone disoriented from his supposed surrender, he took Remus' hand and removed his glove, then spun around and abruptly slapped her with it.

"You have claimed an injustice by my family and sullied its name. I challenge you to a duel. If you stand by your accusation than accept. If it is false, then concede and walk away."

He felt a little silly reciting the challenge by rote, but Snape had drilled proper form and decorum into all his duelists and it would feel even stranger deviating from it. Barlow just stood there, stunned for a long moment. She slowly reached up to touch her reddening cheek.

"Harry, no! You could be expelled for drawing your wand in a fight!" Hermione cried.

"Merlin, what have you done?"

Remus snatched back his glove and shoved it on angrily. Harry didn't acknowledge either of them, his attention fixed on Barlow. As he watched her the blankness was slowly replaced by delight.

"You're going to regret that, little kitty. I accept. Anyone who doesn't want to die, get out of our way."

"Lets move towards the stairs. Less chance of hitting anyone accidentally."

Remus growled in his ear.

"You're not doing this, Harry."

"I can fight one on one or two on ten. You do the math," he hissed back.

"Let him do it."

They both turned towards the stairs at the sound of Sirius' voice. He had two of the three Slytherins by their necks, and smiled grimly up at them.

"It's a matter of honor now. He'll have to see it through. Kill anyone who tries to interfere. I'll take care of things on this end."

“Siri-”

“That's an order!”

“Fuck.”

Remus moved to obey, herding the students like sheep towards the group of Slytherins, blocking them from making any surprise attacks while Harry was engaged. Harry and Barlow had taken up position by the stairs, not looking away from the other for even a moment.

He had challenged her formally, but this wasn't a formal duel and even if it was he doubted she knew proper form, so there was no customary stance or salute and they stood much closer than official gaming rules would allow. There was only steady gazes and twitchy fingers aching for their wands, and at their current range the person who got off the first spell couldn't miss so they'd only need one.

The crowd was silent, the tension hung heavy in the air like humidity or magic. For a few seconds they did not move, but for Barlow wetting her chapped lips. Inside his pocket, Harry could feel his watch beginning to burn.

Her arm shot up, her wand in her hand and a spell in her mouth. Harry still could have cast his first hex before her, but instead he ignored his wand all together. He jumped forward, grabbing her wrist and swinging her towards the stairs. Her curse broke off into a startled shriek as she lost her balance, certain of her fall. Her demise was cut short by Harry, who instead of letting go held firm to her wrist. She tried to pull herself up, but he moved forward and left her floundering for balance again.

“What are you doing? Pull me up!”

“Not until you yield.”

“What?!”

“We're still technically dueling. I can't help you up until you drop your wand.”

“Fuck you!”

He shifted his weight and she screamed, before he caught himself. There were gasps and snarls of warning and someone cried out for 'Sasha'. Harry merely grunted.

“For such a skinny girl, you're sure heavy. I can't keep this up for much longer. Drop the wand or I'll drop you. I win either way.”

She looked him in the eyes to see if he was bluffing, but all she could see was the strain of him keeping his hold on her. With an angry grimace, she dropped her wand. He kicked it down the stairs as a precaution before pulling her to safety.

The duel was over.

The crowd broke into a maelstrom of motion and noise. There was cheering and back slaps for Harry, until his godfather reached him and forced everyone to give him space. Hermione was in his face, shouting and calling him names that were all variations of 'you stupid idiot' and 'you're a bloody genius'. He didn't feel particularly victorious. He had been chosen for what was likely a very bad beat down for things his parents may or may not have done by a girl he'd never even met and apparently with her House's full support. Quick thinking and luck have saved him this time, but what would happen when one or the other failed? There was no way this was the end of things.

It took a while but Hermione finally noticed he hadn't said a single word.

“Harry, what is it?”

“... Nothing. We're late for class.”

oo
oo

They were over fifteen minutes late for class, but so was almost everyone else. When Professor Vector asked what had kept them all,

Dean Thomas immediately spat out that someone had pranked the staircase so everyone got stuck to it if they tried to go up. No one contradicted him, though several people glanced in Harry's direction.

Harry hoped everyone would remain similarly tight lipped about his involvement, but wasn't going to be placing any bets on it. Sure enough, by the time class was dismissed the school was buzzing the latest gossip, and Harry could literally watch the spread of the tale like the gradual onslaught of plague. The symptoms involved staring, elaborate gestures, and exclamations of 'no way!' or 'did he really?'.

It was stranger still when Colin Creevey rushed up to him, barely keeping himself from fleeing from the werewolf pair that glared at him, and told him he was in danger.

"Harry I think you should go the other way! Malfoy just heard about the duel and he looks really really pissed, and.. er... he's heading this way!" the boy said, then quickly fled.

Beside him, Hermione rolled her eyes.

It hadn't occurred to Harry that Draco would be mad at him. He supposed it was possible depending on the story he'd been told and by who. In any case, he wasn't going to run every time a Slytherin decided to hold a grudge, even if he was a friend of his. Sirius spotted the young Malfoy first as well as Ron Weasley following close behind and gave them a threatening look. They both hesitated.

"It's fine, Sirius. Draco's a friend. I'm just going to sort things out with him," Harry said. They moved to follow him, but he held up a hand. "No offense, but its kind of hard to settle a misunderstanding with you threatening death over my shoulder. Just give us a little space."

"Harry..."

"We'll just be in the classroom. Unless Moody transfigured himself into desk, I'm sure I'll be perfectly safe."

Sirius, reluctantly, relented but not before sparing them another promise of painful death with only his eyes. Harry, Hermione, Draco, and Ron quickly moved into an abandon classroom and shut the door. Ron cast a silencing charm, and Harry didn't bother mentioning that Remus probably took it down again as soon as it was up.

"Bloody hell..." Draco muttered, "They're a fright. How can you stand them?"

"I practiced with your godfather."

That almost earned him a patented Malfoy smirk, but then he seemed to remember that he was angry at Harry. He crossed his arms.

"What happened? People are saying you had a duel with Sasha Barlow and that you threw her down the stairs!"

"I did not throw her down the stairs."

Hermione butted in. "It wasn't his fault this time. She cornered him with a goon squad, and it was a duel or a mob. No one got hurt."

Ron snorted. "Well, she obviously isn't alright. She's in the hospital wing, you know."

"What? Who told you that?"

"Uncle Severus."

"Fuck," Harry muttered. "Did he seem mad?"

Draco gave him a 'well duh' look.

"She started it," he muttered.

"Doesn't matter," Ron said, looking far more irritated than Harry thought he had a right to be. "You're in Dueling Club. She's isn't. Our charter could get revoked if you're caught abusing your skills or you'll get expelled from the club, and who am I going to get to replace you before our next competition?"

"I didn't use my magic," Harry insisted. "I didn't even draw my wand. I've got fifty witnesses to can testify that she started it and that she was fine when I walked away."

"And all her cronies will testify that you did."

"Why? What is happening? Why are all the Slytherins pissed off at me? Are you pissed off at me too?"

Draco hesitated, but Ron didn't have enough tact to consider his next words.

"Of course they're pissed. We're all pissed at you. You're the Dark Lord's bloody heir and your family probably killed at least some of their parents. How unfair is that?"

"That isn't my fault!"

"That isn't the point! Lots of kids around here had parents on the other side of the war, but they're not getting news paper articles written about them or free clothes or vacations with the Dark Lord! It's a rip off. Their parents died for him, and the only one he has eyes for is the one with parents who tried to kill him."

Harry didn't have anything to say to that. It was a rip off, but it wasn't his fault. He hadn't asked for any of it, and really he would have been happier to have been left anonymous with only his friends for company... wouldn't he? Although if it weren't for Voldemort, he might never have met his godfathers or at least never been able to talk or speak with them. He could do without the fancy clothes and gifts, but what about the knowledge that had come with the Dark Lord's mentoring? He wish he could say he hadn't wanted any of it, but it rang a lie in his own head.

Merlin, this was why he hadn't wanted to tell anyone. Guilt trips were not his idea of fun.

"So what am I suppose to do? Apologize?"

Draco looked horrified at the suggestion.

“Merlin, Potter, that's the last thing you want to do. That's just handing them the sticks to beat you with.”

“Then what? What can I do?”

There was silence, and he thought it was because they didn't have a solution themselves but Hermione's strained voice revealed a hesitation born of reluctance rather than helplessness.

“You have to fight,” she said, and sighed wearily. “They're going to hate you no matter what you do. It's unreasonable. It's unfair. It's self-destructive. But that the way it is. You're going to have to keep fighting until no one dares challenge you... or at least fewer dare challenge you.”

Harry swallowed. He didn't like it. He could seriously hurt someone or be seriously hurt himself. There had to be another way. He was good at finding solutions that didn't occur to others, but he was currently at a loss. Draco tried to cheer him, but since he was still irritable it came off as mocking.

“Most of my house is just testing for weakness. You defeating Barlow is going to discourage a lot of people from trying anything themselves. No one is going to try anything that will seriously hurt you. Not with the Dark Lord backing you. It's a struggle for dominance. If they can bring you to heel, no one is going to challenge them.”

“Do you want to challenge me?” he snipped.

“Don't tempt me, Harry. I've lost some serious leverage because I'm still your friend. If some one manages to fuck you up, I'm going to lose control of even the first years.”

He felt irrationally guilty for that.

“Sorry,” he said, and changed the subject. “Are you sure Barlow is in the infirmary?”

“Either there or sulking somewhere. Are you certain you didn't hurt her?”

“I might have bruised her wrist when I stopped her from falling down the stairs, but nothing other than that. I didn't even draw my wand.”

“When was the last time you used it?”

Harry gave him a funny look, which only served to further irritate the other boy.

“You haven't cast any hexes or jinxes today, have you?”

“No. I think the only spell I cast today was to un-wrinkle my shirt and that was before breakfast.”

“Good. Don't cast anything unless it's in front of a teacher. If Barlow is trying to get you in trouble, then your wand is your only sure alibi.”

Harry ran his hand through his hair, unhappy but at least he knew what was happening now.

“Thank you, Draco. I'll find a way to make this up to you.”

“I'll consider myself well compensated if you come out of this smelling like roses. All I need is a reminder to everyone else that I'm a genius and not a sentimental sod for my acquaintance with you.”

There was a knock at the door, which startled everyone who thought the Silencing Charm was still up, except for Harry who knew better. Sirius peeked in, looking annoyed.

“Come on, we've got to go.”

By his tone it sounded like more bad news. However, if it related to Voldemort it might not necessarily be bad for him. This hope was quickly crushed when his godfather held up a note, folded into an origami bird and flapping crazily in the man's grasp.

“Lestranger wants to see you.”

oo
oo

“Don't worry, Prongslet. It's not like she can do anything. She just wants to swing her weight around. Try to look important,” Sirius said. He was looking positively chipper (when he wasn't glaring at people) since the fight. Behind them Remus was looking as skeptical as Harry.

The halls were deserted except for the occasional GG, which made the school look strange after the commotion of lunch and the confrontation by the stairs. If they had been heading to Voldemort's office, he wouldn't be as nervous. The Dark Lord would have understood the situation and perhaps even approved of how he had handled it. Lestrage, however, was like Snape. Voldemort put her in a position of trust running the school, and if she decided to punish him somehow the man would probably not ever stop to question it. Worst of all, she probably knew it.

She must have been waiting for some excuse to exact her revenge on him after the basilisk incident, having embarrassed her in front of her master. Well, fuck her. She wasn't half as scary as she thought she was.

The gargoyle on the staircase let Harry pass without a password, but when his godfathers tried to follow the entrance snapped shut and blocked their entrance. He felt a twinge of nervousness, but crushed it. He wasn't to let her intimidate him.

“Mr. Potter,” she said coolly as he stepped off the steps and into her office. It was just how he remembered it, ridiculously cluttered with books, portraits, and artifacts. The latest artifact was one he recognized very well. The Sword of Gryffindor hung upright behind a glass case near the stairs. He brushed his fingers over the case and felt the sword's magic respond, a single ringing sound like that of a bell. Lestrage seemed oblivious to it.

“Headmistress.”

"Have a seat," she said, pointing to chair in front of her desk. Harry did so, but made a point to sit in the chair next to the one she had pointed to. He didn't know what good it might do. They both hummed with magic.

"Do you know why you're here?"

Yes, because you think you can bully me when Voldemort isn't around.

"No."

She smirked.

"There's a young lady in the hospital wing claiming you pushed her down the stairs."

Harry felt a jolt of anger, but kept himself under control.

"Really? That's strange. She must have knocked her head on the way down."

"There are witnesses who say they saw the same thing," she continued. "I find this very disturbing behavior, Mr. Potter. Don't you?"

"Yes, mass hallucinations do seem like a serious problem. I don't suppose they had just gotten out of potions?"

He wasn't looking at her directly, playing at disinterest, but he did notice the little tic starting in the corner of her right eye and felt extremely satisfied with it. It didn't last. Her cool expression took on a more smug look.

"I'm certain this is all a misunderstanding. Perhaps someone else resembling you did it or maybe you accidentally bumped her without noticing. This matter could easily be resolved with your cooperation."

He was being set up for something nasty and he knew it.

"Cooperation?" he said cautiously.

"It will only take a moment."

"What would I have to do?"

"Look at me."

Her voice was commanding, and he looked at her reflexively. There was a familiar sense of pressure and he sprung up, escaping towards the stairs. He heard, rather than saw Lestrangle stand up and follow.

"Where do you think you're going?"

"Away from you. If you want to find out the truth you can legilimens Barlow or one of her cronies. No way in hell am I letting you rummage around in my brain."

"Potter, get back here! We're not done!" she snarled, seizing him by his wrist and turning him around so she could grab his shoulders. He shoved her away, but her response was a backhand that sent him to the floor. She was amazingly strong for a woman.

She climbed on top of him, holding down his upper arm with her knees and grabbing his thrashing head with her hands, forcing him to face her. He kept his eyes pinched shut and struggled, but she was heavy and he was not very strong to begin with.

"Get off! I can't breathe! Get off!"

"Just cooperate Potter and it will all be over shortly," Lestrangle crooned softly, contradicting the pain of her fingers trying to pry his eyelids open and knocking off his glasses.

"Sirius! Remus! Help me!"

"They can't hear you in here. When that door is closed this office is completely sound proof. Now be a good little boy and open your eyes."

He thrashed and struggled and screamed, but it had no affect on her, and when she finally became irritated and sat more heavily on his chest, he really couldn't breathe. His wand was in his sleeve, but without full use of his arm he couldn't cast properly. What could he do? Keep his eyes closed and hope she relented before he suffocated? He couldn't let her into his mind. Too many secrets, too many lives she could ruin with them including his own. If she learned about his godfather's plans to smuggle him out of the country their lives would be forfeit.

He couldn't let that happen! He had to protect them!

He renewed his struggling, even as his lungs burned with the need for air and he was starting to loose all his strength. He felt a pulse of magic (his own? Lestrangle's? One of the artifacts?), and there was suddenly something cool and solid and familiar in his right hand. A rush of joy and he swung from his elbow, making a stabbing motion at his attacker. It missed, but she clambered off him. He took a swing at her as he rolled over onto his knees. He ended up striking one of her chairs instead, slicing it clean down the middle as if it were paper. His glasses quickly secured back in place, he jumped up and pointed his sword at the Headmistress who had retreated behind her desk and drawn her wand. She was furious, but also uncertain and perhaps even a little afraid. He had nearly killed her and they both knew it.

"How did you get that?" she snarled.

"How dare you! How fucking dare you!"

"Potter put that thing down at once! You're lucky I don't-"

He swung his sword across her desk, destroying several trinkets and scattering papers every where. She lifted her wand, but his sword was up before she utter a single spell. If it had been a regular sword, she wouldn't be the least bit intimidated, but this was Gryffindor's sword with the ability to cut through or deflect any spell short of the Killing Curse. She would have been perfectly happy to use the spell, but even she would have a hard time explaining a dead student to the Dark Lord.

She was stuck. She'd underestimated him. It shouldn't have been this difficult. He was just a little boy and she had overcome fully trained aurors with relative ease. Of course, she could use her wand in those instances. She didn't want to use it on this little venture, in case someone grew suspicious and checked him for spells.

If it had all gone to plan, she would have had all his dirty little secrets and the clout to enforce his silence and his obedience regardless of the suffering she inflicted on him. She had been planning this all summer, patiently waiting for the right time and the right opportunity. The release of the newspaper articles made now the ideal time, when he was feeling insecure about his secrets and the world was clawing for his weaknesses. The incident with Barlow made his summons to her office unremarkable and even expected.

Now it was all shot to hell. He still had his secrets, and was now armed and dangerous not only with his sword but her illegal attempt to legilimens him. Her master wouldn't have cared who she practiced such a thing on, unless it was people who held the Dark Lord's secrets. And Harry had those secrets. She didn't know what they entailed, but she knew they were there.

Her only hope now was that he was too naïve to think to use this against her.

"Open the door."

"Potter-"

"Shut up, you psycho bitch! Open the bloody door!"

She hesitated, but he raised his sword threateningly, and she twisted a knob on the underside of her desk. The door opened, and immediately she found her office invaded by werewolves. Well, bugger, she had forgotten about them. Sirius took one look at Harry and the partially destroyed office, then turned a glare on her that threatened murder.

"You alright, Harry?" he growled, not taking his eyes off of her.

“Yeah, lets just get out of here.”

All three shuffled towards the exit, not taking their eyes off of her until they were safely out of sight. The staircase slammed shut behind them. Lestrage collapsed in her chair, wondering how badly she had fucked things up.

oo
oo

Larousse entered Bristol's military headquarters just after sunset, striding purposefully to the uniformed sentry guarding the entryway to the inner offices. She pulled out her Sentinel Level three security card and handed it to her.

“I'm Vesper Larousse. I have an appointment with Lord Voldemort.”

She tried to say the name as easily as Harry was able to, but even she found it difficult to say with any sort of confidence. It was enough, however, for the sentry. The uniformed woman looked at her clipboard for confirmation, checked Larousse for any suspicious objects (she removed seven items, including a silver brooch and the silver engagement ring Severus had given her), sequestered her wand, and then ordered another uniformed wizard to escort her.

The pathway they took was obviously intended for civilians and unauthorized personnel. It skirted the edge of the building, leaving windows to the outside on the left and long stretches of solid walls to the right. There were no windows to the interior of the building, and the few doors they passed were heavily warded. The staircase to the fifth floor was narrow, and a security spell was needed to pass each level, until at last she was led through a door and into a lounge.

The lounge was corporate but for a few tapestries and plants scattered around the room and one man from Voldemort's army of assistants stood behind a desk. He smiled politely, but she didn't miss his discreet once over as she approached. She did not smile back. She hadn't dressed up to impress him after all.

“Professor Larousse, welcome. The Dark Lord is just finishing up with a meeting and will be with you shortly,” he said officiously. She nodded and wandered over to study one of the tapestries while she waited. After about ten minutes there was a chirping sound, like a finch, and the assistant said she could go in.

Voldemort's Bristol office wasn't like his Hogwarts one. For one, there was a lot more wall space, she assumed so he could put up charts and maps for better study. For another, there were a lot more security spells. She felt vaguely nervous passing the filing cabinets with their aura of malevolent magic surrounding it. The desk sat atop a complex matrix of runes and shapes, preventing anyone except the Dark Lord from touching anything on it. As always, she was very impressed with the dark wizard's efforts.

“Welcome, Madam. Would you like some tea?” the man greeted. He was reclining comfortably on a sofa on the far wall, leafing through a manuscript. His informality unnerved her a bit, but she decided that was probably intentional. This was their first meeting alone and he was probably testing her.

“No thank you, my Lord. I wish to take up as little of your time as possible.”

“Mmm...”

He sat up, replacing his manuscript with a cup of tea from an end table, and pointed to the other end of the couch.

“Sit down. It's annoying having to look up at you.”

Another wave of discomfort, but she did as instructed.

“So what did you wish to see me about? Your letter said it involved Harry.”

“Yes, my Lord. It's the matter of his guardianship.”

“Snape is his guardian.”

“Practically speaking, yes, he is. Officially, however... he is still up for adoption.”

There was a very tense silence as Voldemort set aside his tea and looked straight at her. She could feel his attention like a palpable thing, hot and sticky and making her palms sweat and the air uncomfortable to breathe.

“I am aware of this,” he said cautiously. “He has received thirty-two offers of adoption. Twenty of which were made in the last week.”

She hadn't known that. It filled her with uncertainty.

“Are... um... have you considered any of them seriously?”

“No. None of them were suitable, but I suspect I will have many more offers over the next year. He's going to become quite popular. Why?”

She could tell he knew what she wanted, and wondered if Severus hadn't forewarned him.

“I would like to place a bid for adopting Harry.”

He chuckled, a low and throaty purr and she could feel her face burn. Really, this was stupid. She was a full grown woman, not a timid little virgin anymore.

“And what makes you think I would allow you to take my darling protege? You're not even married.”

“Severus and I are engaged. We're going to marry this summer.”

He didn't look surprised, but somehow she got the feeling he hadn't known. Apparently, Severus hadn't warned him after all.

“Is that so? He didn't mention it to me. You are certain he wasn't playing with you? His humor can be quite twisted.”

“I'm certain. I left my engagement ring with the sentry downstairs.”

He looked thoughtful for a moment, and gave her a not so discreet once over much like his assistant had.

“Are you barren?”

“What? No! Of course not!”

“Is he?”

“I haven't bothered asking, but I can't imagine why he would be. There are potions for that if he is.”

“Then why would you feel the need to adopt if you can make progeny of your own? You do intend to bare him children, don't you?”

“Yes, I want a large family and I would like Harry to be a part of it. He deserves that. He's a very special young man.”

“Yes, he is, which is why I must be careful who I entrust his wellbeing with.”

“You already entrust Severus.”

“You're not Severus though, and while you do appear to be a rather remarkable woman, you have a history of disobedience that he does not. I have not forgotten why you were thrown out of the Sentinels. I signed for your expulsion personally.”

“I have learned my lesson, my Lord.”

“Mmm... perhaps you have.”

He slid across the couch as smoothly as a serpent, and she leaned back in surprise so that he was on top of her. Her eyes widened, her breath caught in her throat. His hand was on her cheek and she was certain he was about to kiss her, but instead of the pressure of his lips she felt the pressure of his magic against her mind. She jerked in alarm, but his hand on her cheek kept her immobile as he gently sifted through her mind.

It was over almost as quickly as it had begun. He removed his hand and released her from his legilimens, but remained poised over her trembling body.

“You really do love him, don't you? You silly thing,” he chuckled, and she could feel his breath on her face. “I suppose of all the offers I have thus far received, Severus and you would make the most appropriate pair to look after him. However, I do not give gifts. What is in it for me... personally?”

He leaned in closer, their noses just barely touching. Beneath him, his prey was struggling with herself, completely thrown by the onslaught of both his physical and mental presence. She tried to gather her wits, reminding herself why she was here, that Severus was waiting for her back at the school, and this was a test not an offer. Just a test, a test, a test. Oh, he has such a pretty mouth.

He closed the distance between them.

SEVERUS!

She brought up her hand, covering his mouth before it touched hers. She didn't dare shove him off completely. She wasn't that stupid. Even so, he looked rather irritated, so she had to think fast before he forced the issue and she was left with nothing.

“Moody.”

He pulled back a little, interest peaked.

“I'll find and capture Moody. I'll prove to you that I can protect Harry.”

Voldemort moved off of her, grinning now.

“Oh, really?”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Alright, there are a few things I'd like to say before you all start bemoaning the possibility of Larousse adopting Harry. One, the reasons she gave Snape for adopting Harry, are not HER reasons for adopting Harry. She might be crazy (might not necessarily is), but she really does want to be his mother. Also, yes, Snape and Larousse would make a poor choice of parents from a moral point of view. Pragmatically speaking, they would actually be good choices, being both strong and intelligent and politically savvy. From an author's point of view, it'd make a fabulous story contribution. There is so much physical, emotional, and psychological conflict such an event would create that there would be no end to the trouble it causes and thus helps drive the story forward.

Additionally, everyone seems to think Voldemort would be too possessive. I think everyone's looking at his motivations too simplistically. Voldemort doesn't make important decisions based solely on his emotions (which are twisted and convoluted and not easily predicted to begin with). He would weigh many factors no one else would think of, like how would the adoption help or hinder Harry's public appeal? Would they encourage or distract loyalty to the Dark Lord? Would parental conflict cause Harry to resent him or turn to him for guidance? What about the werewolves? Can they truly protect Harry or would they leave him more vulnerable? These are only a few of the many, many things Voldemort would be calculating before he even considered letting Harry be adopted.

And in the end he really might not allow it, but it wouldn't be due simply to jealousy.

Book III:

Chapter 14

Having been attacked twice in one day, Harry felt he deserved the rest of the day off. So after sending a note to Hermione, via a charmed paper plane, he retired to his godfathers' chambers for some much needed comfort. Werewolves were very tactile, and while Harry normally wasn't, he was happy to receive some for at least a little while. They curled up together on a large ratty couch, Harry's head in Sirius' lap as the alpha petted his hair and crooned how proud he was of him while Remus rubbed his bare feet. It was all very soothing and he envied this part of the werewolf lifestyle. All of his friends would have bulked at this much touch.

Well, Natalie might have found it charming, but she really wasn't an option right now.

"This is insane," he muttered. "Is everyone trying to kill me?"

"No, Prongslet, just the Slytherins," Sirius assured him.

Harry groaned.

"Perhaps we should have killed her," Remus pondered out loud. "We would have been justified and no one would mess with you again."

"Killer at thirteen. That's marvelous. What great heights will I have to aspire to after that? Serial killer? Terrorist? Oh, I know, I can stage a coup and take Voldemort's job and march on Germany. It'll be blast. You can be my generals."

Remus poked him in the foot, forcing out a laugh.

"I meant us, not you. It's expected of us."

"Voldemort would have killed you."

"We could just have said we thought she was trying to kill you."

"He still would have killed you." He wasn't certain if that was true, but he didn't want to risk it.

"Or worse. He could have given us her job," Sirius chuckled. Harry smiled, despite himself.

"Let's not talk about it anymore for a while. All these attacks are depressing me. Let's talk about Christmas or something."

"No Christmas for us," the alpha said, "We don't celebrate Christmas. It's a Christian holy day. Doesn't make much sense for werewolves. It's not like we'll go to heaven."

"What do you mean?"

"We don't have human souls, Harry. We're saturated with Earth magic. When we die, we'll return to the Earth like any other animal or nature spirit. No heaven or hell for us. No salvation or damnation. Just reincarnation or disembodiment."

"How do you know that?"

"Our shamans. They've been known to summon up dead alphas for guidance during times of trial. Can't do that with human souls, at least not for ones that have faith in an afterlife. You get ghosts who don't have enough faith to move on all the time. Hogwarts is full of them, but they usually crossover after a while."

"Huh, I didn't know that."

"Metaphysics is an elective for seventh years," Remus said. "I wished they'd offered it when I was at Hogwarts. They probably thought it wasn't appropriate to teach things that contradicted or categorized popular religious dogma at the time."

Harry didn't know what metaphysics nor dogma, though he figured it had to do with ghosts and spirits and might be worth looking into. There were a lot of classes he should have been looking into. New club activities too, perhaps. Like fencing (if he was going to keep calling on Gryffindor's sword he thought it prudent he learn how to actually use it) and riding (the flight on the hippogryph had proven he had a knack for it). So much had been happening though to distract him, and if he didn't get his act back together he wasn't going to pass his classes, let alone qualify for advanced ones.

Larousse popped into his head unexpectedly. She had warned him about thinking ahead and offered her aid. He suddenly wished badly that he could take up her offer, but he couldn't now. They were on opposite sides now. He with the werewolves and she with... just about every other ignorant fool out there. Funny how he kind of missed her.

Sirius tugged at tuft of his hair gently, garnering his attention. "What is it, Prongslet? You've gone quiet."

"Just thinking about the future and all. I don't know what's happening. Everything is changing so fast. My friendships are all in trouble. My school work. My life. I just need time for things to quiet down so I can sort through it all, but every time I turn around there's an attack or a friend is angry at me or wants to be my girlfriend or turns out to be a mass murderer or I can't play Quidditch but then I'm the vice captain of Dueling club or I become national news or the Headmistress tries to mind rape me."

He took a deep breath and let it out.

"Merlin, I'm tired."

His godfathers don't say anything, but Harry suspects they're sharing their patented 'concerned glance' he'll forever associate with them. Still, Sirius and Remus' hands on his hair and feet, rubbing softly, is very soothing and just airing his thoughts is cathartic. He thinks this is the safest he's felt in years.

"We could always leave," Sirius begins, "Right now. Go to Grimmuald for supplies and then take the tunnel into France. We could be out of the country within two hours, before anyone even knew you were missing."

Harry rolled over to look up at his godfather and shook his head.

"It wouldn't work. Dumbledore would kill me or Voldemort when he caught me... and I think he would. I've seen some of the things he can do. Besides, what would running away accomplish? I'd leave all my problems behind, but I'd leave almost everything important to me too. And what about you? You've got your pack and your home. There's nothing like that in Europe. They might just kill you too."

"I doubt Dumbledore would kill you if you ran away from the Dark Lord. He would probably protect you if you renounced him publicly," Sirius pointed out, ignoring the other points. Harry didn't look any more pleased about the notion.

"I wouldn't give that bastard the satisfaction. He tried to kill me. He already killed a Sentinel and tried to kill all of my teachers. Voldemort's no saint, but I don't see how he's any better."

Sirius looked ready to argue, but then stopped himself and sighed. Harry thought he understood. Dumbledore had been his leader a long time ago. Perhaps the ghost of trust still lingered.

"Alright, no extended vacation. Which is really too bad. There's a lot of good sight-seeing out there."

The alpha's gaze became somewhat glazed as he began thinking about something or other. Remus let out a warning growl.

"Pinch him, Harry, he's wandering into pervert territory. Ski bunnies most likely."

Harry just laughed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry felt better than he had in a long time when he emerged from the wolf den. He was relaxed, reassured, and resolved to fix those aspects of his life he could. He would study harder, practice harder, and work harder in general. He would ignore the gossip as unimportant, fight when he needed to, laugh when he wanted to, and somehow fix his damaged friendships. If at all possible, he'd get his godfathers to lighten up a bit so he could convince everyone that they really weren't that bad. He would even try to convince Larousse.

Extremely difficult considering he knew his godfathers wanted to kill her, but he really did want them to have a peaceful understanding. Because he didn't want to hurt her. She had done awful things, but awful things had been done to her as well. There was so much about her to admire and appreciate, things he admired and appreciated in his godfathers. Strength, confidence, conviction.

He didn't know if he could make her understand, but he thought if she could resolve some of the pain from her family's death it was possible. For both their sakes, he hoped it was possible.

Lestrangle... he wasn't sure what to do about Lestrangle. His first thought was to tell Snape, but Remus had pointed out that the potion's master would use the incident to his advantage, not necessarily Harry's. His second thought was to tell Larousse, but he dismissed it without giving it voice. He could just try to get in contact with Voldemort, which was the most logical choice, but...

He couldn't help but wonder what he might get out of it.

It was a dangerous thought. Lestrangle had a lot to lose and there was no telling what extremes she might go to to keep Harry silent. At the same time, what might she give him for the same silence? Gryffindor's sword was currently in Sirius and Remus' den, and he really disliked the idea of returning it to the headmistress' office. This was the second time it had answered his call. It felt like it belonged to him.

Could he keep that sword and the assurance that she would never act against him again in exchange for him looking the other way? If he merely tattled and she survived she would be a potentially dangerous enemy for life.

Blackmail wasn't his forte, but the concept intrigued him. He couldn't ask Hermione. She wouldn't have approved, and he couldn't risk her going to her godfather. If she had been the one who was about to be mentally violated she might have understood his lingering resentment. That left Draco and Natalie. Also risky, but not nearly as much and perhaps he could work towards earning their forgiveness by sharing a secret with them. He sent them notes, hoping they got them before their free period ended. It was his free period as well, but there was only enough time left for him to get back to his common room and get his things for his final class of the day.

Everyone looked surprised when he rushed into Astrology, bare moments before class was to begin and took his seat by Hermione. Sirius and Remus strode in easily behind him and settled themselves into the dark corners at the back of the room.

"Oh, Mr. Potter. I see you're feeling better," Professor Sinistra said, blinking curiously at him.

Harry suddenly realized he hadn't thought of an excuse for why he was absent so Hermione must have made up one for him.

"Um... yeah. I feel a lot better. It wasn't as bad as I thought."

"That's good. Alright class, today we're going to be studying Leap Year Effects. Was anybody here born on a leap year? No, what about..."

While the professor was distracted, Harry quickly scribbled a note and passed it to Hermione.

'What am I feeling better from?'

She scribbled in response: 'migraine'. He could work with that. Of course, he might appear more believable if he didn't look so damn chipper. He took notes, answered and asked questions, and generally made it a point not to think about anything more serious than what was for dinner. Even the odd looks and whispers he was getting weren't enough to throw his mood.

After class, Hermione pulled him aside, looking worried.

“Are you alright, Harry? Headmistress Lestrangle summoned you to her office and then you sent me that note. I was worried she'd punished you some how.”

“I'm sorry I worried you, but I'm fine. I even managed to get one up on her. I just needed the time to sort myself out. Things are pretty good really.”

She didn't look particularly convinced.

“You didn't eat or drink or touch anything in her office did you?”

He knew what she was really asking, and knew he hadn't been bespelled so he lied.

“Of course not. Well, I sat in the chair, but that's it. Sirius and Remus were with me through the entire thing. Don't worry, nothing happened.”

Still skeptical, but she had nothing else to question him with.

“Okay,” she said, “Then lets go to the library. You can copy my runes notes. You missed a good lecture there. Professor Keigle just started on elemental rune combinations.”

“Sounds fascinating, but I want to finish my conversation with Draco. You go ahead and get started, and I'll join you as soon as I'm done. Yeah?”

“Alright, but be careful. I'd hate for another Barlow to send you to the infirmary for real.”

“Secret passageways and notice-me-not charms it is. I'll see you in bit.”

“Bye, Harry.”

Draco was in the same room they'd met in before lunch, but Natalie was no where in sight. He supposed he should have expected that. Ron was blessedly absent.

"Now what's happened?" the young Malfoy demanded when Harry walked in. "Are you suspended?"

"Of course not. That... woman can't do anything without Voldemort's okay first, but she tried something else and now I need your advice."

Draco crossed his arms, trying to look annoyed but Harry could see he was curious. He could practically hear the gears grinding and ticking behind the Slytherin's eyes.

"... And since you've left Hermione behind I'm assuming it's the sort of advice only a Slytherin can provide? What's in it for me?"

"Perhaps you can tell me."

Harry told Draco about what had happened in the office, minus the part where he had stolen the Sword of Gryffindor, and then asked if he couldn't get something out of it. By the end Draco was looking at him with a mixture of horror and awe and amusement.

"You nearly killed my Aunt Bella?"

Of his eclectic mix of feelings, humor was ironically the tone that stood out.

"You're mad. She's going to kill you. Merlin, she's going to kill me if she finds out you told me. Why didn't you tell Snape about this?"

"What good would that do me? He'd just tell the Dark Lord, and then Lestrage would blame me for whatever happens after that. I don't think I can deal with another crazy person coming after me right now, Draco. I just want to keep her out of my hair for the rest of my stay here... and maybe have her look the other way if something questionable happens."

Draco shook his head in exasperation, but took several minutes to think it over. At last, he seemed to have an idea.

"We should tell my father."

“What? What's that going to do?”

“No, no, listen. We're both just kids. Yeah, we're pretty tough compared to most of the other pixie-brains walking around here and you did alright for yourself in Lestrangle's office, but do you really think either of us stand a chance at outmaneuvering her for long do you? She's very powerful and has a lot more experience. She's even managed to outfox Snape occasionally. The only person I know who can play the game better than either of them is my father.”

“What would he care? I mean, she's his sister-in-law. Wouldn't he side with her?”

Draco made a rude noise.

“Of course not. Her name is Lestrangle, not Malfoy, and as far as he is concerned she's just another rival for the Dark Lord's attention. He'll be happy to have a little dirt on her.”

“I don't know, Draco. How does this help protect me?”

“Simple, the secret only hold power if the Dark Lord doesn't know about it. So in order to keep you from telling the Dark Lord yourself, he'll have to protect you from Lestrangle.”

“What's to keep him from just telling Voldemort everything the moment we tell him?”

“Nothing to gain. Snape wants to be headmaster so he's all for getting her sacked, but my father doesn't get anything other than a pat on the head if he tattles. He outranks her already.”

Harry considered it. He wasn't sure he felt comfortable trusting this secret to Draco's rather sinister father, the same man who made Hermione miserable. But Draco was looking uncharacteristically eager, as if it were marvelous game he finally considered old enough to play. If nothing else, perhaps this would be his way of making amends with his friend.

“Alright, contact your father. You better be right about this.”

Draco actually laughed.

“Harry, I promise you won't regret it!”

Of course, both boys knew Slytherin promises weren't worth making.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Natalie caught Harry just outside of the library, and ignoring his bodyguards, immediately dragged him behind column. She had wanted to ignore him altogether after learning the note she'd received was for both her and Draco, but the young Gryffindor was a treasure trove of unexpected ideas and happenings and if she didn't find out what he wanted her curiosity would be burning. Especially after learning about his supposed attack on Sasha and his summons to the headmistress' office. She really wanted a clear understanding of what really happened there.

“So what did you want?” she said impatiently.

“Natalie, why didn't you come before?” he said, disconcerted and checking the corridor for eavesdroppers (other than his godfathers).

“My life doesn't revolve around your convenience, Harry. I had other things to do. Now what do you want?”

He shook his head. “Forget it, it's already taken care of.”

That hurt. She didn't know why, but him having gotten what he wanted from someone else hurt. Hiding her pain in a veneer of irritation she made to stalk off, but he took her hand and quickly pulled her back.

“Wait, wait. I don't just want to talk to get something out of you. I do like just being with you, you know?” he said, pleadingly.

“Do you now? I wonder about that, Harry, I really do,” she snapped, and he had to pull her back again.

“Please don't run off mad again. I tried to tell you last time, I'd love to be your boyfriend. I think you're smart and funny and pretty and kind of scary, but in a good way.”

She smirked a little at that, but quickly hid it.

“But I don't want you to get hurt. Okay? I mean first there's Moody, which was bad enough, but now there's that Dumbledore guy and half of Slytherin wants me dead or maimed. If any of them knew you were with me, what's to keep them from hurting you instead? You don't have bodyguards or a Dark Lord watching your back. Do you see? I don't want you to get hurt because of me.”

It was possibly the sweetest thing anyone had ever said to her, but she couldn't just accept it without a little more resistance.

“Oh, yeah? What about your other friends? Draco? Clyde? Hell, what about Hermione? Half the school thinks you guys are an item.”

“Hermione's got her family watching her back and it's only the dumber half that thinks we're a couple. And besides, do you really think I'd have any luck at convincing her to keep her distance? She'd just lecture me for week. Clyde's always surrounded by other Gryffindors when he's not hanging around with us. Please, don't be mad at me.”

Natalie rolled her eyes and sighed.

“Alright, but you're my date for the Malfoy Christmas party.”

Harry looked startled and then panicked.

“What? I already told you, I don't want-”

“Well, I don't care what you want,” she interrupted, walking out from the darkened corner. “I'm a big girl and I can take care of myself. If you don't want anyone to know, just act like it's a popularity thing.”

You know, taking the prettiest girl in the school to the ball just to make everyone jealous. It'll be fun."

She did a dramatic hair flip and wink, and he nearly laughed but quickly got control of himself.

"Natalie..." he said, his pleading dissolving into something more authoritative, which she happily ignored as she strode between the two werewolves. They watched her intently but she ignored the feeling of vulnerability and kept her pace.

"And I want a corsage. I'm wearing white," she called over her shoulder.

"Natalie!"

She looked back and grinned, putting a finger to her mouth and warned him to be quiet. When she was out of sight, she let out a thrilled little giggle. Okay, that probably wasn't the smartest thing to do. He was right about putting her in danger, but she was no damsel. She fully expected some nasty, but intriguing things to happen.

After all, what's the fun in loving a prince who doesn't have a few dragons to slay?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Wednesday morning had dawned with fresh snowfall in the South of Britain, covering most of England in a clean white blanket. The streets and sidewalks had been trodden into dirty slush along the busier shopping districts, but along the back alleys and side streets everything remained placid and scenic.

Larousse's boots crunched softly as she walked, the only sound the snow didn't seem to swallow as she made her way down Snigget Street. The row of narrow store fronts on either side of her were dark or boarded up, but for a handful of stubborn shops hanging lanterns and half-dead holly and evergreens from their awnings and on the dirty windows as testament to their continuation. Once upon a time the area had been a booming shopping district, but too many battles had run through there during the war and too many people had died there for the living to ever feel comfortable.

It was the perfect sort of place for conspirators to meet.

She finally came to a shop with chipped green paint and light streaming from the window. She brushed the snow from the sign.

Madam Longbottom's Medicinal Teas and Cordials

Visitors Welcome

This was it. She stepped inside, a little bell announcing her presence as she entered. The shop was surprisingly warm and welcoming. The counter to her right had poinsettia and a rather glum looking toad in a Santa hat, and the smell of baking cookies rose above the scent of herbs and spices. Old laterns from the ceiling illuminated open boxes of dried plants, mosses, medicinal stones, racks of mortars and pestles, bottles of oil, antique tea sets, and instructional books. It looked very much like an apothecary without animal parts.

"Hello? Madam Longbottom? Is anybody here?"

There was a sound from the back, behind a curtain of beads, followed by a deep scratchy voice.

"Jus' a moment, please." A short pause, then. "Would you like a cookie?"

"That would be delightful," she said sincerely, for the cookies really did smell wonderful. A few more shuffling sounds and a squat old woman ambled out with a tray of cookies and milk. Larousse took stock of her quickly, noting the keen look in her eye and strength in her large hands. There didn't appear to be anyone else in the store, and even if it wasn't busy she thought Augusta Longbottom must be quite active to run it by herself.

“Ah, a new customer. I don't get very many of those. How can I help you?” she said, looking intent. She wasn't very smiley, but one bite of her almond fig offering made up for it, Larousse thought.

“Well, I have a friend who mentioned this shop to me a few days ago. Said you have a good reputation.”

The old woman nodded, but there was a bit of skepticism there.

“And would I know this friend?”

“Yes, though you probably don't like him much. Head Sentinel Morgan,” she said, taking a sip of her milk to cover how intently she was watching the old woman's reaction. There was a definite stiffening of her shoulders and darkening of her expression, but nothing particularly suspicious.

“You're a sentinel?”

Larousse laughed. “No, no. Of course not. I'm a professor. I teach up at Hogwarts.”

The old woman didn't react at first, but then slowly seemed to relax.

“Oh? How does a professor meet the head of national security?” she said conversationally.

“The same way a tea shop lady might, I suppose. Lot of nasty business up there lately. Lot of nosy questions about one's political associations, if you know what I mean. Well, we've seen each other enough that we've managed to get along. I met with him a few days ago for a news conference, got to talking about holiday shopping of all things, and he mentioned this place.”

She snorted.

“I'm surprised he'd go recommending the shop of a traitor. He was quite adamant that he was going to shut me down for harboring a fugitive. I mean honestly. A little old thing like me holding a murderer in my attic? Ridiculous.”

"Yes, he felt pretty silly for suggesting it afterwards. Potter actually laughed when he overheard us. Cheeky little bugger."

Longbottom looked very curious about that.

"You mean Harry Potter? The Harry Potter? The child the paper is making all this fuss about?"

"Oh, yes. Nice boy, first in my class, but something of a troublemaker. You meet all sorts working in Hogwarts."

"I don't doubt it, dearie. What do you teach?"

"History of Magic."

They gossiped and chatted idly for almost an hour, and by the end of it Larousse felt the only thing she'd gotten out of the whole thing was a nice carrot flavored tea to help relieve Severus' eye strain and a tummy ache from eating too many sweets. Morgan had been right. Whatever trouble Madam Longbottom might have gotten herself into during the war had obviously left her resigned to quieter pursuits. She owned her little shop with a small but loyal following of customers to keep it afloat, kept mostly to herself, baking cookies for grandnieces and nephews for the holidays. A few discreetly cast detection charms had revealed no hidden fugitives, secret rooms, illegal contraband, or weaponry.

She was just a tea shop owner, and Larousse was running out of leads. Scrounging after the sentinel's leftover suspects was a long shot to begin with, but the chance of her succeeding in finding Moody before Morgan was a long shot to begin with. It was a stupid bargain to make with the Dark Lord, but what else did she have? She doubted her virtue held as much value as the wizard had implied, and if she had succumb there was no telling if he might not expose her indiscretion to Severus and then she'd really be lost or use it as leverage to do some other unsavory tasks. She was not rich or powerful. She had only her wits and her wand to get her what she wanted.

Now all she needed was lucky break.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Augusta Longbottom smiled easily as the pretty young woman left the shop, feeling quite proud of herself. She was afraid she came off as a little too interested at first, but had played it off as typical gossipyness of old women. She nibbled on her cookie and thought about what she should do next. This Vesper was definitely worth looking into, but she might also be bait. A sentinel is disguise. It wouldn't be the first time they had tried that technique. Still, if they could do it...

She pulled out a piece of paper and started writing. If this woman was who she said she was, then she had a much better chance of getting a hold of Potter than Quick ever did. She needed confirmation first. The sentinels were much too alert for them to make any mistakes this far into the game. This needed to be perfect.

'Dear Ladybug...'

Book III:

Chapter 15: The Huntress and Her Prey

McGunny was sitting in his office, torn between studying for his Transfiguration quiz and skimming through the latest batch of intel Weasley had managed to dig up on Barlow and Potter. It really wasn't much of a contest. He could study during his free period tomorrow, but he had to hurry if he wanted to outrace the latest bit of gossip. As a part of the press, even a amateur press, he understood the responsibility of remaining objective, but this latest bit of scandal angered his sensibilities, especially the more he learned.

He knew for instance that Barlow had set a small mob on Potter, that she had lost a fair duel to him, and that she had been completely unharmed after. Weasley had confirmed this with several witnesses who had been there, even one very reluctant Slytherin, and despite being a utter slob he trusted the boy's ability to separate gossip from gospel. Which is what made Barlow's framing Potter, and attempting to use the press to do it, so very infuriating. The girl hadn't checked herself into the infirmary for more than half an hour before sending him a note to request an interview.

He had gone himself, and what he had been made to listen to sickened him. Not only was she a poor actor, she was a bossy one too, demanding he print her story right away. He hadn't, of course. He'd interviewed a rather disgruntled Madam Pomfrey first. The nurse was not permitted to talk about a patient's condition, but that didn't mean she couldn't dispel misinformation.

Two lies had thus been confirmed. Barlow hadn't been cursed with cruciatus and she didn't have any broken bones.

He had quickly rounded up some of his reporters to find out what had really happened and hoped to track down Potter himself, but learned from Weasley that he had already been summoned to the headmistress' office. It made McGunny nervous.

Potter had shown up again later in the day, surprisingly high spirited for having been accused of assault and battery. Perhaps the headmistress had believed him. It's not like she would have much choice as the girl was obviously lying.

It was with some uneasiness that he left his office in search of the subject of the scandal. He tracked him down to the library, and tried to mentally prepare himself for the meeting. They hadn't spoken directly since the interview, and while he was hopeful that he would be well received he couldn't be certain.

"Potter," he said, and the boy turned from copying some notes to look at him.

"Oh, hey, McGunny," he greeted, friendly but cautious, "What is it?"

Across from them, Granger looked up from her tome nervously. Relax, Granger, I won't bite, he mentally admonished

"There have been some rumors floating around about a fight this morning involving you and a Slytherin girl. I was wondering if you'd mind giving an account of what happened? To clear up the rumors, of course."

"Of course." But he looked skeptical. He turned to Hermione but she just nods. Thank you, Granger. It's about time you helped me out a little. "But lets keep this short, I've got a lot of studying to get done before practice."

He must have meant dueling practice, which meant he hadn't heard.

"Practice was canceled. Professor Larousse took her sick days for the rest of the week. There was an announcement at lunch."

"Oh..."

"Don't worry, Potter, I still won't keep you long."

They made their way to a private table, conscious of the stares they received and whispers until McGunny put up a privacy spell.

"First off," McGunny began, "let me say that I know Sasha Barlow and her cronies are full of shit, and while I don't know how much you've heard so far you should know she's attempting a smear campaign against you."

Potter impresses him by not so much as flinching, merely leaning back in his chair a bit to take stock. McGunny wondered what he saw.

"She's tried to use my paper to spread her lies," he continued when Potter offers nothing, "And I take that as a personal offense. Some of my reporters have already investigated, and I think I have a good idea of what happened, but I'd like to hear it from you. The testimonies I received seemed a bit... excitable."

Potter nodded, but didn't say anything.

"I just want the truth."

For an instant, he looked angry and McGunny thought he made a mistake, but then his expression smoothed out and he just got this look. Green, green eyes and they're like a forest fire. Terrifying and mesmerizing at once. What did he see with eyes like that?

"Alright."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Larousse was absent from DA&D the next day, just as McGunny had said she would be. His godfathers were quite happy about this, but Harry felt uneasy. She wasn't sick, in fact, she wasn't even in the castle anymore. What was she doing then? Everyone said she was holiday shopping, but that was ridiculous. The other teachers managed to get their shopping done without skipping classes, and they all had more family left than Larousse.

Could Lestrangle have put her up to something? They did seem to get along fairly well.

Could he really afford to think about that right now?

There were more pressing matters, like end of semester exams, Christmas shopping (damn near impossible since he had no way to get out of the castle), McGunny's upcoming article, the Hogwart's Christmas Dance, and the Malfoy Christmas party in which he would be negotiating with Lucius for secrets and safety.

"Hermione, can I just skip the dance?" he asked hopefully from across the breakfast table.

She glowered at him.

"Harold James Potter don't you dare leave me alone with that boy."

"Draco will be there."

"That's not much comfort. I think he's trying to hook me up with Ron. He can be so utterly ridiculous sometimes."

Harry knew that wasn't the case, but he could hardly tell her that her brother had sold her out over a lost chess match.

"It's your fault you're in this mess in the first place. You didn't have to offer to go out with him."

His friend turned pink, and he would have laughed at her but she was already irritated with him.

"It was good manners. Besides, what would you do if you didn't go?"

"Not worry about it? I don't have a date yet, you know. Then there's the dressing up. It's just a hassle."

"Aw, come on, 'arry, id'll be fun," Clyde interrupted, not bothering to stop eating. "It's not wike dose snooty Pwurebwood pardies. No fence 'mione. It's a weal party. Jus ask Nadawie out. She'd do it in a 'artbeat."

Beside Hermione, Ginny grimaced, and he thought he knew how she felt. Clyde really needed to take etiquette lessons if he was going to eat at the big kid table.

"No, I'm going to the Malfoy party with her. The Hogwarts party just makes it kind of redundant."

After a few more protests, he manages to duck out of at least one concern. What should he work on now? The Malfoy party was on Saturday, exams started Monday, and he still didn't know how he was going to get through his Christmas list.

"Merlin's beard, they're a plague," Clyde growled, after he'd swallowed luckily. Harry looked up to see some six or seven GGs wandering into the Great Hall. They had been increasingly invasive over the last two weeks, wandering out from the mostly unused corridors and into the main halls and classrooms, quiet as can be but a definite distraction. There was talk of actually construction work sometime during break and the GGs were rushing to get their measurements and calculations done before then, at everyone else's expense.

"I don't know if I can put up with them for another four years," Clyde lamented. "Before you know it they'll start taking measurements of our dorm room while we're trying to sleep. Just wait."

Hermione said he was being silly. Harry wasn't so sure. He hadn't paid much attention to it before, but the GGs were popping up everywhere. Lately, he couldn't turn a corner without finding one hanging from the ceiling or crawling on the floor. He'd actually tripped over one Monday.

"They've started damming the moat," Ginny said softly, "I saw them doing it during Herbology. I talked to one of the engineers, and they said they're adding a basement underneath it before they start building over it. They'll have to completely re-dig the moat after this or it'll be running through the middle of the castle instead of around it. Though, that might be kind of interesting."

It had been weeks since Ginny and Harry had a decent conversation, and as part of his new 'Make My Life Less Shitty' plan, he wanted to fix things between them. Actually talking to one another seemed to be a good way to start.

“Really? Did they say when they'd start?”

“Tomorrow I think.”

“I wonder if the castle will shake?”

“Not if they're doing their jobs, it shouldn't,” Hermione said, frowning thoughtfully. “Otherwise you never know what will collapse. I guess that's why they're starting on an empty wing.”

It seemed a security risk to Harry, but there was no point in worrying about it. Either it was being taken care of or it wasn't, and nothing he said could change that.

“I hope there isn't a draft,” he said instead, earning a few giggles. And like a drop of blood attracts sharks, so too did that laugh attract the Weasley twins. They came out of no where (they had to nowadays else his godfathers toss them out a window again) and perched themselves on either side of Harry.

“Hey, Harry, you little minx. We haven't seen you around-” George began.

“Unguarded,” Fred inserted.

“-lately. Thought we'd check in on you. Make sure you haven't gotten boring on us.”

“Or that we haven't gotten boring. It's good to have an outside opinion on this.”

Harry raised a brow.

“You the ones who cursed the second corridor bathrooms to pour out slime instead of water?”

"Well, yeah," George said.

"And transfigured the Dueling Club's rapiers to turn to rubber?"

Fred chuckled, recalling the tasteless jokes that had resulted from that particular prank.

"Pretended to be George and kissed Angelina?"

George turned to Fred, scowling. "When did you do that?"

"Er..."

"You're both fine. The only thing that happened to me was Barlow. Blah, what a spider," he said, intentionally leaving out Lestrage. And Larousse. And Natalie. And- "Hey, perhaps you guys can help me with something."

He excused himself from the table and led the twins outside the Great Hall. Sirius and Remus followed discreetly, and despite their displeasure at the mischievous duo kept a respectful distance. Students and GGs were moving in and out, so they moved to a less trafficked end of corridor.

"What can we do for you, My Lord?" Fred crooned, the perfect image of corrupted innocence.

"I need advice."

Here the twins grinned wickedly at one another. Harry thought he better be more specific before they dragged him into something truly wicked.

"I earned quite a bit of money this summer and I want to buy some Christmas gifts, but I'm not allowed out of the castle. You all seem to smuggle the weirdest things in, perhaps you have some ideas?"

If possible the two Weasley's expressions became even more wicked. Fred actually hugged him.

"You make us so happy, My Lord!" he laughed. "We're going to have so much fun!"

George just nodded, but then looked cautiously over at his two loitering bodyguards, pacing a short distance away.

"Of course, it all depends on them. Think you could get them to leave you alone for a few hours?"

Harry merely shook his head, now wondering how wise it was to come to them for advice after all. Still, their enthusiasm was contagious. It had been such a long time since he'd just joked and planned silly things with his friends. Lately, it had all been homework and plotting and political maneuvering.

"Well, what are the chances of them letting you out of the castle?" George tried again, though he looked skeptical. That stirred Harry's interest even more. Out of the castle? He hadn't even stepped onto the grounds for anything other than Herbology since November!

"I think I might convince them, so long as they can come along. They're protective, but they have a really good sense of adventure, you know. They had a lot of fun when they went to school here," Harry said, then looked over at Sirius. "What do you think?"

"Sounds like fun," Sirius called back.

The twins were startled. "They could hear us from there?"

"Of course."

"Wicked," they said, grinning. Fred continued with, "Alright, meet us Saturday in the owlry, seven A.M. sharp, and bring your money with you. We're going to Hogsmeade!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Friday morning, Larousse realized she was being followed. She wasn't sure how long she had been followed, perhaps it had been happening since Tuesday or perhaps that morning was the first time, but she had this sudden feeling while eating a breakfast in her hotel's cafe and when she looked up it was to see a man bolting behind a corner. At first, she thought perhaps Morgan had sent one of his men to keep track of her in case she found something or got into trouble, then realized she would have noticed such a person following her from the beginning. Sentinels were easy to spot if one knew how to look.

So she pretended not to notice, and reviewed her notes from the last couple of days. If she had to choose off the top of her head where she had picked up her stalker she would have chosen either the pub in Knockturn Alley from Tuesday or the bookstore in Nottigham from Wednesday. They had been the most suspicious or at least the easiest places to conceal someone. She had been dutifully spreading her tale of Hogwarts teacher on a shopping trip at every place she investigated, hoping Moody would some how hear and take the bait. After the attempt with Quick, she knew she made an almost irresistible temptation. She borrowed an owl from the hotel receptionist to send Morgan a note, then went hunting.

First there was the clothing store, then the gift shop, a bakery, and various other sorts of stores a person might obtain Christmas presents. She didn't see her stalker again, but she knew he was there. Now that she was aware of him, she could sense him. After dropping off some of her packages at the hotel, and confirming that Morgan hadn't sent a reply yet, she went out again.

This time, hands free, she headed towards Wisteria Wandering, a little Bohemian neighborhood with a lot of art studios and long stretches of empty buildings and dark alleys. She turned into one of these alleys, ducked into a doorway and waited. A moment later, the man from that morning appeared.

He was nondescript, modestly dressed in old but tidy cloak and bowler hat, clean shaven and dark haired. He hurried down the alley, but when he reached the end he hesitated. He must have realized he lost her trail. While he was distracted, she wordlessly cast a tracking spell on him and retreated further into the shadows.

Her stalker waited for another hour, likely hoping she'd reappear out of one of the studios, but eventually gave up and headed back the way he'd come. Once he was out of sight, Larousse followed him. With her tracking spell activated, she didn't need to actually see him to follow, which was good because he used the floo twice. The first time was to a public floo in London, where he met up with another man, tall and lanky, and together they took the same floo to Edinburgh. They ate lunch in a pub, and while they were thus occupied, she sent an urgent missive to Morgan again, this time through the neighborhood Sentinel Station.

"If you tell us where they are, we can arrest them immediately," the Head Sentinel had said.

"No, Chief Sentinel Morgan was very clear about my instructions," she lied, "I am to follow them until they lead me to their Headquarters and only then should I contact him for specific instructions. This is a very delicate situation."

"Of course, Sentinel Larousse, I understand completely. My men and I are at your disposal."

They saluted each other, and she made a hasty retreat. The men weren't at the pub any more when she arrived, but she tracked them down to an abandoned textile mill just on the edge of a muggle district. It made her nervous, but she couldn't go back.

She was so close, she could feel it. Not only had she possibly found Moody, but his cohorts as well. If she could catch them by surprise, she could catch them all. Harry would be safe at last. Voldemort would grant her custody. Her and Severus would get married and adopt Harry, and they'd live together in Severus' beautiful little house in the country and by this time next year she'd be pregnant again. They'd be a wonderful family, proud and handsome and accomplished. Harry would get over his godfathers soon enough when he saw the life she could give him, the full sort of life he'd had before his parents' murder. A father to guide him, a mother to love him, and little brothers and sisters to look up to him.

It would all be so perfect.

But she had to catch Moody first.

Casting a few anti-detection charms on herself, she circled the warehouse, checking for exit and entry points. There were four doors, one on each side, and she laid down traps in case anyone tried to flee. She could do nothing about the windows. They were too large and too numerous to charm without detection. She risked a few quick peeks inside as she went. There were four people now, one of them a woman, but none that she recognized all crowded around a crate they were using as a table. It was too dark inside for her to get a good look from where she was.

Cautiously, she went to the back of the building and climbed a fire escape to the second story entry, casting several silencing charms as she went. She didn't enter through the door, thinking it was probably charmed with some sort of alarm, but knocked out the glass from a window and climbed inside. It was all perfectly silent, and she hoped that no one noticed the increase of light from her position. Stealthily, she crept further into the warehouse.

It was dark on the second floor, the many windows layered with dirt or paint or boards, and it stank of animal piss and bird droppings. She kept to the spaces where the shadows weren't as thick, skirting strange silhouettes of industrial machinery, until she exited through an open doorway and onto a walkway. More silencing spells, but the danger here was still great. The walkway was metal mesh, allowing her to look down to the level below, but also for anyone to look up and see her as well. She had to risk it.

Navigating past boards and old newspapers, she found a spot near the stairs where a tarp and some overturned planks provided her some cover for her to observe from. Her view wasn't perfect, but she got a good idea of what was happening. The woman, younger than her, was arguing with the men, but they obviously weren't listening.

"We shouldn't be following this woman," the lone female insisted, "She's obviously a trap. What kind of teacher leaves the school a week and a half before holidays? I'm telling you it's a set up."

"Don't be daft. We got confirmation. She's a teacher just like she was saying. First time teaching so she's a bit irresponsible. Nothing odd about that."

"Oh, come on, does she look like a history teacher to you?"

"I wish my history teacher looked like her," one of the men snickered.

"Shut up, Blue."

"Look, Green, all she's done is shop and shop and shop," said the man Larousse recognized from the alley. "She puts my wife to shame. It's too bad I lost track of her, but it isn't strange. We'll get confirmation that she's legit in a few hours and then pick her up tonight at the hotel. If she keeps her pattern she'll leave for dinner around seven-thirty."

"I just don't like this. We screwed up with the last subject, what makes you think it will work a second time around?"

"We didn't have an insider the first time. This works a lot better. Stop worrying."

The woman wasn't satisfied, shaking her head and pacing back and forth. As Larousse's eyes adjusted she could make out the shape of a chair with chains hanging from it and a bucket underneath it. It made her shiver, realizing this must have been where they kept Quick.

"I still don't like it. If she is a teacher... Merlin, it's not like the last time. He was a Death Eater. A monster. This isn't right."

"Oh, stop being a ninny. She's one of Voldemort's bloody people, as bad as any Death Eater. How many kids you think she's convinced that Dumbledore is the Devil and Voldemort a saint? At least you could tell a Death Eater is a monster. She's something worse in my opinion."

He spat to emphasize his point. Larousse wrinkled her nose. Disgusting. As if this worm had any right to criticize her after trying to murder a child. Sick bastard.

"Whatever, Red, I still don't like it."

"Dumbledore knows what he's doing," Red said.

"Dumbledore's ass isn't on the line here."

Deciding she'd heard enough, Larousse made her move. Soundlessly, she cast a full body bind on the woman called Green. She stiffened like a board and fell over.

"Green, what is-"

"Get down stupid!" Red yelled, shoving Blue behind a stack of crates while he dived for another. The third man, the lanky fellow who'd been silent, ducked down, but he didn't know where the threat was coming from and sought shelter on the wrong side. A disarming spell sent him flying into a stack of crates. Red and Blue located her a moment later, blasting hexes and revealing charms, but they bounced off her shields and only served to temporarily unbalance her as the floor lurched beneath her feet. Blue made a run for it, but the trap she'd laid in the door way came down on him like a lightening bolt, leaving him a smoldering mess of burnt hair and flopping limbs.

Three of the four incapacitated, she gave up her stealth for the benefit of position, leaping towards the edge of the platform and screaming out curse after curse.

"Dirumpor! Excido caput! Sanguis ferventi!"

The last one must have caught him for there was an ear splitting shriek and sickening wet sound, and then all was silent. Larousse took a deep breath, feeling her heart racing and her hands shaking. She remained where she was for several moments, knowing none of the those still alive would be getting up any time soon, and tried to compose herself. It took longer than she expected. It had been too long since she was in the field.

At last, when her hands were still, she cautiously climbed down the stairs, her wand poised in case she had missed some one. There was no one else. She checked each of her prisoners, casting revealing charms on them, but aside from the woman no one was in disguise.

None of them was Moody.

Dammit.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort received news of Larousse's misadventure twenty minutes after she had contacted Morgan. To say he was surprised was an understatement. After the woman had left his office last week, he hadn't thought he'd hear from her again. He wasn't entirely sure he was pleased to be proven wrong.

He had been impressed with her ambition, with her drive, when she had first sought audience with him. Her familial interests weren't as attractive, but he could appreciate her vision. She had a dream, and she dreamed big, and that was always a thing to admire.

It didn't necessarily mean he'd allow her dreams to come true.

She was crazy, after all.

"Clarence, get in here," he commanded, and a moment later his secretary entered, carefully sidestepping the cursed filing cabinet. "I need to you to contact Commander Malfoy or his wife and tell them to extend an invitation to Vesper Larousse for their Christmas party. Make it clear this is not a suggestion."

"Yes, sir," his servant said dutifully, scribbling down his instructions on his note pad.

"Also, inform Headmistress Lestrage that I will be pulling Harry out of school for the Solistice. Three days at least. The werewolves will remain behind. You should probably inform my house staff as well."

"This will be your Bristol estate, correct?"

"Yes, but I want my London suite open just in case."

"Very good, sir. Anything else?"

"Press conference tomorrow morning, don't bother with a specific time, but tell them it's important. Morgan's made a break in the Moody case."

"Excellent news, sir."

Voldemort's only response was to gesture the man to leave. Alone again, he reviewed his schedule for the next couple of weeks, filling in new information and making a note to cancel some meetings and make room for others. The latest break in the Moody case was encouraging, but not necessarily the end of things. The conspirators probably didn't have a clue about Moody, but they made delicious fodder for the press. It could prove troublesome if, despite the capture of his supposed allies, the real fugitive remained free for long.

It would embarrass the Sentinels. Of course, so would the knowledge that a civilian had succeeded where the Court had failed. He would need to speak with Larousse soon.

What a mess. If had known Larousse was this capable he wouldn't have fired her all those years ago. Morgan had warned him. Ah, but what else could he do? Aside from let the werewolves kill her... come to think of it that was still an option. But no, that was no way to treat Severus' fiancée. Crazy or not, she was perfect for him.

Not so much for Harry, he thought, but then who was?

If any woman were to influence his young protege, she was as likely as anyone. Severus and his new bride adopting Harry would relieve a lot of political tension resulting from Harry's parentage. Loyal parents meant a loyal child in the public eye, and if they weren't his real parents it was a minor detail. Harry's new parents would be the one reaping the rewards of his position, after all.

He had to speak with Harry first, not so much to ask his opinion, but to gauge his overall reaction. Snape had been reporting an increasing independence in Harry, and Voldemort was loath to cripple its development. Adoption could work in either direction, creating either reliance or rebellion.

Tomorrow's Christmas party would be essential in determining his decisions on several matters. How would the other purebloods respond to Larousse's re-emergence after years of social exile and her eventual marriage to Severus? How serious was his potion's master about marrying her anyway? Did his plans truly align with her dreams? Would Larousse attempt to push her bid for adoption after her recent exploit? How would Harry respond to Voldemort's mention of possible adoption? He wasn't going to rush into these matters until he had a clearer view of the situation, and Harry's adoption wouldn't likely be resolved before the end of the year, but he wanted a definite idea of where things stood.

The Solstice was another matter entirely. It had been months since he'd been able to spend any time with Harry, and now was an important time for his protégé. The boy was emerging into his own, magically and politically, and Voldemort wanted to be there. The Solstice was the perfect opportunity for him to teach Harry some more of the arcane magics, to discuss the nuances of politics, and just generally reconnect away from everyone else.

He was surprised to find himself looking forward to it.

He supposed that meant he should go downstairs and torture his new prisoners. It wouldn't do to be going soft now.

Book III:

Chapter 16: Royal Negotiations

Harry was up at an ungodly hour for a Saturday. It was a mortal sin for any students to be up earlier on weekend than they were on a weekday, but the young Gryffindor supposed that was the price of being a sneak. He went through his morning routine as quietly as possible. All around him his dorm mates snored and sniffled in their sleep, all warm and cozy, and it wouldn't due to wake them. Clyde in particular would wonder what he was up to.

Showered and dressed, he gathered up both his Baluvian cloak and his regular black one and crept out of the tower. Sirius and Remus were waiting for him with breakfast, eggs and sausage wrapped in a pancake, and quickly escorted him into an empty corridor.

"Are you sure about this?" Remus asked quietly. "It's risky."

Sirius didn't look nearly as worried. "Nah, it'll be like old times. Remember when we used to sneak out? We had a blast! Besides, if I don't get out of this castle soon the I'm going to be risky. I haven't run since the full moon."

"We weren't targeted for assassination."

"I don't know about that, Filch had it in for us. Snape too. We're lucky Dum... er, the headmaster liked us so much or we'd have been expelled for sure."

"Oh that's comforting," Harry said, irony hardly lost on him. "Though, I've got something on the headmistress even if I did get caught I might be able to get away with it."

Sirius chuckled. Remus did not.

"How much do you trust these Weasley boys?" the beta asked skeptically.

Harry considered.

"In what sense? They wouldn't rat me out or intentionally get me in trouble. They've been good friends, even when the rest of Gryffindor wasn't very happy with me."

Remus sighed and gave up. He wasn't going to convince Harry of abandoning this venture, and even he doubted there was much to worry about. The chances of Moody just waiting for Harry in Hogsmeade were slim.

"Don't worry so much," Harry said. "I promise to be very careful."

After that, there really wasn't any turning back. They met the Weasley twins just outside the owlry. They greeted Harry warmly, admired his Baluvian cloak for a bit, then got down to business. George pulled out what appeared to be a box of candy, and tossed it on the ground and flicked his wand at it.

"Revelo."

Immediately, the box grew into a travel chest, covered in stickers promoting tours and exotic foods and strange sights. Fred explained.

"This used to be our uncle Benjamin. He got to travel a lot during the war, but he's stuck in Ireland now so he gave it to us. We never could figure out how he afforded it, but we suspect he was doing some smuggling for some extra cash."

The twins opened the box, which was filled with clothes. They ignored those, and started tapping on the sides of the trunk and on the strange symbols that were burned onto the bottom of it. The chest's sides fell open and collections of strange objects fell out onto the inside of the trunk. Harry could only stare curiously. He didn't recognize any of the items.

Sirius must have though, because he let out a barking laugh.

"It's an Incognito Kit. Professional quality too. You're uncle really was up to no good."

The twins grinned.

"We could say the same of you, Mr. Blackbone, if you actually recognize what this is," Fred pointed out. Sirius just smirked.

"What's an Incognito Kit?" Harry asked.

Remus explained. "It's just what it sounds like. If you want to go out in disguise then this is what you want to have. It contains all sorts of magical objects and potions and props. Some less reputable shops will sell them under the counter, but most people assemble them themselves."

"Neat. So we're going in disguise? Who am I going as? Why don't we just use disguise charms?"

"Too easy to see through and they fade too quickly," Fred said. "And you're going as Ron."

Harry made a face, and everyone laughed at him. "Ron is best. We know he's staying at Hogwarts today, so you don't have to worry about running into him and no one is going to question him wandering around," George said.

"Especially Slytherins," Fred added.

"We can't just make up a person?"

"Too risky. There's going to be students all over the place. Someone is bound to notice a strange kid hanging out with us. No one is going to question Ron holiday shopping with his brothers."

Harry conceded, and they immediately went to work. The twins had ties and scarves and badges from all of the Houses, and quickly replaced Harry's Gryffindor colors. Potions followed next. One that tasted like sour lemons turned his hair brilliant orangey-red (though it was as ridiculously unmanageable as ever) and a coppery one gave him freckles. They wanted to use a purple potion to temporarily fix his eyes, but Harry knew from experience how unreliable such concoctions were. Instead, he showed them all a trick or two by charming his glasses invisible and making his eyes appear brown at the same time, both spells he'd learned from Hermione's book for charming glasses she had given him during first year. Bless her academic inclinations.

In the end, he looked very Weasley-ish, and as long as no one familiar with Ron got a close look it would work out just fine.

They turned their attention to the two werewolves, and Remus very reluctantly submitted himself to being dressed up like a GG. Sirius refused.

"I've got the perfect disguise already," he said, then turning a warning glare at the twins, "If you tell anyone about this, you die."

Within seconds Sirius' barbaric countenance was replaced by a rather mangy looking dog. A big mean mangy looking dog. The twins just stood there and goggled. Harry laughed in delight, and ran his fingers through Sirius' coat. It was rough and wiry, and underneath he could feel powerful muscles ripple with every movement. He was just the sort of dog that could run with a werewolf without fear.

"That's incredible."

Sirius gave him a doggy smile and preened. Remus rolled his eyes.

"Don't inflate his ego anymore than it already is. Come on. We'll want to get to Hogsmeade and back before the big crowds arrive. That should give us until eleven."

"Aye, aye, Captain," the twins agreed.

"How are we going to get out?" Harry asked. "We'll look weird going through the front gate."

"Yeah," Fred agreed, "Plus it won't open for another hour and then a teacher will be posted to check for permission slips, which you don't have. We're going to take an alternate route."

"The moat?"

“Normally, we could just walk over it, but the Sentinels but up wards against that. Nope, it just so happens that the GGs left a nice little opening in the wall and across the moat. We tested them yesterday. There aren't any wards up there. There isn't any magic at all. I think the castle would start attacking them if it sensed its walls were being torn down.”

Remus looked horrified. “You mean they left the castle completely defenseless? Not even a sentry?”

“Well they warded both ends of the corridor, but they were careless. They didn't know about the hidden passageway behind the tapestries.”

Remus shook his head. He suppose, if nothing else, this trip would reveal some of Hogwarts security risks. They traveled down a third floor corridor and from there took several secret passages he could easily remember from his youth, crossing into open areas only when necessary, until at last they exited through a tapestry of a chimera and into the construction area.

The air was cold, without protection from the outdoors, and bare but for a few tapestries left on the walls. A series of white cloth tarps had been hung to keep out snow and birds, and rippled from the wind. Harry wrapped his Baluvian cloak tighter around himself, unprepared for the nipping cold after spending so little time outside.

Sirius, in dog form, trotted ahead, sniffing the air for potential danger. He made various doggy gestures that Remus interpreted for them as 'all clear'. They slipped through the openings and into the open air.

The sky was dark blue to the west and brilliant pink to the east with the rows of bright orange clouds, the tiniest speck of sun peeking over the horizon. Harry smiled, taking in the simple grandeur of it, until Fred urged him forward.

“Best be quick before someone spots us, yeah?”

There was only a bit of stone flooring left after exiting the flimsy barriers before the walls simply disappeared. There were no piles of rubble or broken pieces of stone, but a clean opening as if the castle had been built with it there already. Beyond that the floor fell out into what was once part of the moat, but now was little more than a rocky ditch, slick from ice. They made their way down carefully, and even more carefully climbed back out, their shoes and paws slipping dangerously as they went.

“Now what?” Harry asked, once they were safely on the other side.

“Now we take you some place special. You won't believe it,” George said. Instead of heading towards the road like Harry thought they would, they went further afield to a cluster of bare trees near the lake. He was familiar with many of the trees. He'd had picnics underneath them with his friends several times, but they had all been green and thick with blooms. Only the Everbloom tree was in flower now, its large white flowers barely visible through the layers of snow.

And out of all those trees, Harry was alarmed to see they were heading straight for the Whomping Willow.

“Don't worry, Harry,” Remus said. “I know where we're going now. The Whomping Willow hibernates this deep into winter.”

A bit uneasily, Harry followed the others. Sirius seemed to know exactly where to go, for he rushed for a spot at the base of the tree, and after a few moments of digging, disappeared.

“How did you-” the twins begin.

“This was our school long before it was yours,” Remus said, then climbed in. Harry followed cautiously, then the twins.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was flabbergasted to learn that the most haunted place in Britain was anything but. The Shrieking Shack was quiet and spooky, but the only dead things lingering there were cobwebs. By now the twins were interrogating Remus about how much he knew about Hogwarts's many secrets and what adventures he'd had there, as both student and werewolf. It seemed Harry's godliness somehow extended to his godfathers now, and Fred and George were starry eyed as they made their way into Hogsmeade.

Harry left his trademark fur cloak at the shack, assured that it would be perfectly safe there, and traded it for his now much cleaner and drier school cloak. Sirius and Remus went on ahead so as not to arouse suspicion, and the twins immediately dragged Harry to Zonko's. The store wasn't open yet, but the clerks were puttering around the store in preparation for the holiday rush. They all seemed to recognize the twins and unlocked the door to let them in.

"Welcome, welcome! You've brought one of your brothers! Which one is this, I don't recognize him." greeted a congenial man with coke-bottle glasses and a dark green mustache.

"This is Eric," Fred said, "And he's a cousin. He's got the Weasley gift though."

"Ah, very good. Then you'll have to show him some of the new stuff. It's in the Special Clients room," the man said, and winked. The twins grinned and immediately took him towards the back. Harry looked around, amazed at the array of novelties and oddities that filed every shelf and display case and storage bin.

"There will be time for that later," Fred assured him. "The best stuff is always in back."

oo
oo

And the twins were right. All of the best stuff was in back, and they seemed to have access to the back room of every shop in Hogsmeade. They charmed, flattered, impressed, and conned their way into the hearts of the owners and clerks, and none seemed immune. Harry bought several one of a kind items and even some art supplies and supplies for creating or specializing some other gifts. He spent way more than he probably should have, but managed to hand over just a little bit more for treats at Madam Pudifoots to thank the twins.

It was a wonderful morning, and just what he needed. Blessed anonymity and time spent with friends, doing normal things without worrying about attacks or gossip. Sirius and Remus only made themselves known briefly, usually just long enough to glimpse each other, and it seemed Remus had managed some shopping as well because at one point Harry saw he had a long narrow box.

It was 11:20am when they finally returned to the castle, tired but relaxed and happy. The GGs had shown up for construction, so Harry and the twins had to sneak back into the castle from the front, slipping in when a large group was coming out, their scarves and hats pulled around their faces as if to fight off the cold. Vector was so busy checking permission slips going out, she didn't even bother checking on those students coming back in.

Remus had wandered in through the construction site, no one paying any mind to him as they toiled like ants. Sirius stayed outside for another hour, running around the grounds on the pretext of checking for Moody or any other unusual smells, but Harry and Remus both knew he was enjoying his romp. He eventually reappeared back at their private room. There was bits of fur and blood on his face and clothes. Remus identified it as rabbit.

After removing his disguise and carefully stowing his things in his trunk, they all went down to lunch. Harry was quite convinced they had managed to pull things off without a hitch, until Hermione came up behind him in the Great Hall and slapped him upside the head.

"Harold James Potter," she snarled, "Where have you been?! I looked all over the castle this morning!"

He rubbed his head, and awarded her an annoyed look.

"I was with Sirius and Remus, alright mother?"

"Where? I tried a Locating Spell and still couldn't find you!"

“Calm down. I've got an anti-locating spell on me since the poisoning. So no one can stalk me... unless they have the counter-spell of course.”

She let out a frustrated sound and sat down.

“I don't suppose you've read the paper, then?”

Harry felt his good mood plummet. He hated the line 'have you read the paper?' Nothing good seemed to come from it. Seeing that he hadn't, she handed him her copy and continued.

“There's been a break in the Moody case. There was a raid yesterday morning and three people were caught and another one killed. None were Moody, but it's definitely progress.”

It was good news after all. The picture on the front showed three rather battered looking individuals being hauled away in a crowd of uniforms and camera flashes.

“That's great. Where was this?”

“Edinburgh. That isn't far from here. But that isn't all.”

Okay, so the news might not be all good.

“What?”

Hermione leaned in, talking low.

“I think Professor Larousse helped catch them!”

“What?! I thought she took the week off because she was sick?”

“No, she took her sick days off, but you don't need to be sick for those. Listen, she was gone since Tuesday, but just after these arrests Draco got an owl from Lucius with an invitation to our Christmas Party for her. I think she left to help catch the terrorists and what ever she did worked, and now she's in good with the Dark Lord. I think he is the one that invited her.”

"I don't know, Hermione, that's kind of a stretch."

"Not really. She is an ex-Sentinel and she's been really worried about the attacks on you and the school, so I don't think it would be weird of her to find some way to help."

"Or Snape could have asked for her to be invited. You know, like as a date? They're pretty chummy," Harry pointed out.

She just shook her head. "He wouldn't have asked last minute. I've got a feeling about this. Call it journalistic instinct."

Harry wasn't so sure.

"Then she's back in the castle?"

"I don't know. Draco had to drop off her invite with Uncle Severus."

"Well, if she shows up tonight, you can always ask her. I think the paper would have mentioned it though, but I'd give you props if your theory turns out to be true."

"You want to make a wager on it?" she challenged. He smirked at her.

"I learned my lesson from your mistake, thanks."

"Harry!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The remainder of the day was spent getting ready for that night. He wrapped a few of his Christmas gifts, and then set to work on looking presentable. This created an opportunity to reconnect with Clyde and Ginny. They dragged out some of the formal clothes from Harry's closet, rifled through an issue of Wizarding Wardrobe that Draco had lent (thrown at) him, and got to work.

Ginny's mother had taught her how to make clothes, not so much as a profession, but out of a need to conserve funds and she admitted most of her own wardrobe was handmade. Harry, remembering the twin's smooth talking lines in Hogsmeade, tried a few of them on her, saying he desperately needed her talents and he didn't trust anyone else to help him. She'd turned red and stuttered, but agreed.

Clyde worked as a counterweight to Ginny's stylistic preferences. She enjoyed ornamentation and patterns. Clyde was quick to point out when she was turning Harry's clothes into a dress with pants. They argued and teased each other, and laughed whenever Harry had to try on their creation that didn't work. Most of them didn't. At last, after several rounds of hysterical laughter at Harry's expense, Ginny had managed to re-make the clothes Voldemort had given him. They were tighter, making Harry look taller with a white high collar that remained partially unbuttoned and over extended lapel for his black jacket embroidered with an even darker black thorns in velvet, that seemed to grow before the eyes. It gave him a roguish vampire look, sans the unattractive layer of grave dirt of course.

"You're a genius, Ginny!" Harry said, and he meant it too. He looked good. Even Clyde was looking impressed.

"Not bad. I didn't think someone as tom boyish as you would be able to pull it off!"

"Oh, shut up Clyde!"

He thanked her profusely for several more minutes, before he realized he was running out of time. He brushed his hair (useless), cleaned his teeth, trimmed his nails, polished his shoes, and charmed his glasses invisible (the twins had insisted he went 'rimless' for a night). While he was busy, Clyde opened his trunk to get his Baluvian cloak and made a rather startling discovery.

"Harry, why is your cloak all wet and dirty?"

"Er..."

Ginny looked horrified.

"You didn't go outside did you?!"

"Um... just this once. And I had Sirius and Remus with me. Honest!"

"Harry!" both his friends exclaimed. He hushed them with his finger.

"Do you want the entire school to know?" he said, "I was careful, and it was only to get some shopping done, and all those people got caught yesterday in Edinburgh. I promise it was just this once."

Ginny didn't look at all convinced, but Clyde seemed to understand.

"I get it mate. You're used to being outside and going where you want and then all this junk happens and it's like you're grounded for a fight someone else started," he said, knowingly.

"But what if Moody found you? What if a teacher found out?" Ginny said. Harry shrugged.

"Moody could never have guessed I would sneak into Hogsmeade today, and I did keep my godfathers around for protection. Besides, what would a teacher do? Ground me again?"

"Harry..."

"Don't worry guys, it really was just this once. I promise."

They relented, and just in time too, because he just had long enough to spell his cloak clean before Hermione came rushing up the stairs to get him. He bid them goodnight and escorted Hermione down to the main floor. Everyone they passed stopped to stare, and few of the more daring even let out a cat call.

Their Slytherin companions and Larousse were already waiting for them. For a woman Hermione thought had been battling terrorists the day before, she looked very good in her shimmery black evening gown, little crystal butterflies woven into her short hair. Or perhaps she just looked good when she stood next to Snape, who looked as unpleasant as ever.

"You look like a hooligan," the potion's master muttered when he saw Harry. The Gryffindor just grinned at him cheekily.

"If it walks like a duck..."

They all looked at him funny, and he sighed.

"Muggle saying. Never mind. Hi, Natalie."

He let Hermione go, and she headed towards Draco, while he made his way over to Natalie. She was dressed similarly to Larousse, only in white velvet and translucent silk wrapped around her arms and shoulders. Her smile told him she clearly didn't agree with Snape's assessment, or if she did she really liked hooligans. You could never tell with Natalie.

She held out her arm expectantly, and he grinned. It had taken him a couple of days, but he realized that her demand for a corsage hadn't been simply to make his life difficult. It had been a challenge, a game, and he could admit to being very competitive.

From his pocket, he pulled out a box, and opened it. It was the corsage. The blooms were from an Everbloom tree, large white blossoms with a hint of pink in the center, and a sprig of holly berries both easily found amongst Hogwarts's many decorations, all attached to silky white ribbon. She gave him a mock glare.

"Cheater," she said, but let him tie it to her wrist anyway.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It took Harry exactly forty-six minutes to get into trouble. The ball had barely started, and Harry was taking advantage of the mostly empty dance floor to have Natalie teach him a few moves, while Draco and Hermione gave advice and critiques from the sidelines. They were all laughing, even Harry who was doing very badly at the fancier moves. It seemed he was better at dancing around a bonfire with werewolves than dancing around a ballroom surrounded by Purebloods. Funny, he thought the one would have prepared him for the other.

There was a great deal of staring and whispers at first, but Natalie was good at distracting him (i.e. demanding his attention be on her) and soon Harry didn't notice at all and the crowds seemed to lose interest. The truly dangerous people weren't around to provoke them yet, most being Death Eaters who headed straight for the parlor and the Dark Lord waiting for them there. Draco said as soon as they were done, he'd take him to see his father in private and avoid the worst of it.

Thank Merlin, Draco was his friend and not his enemy.

And then, out of nowhere, Lestrage appeared and cut in.

"Pardon me, Miss Cypher, but I'm going to borrow your date for a moment," the Headmistress said, falsely pleasant as she practically snatched his hands out of Natalie's. Harry stumbled a bit as he was dragged further away from his friends and into the maelstrom of twirling bodies. A waltz. At least he knew that one, but that was very small comfort as she grabbed his other hand and forced him into the proper position. He was still too short to dance with her properly, his eyes level with her bosom (and she was rather chesty), but he tried very hard not to simply let her drag him all over the dance floor. He managed not to misstep for the most part, but he was hardly the picture of elegant sophistication.

"What do you want?" he said after he was confident enough in his footing to risk split concentration. Her smile was hard.

"Can't you guess?"

"Why bother when you can just dig yourself a deeper grave by threatening me?"

"Threaten you, Harry? Why would I have to threaten you?"

"Because Voldemort-"

She threw back her head and laughed, and he felt his cheeks burn as the witches and wizards turned their heads to look at them. They danced silently until everyone was ignoring them again.

"It was the Dark Lord's idea," she said.

"You're lying."

"Of course you'd say that. You think he's really your friend, after all. Isn't that so sweet? But the truth is the Dark Lord doesn't have friends. He has pawns and he has minions. I'm a minion. You're a pawn. Which of us do you think really knows what's going on? Hm?"

"You're just trying to get yourself out of trouble. You wouldn't be here trying to bluff otherwise."

"Oh, that's good. We really should have stuck you in Slytherin. Normally, this would be true, but right now we're both going to lose if you talk to him."

Harry, tired of looking at her mouth, made a quick sweep of the room. His friends were on the sidelines, wondering what was going on, but he didn't dare acknowledge them. She might think he had told them and he didn't want to get them into any trouble. Draco frowned and stalked away.

"You have until the end of this waltz to convince me or I'm stepping on your foot and making a run for it," he said sharply. He wanted to stop immediately, but she might follow him or keep him from escaping. If he had to pretend to be susceptible to her suggestion for him to get back to his friends, he'd play his part.

"Like I said, it was his idea. He wants to know your secrets, especially about Blackbone. You know they are political enemies? He wanted your secrets on him without your thinking he'd betrayed you. So he told me to do it, and then pretend it was for blackmail. You'd never have been able to tell anyone and he wouldn't be expected to punish me. But you surprised me. I failed. Now if you tell him he's going to punish me. I'll probably lose my job."

"Oh, boo hoo."

"And then he'll send someone else to Legilimens you. Probably, Snape."

Harry tensed. Could that be true? No, of course not. She was just trying to save her skin. Voldemort wouldn't... okay, he probably would, but... this was her idea. It had to be. She was desperate and clever and Slytherin, and he couldn't look in her eyes to see if was lying or not.

"So what do you propose?"

"Tell me something about Blackbone."

"No."

"It doesn't have to be true. Just something to feed to the Dark Lord so he thinks I succeeded. It could work out for the both us. We would make much better allies than enemies. What do you say?"

"I say the waltz is over."

The music had indeed stopped, and he tried to pull away but her hand tightened around his fingers until were being crushed together. He winced and clenched his teeth, his eyes watering from the pain.

"Step on my foot and I'll break your fingers, you little bas-"

"Bella! There you are. Excuse me, young man."

Lucius Malfoy appeared like the second coming of Christ. Harry could have sworn he saw a halo surrounding the man as he cut in, but that was probably just the glare from his teary eyes. Quickly he made his escape off the dance floor and straight out the balcony doors. Blessedly quiet and empty, and he wiped the tears of pain from his eyes before anyone could notice. He wasn't surprised when Natalie appeared by his side a second later.

"Are you alright?" she asked, placing her hand on his arm. He smiled weakly and nodded.

"I'm okay. I really don't like that woman though."

Hermione and Draco showed up a moment later. He turned to Draco.

"Was Lucius your doing?"

The Malfoy heir smirked.

"Thanks."

"What's going on?" Hermione demanded. "Did she do something to you? You looked like you were in pain."

Harry shook his head. "She just wanted to get a little revenge for me slipping through punishment over Barlow. My fingers are a little crushed is all. Nothing broken."

He wiggled his fingers to prove it, but some of them were starting to swell and bruise already. Natalie scooped up some snow from the balcony rail and took Harry's hands into hers.

"That should help a little with the swelling. That dirty old hag. I hope Snape throws her from the tower."

That made Harry laugh, then hiss as some of the snow melted and dripped down his sleeve.

"Well, she's gone for now at least," Hermione said, "Lucius must have taken her to the parlor."

"How long do you think they'll be?"

"At least an hour, probably more. Do you still want to hang around here or do you want a tour instead? Nothing interesting is going to happen until the old fogies are done getting drunk."

"Draco!"

“Well, that's what father says! That's why they all meet in the parlor and not the conservatory. All that fine booze they filch from him.”

Harry and Natalie laughed while Hermione turned pink.

“The tour sounds like fun. Why didn't we do this last time?” Harry said as he followed the siblings back inside, Natalie's arm wrapped around his and her snow cold hands soothing in his.

“Had all those goons with me then. As if I wanted all those people knowing the layout of my house. I was convinced Weasley might show up to steal something if I did.”

“Draco, that's awful. You're both friends now.”

“Well, yes. Doesn't mean I'd trust him alone with the silverware though.”

They left the ballroom, skirting a majority of the guests and the greetings and the snide remarks veiled as something else. The hallway was mostly empty but for the occasional house elf scurrying to get things done.

“Why didn't you invite him anyway?” Harry asked, though he didn't mind the boy's absence.

“I did. He turned me down. Incurable brat. He said he had better things to do again.”

Even Harry couldn't help but admire Ron's cheek for that.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“She's quite a remarkable woman,” Lucius said, offering Severus his preferred cognac. “Even if she is a little quirky.”

“Only you would consider ambition and pragmatism in a woman as 'quirky',” his friend replied, accepting the glass. From beside the bar they had a clear view of the entire room, including Vesper Larousse, dressed like a lady, talking like a soldier, and sending coy little smiles at her fiancée when half the menfolk were hovering around her.

“Are you really going to marry her?”

“I intend to. You've seen her ring?”

“Yes.”

“It was my mother's.”

Lucius actually looked surprised.

“You really are serious about her. Is it love? Please don't tell me she's ruined you already.”

“If love can be convenient and enjoyable at the same time, then I suppose it is. She's going to make a wonderful mother, if she doesn't spoil the children rotten. I suppose my job will be to keep that from happening.”

“Children? You're going to have more than one?”

Snape smirked. “Primo pater, Lucius. I have to make sure my line doesn't die out before it's even started. Besides, she wants at least five.”

Lucius laughed. His friend had gone mad. It had to be love. Or the woman was drugging his tea. He hadn't heard Severus sound so enthusiastic about his future since they were both just school boys. Well, if this was what he truly wanted, Lucius wished him the best of luck. The world needed more Snapes anyway. They were good counter agents to the Weasley invasion.

“I'm going to duck out for a while,” Lucius said. “You can introduce me to your lady after the fireworks.”

Snape just nodded and went to rescue 'his lady' from her hoard of admirers. Lucius stepped up to his wife, chatting with some of the abandoned women, and kissed her cheek.

"Make sure your sister doesn't leave before I get back?" he whispered in her ear. She giggled and slapped his shoulder as if he'd whispered a flirtation in her ear, but he wasn't even out of the room yet before she managed to rope a rather distracted Bellatrix from the parlor window. Voldemort was in his customary position near the fireplace, looking almost as distracted as Bella, but Lucius doubted it was for the same reasons. The Dark Lord was facing difficult times, preparing for a war he believed inevitable and placating a public into believing they were safe at the same time. He did it with his usual grace, but Lucius suspected he would rather be somewhere else that night.

The Dark Lord noticed his retreat and nodded. He wasn't going to question Lucius' coming and goings in his own home, which he appreciated.

"Tikki," he said once he was alone and a bony little house elf popped into existence. She shrank and quivered as he loomed over her, irritating him. "Where is my son and Potter?"

"Y-young M-master and Mis- Mister P-p-potter are w-with Young M-mistress a-and Miss- mis Cy-cypher in the mu-music room," she barely managed to squeak out.

He kicked her out of the way as he stalked towards the southern end of the mansion. He hadn't expected the children to leave the ballroom, but this worked out even better than tracking them down in the ballroom. It wouldn't do for anyone to know that the commander of Wizarding Britain's military was conspiring with juveniles.

He wondered what they were doing so far from the party anyway.

The sound of the piano was his first hint. It echoed softly through the hall and the men and women in the portraits gathered close together to listen. Not bothering to knock, he stepped inside. The Cypher girl was playing the grand piano, while Potter leaned against it watching as Draco lead Hermione in one of the more complicated dances. It was good to see the children hadn't forgotten their lessons.

His clapping startled all of them. Cypher missed a note. Draco and Hermione missed a step. And interestingly, Potter's wand was in his hand and raised for battle between one clap and the next.

"Bravo," he began, his expression cool and superior, "Very well done, but if you wanted to dance you could have stayed at the party with the guests."

There was a hint of chastisement, which left Draco and Hermione cowed but only seemed to ruffle their guest's feathers. Their postures were stiff, their green eyes sharp and cold.

"Forgive me," Potter said, nothing pleading in his tone, "I asked them to show me around your rather remarkable home. I did not realize I was pulling them away from some sort of responsibility."

Lucius didn't say anything for a long moment. So this was Potter, now? He barely recognized him from the little runt of two years ago. That child had been anxious and unremarkable, but for his ability to show up where he shouldn't. This boy was confident with a cautious edge, his green eyes looking sharper without his glasses. He thought he could work with this.

"Indeed, it is the responsibility of the host to remain with his guests to ensure everything runs smoothly, but I forgive you. I assume it's ignorance and not lack of propriety."

"Thank you," was the sharp retort.

"But I would be remiss in my duties if I did not correct the mistake. Ladies, if you wouldn't mind returning to the ballroom, I believe a lesson in party etiquette is in order."

Hermione looked worried, but Draco reassured her with a smile and sent her on her way with Natalie. Lucius was vaguely amused when he saw the Cypher girl stick out her tongue behind his back in the reflection of a window. The closing of the door echoed loudly. Lucius' smile became more congenial.

"Well, now that that's out of the way, lets get down to business, shall we?"

Potter looked startled by the quick shift in mood, but recovered quickly.

"Yes. How much has Draco told you?"

Draco looks surprised by the question, then annoyed. Lucius wonders how much they trusted each other.

"Only that you are privy to some very delicate information regarding Headmistress Lestrage, and if her little attack on the dance floor were any indication it is likely worth my interest."

"And my terms?"

"Do you want a contract?"

"No, I don't trust those. I'm already under one already."

"What assurance do I have that you will not betray me?"

"We both have more to gain keeping this between us. At least until Lestrage tries something stupid."

"And if she does, and you speak? Will I be held accountable for keeping this information from the Dark Lord?"

"I never need to mention you. If you tell him yourself, then Lestrage will know that and won't come after me. I don't want much."

"That all depends on what you're buying it with. That woman is very formidable and controls Hogwarts, not I."

"Voldemort controls Hogwarts," Harry corrected. "Which is why she'll be in trouble if he finds out what she tried to do to me... or perhaps because she failed to do it."

Lucius strode over to the piano, watching his reaction, trying to guess what she had done. Murder? Rape? Imperius? He didn't flinch or back away at all, following him like a hawk, but when they were standing right before each other, Lucius noticed those eyes weren't directed at his own. That was kind of strange. He had seen Potter look Voldemort directly in the eyes before without hesitation. Of course, that was two years ago, and he must have learned some things to fear since then.

"She tried to legilimens you, didn't she?"

The boy's shoulders stiffened, and he tried to cover it up with a shrug.

"That might be it. It might not be. You haven't agreed to my terms yet."

"And if I said Draco told me already it was legilimens?"

Potter turned sharply to the younger Malfoy who looked like a house elf caught in the laundry. They stared at each other, and then Potter sighed.

"I'd say you were a very clever liar, Mr. Malfoy."

"I could take that as an insult," Lucius warned.

"And then what? It doesn't matter. Do you agree to my terms or not?"

"Why should I when I already know your secret now?"

"Because it's a worthless secret if I tell Snape or Voldemort myself. They would never believe I told you willingly if I didn't confirm it."

Clever, clever boy. Was this the Dark Lord's influence? Severus'? Draco's? What sort of games did they play in that school of theirs?

“What makes you think the Dark Lord would even care?”

“It doesn't matter if he does or not, if Lestrage believes he does.”

“True. Very well, you have my protection from Lestrage and I have your silence. Now tell me what happened precisely.”

The tale was thankfully brief, but interesting as far as teenage exploits went. He couldn't boast ever trying to cut off Dumbledore's head when he was in school. Well, he suppose that it was his duty as his Master's servant to aid his protégé in any way he could, especially since the man was so busy lately. It would do Draco some good to observe the intricacies of blackmail without actively participating as well.

So he nodded, thanked Potter kindly for coming to him, and accompanied both boys back to the ballroom where the Dark Lord and his entourage finally joined the rest of the rabble. It was with an air of smugness that he found Lestrage, eying Harry suspiciously.

In her distraction she didn't even notice Lucius coming up behind her, until he whispering in her ear.

“My dear, you've been a very, very naughty girl.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“That's an interesting look,” Voldemort said, tilting Harry's head curiously from side to side. “Your eyes look less round without your glasses.”

The fireworks display had just ended and the crowds were returning inside where it was warmer, and Harry had sent his date off with his friends for a moment alone.

“They're still there, just invisible,” he taking them off and setting them on a pile of snow on the rail, which collapse under their weight. Voldemort smiled at that.

“Very clever. How are you?”

“Okay, I think. Nothing too big has happened so things are starting to get back to normal. I heard there was a break in the Moody case.”

The Dark Lord nodded, but didn't seem particularly interested in talking about that. That was fine with Harry. He'd heard enough about it the day before. With the Lestrage issue out of the way for the moment, he wanted to concentrate on nicer things.

“What about you? I haven't really heard from you in a while.”

“Busy. The usual things. Greyback wants his werewolves back for the full moon, so you might have to do without your guardians for a few days.”

Harry nodded. A few days wasn't so bad. He was starting to suspect his time with them was running out now that the conspirators had been caught, Moody probably wasn't far behind.

“I'd like you stay with me while they are away.”

“Will we celebrate the Solstice too?”

Voldemort grinned at the eagerness in his protégé's voice. He had been worried the incident with the Moon Goddess would have left him leery of trying another ritual any time soon.

“If you are willing then, yes, you may participate. I think you're ready to learn a thing or two about the rites.”

“Like the arithmancy?”

“That, among other things.”

“... Will it hurt?”

Voldemort ruffled his hair affectionately. “Just a little.”

Book III

Chapter 17: Ritual Sacrifice

After three days of final projects and end of the semester exams, Harry was exhausted, but alive. No one seemed to have enough time around the castle to go starting fights with him, and after Barlow was suspended for all her troubles no one was eager to test their luck. Hermione looked ready to keel over, and her stress level hadn't dispelled even after the tests were done.

"Perhaps I should have gone in to more detail about Dorian's Theory, I mean it did influence Lord Marcel's Theory of Infinite Dimension. And why did Madam Sprout only ask for six examples of non-native magical trees? There's like thirty of them on the grounds and that would have been easy credit right there. Do you think I should have?"

"Hermione," Harry said, his eyes threatening painful death if she didn't shut up about the bloody ridiculous tests. "It's over."

Her mouth snapped shut. Clyde mouthed a 'thank you' at Harry, and went back to enjoying his pudding. Dinner was being held an hour earlier than usual, so that everyone could get ready for the Christmas Dance by seven. Harry was glad he'd ducked out of it. He didn't know how anyone else could summon the energy to dance after all those tests. He felt mentally and magically drained.

"Are you sure you don't want to come tonight, Harry? It's supposed to be a lot of fun," Hermione insisted.

"I know, I went to the last two parties. And they were fun, but I'm tired, and I've got some last minute projects to work on."

Clyde leaned in and whispered in Harry's ear.

"You're not going to sneak out again are you?"

"No, of course not. Not that kind of project. I've got to wrap some gifts and then I want to do a little research."

That got Hermione's attention. "Research?"

"Arithmancy, I think I'm going to have to take the re-test."

Half true. It was arithmancy, but it was for the Solstice ritual, not what they were studying in class, which he thought he got at least an E in. They chatted about holiday plans and plans for next year and about what an odd semester it had been until it was time to go up to the common room to get ready. He helped Clyde look as presentable as he could in his new dark violet dress robes, thinking he looked kind of silly but not wanting to hurt his feelings, then hung out with the other guys down in the common room when Clyde left to pick up Cathy Wickett. Fred and George were dressed in ridiculously old fashioned robes in Christmas red and greens, and should have looked tacky but somehow managed to come off as merely eccentrically festive instead. He pitied their dates just the same.

And then along came Ginny. He hadn't seen her at dinner, but a lot of girls had been absent, favoring primping over food, and apparently it had paid off for the youngest Weasley. She came down the stairs with Hermione, a pixie escorting a princess. Where Hermione's was dressed in regal red velvet, Ginny was in ephemeral pinks, light silky fabric that moved like a breeze over her every curve. Hermione's hair was down, a wavy cascade of auburn down her back. Ginny's was up in a thousand tiny ringlets, held up by matching pink ribbons that should have made it look like a mess, but came off as pleasantly irregular, like a wild garden or a waterfall. Both were dressed down from what was expected at a Malfoy party, but then they wouldn't simply be waltzing tonight either.

He blinked widely.

"Wow."

Hermione smirked. Ginny turned incredible red, but it only made her look cuter.

"See what you're missing?" Hermione teased, "You'll just have to buy a picture from Colin."

"Ron was right, red does suit you," he teased right back. Soon she was just as red as Ginny. She quickly changed the subject.

"Where are Sirius and Remus? They were here this morning, but I didn't see them at dinner."

"Full moon tonight. They had to go home to celebrate with their pack. They'll be gone for a few days."

"Oh, is that why you're going with Voldemort? Because they won't be around to protect you?"

"That's why I'm leaving tomorrow, but they'll be back to guard the castle way before me. I think it's more good press or whatever. I bet I'll be running across a couple of reporters."

"That's too bad," Ginny said, "You should have fun on your break. I think you deserve it more than anyone."

"Thanks, Ginny."

They talked for a little longer before Colin showed up, and greeted them all with a face full of flash.

"Sorry, sorry! But it was a great shot!" he apologized, and escorted a rather put upon looking Ginny out of the tower. As they were leaving, Ron walked in and gave Colin an even look.

"Watch where you put your hands tonight, ya little bugger," he warned.

"Mind your own business, Ron!" Ginny snapped. He ignored his sister and stepped in. He was dressed in tasteful black with little gold fixings. He had cut his hair too, cropped into something almost military and it looked almost dark blond that close to the scalp. He didn't look a thing like his brothers dressed like that.

"That's different," Harry said, unsure if it was improvement or not. At the moment it just looked strange. Ron just smirked.

“Good evening, Hermione,” he said, perfectly gentlemanly, even bowed politely. “You look lovely.”

She turned even redder than when Harry had complimented her, and the Gryffindor felt a surge of irritation. He seriously hoped this poxy bastard wasn't actually charming her. And bloody hell, since when did he get away with calling her 'Hermione'?

They exchanged pleasantries until Harry felt his teeth had to be rotting out of his head listening to them. At last they left, Harry now almost completely alone in the tower. He went up to his room and worked on his gifts for a while, but soon grew bored and took his library book 'Applications of Arithmancy in Common Magical Rituals' down into the common room.

Natalie was there.

She was standing by the fire place, dressed in a cardigan and a black skirt. Clearly, not intending to go to the party. In fact, if her little picnic basket were any indication, she was intending to stay for a while. He smiled.

“Not in the dancing mood?”

She looked up at him and smiled back.

“Aren't you? What's wrong? Couldn't find a date?”

“I'm all danced out for the year. Besides, I've got some studying to do.”

She made a face, and he laughed. He picked up some pillows from the couches and chairs and tossed them to her. She arranged them, and sat down and he joined her.

“I hope you don't mind my interrupting. It just seemed kind of lame to spend the evening alone,” she said. He shook his head and peeked in her basket. There were cakes and candies and a couple of thermoses of no doubt highly sugared drinks like hot chocolate and eggnog. It smelled wonderful.

"I don't mind at all. I could even use your help."

"With studying? Eww... that's more Hermione's thing."

"I think you'll like this. It's very old magic. Very powerful."

That did seem to make her a little more interested, so he continued.

"I'm performing a ritual with Voldemort during the Solstice. I've done a little bit of it before, but I'm going to be more involved this year so I kinda want a better idea of what I'm doing."

Now she looked really interested.

"You're performing rituals with the Dark Lord?! I don't know whether you're mad or brilliant. What does the ritual do? Does it have a name?"

"I don't know if it has a name. I haven't found anything in the library about it, but it's really really powerful so it might be in the Restricted Section. It connects you to the magic of the Earth."

She didn't seem to understand what he meant, so he explained as best he could about what he had experienced last year when he'd done it and again his experience during the summer festival. Like a little child listening to a particularly exciting bedtime story, Natalie hung off his every word and gesture, eyes wide with fascination and awe. When he was done, she had to literally shake herself.

"That's incredible. You mean you could... I dunno, talk to gods or whatever?"

He nodded, though he doubted if he'd truly understand their reply. He'd been so overwhelmed the first time he didn't think he'd have understood if someone had told him one plus one equals two. Regardless, she was very interested after that in helping him figure out what he had done. Harry drew a diagram of what he remembered, and together they looked up what the many components meant. Some of them were very simple, the pentagram, the runes of the elements, the power of the blood were easily understood to be amplifiers of power and sacrificial enticements to gain the Earth's attention. The other symbols were more confusing. Why were there so many geometric shapes around the pentagon? Did they attract magic rather than repel it? Why were the symbols for drowning and burning included?

The more they learned, the more questions Harry had. What did something like this do to a person? The affects on himself had seemed temporary, but hadn't his magical strength increased since then? He hadn't really noticed before or perhaps he thought it was the natural development of his own abilities, but he didn't tire as quickly when casting spells and he remembered them easier after learning and always seemed to know what he should cast during duel or fight. And then there was Gryffindor's sword, which found him so easily and repetitiously. Was that the ritual's influence? For magic to come more naturally as it did for the Dark Lord?

They finally gave up on understanding any more of it. It was clearly the work of someone with more advanced knowledge than they had. They ate their sweets and told stories, silly things from when they were young. Harry told Natalie about his parent's studio and how they let him play with the raw clay and taught him how to draw and paint. Natalie told Harry about how her mothers spoiled her rotten with riding lessons and traveling every summer. It was almost ten before anyone came up to disturb them, and of all the people to showed up they hadn't expected Draco.

He threw open the portrait door and ran right up to them, his pale face actually stuck in a look of disbelief. Harry immediately stood up, expecting something had happened to Hermione. Instead, what came out of Draco's mouth was considerably more disturbing.

“Uncle Serverus is getting married...”

“What?!” they both squawked. “To who?”

“Vesper Larousse!”

Somehow, Harry thought he should have seen that coming.

oo
oo

Harry didn't sleep well after Draco told them about his godfather's announcement after the party. The excitement he was feeling over the upcoming ritual was overshadowed by anxiety. Snape and Larousse? A dangerous duo if he ever saw one. Each trying to stick their noses into his business at any given moment. He had tried to convince himself that it wasn't that bad. That they could end up distracting each other and leaving him alone, but his sleep was filled with prophetic dreams of summers spent in their company, of chores involving nasty potion ingredients, picnics by the lake, and trips into the woods to hunt his godfathers with guns and harpoons.

The morning dawned gray and cold, a new layer of snow blanketing the old. He gathered with the rest of the students in the Great Hall, then regretted it when he saw the objects of his anxiety at the teacher's table. Snape looked unusually smug, and Larousse was practically glowing. He wanted to be happy for them, but it was harder than it should have been.

The carriage ride to the station was noisy, Draco and Hermione unable to discuss anything other than their godfather's surprise and Natalie throwing in her usual quips. Draco thought Snape was nuts. Hermione thought it wonderful. Natalie thought the entire thing hilarious. He wanted to join in Natalie's amusement, but couldn't bring himself to do more than crack a smile or two.

They exchanged Christmas presents quickly, hiding them away before they left the carriage, and promised (and likely lied) that they wouldn't open them early. He saw them all off from the platform, his trunk and Elsbeth sitting patiently in her cage beside him. This year he wouldn't be able to travel to London with them as his security status still hadn't dropped enough for him to take public transportation. It was with more than a little longing that he watched as the train pulled away and faded into the distance. When the Hogwarts Express was little more than puffs of smoke on the horizon he turned back towards the platform to see Snape and Larousse waiting for him.

In Larousse's arms was Inana's basket.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Inana slept inside his shirt on the ride to Bristol. Despite the warmth of her green house, Britain's gray winter skies had left her lethargic and she mustered only enough energy for a quick chastisement for leaving her unattended for so long before dozing off. He wished he could join her, but he was feeling even more anxious about Snape and Larousse than before.

Something about that last image of them on the platform, standing side by side, Larousse's holding out his serpent made him uneasy. It was the sort of image that reminded him of his parents, standing near the bus stop, handing him his lunch pail. Silly really, but there had been a possessiveness in the gesture he didn't like coming from them. Even Snape's usual apathy felt artificial, like he was gaging Harry's reaction.

Madam Hardwick was back in all her prudish glory to greet him by the road, shiny black car and all. She sat across from him in the car to make sure he hadn't reverted back to slouching or drooling all over himself. He'd bluffed his way through the proper courtesies then ignored her altogether. It was snowing heavily in the south, and Harry wondered if it was snowing where his godfathers were and if it bothered them at all. Would Luna be with them? A girl or a goddess now? He blushed and quickly tried to think of other people. Snape and Larousse came up quickly, but the thought of them together sent his mind scurrying in yet another direction.

What was Voldemort doing right now?

Would he be in Bristol still or had he relocated to London since last year? Or was he somewhere else altogether? He might already be at the lodge, working from his study or preparing for tomorrow's ritual. No, he said he wanted to teach it to Harry, so he wouldn't start without him there. Maybe he went to see Greyback and the werewolves, as part of obligations as a shaman? Were he and his godfathers annoying each other this very moment?

It turned out speculating on Voldemort's activities was very entertaining, for he managed to distract himself until they reached the estate. Which was good, because having driven from Hogsmeade rather than London meant the ride was almost two hours longer than it had been last year. He really didn't understand how his travels arrangements were made, because efficiency really didn't seem to be a factor.

The Sianach Lodge was exactly how he remembered it. The forest was gray and mysterious, the road long and narrow, the mansion itself majestic and sprawling. Mr. Whitby and Victoria were there to greet them upon arrival, bundled up in their matching winter coats.

"Welcome back, Young Master," Mr. Whitby said as he opened the door for him.

"Thank you, it's good to be back," he said, sincerely.

Victoria looked like she wanted to run over and hug him, but didn't dare with all the stuffy people around. He smiled at her and she smiled back, before they both pretended to be proper for everyone else's benefit.

"Master is still abroad, but should arrive later this evening," Mr. Whitby said, leading them inside where the familiar row of servants were gathered, bowing respectfully as he entered. "Would you prefer something to eat or to settle into your room, Young Master?"

"I think I'll settle in first. Will our Lord be back by dinner?"

"That is unclear."

"Would you have a light snack sent up then? If he isn't back before seven I'll take my meal in my room," he said, heading towards the stairs, Victoria following dutifully after him.

"Very good, sir."

"Thank you for escorting me, Madam Hardwick," he managed, rather reluctantly, "I hope you have a nice evening."

She didn't seem very interested, but she acknowledged his attempt at politeness with a nod. As soon as they were out of sight, Victoria really did hug him.

"Oh, Harry, it's so good to see you again!" she squealed, turning him around to good a better look at him. "You've grown! I swear you had to have grown a foot since I last saw you!"

He grinned, though he knew she was full of it. He was still shorter than most of the boys in his dorm.

"You haven't changed at all."

She slapped him on the shoulder.

"I'd have you know I am quite changed. I've got a boyfriend now."

"Really? Me too. I mean, girlfriend, girlfriend. She's definitely a girl."

Victoria laughed. They arrived at his room, exactly as he remembered it, lots of wood and amber with a magnificent view through the southern and western windows. Through the thickly falling snow he could barely see the outline of the forest beyond the gardens.

"You've definitely had a busy couple of months," his maid said lightly, but there was a sort of caution in it. "It seems every time I turn around the paper's printed how something or other happened to you. I nearly keeled over and died myself when I heard about the explosion at the school. Awful business that."

He looked to her, and found her sort of fidgeting, staring at her toes. She made a little sniffing sound, and he realized she was fighting tears.

"Vicki?"

"I've just been real worried about you, Harry. All those attacks at a place that's suppose to be the safest in all of Britain. It's just too awful. You being so young and kind and all. It'd break my heart if something happened to you."

She sniffled again. Harry just stood there, unsure what to do. He'd never comforted an adult before, except for once when one of Hagrid's beasts had died despite treatment and really Hagrid wasn't that different from a big kid. It seemed he didn't have to do anything, for between two blinks of an eye she had composed herself and managed a big grin.

"So don't be running off into the woods at night like last time or I will be quite cross with you! Well, I better go get that snack and see what's taking Danny so long with your luggage."

And with that she disappeared out the door, leaving Harry to wonder what had just happened.

oo
oo

Voldemort didn't arrive at the Sianach Lodge until almost nine. He had been busy all day and most of the evening, wrapping up some loose ends before he disappeared for the next few days. His errands had taken him all over Britain, including a brief inspection of Hogwarts construction and a meeting with Lord Thurles, regional steward of Ireland, in Dublin. The weather hadn't been accommodating, having snowed or was snowing everywhere he went and even apparating didn't alleviate the annoyance of wet and cold.

He wasn't tired in the same way men where, being not entirely human, and sleep hadn't been necessary since the seventies, but he did want to rest. He wanted somewhere warm and quiet and dark, with only a book and a hibernating Nagini for company. Yet there were still a few important matters to attend. Whitby and all the servants, except for Harry's personal maid, were there to greet him at the door despite the hour, but he ignored all of them except for Whitby and the stable hand.

"You have it then?" he asked, stalking right past them and towards the back of the house. Both men scurried to keep up, and the stable hand didn't dare stop to grab his coat when they were led straight out the back door and towards the stables.

"Yes, my Lord," Whitby said, "Female, virgin, a very attractive creature."

"Mean too," the stable hand muttered, grimacing as he looked at his hand, blood spotting through the bandages.

Voldemort nodded, but didn't look back. He had to make certain she was what he needed else the ritual wouldn't work as it was suppose to. Last year, less exact requirements had been needed of the sacrifice, but then it had only been for himself and Harry's participation had merely been a happy accident. If it was going to work a second time for the both of them, he couldn't be stingy. This one had to be perfect.

The stable was charmed to be a pleasant temperature all year around, and the lights were kept on but dim at night. Aside from that, there was very little magic used there. There were sixteen stalls, two holding his six Irish wolfhounds, two milking cows, a team of four black horses for carriages, a white charger, three well-trained field hunters, and the last four were usually kept empty. It smelled of hay, manure, and dog food.

"Stay here," Voldemort instructed, leaving them by the entrance while he strode to the very back of the stable. The animals watched him warily as he passed.

She appeared to be waiting for him when he reached her. She was tied to prong in the middle of the stall so that she didn't hurt herself smashing into the walls in her attempts to escape, but she wasn't struggling now. Her large dark eyes watched him cautiously, her slender legs trembling with the desire to flee. Whitby was right. She was an attractive creature.

She would do perfectly.

“... the sun determines the range of the spell?”

The Dark Lord grinned. They entered the dinning room. Harry was a bit disappointed to find they'd only been left hot porridge. Is that what they'd eaten the day of the ritual? No, Harry thought he'd had something else, but then Voldemort hadn't eaten with him that day so perhaps this too was significant. Like a mild form of fasting.

“Very good. Do you know how?”

“The sun powers the earth, and somehow it powers the spell as well. It powers the connection between us and the earth. That's what the runes for flowers are for, right?”

“Among other things yes.”

“So when the sun moves too far west the angle changes and the connection loses power?”

“Yes. Very, very good. You have been studying this?”

“Yeah, a little. But if the angle of the sun is so important, why not perform the ritual in summer instead of winter?”

“For one, the connection would become too powerful and your soul would be torn from your body.”

That was a very good reason, Harry decided.

“For another, life is much too chaotic in spring. Animals and plants are living, dying, growing, breeding, birthing, and just constantly shifting. The earth and water itself is also shifting under the heat of the sun and activities of the living. Winter is a time of stillness. Nothing births except for bears and few other odd animals, plants do not grow, water freezes. If you were to try to connect to Her during the summer, even if you were not disembodied, you'd be driven very quickly insane. Now eat your porridge.”

They were finished eating within minutes. Voldemort quizzed him on his understanding of the spell, and though he got almost as many answers wrong as he did right and three times as many he couldn't even begin to guess at, the man seemed pleased. Harry was very glad he had at least attempted to figure the ritual out the night before. When at last Voldemort felt he had found the limits of Harry's understanding, he took him back to the study and handed him a wooden box.

It was about the size of a box of chocolates, dark red wood with a crest carved onto the top. There was something familiar about the crest, something alluring though he couldn't recall where he might have seen it before.

"This is for you. For your first born son. For his first son. And so on and so forth. With every generation its power will grow."

A shiver ran down Harry's spine, the man's words felt like a spell, sending magic into motion to some unknown end. He ran his fingers over the lid, and they tingled.

"Is this the Potter crest?" His throat felt thick and uncooperative.

"Yes. Twenty generations of Potters wore that crest for over a thousand years, though the name has changed almost a dozen times itself, the bloodline remains true. Only the blood of your direct descent will open that box."

"Blood?"

"There is a catch on the box. When you press it down you will feel a sharp pinch. It's nothing more than a needle prick."

"What's inside?"

"Open it and see for yourself."

Hesitantly, he found the golden catch on the side of the box with his thumb. It was round and smooth like a button, but when he pressed it there was sharp sting that made him flinch. There was the sound of tiny gears, like that of a watch or a music box, winding down, then a click, and the lid popped open a fraction. He sucked the droplet of blood from his finger, then opened the box completely.

Inside was a knife resting on a velvet cushion. He set the box down on Voldemort's desk and took out the knife. The sheath was undecorated wood with smooth gold fittings that matched the handle. It took a moment for Harry to realize the sheath was made of holly, the same as his wand. Carefully, pulled the blade free.

It was perfect.

It wasn't sure how he could tell, as he was no black smith or swordsmith or weapons expert, but one look at its uncorrupted mirror sheen and he knew. It was very slender with an unserrated edge. Elegant. Sharp. What was it for? Clearly not for fighting, but it had a definite purpose.

He re-sheathed it.

When he looked up, he found Voldemort's eyes half-lidded, his mouth curved upwards ever so slightly, like a well pleased cat. The thank you that was on the tip of his tongue died. Unease was quickly drowning his gratitude.

"Do you like it?" the man asked, though he seemed to already know the answer.

"It's beautiful," Harry admitted, "But... it's not a gift, is it? You don't give gifts."

That cat smile sharpened with pleasure.

"That's true. Very true. It is not a gift. It's a tool. A very important tool, that I, as your teacher, am providing for you."

He suddenly remembered where he had seen a knife like this before. Voldemort had one just like last year, when he'd cut his hand to offer his blood. This was a sacrificial knife. The Dark Lord stepped towards him, placing a hand on his shoulder.

“Also, as your teacher, I am going to show you how to use it properly. Gather your cloak, we’re going outside for a while.”

oo
oo

It was snowing lightly as Harry trudge towards the stable, following after Voldemort. The snow was practically to his knees, so he followed in the other man's footprints as he waded through it with his usual uncanny grace. He wrapped one of his plain black cloaks instead of his Baluvian, suspecting that what came next might stain.

The stable was warm and smelled of animals. The sound of horses shuffling and the whining of dogs dominated. Voldemort secured the door behind them.

“We must be very careful in our preparations. Carelessness is a sign of disrespect, and you don't want to disrespect Her. She has very clever and horrible ways of making you regret it. Britain is full of legends about the ways she makes the irreverent suffer. Does that frighten you?”

“Yes.”

“Good.”

“I'm afraid of God too.”

He wasn't sure why he said it. Half of everything he ended up saying to the Dark Lord seemed to be as surprising to himself as the other man. It came to him the same ways spells in a duel came. Instantaneous and somehow perfect, even if the result was unexpected. Hermione said it was his subconscious becoming more dominant when the stress of a situation caused his adrenaline levels to increase and inhibit his conscious thought process. He had no idea what she was talking about, but he wondered if talking to Voldemort was close enough to dueling for the same principles to apply.

“Really? Then I suppose He still has some hold over your soul. I'm not afraid of him at all. What can He do to me? His domain is that of the soul, and He cannot touch mine. I suppose we each face different risks in whom we entrust with our soul, but I like a Master less pretentious.”

“Won't She punish me? Knowing I still fear Him? Knowing I still belong to Him?”

“Only if you're dishonest about it. I think She likes you. Your gift in magic suggests She does. I believe She'd rather seduce you.”

He felt his cheeks burn at the suggestion. Merlin, he'd already faced a enamored goddess-possessed Luna with disastrous results, he didn't think he could take on the affections of an entire planet. Voldemort laughed, as if reading his thoughts. The animals shifted nervously in their stalls.

“Not that kind of seduction, child! Now come, we've not much time.”

Harry felt another jolt of unease, but the only thing (and the very odd thing) Voldemort did was take him into one of the cows' stalls, and demonstrated how to milk her, and then went to milk the other one.

“Milk is a traditional offering, cow or goat or really any kind. It ranks between an offering of blood and an offering of grain. It's an offering of both food and body. In ancient times, farmers would pour milk onto their fields to entice the Earth to yield a good harvest. We will use it to bring forth the more beneficent nature of the Earth, rather than the vengeful. Blood will summon her power.”

Well, that was interesting and disturbing, but the cows didn't seem to care either way so Harry filed it away for later examination.

When they were done, they poured Harry's milk in with Voldemort's and set it aside. Harry hoped that was it, but then the Dark Lord lead him all the way to the back of the stable. What he saw there made him freeze.

"Pretty, isn't she?" Voldemort said. "Her blood is particularly powerful, which we will need to maintain the integrity of the ritual diagrams."

Harry could only stare, seeing his own reflection in her wide black eyes.

"We... we're going to..."

"Yes. We need a lot of blood. A dove or goat won't be nearly enough."

"But..."

"It's called sacrifice for a reason."

For a long moment, he couldn't do anything but stare and wonder if he were even capable of what Voldemort were asking. He'd killed before. Fish. Rabbits. Probably a hundred rats for Inana and Elsbeth and the other snakes and animals at the medical bestiary. Even a deer with his godfather's help. Why was this any different?

Because it wasn't fair. She was tied up. She couldn't run or defend herself. There was no hope for her beyond the clemency he granted. It was completely unfair.

"...W-will it h-hurt?"

"No. Your knife is designed to make it quick and painless. I will show you how."

Voldemort's hand on his shoulder moved him further into the stall. The sacrifice started to struggle, kicking out at them.

"Careful," the Dark Lord warned, "She might look like a helpless little deer, but she's a sianach. Her kin have been hunting men for thousands of years, and she has the canines to prove it."

He had never seen a sianach, but he would never forget one now. They were white, or was that a seasonal color? At least, this one was. There were small gray flecks on her back, reminding him of fawns, but she was much too big. Big as a normal adult female deer, but was that as large as an adult sianach? How big were they really? If they were big enough to hunt men it was probably bigger than the average deer. She snarled like a dog, fangs bared and snapping at him.

Voldemort moved in fast, seizing her head in both his hands. She bucked and kicked, but she could neither see nor reach him. He leaned in close and whispered something and she suddenly stopped. He pulled back and moved to the other side of her, gently pushing at her hind and front quarters to reposition her. She didn't resist, her body as docile as a well trained pony. She shook her head, flicked her tail, and seemed utterly oblivious to them.

"What did you do?" Harry asked.

"An apathy spell. You could set fire to her and she wouldn't care at this point."

Harry really hoped that wouldn't be necessary.

"What do I do?"

"Get the pale and set it here."

Harry did as instructed, setting the pale in front of the sianach. He was very close to her, and he couldn't help reaching out to touch her. Her fur was both course and fluffy under his fingers, waterproof and warm he realized. She didn't react to his touch at all. From over her shoulder he watched Voldemort mimic him, admiring the creature they were about to slaughter.

"What now?"

"You have your knife?"

Harry nodded.

"Take it out."

He had attached it to his belt, and the blade came free easily. He could see his reflection in it, wide green eyes in pale, pale skin. Voldemort's hand was at the underside of the sianach's neck, feeling his way up and down. He stopped a short distance from where the neck reached the shoulder.

"Here," he said, "This is the carotid artery. The main artery that takes blood from the heart to the head. There are other places in the back legs and pelvis that bleed profusely, but this is the safest and easiest place to cut. Do you understand?"

He nodded. "How do I...?"

"Give me your hand."

He surrendered it to him, allowing the Dark Lord to readjust his hold on the knife and reposition his hand, the blade pointing directly at the carotid artery. With his hand still on Harry, he demonstrated the stabbing and cutting motion.

"Stab deep, it won't take a lot of physical strength, but you mustn't hesitate. As soon as it's in at least half way, tug sharply towards yourself and pull it out. Are you ready?"

No, he wasn't ready, but there was no stopping at this point. She was going to die, one way or another, and he had committed himself already. He had wanted to learn and to understand magic, and perhaps that was going to be painful and ugly and scary like it was in this moment, but it was also true. Nothing to hide the rawness of it, to sugar coat or spin it into something more acceptable. If he was to truly become a pagan, to even understand what that meant, he had to do this.

"Yes."

"Then go."

He hesitated.

"GO!"

The knife sunk in quick and easy, almost to the hilt and he nearly fell over when he tugged it sharply towards him and out of her. A splatter of blood caught him in the face as he removed it, running from his forehead, over his right lens of his glasses, and down his cheek. A torrent of blood followed, downwards, straight into the bucket. The sianach fidgeted, but Voldemort held her gently in place, keeping her head elevated to increase the blood flow.

It was over in less than a minute. All he had to was stand there and watch as she quickly bled out, gradually losing strength, first leaning against the Dark Lord, then falling to her knees, then her side, and then gone.

There was more blood in the bucket than there had been milk.

He ran out of the stable as fast as he could, stumbled in the snow, and vomited up breakfast. His right hand still held his knife, the flesh and metal both covered in blood. He touched his face with his left hand and found blood there too. He stumbled another few feet to a clean patch and used the snow to scrub himself clean, knife and hands and face, then dried them with his cloak. He blamed his shaking on the cold, and walked back inside before the Dark Lord decided he'd chickened out and run away.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort was concerned when Harry ran. Surely a little blood letting hadn't scared him away? He'd killed giant snakes for Merlin's sake. But no, the boy returned a minute later, a little green but otherwise fine. His hands and face were flushed but clean of blood.

It was a natural reaction he supposed. The sort of thing farmer's children learned to overcome when slaughtering their livestock. He'd never had a problem with killing animals himself, but then he'd never had a problem with killing people either. Harry's natural revulsion might actually serve to make the sacrificial blood more meaningful. He doubted it would bother the Earth one way or another.

Ruffling Harry's hair affectionately, he dismissed the show of weakness and led him back to the house. He had wanted to explain the significance of using a young doe, how sacrificing her was like sacrificing not only the deer herself but all the offspring she would ever have had and how it so easily overshadowed the offering of a mature buck. He didn't think Harry would appreciate being told he'd simultaneously killed a potential mommy and all her potential babies.

Non-Slytherins were funny like that.

Instead, he took Harry to the kitchen, where there were many pots and bowls and herbs and instruments laid out. He lectured Harry on the purpose of each of them, had him help pour the milk and blood into their specific containers, mixed the herbs, theorized the importance of each step, and then corrected him when he was wrong or praised him when he was right. The activity seemed to calm Harry. Gradually, he became less pale and his hands stopped shaking.

At last, the materials were all prepared.

"I think we're ready to begin."

Book III:

Chapter 18: The Siege part I

"It seems such a waste," Lestrangle lamented, staring over her coffee cup at her associate, "After everything you've done, you're primed for reinstatement into the Court. Sentinel or Guardian or Judge or whatever you like. You could have any of it, and you're... settling?"

Larousse shook her head.

"'Settling down' is not the same thing as 'settling', Headmistress. I see my ambition as expanded into the familial aspect of my life, rather than diminishing in my professional one. I've got so many plans..."

Lestrangle looked anything but convinced. It was quite beyond her why a woman of Larousse' skill and drive would leave a prominent position at Hogwarts, ignore an even more prominent position at Court, and marry Snape of all people, let alone bare his spawn. If it had been up to her she never would have married Rudolfus, who proved useless in everything including siring children. She considered telling Larousse this but was afraid she'd take it the wrong way.

"Have you settled on a date, then?"

"Sometime in late June. It'll give us the summer to get our affairs in order, change my last name, combine our accounts, revise wills, and things like that. Do you think you'll be able to come? I really hope you do. I never would have met Severus if it weren't for you."

Lestrangle merely shrugged. "Of course, I will. It would-"

The screech a siren's alarm started both women, causing Lestrangle to drop her hot coffee on her lap.

"Ouch! Dammit," she cursed, producing a wand to clean up the mess and then silence the wards.

"What was that? Has the castle been breached?"

“Calm down, Professor, let me check.”

The headmistress open her desk and pulled out a large piece of parchment. Flicking over its contents, she sighed and put it away again.

“Just the mongrels. They're back earlier than I expected.”

“You mean the werewolves? They're back in the castle?”

“Yes, though I don't know why they bother. Potter won't be back for another couple of days. Maybe they want to steal something else.”

“Steal? What did they steal?”

Lestrangle pointed at the empty display case where the Sword of Gryffindor had been. She still hadn't figured out how to get the sword back before the Dark Lord noticed its absence. Fighting over it was useless, since she couldn't touch the damn thing any way and threatening Potter or her mangy cousin might actually result in them threatening her right back. Perhaps she could use Larousse' natural animosity towards the werewolves and Harry's convenient absence to solve at least one of her problems.

“The Sword of Gryffindor. Potter found it last year, and I think they have a misguided notion that it belongs to him rather than the school. The boy even gave it up after the Dark Lord explained it's connection to the Founders, but they're such base creatures I don't think they comprehend the matter as more complicated than 'finders, keepers'.”

Larousse scowled, obviously irritated by their supposed misdeed.

“Haven't you told the Dark Lord?”

Lestrangle shrugged.

“It's a minor matter. I will simply have Potter return it. They're his dogs after all He'll have to take responsibility.”

“That's hardly fair. He's only a child and they're full grown... men.”

"If you want to get it for me, that's fine too. I'm afraid I have more important things to deal with today."

"Of course, Headmistress. Severus and I will take care of it."

Lestrangle hid her smirk behind her cup.

oo
oo

It had taken them almost three hours to prepare their materials, and it was starting to resemble a potion's detention with all the cutting and measuring and mixing. Luckily, Voldemort was no Snape, and rather than terrorize or ignore Harry, he just kept talking and explaining and quizzing. Harry thought he had learned more about magic in those three hours than he had all semester at school.

It was still snowing when Harry and Voldemort went out into the maze. The shrines to the gods and goddesses were barely visible, their offerings indistinguishable mounds of white.

"Who are they all?" Harry asked.

"Are you asking for specific names? They vary from region to region."

"Why do you honor some but not the others?"

"I honor each their due. Some are best worshiped in winter others summer and so on and so forth, and still some require attention all year around. Of course, these are only the ones I bother with. There are thousands of gods and goddesses with various levels of power and influence scattered across the world."

"Then what are they? I mean, what is a god or goddess? They're not really like... Her, but they sort of are. Luna had one inside her, how does that work?"

"Gods and goddesses are spirits granted some sort of authority by the Earth. They can be the spirits of those once living, human or animal or plant, or even created out of magical or emotional energy collected in an object or place, like a poltergeist. Luna's goddess is parasitic, it is too weak to hold her place without being absorbed by the Earth again so it inhabits a suitable human body. There are many spirits who do this with animals. True familiars are merely spirit possessed animals."

"So if you died you might end up a god?"

"Yes. Or several gods. Or a demon spirit. Perhaps I'll be reborn into another physical body or have to possess it. There's really no telling what she intends for me after I shed this mortal coil. I have a millennium to wonder."

Harry was going to ask what he meant by that, but they had reached the center of the maze. Voldemort cast a spell to harden the snow so they wouldn't make it uneven by walking on it. From his cloak, the Dark Lord pulled out a piece of paper and on it was drawn the diagram for the ritual. He blew on it, setting it alight and tossed the smoldering paper onto the ground. It 'exploded', the diagram bursting out of the paper with all the passion of a firecracker and all the grace of a blooming flower to spread across the ground. What was left was a glowing blue outline in the snow, as large as he had remembered it though it hadn't been blue then.

"This is what arithmatists call a 'mini-mega'. It's used to carry around complicated diagrams for lectures and demonstrations on small pieces of paper. I've modified this one a bit," Voldemort explained. "Hand me the urn with the tree on it."

That was the urn with the blood. They had transferred the milk and the blood to their own urns after mixing in the different herbs and metals. Harry was carrying both, one under each arm, while the Dark Lord carried everything else. He handed the urn over to him.

With perfect control, Voldemort removed the urn's lid and tipped out its contents onto one of the glowing blue lines. The blood didn't pool like Harry expected, but flowed along the lines of the mini-mega, recreating the diagram in blood. Slowly, the blood replaced the blue, flowing all the way around the diagram and into the interior, even into those runes and symbols that weren't touching the main lines, until at last it was complete.

A rush of magic made Harry shiver. Voldemort grinned.

“Now the other one.”

He handed him the milk urn. This was less carefully dispersed. The Dark Lord merely poured it out as he walked around the symbol. It did nothing to disrupt or mix with the blood, and in the snow it was all but invisible. There was a shift in the magic, but Harry could still feel its power.

“Excellent. Now take off your shoes and your cloak, and join me in the middle.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The world had become a dark place in his absence. Or rather the darkness had spread. Spread out from Askaban like a plague carried on the wind, infecting, tainting everyone it touched from babe to elder. After twelve years in a living hell, he had thought the world outside would be as good as heaven, but it wasn't so.

Everyone he had ever cared for or respected was dead or run away or imprisoned or a beast or as wretched as the very men and women they'd fought to keep Britain safe from. No one spoke of those brave souls who had died. Their graves were unmarked. Their families denied they ever existed. Their children pretended they didn't even exist, kept like obedient pets to their Pureblood masters.

The Monster's name remained unspeakable and feared, but the crowds followed him like sheep. Worshiped the dark lord like some sort of king, and spat at the name of Dumbledore. Ah, well, Moody spat at the name too. The coward. The hypocrite. Left everyone in the fix while he went to play hero all the way from Europe, leaving everyone else to rot. Leaving him to rot in prison.

He'd get back at them though. He'd finish what he and his had started a lifetime ago and see Voldemort and his spawn in the grave, and Dumbledore wouldn't be able to take credit for it. Not a chance. They'd tried and failed miserably that one time with Potter... though he didn't have much luck either. He hadn't tried hard enough, planned big enough.

But he was still free. Free and in Hogwarts, and no one the wiser. The Dark Lord so eager to tear apart and rearrange every reminder of the past, had left gaps in the security and now he was in. Potter and Voldemort weren't here, but eventually they would return and he'd be ready for them. Ready for them and all their miserable horde of dark wizard spawn. Ready to tear it all down around them once and for all.

God, his leg hurt.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It was cold. The power resonating around him did nothing to alleviate that particular discomfort. His feet ached, his limbs trembled, his teeth chattered.

Voldemort appeared amused by his discomfort, his own bare feet and chest not bothering him in the least.

"Is it really that cold?"

"C-c-can't y-you t-t-tell?"

"Not really, but I'm not entirely human either. Quickly, kneel there, in the rune for 'water', just like last time. You still have your knife? Good, take it out."

Harry did as instructed, trying to ignore the cold, and the pain that was starting to seep into him and focus on the magic surrounding him. There was no awareness yet, but they hadn't made their entreaty, only created an appropriate alter. Right now there was only unharnessed energy in its raw form, tingling and caressing, the Earth purring like a cat against his magical senses. It was with some curiosity that Harry noted the snow had stopped falling on them, but he could still see it falling over the forest in the distance.

"She listening, isn't she?"

"Oh, yes. She knows we're here."

Voldemort closed his eyes then, and started to speak. It wasn't in any language Harry knew, but the dialect was Irish, so he assumed it was Gaelic. It sounded like neither a plea nor a command, but a lullaby, gentle and affectionate with a perfect rhythm found only in verse. Was this truly a spell? It was magic for sure, the strongest he had ever known or heard of, but there was no discipline in it and the form suddenly seemed fluid and unpredictable. Like hunting, they could do everything right and there was still no guarantee of success or that they would receive exactly what they sought.

The realization that the last time was a gift coincided with a surge of magic, welling up and into him. He let out a startled scream, even as the magic receded and returned more gently, twining up his body like a vine, finding his every fissure and digging in deep. Awareness came to him, flowing into him through the vine-like magic, teaching him to sense things as never before. Where before he had felt and seen and heard, he now felt and tasted and smelled.

His new magic sense reached out timidly at first, encountering Voldemort's own magically charged body, smelled the thousand different chemicals that composed him, the flux and tumble of their million reactions a second, tasted his elation like a perfectly ripened fruit, sweet and vaguely salty. He felt their magic's touch and mix, flow back to one another in some new recipe.

Their magic expanded, reaching out to touch the world beyond themselves, lapping first at the blood of the diagram itself. Harry was aware of the blood, how the sianach lived in it still, transforming in that very moment into something else, a small spirit that slept in the Earth until spring where it would rise again as a white ash tree. And that tree would grow quickly and flower sooner than all the other trees, and then die within the year to become a wand, and that wand would belong to the grandson of Eric Joseph Jacobee who was currently two hours and fourteen minutes old and two hundred and fourteen miles away from where he knelt.

He had forgotten how beautiful She could be. How loving even in her cruelty. How ironic in her affections. Was this her gift to him? To ease his guilt? To seduce his love? To educate?

There was a pull in the magic, a gentle but firm tug on his... on their awareness, pulling their senses far from the maze and Bristol and beyond into Scotland, past Edinburgh and at last surrounded by an old and familiar magic. Hogwarts stood a beacon on a hill, surrounded by a vast magical landscape of forests and lakes and ancient townships and villages. Witches and wizards and sentient beings and beasts flashed across his palate in like an entire box of Bernie Bott's Every Flavored beans all at once, there and gone before any particular taste could be identified until at last there was only one flavor.

It tasted of ashes and spoiled milk, and he gagged but the taste wouldn't vanish.

"Ugh... Merlin, what is that?" he choked, unable to communicate mentally with the Dark Lord while that 'flavor' polluted his senses. Voldemort said nothing for a moment, lingering over this latest discovery even as Harry tried to flee it. At last, he let out a small gasp.

"It's him. It's Moody."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

If there was one word to describe McGunny, it would have to be 'pragmatic'. Sure, he had his moments of ambition, of sentimentality, and occasionally even daring, but never beyond what was reasonable for the situation. Which was why he was in his office leaning over submitted articles and proposals, foregoing the usual holiday traditions with his familial relations in favor of organizing the student paper while everyone else was away, because truth be told he missed his family. He missed how Anna and Peter fought over the dumbest things and how his mother was always trying to fix his clothes and his dad's muttered obscenities at the newspaper. He missed the fields and the woods and stonewall his forefathers had built during the occupation by the Romans. He missed his dog and his horse and even that damned rooster that couldn't tell noon from sunrise.

But he was pragmatic. Missing something didn't excuse his responsibilities to the Hogwart's Herald, and as editor it was his duty to make sure everything was taken care of, including the New Year's Edition the student body would be expecting upon their return. The paper was doing so well, and combined with his grades he was certain he could get into any university of his choosing. His parents would understand. His siblings would get over it. Summer was less than six months away.

He sighed and pushed his papers aside. The office was too quiet with the rest of the paper crew gone, and it was far too depressing to spend his entire day there. He gathered up his materials and headed for the Great Hall. There weren't a lot of people in Hogwarts during the holidays, but the Great Hall was supposed to be the unofficial common room for everyone left behind. Most of the tables had already been removed, and the empty space filled with Christmas trees and decorations to give the chamber a more intimate feel. Perhaps he could find some company there.

He wasn't half way there when he came across two very unexpected figures. Sirius Blackbone, looking decidedly droopy-eyed, and Remus Slivermoon, with a very conspicuous set of claw marks across his nose, were loping in his direction. McGunny couldn't fathom why they would be there, since they'd left two days ago and Potter wasn't even in the castle anymore. He thought about asking them. Then thought better of it. Then decided it was the only practical things to do.

"Good day, gentlemen," he greeted.

They paused to consider him, but didn't return the greeting. He swallowed.

"I hope nothing is amiss that would draw back to Hogwarts so... unexpectedly."

Blackbone gave him a particularly bored look and just walked pass him. Slivermoon lingered a bit though.

“We came to make sure the school remained safe until the rest of the students return. Moody is still a threat after all, and the construction work leaves the school particularly vulnerable. We'll be out and about making rounds later tonight.”

McGunny thought he might have seen a tired smile, but it was hard to see beneath the scratches and the facial hair, and the werewolf had turned to lope after his alpha too quickly to confirm. McGunny wondered if their reasons were honest. He doubted they were going to raid the school for victims after the full moon, but they had never shown much interest in the students aside from Potter. Perhaps Potter had asked them?

Where was Potter anyway? Was he spending the holidays with some friends or was he spending it the Dark Lord once again? Whatever he was up to, McGunny thought it had to be something interesting.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

They apparated to Hogsmeade, barefoot and cloakless, and found themselves in the middle of a very surprised crowd of holiday shoppers. Voldemort ignored them, grabbing Harry's arm and lead them over to a row of horses tied outside the pub. No one attempted to stop them or even object as they untethered and mounted the animals and turned them towards the castle.

“Shouldn't we tell the Sentinels?” Harry called out, as they rode out of the village. There was still a temporary Sentinel post in the village after all.

“This situation is delicate. If Moody is doing what I think he is, he could destroy the entire castle. I will have to deal with him quickly and quietly. The Sentinels will just be in the way.”

They hit the country road, open and traffic free, urging the horses faster. Harry had never ridden a horse, let alone a horse at full speed, but he found it came to him naturally as if... Beside him the Dark Lord rode like a professional, moving his body smoothly with his mount's every stride. Harry realized he wasn't feeling the cold either,. Was this magic? Could he do this because he was magically connected to Voldemort in this moment? Or was it Her will that he had these abilities?

"Why did she show us Moody? Did you ask for that?" he asked.

"No, this is entirely Her idea. I never even thought about using the ceremony to find Moody. Hogwarts is one of the most magically saturated locations in Britain, She doesn't want to see it destroyed. She wants us to stop him."

Harry was amazed to see the Dark Lord was actually grinning. He could taste blood and steel and ozone on his tongue, the taste of battle and magic. He said nothing more until they reached Hogwarts and dismounted at the castle keep.

"Moody should still be at the north end of the castle. I want you to find the teachers and tell them to evacuate the students and themselves to Hogsmeade. I'll try to refrain from fighting until then, but you must be quick."

"Okay," Harry said dutifully and ran off to do as he was told.

"Harry!"

He stopped and turned back. Voldemort regarded him seriously.

"Be careful."

Harry managed a weak smile. "And you, my Lord."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McGonagall was enjoying a cup of tea in the Great Hall with Professor Flitwick when Potter arrived. And by 'arrived' she meant stormed in like a hurricane. The main doors flew open as if by a great wind, but what came through them was boy in only a shirt and trousers and soaking from ice and snow. The ten odd students scattered around the Hall all dropped what they were doing to stare dumbfounded as he stalked past them and right up to the teacher's table.

Up close McGonagal felt the tingle of magic wafting off of him like body heat. In his belt she could see a sacrificial dagger. What had he been doing with that?

"Professors," he whispered urgently. "You have to evacuate the school. Moody is in the castle, and we think he means to tear it down."

"What? What are you talking about? Heavens you must be freezing!" Flitwick said, looking him over from head to toe, but the boy wasn't even shivering.

"Professor!" Potter snapped, both of their tea cups shattering. "Get. Everyone. Out. Of. The. Castle. NOW."

McGonagal wasn't one to be ordered around by her students. In fact those foolish enough to try never tried again, but she thought she might just have met her match this once. And if Potter was telling the truth, and she had no reason to think he'd lie about something this serious, it was probably for the best that they did as he said.

"Filius, take everyone here down to Hogsmeade. I'll get everyone else lingering in their dorms and warn Severus and Larousse. We'll sort this all out once we're certain everyone is safe."

"I'll take care of Professor Snape and check the Slytherin dorms. It will save time," Potter said.

"No you won't, young man, you're going with Professor Flit-

He ignored her and rushed out of the room. She nearly raised her wand to stop him, but thought better of it. Filius gave an indignant grunt.

"How rude!"

"We can lecture him on proper respect for his professors later. Right now we'd best do as he says."

"But-"

"Later, Filius," she said and hurried off towards the Hufflepuff common room where she believed a few girls were staying. As she was leaving she heard the charms professor mutter, "I see where he gets it from."

oo
oo

The dungeons tasted of wet stone and bitter herbs, and stank of sulfur. Harry staggered on the stairs, barely catching himself from a rather undignified decent into the bowels of the castle. Spitting and covering his nose and mouth did nothing block it. Perhaps he should have let McGonagal handle the dungeons, but it was too late now. He sprinted down the dark corridors, senses beyond sight guiding him around obstacles and to the potion master's rooms. The moment he arrived he knew Snape was in his rooms and he wasn't alone.

There was a portrait over the entrance and he didn't know the password.

"Professor! Professor!" he shouted.

There was a moment's hesitation, then the painting swung open. Snape looked ready to bite his head off, but took one look at him and apparently changed his mind.

"What the devil, Potter?"

“Harry?” Larousse appeared from behind Snape, and gasped. “Merlin, what happened to you? You're soaking wet.”

She touched his face and hands, looking terribly worried, but he snatched them back.

“I'm fine! We have to get out of the castle right now!”

Snape didn't look convinced, “Potter have you ingested something?”

“Moody is in the castle!”

That seemed to catch both of their attentions, and Harry started backing away, luring them away into the hall and back towards the exit. Snape grabbed him by the arm to stop his retreat but immediately let go, as if he'd been bitten.

“Where is Moody?” Larousse asked, oblivious to Snape's reaction to Harry's magic. “If he's here we can catch him and put an end to this. Tell us where he is.”

Harry shook his head.

“No, no! You can't. Voldemort has gone to get him, but he can't start until we're all out of the castle. Is there anyone else down here?”

“No, all the Slytherins are in the Great Hall,” Snape said, “But what do you mean by the Dark Lord 'can't start'?”

“Moody has been planting explosive spells all over the castle and he can set them off at any time. Voldemort is going to stop him, but if Moody knows something is happening he'll blow the place to bits. So we've got to get out of here before he'll risk it. Can we just go?!”

“Yes,” Snape said and grabbed his and Larousse's cloaks from beside the door.

“What about Harry?” she asked, even as they made their way out of the dungeons.

“He's saturated with magic. He could probably jump into the lake without it affecting him.”

“He can hear you just fine, you know.”

“How-”

“It was a very bloody affair,” Harry snapped impatiently, “We can get into the gory details later.”

oo
oo

By the time they managed to get out of Hogwarts, so had the rest of the castle. Fifteen students, six professors, the headmistress, the Sleuws, and some thirty bewildered GGs were trudging through the snow towards Hogsmeade. They caught up to the group quickly, and the adults were quick to demand answers. Harry told them Voldemort had been teaching him ancient magic, and that during a location spell they had found Moody and soon figured out what he was doing. They had both come to stop Moody and get everyone to safety. Questions about why he seemed to have turned into a magical battery he deemed irrelevant and were summarily ignored.

After that, the adult turned to each other to figure out what they were going to do with sixteen children with only the clothes on their back and the Dark Lord and a lunatic running around the castle. Harry left them to it, satisfied that he had done his part and certain Voldemort could handle himself. Everything was working itself out for once, and he was going to be looking forward to an assassin free New Year.

“Potter.”

McGunny came up beside him. Well, bother. He had hoped he would be able to avoid the press until Voldemort and he could corroborate their stories, but it seemed he had used up his luck for the day.

“Hey, McGunny. Lovely day we're having, isn't it?”

The Ravenclaw looked around at the gray sky and ever deepening snow and then at Harry in his bare feet and without so much as a jumper on.

"Yeah... who needs summer? Um... are you alright?"

"Mmhm."

"... Can I ask you something?"

"Sure."

"This wouldn't have anything to do with why your bodyguards showed up this morning, would it?"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Puddifoot's would be best for the day," Lestrage said, as the village came into view. "We'll inform the Sentinels in the village that we'll need emergency shelter for the night just in case."

"We're going to be getting a lot of owls when the papers learn the school has been evacuated," Snape said idly. Truthfully, he was distracted, wondering what exactly was happening up at the castle. Larousse and he had just been preparing to go start a fight with the werewolves one moment and then Potter showed up like freak lightening and shocked hell out of everyone.

"We'll worry about that when the Dark Lord gets back. I'm not sure how he's going to want to spin this..." the Headmistress said dismissively, then laid out a plan to keep the children safely away from the press.

Where was Potter anyway, Snape wondered, scanning the crowd. It should have been easy to spot a half naked boy running around in the snow, but he couldn't...

"Bloody heart attack..." he muttered, and turned back towards the castle.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort knew immediately when Harry left the castle. The vibrations he had been feeling, like music heard through his fingertips, altered just so as that particular harmony moved away, changing the tune of the castle from C to B flat. The other tunes were harder to hear over the orchestra of noise that was Hogwarts, but they too were gradually disappearing until there was only the discordant G sharp mingling badly in the background.

He pressed his hands to the stones and followed the disharmony to the north end of the castle. He started from the wing under construction, felt where the wards had been tampered with and found the secret entrance behind the tapestry, and followed it. His hand brushed something paper-like and flinched away from it as the sound of nails on a chalkboard stabbed at his skin.

It was a Distemperance Spell, used to suck out the magic of an item before using that same magic to explode. A nasty spell and well chosen. The castle would not attack a spell using magic it recognized as its own. They were easily diffused luckily. He concentrated on the spell's special vibrations, and just sort of 'tweaked' it. The vibrations gave a violent shutter and disappeared.

Traversing the length of the castle he found and disarmed six more. There were definitely others, put up days before in other parts of the castle, but the newest ones were the easiest to find and following them lead him ever closer to his prey.

Book III:

Chapter 19: The Siege Part II

The Malfoy Estate was created for the amusement of its household, both young and old. There were many rooms dedicated to many different interests and hobbies and the grounds were similarly designed with these purposes in mind. The artificial river that ran through the western end of the estate accommodated fishing, boating, and various magical sports like Kimshi* and water chess* during the summer. When the water finally froze in late November, there were many other possible activities but Draco and Hermione liked ice skating the best.

Which was why when Hermione was feeling particularly stifled in the place that she had never really thought of as her home, she often found herself there despite the chill. Draco, hating to be alone, usually followed her.

"What do you think we should get Uncle Severus as a wedding present? I mean, I don't think a set of bath towels is going to cut it," she mused, gliding passed Draco who was skating backwards in the opposite direction.

"Don't even worry about it. Father will take care of it. He knows him way better than either of us."

"Mmm... I don't know, I think we're both old enough to get them gifts of our own choosing."

"You didn't get him a Christmas gift," Draco pointed out.

"He hates Christmas. I used to think he was a pagan, but really he's just anti-holiday, I think," Hermione chuckled.

"How can someone hate Christmas? You get all those presents and good food and stuff."

"Maybe he didn't when he was little. You know there are kids who really resent Christmas when they see all the neat stuff they can't afford to have. I bet that's it."

"I suppose so... but Harry's poor and he likes Christmas. At least I think he does. He might be pagan now, but he always gives you presents so I don't know," he wondered, lazily skating a figure eight. Hermione circled around him, arms spread like bird in flight.

"He got you a present too."

"This is the first time though."

"This is the first time you got him one too. And you like the puzzle box... even if you haven't figured it out yet," she said. He quickly grabbed her arm as she passed him, and spun her around in a circle as she squeaked in surprise. "Draco!"

"When I do figure it out I'm shrinking your book and hiding it in there. See how long it take you to figure it out!"

"That sounds like a perfect hiding place! You know 'Witches Over Wizards' was black listed three times in the last century? Wouldn't want Lucius to find it and have it burned. It's hard enough finding a third edition, let alone a second one," she said, slipping free of his grip when he pretended to fall asleep. She made a snow ball and chucked it at him. He fell over, landing in a snow bank, but quickly got up to retaliate, chasing her down with a snow ball of his own. He missed, but still managed to tackle her into another snow bank.

They chucked snow at each until they were both freezing cold and wet and tired. He stood and helped her climb to her feet, the both of them breathless with exertion and laughter.

"I wish our friends could be here. Especially, Harry. He's probably feeling pretty lonely about now without any family," she panted, even as Draco was charming their skates back into boots.

"Yeah, it must be pretty dull. I mean, the Dark Lord is an adult and a pagan. What kind of holiday fun can you have with that?"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

While Draco was wrong to assume things were pretty dull in the Dark Lord's company, he was right in his assumption that Harry wasn't having much fun. Aside from the wonderful tingly sensation he was getting from his magical boost, he did not enjoy running around in circles with the threat of death literally looming above him. At any moment, Moody might realize he'd been found out and bring the castle down on his and his godfather's heads. He wasn't as worried about Voldemort, who seemed like he could walk out of any situation completely unscathed.

He didn't have the enchanted gold band he would normally use with his watch to find his godfathers, so he had to take an educated guess and headed towards their private room. It was uncomfortably close to the southern end of the castle, but the increased likelihood of them running into Moody made finding them quickly even more important. Luckily, his magical senses extended far ahead of himself, and he managed to taste his way to his godfathers with just the vaguest flavor of ash reaching him.

"Padfoot! Moony!" he called softly, hoping their senses weren't too dulled after the full moon. The hall was empty, but he could taste them near by, clay and blood and something else he associated with the moon. He was almost to their door when he was grabbed from behind.

He was startled, his magic lashed out, knocking Sirius a good twelve feet.

"Sirius!"

Remus appeared from behind a column, looking more annoyed than alarmed at his mate sprawled across the floor.

"I told you sneaking up on him was a bad idea," he muttered, and helped the stunned werewolf to his feet.

"B-bloody hell, what was that?" Sirius stuttered, his hair fizzled like he had just been struck by lightening. He blinked at Harry. "What happened to you?"

Harry let out an exasperated sigh. "I'll tell you later. Right now we have to get out of the castle."

"What are you talking-"

"LATER!" he snapped, and Sirius snarled back instinctively. Harry ignored it, and started down back down the hall, hoping they would follow him. They did.

"Prongslet, what is going on? What are you even doing here? You look like you ran here in the snow," Remus asked, jogging along beside him. Sirius, alpha by nature, was already moving ahead of them.

"I did, sort of. Listen, we haven't got much time. Moody is in the castle-"

That brought Sirius up short, causing Harry to run into him, but he was grabbed by his arms before he could fall.

"Where? Where is Moody?"

"It doesn't matter! If we don't get out of here now we could be crushed! He's planted explosives all over the school!"

Sirius paled and looked to Remus. They nodded to each other. They were tired and weaker than normal so soon after the full moon, but they weren't going to let that stop them from protecting Harry. Sirius scooped up his godson and set him over his shoulder, ignoring the indignant protests, and started running for the nearest exit.

They had almost made it to the stairs that would lead them to the ground floor and hundred of windows they could climb out of, when the first explosion rocked the ground beneath them. It was so close, both werewolves were knocked off balance, forcing them to fall to their knees. Harry grunted as Sirius' shoulder dug into his stomach. They remained on the floor for a second, stunned.

"Is that it?" Harry wondered out loud.

In response to his questions, another explosion directly in front of them took out the stairs. Despite the shaking ground, both werewolves were on their feet and running in the opposite direction. Harry watched behind them as yet another explosion collapsed a section of corridor, an avalanche of stone, mortar, and debris flowing into their space and then below as the floor gave out.

"Oh, God."

A third explosion had the roof falling down directly on top of them. Harry closed his eyes, clutched Sirius' leather shirt in his fist and prayed.

"Faster. Please, faster."

Magic poured through his hand and into Sirius, and there was a sudden jolt of speed and a moment of weightlessness. He opened his eyes to watch the floor falling away beneath him, and he thought for certain they were falling, but Sirius' feet landed heavily on solid ground, digging a shoulder into his already bruised stomach with his landing.

He had jumped to safety.

"Where's Remus?" he cried, terrified that they might have left him behind.

"I'm here, pup," came a call from ahead. It seemed he was faster than even a magically enhanced Sirius when he wasn't carrying ninety pounds extra weight. "But we're running out of hallway!"

Another explosion, and they managed to outrun it more easily this time, but Remus was right. They were out of the space to run. The end of the corridor led to a spiral of narrow steps leading up to a turret and down to the first floor. A cloud of dust coming up from below meant the first floor was as collapsed as the second, and left them with only the possibility of going up. Sirius took the stairs in three-step leaps, but still wasn't fast enough to reach even the third floor.

A final explosion rocked the tower, shaking free parts of the walls and stairs, convincing them that they were all going to die. Sirius pulled Harry underneath him and pulled Remus close, huddling them all together tightly as the world came apart around them in a deafening roar. Crushed between them, Harry closed his eyes tight and whispered over and over again, "Protect us, protect us, protect us..."

It felt like eternity, but could only have lasted a few seconds, and as the world stopped shaking and thundering around them they were still alive. Cautiously, Harry opened his eyes. The air was thick with dust, but beneath him, he could see their section of the stairs was still intact. He looked over Remus' shoulder to see the stairs going upward were gone, as was the top of the turret, revealing a gray sky above them. He looked over Sirius' shoulder to see the stairs beneath them were likewise gone, and the entire corridor had collapsed. He looked around to see that the rest of the school looked completely intact except for a section of wall in the most southern corner of the castle. They had managed to climb half way up to the third level of turret, which left them looking down on most of the castle's roofs and much too high to jump or climb down themselves.

Well, at least they were alive.

"Sirius? Remus?"

"We're alive," Remus whispered, shifting as he looked around. "How?"

Sirius loosened his death grip on them, and looked around himself. He tested the edge of their narrow perch with his foot, making sure it wouldn't collapse. As both men moved away, Harry felt the bitter cold of the air and shivered. His magic! It was gone! In his moment of desperation he must have used all the extra magic the Earth had granted him and then some protecting them all. It was the only explanation for why the stairs and wall that supported them hadn't collapsed and the falling debris hadn't crushed them.

Unfortunately, that left Harry wet, barefoot, and exposed to the elements with no way to reach shelter. His shivers became more violent.

"Harry?"

"C-c-cold."

"Shit," Sirius cursed, wrapping him up in his arms again to conserve heat. "Remus, do you have your wand?"

"Yes, I have it. Just a moment."

They had very little room on their ledge, but he managed to lean back enough to cast a warming spell on Harry and then sent up a signal flare so that someone might come and get them. Remus didn't trust himself to levitate them down after that. He was just as physically and emotionally exhausted as Harry, and he didn't dare use up what little remained of his magical reserves before they were certain of their safety.

"I-is it-t o-over?" Harry stuttered out through chattering teeth. The warming spell had taken away most of the chill, but it didn't work as well on someone who was wet, and he was relying heavily on his godfathers' body heat to keep him warm. Sirius' large hand ruffled his hair.

"Yeah, it's-" There was a moment's hesitation, and Harry could feel both werewolves' bodies tense. "Remus..."

"I see him."

Harry peeked out from the shelter of their limbs to look in the same direction as them. There was movement, a mere displacement of rubble at first, and then someone appeared, climbing over it all stiffly. Even covered in dust, Harry could make out the bright green of a GG helmet.

“Oh, no...”

oo
oo

He had done it! By the grace of God he'd killed the Devil.

It had been close though. He hadn't expected the Dark Lord himself to appear out of nowhere, nor that the dog would have expected the traps he had laid. The wards he had set up were torn down like they were nothing more than cobwebs with a mere wave of the hand. Only one of the Distemperance curses he'd set that morning had gone off, and it had been closer to killing him than the Dark Lord. The creature had the audacity to laugh.

He hadn't laughed when he set off the rest of the Distemperance spells though. The bastard must not have expected it. Must not have realized that Moody had been coming and going through the school for months, so heavily disguised in polyjuice and stolen limbs and class one Senseless spells, that all the reveling charms in the world plus a werewolf's nose wouldn't be able to pick him out from the man he had killed and dismembered to gain authorized access to the school.

Yes, he managed to surprise the thrice-damned snake with that moved. Distracted him just long enough to hit him with the Killing Curse. The result wasn't what he was used to. Most men just fell over dead, without an ounce of fuss. The Dark Lord had just staggered though, startled, then collapsed to his knees slowly. In the final throws of death the body had begun to melt. There was the distinct feel of magic being released, then he'd fallen apart, forming into a bloody puddle, seeping into the surrounding stones, and then disappearing. It gave him the shivers, but it was over now.

The Dark Lord was as dead as dead could be.

Now all he needed to do was kill his spawn and the curse that had fallen over Britain and corrupted its people would be lifted. It shouldn't be hard. With the Dark Lord dead, who would bother rising up to defend the wicked child?

He had to get out of the castle quick though so he could apparate away to hunt the little devil down later. The explosions he'd set off would make a convenient point of exit, so he headed in that direction. And surely, it was serendipity that his very route of escape should lead him straight to his next target.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I'm afraid so, Prongslet," Remus said, "Don't worry. I can shield us until help arrives."

Harry shook his head. He knew that wasn't true. He could taste both of their exhaustion from the full moon before the explosion, and they had lost even more in their escape and then the warming and signal spells. Harry didn't have his wand on him either, and even if he did he was magically exhausted. He probably didn't even have enough to summon Gryffindor's Sword.

If Moody decided to cast the Killing Curse, it wouldn't matter any way.

They could only watch as Moody stumbled over the debris, disappearing and reappearing amidst the clouds of dust. They stayed perfectly still, hoping he would pass with out seeing them. It seemed as if it would work for a moment, the man was so preoccupied with keeping his footing, but then he stopped a moment to look around.

"He's spotted us," Sirius said.

Harry closed his eyes tight, and continued his prayer, hoping that they had survived the first attack for some purpose that would carry them through a second time.

"Protego!"

The force of the attack striking Remus' shield charm made Harry grit his teeth and shudder. He could feel Remus trembling from his efforts to protect them, yet not sooner was it over than he was forced to raise a second shield.

“Protego!”

“Why doesn't he just use the Killing Curse?” Harry whispered, careful not to distract Remus. Sirius shook his head.

“He doesn't have enough magic left himself. Even if he cast it, there's no way to guarantee he'd hit who he intended and that curse can't be repeated in quick succession. Come on, Moony, you can do it. He can't be in much better shape than us.”

“Protego!” he bit out, blocking yet another curse, his whole body trembling. “I'm almost done for. I can cast one more and then that's it. I haven't got anything left.”

Below them Moody was shaking too, but he didn't look anywhere near ready to give up. In fact, he only looked more and more excited, licking his lips and shifting about. Harry buried his face into Sirius' shoulder.

“I'm so sorry. This is all my fault. You shouldn't have to die here. I'm sorry. I'm sorry.”

“Hush, Prongslet,” Sirius said. “We've no regrets.”

“Gracious, Harry,” Remus joined, “We're not dead yet. We've still-Protego!”

Harry and Sirius barely managed to catch and hold onto him as his final spell stole the remainder of his strength, causing him tip backwards off their perch. They pulled him back until he was collapsed on top of Harry. Even as they regained their balance, Harry watched from the corner of his eye as Moody lifted his wand for yet another blow.

Yet before he could cast anything, he leaped behind a pile of rubble.

“Sectumsempra!”

Harry's heart swelled with new hope at the familiar voice.

"It's Professor Snape!"

"Yeah," Sirius muttered unhappily. "Oh, look. He's brought his wench too."

Sure enough, there was Professor Larousse, flying straight for them on a broomstick. Behind them, Snape was keeping Moody pinned downed, casting curse after curse with every intent to kill. Larousse came to hover beside them and held out her hand.

"Give Harry to me," she commanded. "I'll fly him to safety."

"What about them?" Harry asked, afraid she would abandon his godfathers, but the werewolves were already pushing him towards her, even Remus who barely had strength enough to keep from falling. "No! Wait! What about you?! I'm not leaving you here!"

"It's you he wants dead, pup," Sirius said, forcing Harry the rest of the way onto the broom. Larousse's arm came around his middle, and he found himself instinctively gripping the broomstick and adjusting his weight to maintain their balance. Sirius shoved the broom away to keep Harry from trying to get back to them, and let out one last snarl at the woman. "Keep him safe or I'll kill you myself!"

"Sirius! Remus! No, don't!"

"Sshhh, Harry, they'll be fine," Larousse said, tightening her hold on him. "I'll send the broom back for them. I promise, but I have to get you out of here first."

He nodded, rearranging himself for easier flight. They were rising higher, awkwardly, the school broom too small for both of them. "Okay, just hurry."

"Alright, hang-"

There was a cracking sound, and the broom lurched, tipping straight down. On his own, Harry would have been able to hold on, but Larousse was wrapped around him, and their combined weight tore them both free from the broom and sent them falling.

Harry crashed onto the slanted roof of the castle, the snow cushioning his fall. Larousse landed beside him with a cry of pain. For a moment, all they could do was stare stunned at one another, amazed that they'd fallen and even more amazed that they were still alive. Then Larousse cringed, and carefully reached behind to touch her back. Her hand came away bloody.

"Are you al-" he started and then realized it was a pretty stupid thing to ask. "How badly are you hurt?"

"Don't worry. I've survived worse. Are you alright?"

Harry took inventory of himself. "Nothing broken. Just kind of cold. What happened?"

"I think one of Severus' curses got deflected right at us. It took out the end of our broom and rather ruined my cloak," she said, smiling shakily. He smiled back, just as shakily. He looked around, and was surprised to see his godfathers were now above him, the tower looking directly down at them. Could they perhaps jump to safety without him weighing them down? Remus was probably too weak, but Sirius... No, he wouldn't abandon Remus, and they didn't seem too concerned that Moody would start firing on them.

He gave them a thumbs up to let them know he was alright, then looked for some means off the roof. At the far end the roof connected to the wall of a even larger section of the castle were two large windows staring out at them.

"Do you think you can crawl over there?"

There was no response.

"Professor?"

She was unconscious, her eyes closed and her breath shallow. Harry cursed. She was dying and without his magic there wasn't much he could do for her or himself. By himself, the quiet of winter came over him, and in the distance he could hear more spells being cast beneath them and knew Snape wasn't going to be able to help either. He took a deep breath, let it out, and then started crawling over to Larousse. He grabbed the collar of her robes and started dragging her towards the window.

It was ridiculously slow. She was heavy, the snow that had cushioned their fall also made moving difficult, the warming charm was starting to wear off, and the roof was too slanted to stand on. In fact, he wasn't even sure what he was walking on, be it wood, copper, or very fragile glass, and whether it might suddenly shatter beneath them. Yet slowly, inch by inch, he made his way towards the window.

He made it about half way before another explosion rocked the castle. There was no time to wonder reason or origin, as the snow and the thick sheet of ice beneath that was shaken loose and they both began to slide down the roof with it. Harry scrambled for a hold with his free hand, but found only smooth, slick metal. They were speeding towards the edge, and Harry thought the only hope they had was Snape noticing in time to cast a levitation spell on them, but even that seemed ridiculously optimistic.

Movement out of the corner of his eye, and he could see a Padfoot, speeding towards him on four legs, his clawed feet finding traction where Harry's blunt fingernails couldn't, and so very, very fast. He closed the distance between them in a flash, and at the last leap he was once again a man, snatching up Harry's arm in one hand. With his free hand, he smashed his clawed fingers into the copper panels, puncturing them into four perfect grips. Their descent was brought to a abrupt stop, but Larousse was already half way over the edge.

Harry cried out as he felt his arm nearly pulled out of his socket. He just barely keep his hold on Larousse.

"Harry!"

"Padfoot," he whimpered. "Help me. She's too heavy."

"I can't pull you both up! You have to let go of her!"

"No! She'll fall!"

There was a silent pause.

"Prongslet... she's already gone."

Harry looked down at her. She was very still, but that was because she was unconscious, right? He tried shaking her a bit, but she didn't respond. He shook her again.

"Harry!"

"She isn't dead, she's just... hurt. She's unconscious!"

"No... she's not. Let her go."

"Please..."

A second explosion shook the castle, and in his surprise, he lose his grip. Larousse slid over the edge, and as she fell Harry could see her face for just an instant.

She looked peaceful.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort emerged from the wreckage of Hogwarts one severely pissed off dark wizard. While it was pretty neat to learn that he had, in fact, survived a direct hit by the Killing Curse, it was not at all pleasant to spend the next twenty minutes completely rearranging his physical matter back into a usable form. Nor was it particularly fun learning that most of the magic he'd gained through the Solstice ritual had been used up in the process.

At least he still had enough of his own magical reserves to cause a little havoc of his own. Finding Moody had been easy. All he had to do was follow the shouting.

Exploding a wall that happened to be in his way probably wasn't necessary, but he was feeling extravagantly violent at the moment and considering all the damage already inflicted on the castle it hardly made a difference. He stepped out onto the destruction the mad man had wrought, and waded through the cloud of dust until he found himself standing directly behind him. Through the haze he could make out Severus taking cover behind a tree. They locked gazes for an instant, but there was no time to communicate via legilimency before another curse by Moody forced the potion's master to duck behind his cover.

Voldemort slapped Moody upside the head for interrupting them. The escaped prisoner spun around, and then just gaped. Voldemort slapped him again for being rude. Up close, the man's disturbed mind became readily more apparent. With all the skill of a watch maker, he disassembled the man's appearance, tools, and magic to determine his composition. Certainly, Moody didn't look like he had. He had two legs for one, and two eyes as well. Both of them belonged to another wizard, likely the same one he was pretending to be. There was a definite madness there, but it looked almost funny coming out of a skinny little man he was pretending to be, his hair nearly all fallen out and eyebrows too bushy. The flask in his engineer's robe had to contain polyjuice and the amulet around his neck held the charms to avoid suspicion and were also clever tools in his arsenal, and no doubt there were half a dozen more. In his prime and in his insanity, Moody could never be accused of being anything less than thorough.

"How-"

The Dark Lord wasn't in the mood to gloat. His wand still safely back at the lodge, he performed his last bit of wandless magic for the day. He smashed his hands together in a parody of a clap, and the stones beneath them rose and crushed the impostor. Even over the sound of smashing rocks, he could hear the crunch of bone and the squish of organs.

Voldemort smirked. He hoped the castle got as much enjoyment out of it as he did. It had certainly relieved the worst of his bad mood.

Then the body of Severus' fiancée nearly landing on top of him sort of ruined it all over again.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Natalie thought being the only daughter of two witches was the best sort of life any girl could hope for. There were no huffy father droning on about how a girl ought to behave (as if any adult man really knew anything about little girls) or stinking up the house with cigars or calling her silly for caring more about the latest album by the Wicked Sisters than the latest Quidditch championship (unless it was school quidditch and Harry won, that is).

No, having two mothers was way better than having a mother and a father. Especially when they were very different. Constantina and Lenora were as different as the sun and the moon, but you would never find a more loving pair in Britain. Constantina was a driven, ambitious woman who was always planning something and never tolerating even the smallest slight. Lenora on the other hand was as flighty as a butterfly, always curious to try new things and just as quickly to abandon them, with nary a thought to other people's opinions of her.

Sometimes the only thing Natalie thought they had in common was how much they loved to spoil her.

“How does this taste?” Lenora asked, handing her a cookie shaped like a stocking. Her mothers and she were gathered around the kitchen table, Constantina perusing the paper for advertisements on auctions and rummage sales and foreclosures (she was an antique dealer and very good at snatching up the most peculiar and hard to find items), dressed head to toe in black except for the fuzzy white and red slippers Natalie had gotten her when she was eight. Lenora, golden hair tied up in a bandanna and her face powdered with flour, was experimenting with cookie recipes in hopes of really surprising the other witches in her book club.

Natalie dutifully nibbled the offered experiment and chuckled.

“Like pumpkin.”

“Damn! It's suppose to taste like coffee!”

“Coffee-flavored cookies?” Constantina asked skeptically, looking up from her newspaper. “Blah. The pumpkin flavored cookies sound better.”

“But they're completely inappropriate for the season!” she lamented. “Whose going to buy these at the bake sale?”

“Zonko's Joke Shop,” the other witch offered, then turned back to her newspaper.

“I'll take them! I bet Harry would like them,” Natalie said, thinking of all the times she seen him trying to sneak extra pieces of pumpkin pie during the fall. It didn't take her long to realize her mistake, for both her mothers were now sharing amused looks. “What?”

“Nothing,” said Lenora, her smile not shrinking a millimeter. “Just wondering what else this Harry boy must like. You've been very secretive about him lately. It used to be you'd send us letters all about how 'Harry talks to snakes' or 'Harry won the Quidditch cup' or 'Harry cured Blue Pox' -”

“Harry had Blue Pox, not cured it. That's just silly.”

“Yes, of course. But lately, I haven't heard a peep. You're obviously still friends. Might you be a little bit... more now?”

Natalie took great pride in not blushing.

“Maybe.”

“Well, since you're not sure, do you mind if I take a crack at him? I've seen his picture in the papers. Very cute!”

“Mom!

“Don't tease, Lenora. I might get jealous.”

“Mother!”

“Well, I can't risk Constantina's wrath. At least not until after Christmas. It seems you'll have no competition from me.”

“Hmph! You're not his type, anyway!” Natalie sniffed. “He's much too sophisticated.”

Lenora feigned a heart broken look, and started on a new mixture of cookie doe, this time with avocado. “So what is your maybe-more-than-friend doing for the holiday?”

“Communing with the planet. He's a pagan, you know. And not one of those 'don't eat meat or use potions because they're made with kitten livers' pagans either. I mean a real pagan. Run around naked in the moonlight and talk to trees and summon up elementals sort of pagan. You-Know-Who is giving him personal instruction. I've seen the spell their going to try during the Solstice. It's wicked powerful.”

Constantina chuckled. “A sophisticated naturalist? Sounds like fun, but if he offers you mushrooms or homemade droughts, I expect you to say 'no' am I understood?”

Natalie rolled her eyes. She knew her mothers didn't believe half of what she told them about Harry, even though he had shown up in the papers and everything. It was probably for the best anyway. They'd flip their lids if they really knew what was going on.

“It may be too late,” Lenora butted in. “I saw your Christmas present on your dresser when I was taking care of your laundry. You'll have to show us what he got you when you open it.”

“Hmph. Then you'll be waiting a long time. I'm going to open it with Harry or not at all.”

"Well, aren't you a romantic?" Constantina said, knowing it was rather ironic. Natalie was to romantic what hawks were to bunnies. The Slytherin smirked.

"I just don't like the idea of him going off and having fun without me."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Vesper Larousse was cremated two days before Christmas. Harry, who had never been to an actual wizarding funeral, was not in any state to appreciate the grandeur of it. It was performed 'old style', at the very top of a hill where a large circular platform of stone had been laid out for everyone to stand on and at the center a pyre. Larousse's body was wrapped in white linen with her face exposed, the injuries of her death unseen, and her expression peaceful as it had been the moment she'd died. Those gathered, and for a woman with no family there were great many mourners, laid bundles of dried flowers over her body until she was completely buried beneath them. Snape was the one to set it all alight.

Harry watched him from the other end of the platform, searching for some sort of clue about what he was feeling and if he believed Harry had killed his fiancée. She had died trying to save him from a situation he had gotten himself into, after all. He was under no illusions that she would have lived if he hadn't gone back to the castle. Whether he still would have done so, knowing that if he didn't his godfathers would both have died, was something he had yet to resolve with himself. Yet Snape did not look at him nor had he acknowledged him in any way since Larousse's death. There was no anger and no tears. Whatever the man felt about his loss or Harry's role in it, he buried deep under layers of solemn responsibility.

Harry rather thought he must look exactly the same.

His tears had come and gone, leaving him feeling hollow. Hermione was standing beside him, gripping his hand comfortingly, but he couldn't muster the energy to squeeze it back. She had tried so hard to get him to talk to her, but what could he say? The woman she had admired was dead because of him. The only ones who knew the truth were the ones who had been there, and of them the two he thought might understand how he felt had been sent back to the werewolf territories.

With the death of Moody and the subsequent execution of his co-conspirators the next day, the terrorist threat was over and the werewolves called back by their Head Alpha. Harry hadn't even been allowed a proper goodbye, for no sooner than Sirius pulled Harry off the roof and to safety, Sentinels had shown up and dragged him off to St. Mungo's. They were safe at least. Voldemort had spared just enough time to inform him of that before disappearing to play his political games. Victoria had been the one to take him back to the Sianach Lodge, and she was the only person he could stand to see for the two days it took for the funeral to be organized.

The wake was an elaborate affair, with a lot of pomp and circumstance and speeches about heroism by men and women in uniforms. Harry could only grit his teeth through it all. He hadn't known the woman long, but what he did know was that she hadn't wanted to be a heroine. She had wanted to be a wife and mother. She had been denied twice, first by the death of her family and then by her own.

Would she see her loved ones in heaven?

For the part he had played in her demise and his dalliance into ancient magics, would he ever be able to see his own?

The pyre's blaze grew in power and violence, lashing out with burning hands at the cold wind whipping against it. In the smoke and shimmering haze, Harry lost sight of Snape and everyone else on the other side of the platform. He dimly heard the recitation of the priest, recognizing snatches of Latin and bowed his head with everyone else when the prayer was said.

He hadn't realized when it was over, his thoughts lost at some point in the drone of the priest's voice and the roar of the fire. A hand on his shoulder drew his attention upwards, Victoria looking down at him with a kind, sad smile.

"It's time to go now, Harry."

He nodded, and turned to Hermione who was still holding his hand. She was looking at him worriedly, and behind her Draco was wearing the Slytherin equivalent (which looked rather similar to his 'I wonder if it will explode if I touch it' expression). Hermione pulled him into a fierce hug, and he felt something rise up in him.

It could have been her. If she had been at the castle, she would have gone after me. She could have died.

He pulled back sharply, suddenly unable to breath.

"Harry-"

"Stop," he gasped. "I can't... You can't... just leave me alone... for now."

Hermione expression was pained and painful to look at, but Draco quickly dragged her away.

"Leave him be. He's not ready for an inquisition right now," he said sternly, then turned to Harry. "Just fire call or send an owl or whatever if you want to talk or just hang out. We'll be there when you're ready."

He just nodded without looking at them, feeling rather than watching as they walked away. Victoria's hand squeezed his shoulder lightly.

"It's cold out, Young Master. Lets get you inside."

The platform was almost empty as she escorted him down the steps on to the gravel path that would take them the church and behind that their car. Around them the landscape stretched out before them like black and white photograph; vast white hills, gray skies, black skeleton trees. The mourner is their white cloaks and robes were barely visible. He paused for just a moment to look back, and just out of reach of the crumbling remains of the pyre he could see the Dark Lord speaking softly to Snape.

man, mysterious in his motivations and emotions, and even now he was exerting impressive self-control and rationality.

“You know,” he continued. “when she died, I thought I was in shock. I barely felt anything other than surprised disbelief. She was so beautiful and so very alive, and then she was just beautiful. It should have worn off by now though. I should... feel something. At least, I should feel something like what Potter is. Sad, I suppose. But I don't. I feel regret that the plans we made won't come to fruition, and I miss her company, but I don't... I'm not sad.”

Voldemort didn't really understand. He had never felt sad for a person before, not even himself, yet he knew it was customary for someone who wasn't a complete sociopath to feel some sort of grief over someone they loved passing away. Unless...

“You did not love her?” he tried, and Snape stiffened. “I'm actually surprised. She seemed to make you happy.”

“She did make me happy.”

He stepped away from Voldemort, moving to another side of the pyre. He withdrew his wand and started shifting through the ashes and debris.

“I think there must be something missing,” he said, “I think I fell in love with her dreams, with her ability to still dream. It hadn't occurred to me that I could have the sort of happiness she described. The kind of happiness that can be shared with others, instead of coveted, that grows the more it is given away. Those dreams should have died with her, but... they haven't. The dream isn't dead. She gave me the dream... but I don't need her to carry it out.”

Voldemort just tilted his head curiously, wondering if his servant intended to run off with one of his fiancée's bones. Human bones, even burnt ones, were powerful ingredients for potions after all. After a few minutes of quietly sifting through the ash, Snape seemed to find what he was looking for and caught it at the end of his wand.

It was a ring, glowing red from the heat of the fire.

"It's ironic," Snape mused, staring down at the ring with something akin to affection. "She died trying to destroy that same sort of happiness Potter was searching for with his godfathers, and Potter still probably feels more grief over her than I do. He didn't even know she wanted to give him the real thing."

He cast a cooling charm on the ring, placed it in his pocket, and stood up. The two wizards stared at one another for a long moment, and still Voldemort couldn't quite read the other. He wondered if this was true rationality or if the man hadn't gone a bit insane.

"What will you do now?" Voldemort asked, hoping for some clue into his state of mind.

"I'll try again. I doubt there is another Vesper out there for me, but I'm sure I can find a suitable wife and bearer of my children. I'll wait a year before I start courting anyone. That should be a reasonable amount of time for 'grieving'. No point in insulting the dead."

Voldemort nodded in agreement.

"When you are ready, I'll be more than happy to assist if you require it. Despite the previous failures, I am usually quite adept at selecting compatible pairs."

"Thank you, my Lord."

oo
oo

Kimshi is an magical sport from the orient, rather like polo only you ride some sort of magical animal in the water instead of a horse on land and it's only played between two people. Water chess is a team sport with positions, and is played on top of water and is rather too complicated to explain here, but if you're not careful you can drown playing it. :P

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT!!!! TRANSLATORS NEEDED!

Book III is coming to an end in a few weeks, and I am already starting on book IV of the series. There is quite a bit of German and some French in it, and since I'm able to speak either, I am looking for some help. Several people have offered to help and actively helped already, and I am hoping for continued assistance. Before anyone agrees to anything, they should be aware that I will require a lot more translation than I did in the previous chapters and must be able to commit their time and effort to it and be able to respond promptly when I submit text, since I can not progress in writing without certain parts translated first. If you are fluent in German or French (or both would be nice too) and English, and can translate quickly and consistently, creative in your translation (I know what sounds natural in English doesn't always sound natural in another language, and vice versa, so some tweaking is to be expected and appreciated) and are willing to help me I would be so grateful! In return, you will receive updated chapters as they are written rather than once a week and earn my eternal gratitude!

Book III:

Chapter 20: The Prince and his Sorrow

Victoria made a considerably more pleasant companion than Madam Hardwick. The benefits of her presence were easily recognized. She was friendly, considerate, and kind. Harry wished he could work up the energy to give her the smile he could tell she so desperately wanted, but he didn't know if he'd ever be able to find one again.

Hermione's hug was the instigator of a cycle of thoughts that he seemed incapable of breaking away from. His parents were dead. Larousse was dead. Hermione had nearly died. Sirius and Remus had nearly died. So too had Snape. All of his friends had put their lives at risk just associating with him. Even Tom, and he cursed himself for not being a true friend and sending that letter to check on him, had gotten sick again after they'd made up. Now, it wasn't all his fault. Some of it probably wasn't his fault at all, but how much of it was? Who else was going to get hurt or die just by being around him?

"What are you thinking, Young Master, that's got you looking so blue? Best stop now. It doesn't do anyone a wit of good making yourself heartsick," Victoria said, setting a bowl of hot soup in front of him. "Eat up. Mum always used to say chicken noodle soup was good for body and the soul."

"Thanks, Vicki."

He wasn't the least bit hungry, but if he couldn't smile for her, he could at least eat for her. It wasn't like there was anything else to do. They were stuck in a London hotel for the night, pending an inquiry at the Iron House the next morning. They held adjoining rooms, but she hadn't left his side for more than ten minutes at a time, stepping out only to get food, tea, and a letter of instruction from the hotel front desk. The hotel wasn't particularly fancy, but it was nice enough for someone who was about to be interrogated. Victoria said they just wanted to take his statement. Harry wondered why they even bothered since Voldemort had been there to tell his version of events and that was the only version that mattered.

“What's going to happen after the holidays are over?” he asked, trying to distract himself from his gloomy thoughts.

“Oh, they've started repairs to the school already. It helps that the school will fix itself once the proper wards are activated or deactivated as the case might be. There wasn't a lot of activity on that side of the school anyway, so classes should begin as usual.”

“And the Dark Arts and Defense class?”

“... a substitute will take over.”

“Mm.”

There was an awkward silence as they struggled to find things to say. Victoria changed subjects.

“Is there anywhere you'd like to go while we're in London? Diagon Alley is really something during the holidays. And of course there are plays and the Snow Market and such. Lots to do before you have to go back to the castle.”

“I'm not going back to the lodge?” he asked, unduly surprised by that. He didn't think the castle would be ready for residents so soon, but more importantly he didn't think he was ready to return. Too much had happened, and as hard as it was to be alone, it would be even harder to return to the rough and tumble existence that defined his education.

“No, I'm afraid Master is staying in London and will be very busy. He thought you'd prefer staying at Hogwarts than alone at the lodge. You're security status has been lowered so you have all the liberties of the other students. You can go outside and play quidditch and visit Hogsmeade like everyone else. Do you think you might want to go out before then?”

He shook his head and ate another spoonful of soup. She sighed, and let him be for the rest of the evening. As empty as he felt during the day, his head was too full at night, and he barely slept, haunted by images of THAT day and those that followed all the way up until the funeral. In the brief snatches of sleep he obtained, those memories were overlaid with even more horrible images. Sirius and Remus buried beneath the collapsing castle. Hermione falling from the roof. The funeral pyre replaced with a stake, himself tied to it and the mourners all round watching as Snape set it ablaze.

He woke violently, covered in sweat and freezing cold, yet it wasn't the dreams that had woken him. It was a steady knock on the door. He sat up and blearily put on his glasses. Through his window he could see dark gray skies and a heavy rain.

"Enter."

Victoria came in carrying a breakfast tray. She hesitated when she saw him, then quickly set down the tray on the writing desk so she could check his temperature.

"Are you alright? You're freezing. Did you just leap in through the window?"

Amazingly, the suggestion sparked a faint smile, but it died quickly.

"No, just didn't sleep well. Is that for me?" he asked, gesturing towards the tray. She nodded.

"Yep, a nice big breakfast... well, I suppose it's lunch now. You have that appointment at the Iron House at one and then we'll be traveling most of the day and the weather is lousy, so you'll need your strength. Why don't you go take a hot shower first? Housekeeping spelled the food to stay warm."

"Okay."

"Would you like anything else?"

"Coffee?"

She grinned. "An excellent idea. I'll call them- oh, forget it, it's faster to get it myself. Take your shower, and I be back by the time you're done."

“Okay.”

Alone again, he went through his travel case for a change of clothes, intent on taking them into the bathroom with him so Victoria wouldn't end up walking in on him while he was wrapped up in only a towel. As he headed towards the bathroom, a rolled up newspaper squeezed between his plate of macaroni and his glass of milk caught his attention. He felt a tug of curiosity, wondering what had been written about the attack at Hogwarts.

He unrolled it, and to his surprise the front page featured a picture of Larousse's funeral. The image was grainy and out of focused, likely taken from a distance. Another picture of Snape, Larousse, and himself talking together on the field of the destroyed quidditch pitch featured beside it.

The head line advertised 'Family-To-Be Mourns Heroine's Passing'.

Harry swallowed thickly and started to read.

oo
oo

When Victoria returned to the hotel room, she knew instantly that something was wrong. Her wards were still intact, which meant no one had gotten inside in her absence, but there was definitely an aura of 'wrongness'. Her wand remained tucked up her sleeve, but she kept her wrist loose so a simple flick of the wrist would put it in her hands.

She went to Harry's room and put her ear to the door. She heard nothing, not even the distant sound of his shower running. She knocked.

“Harry, you there?”

Nothing. She flung open the door, peeked inside, jumped back in case anyone was waiting for her, then entered. She repeated this with the bathroom door. A quick check of the room found Harry's cloak and shoes missing and a newspaper scattered across the floor.

Harry was gone.

oo
oo

After a month of consistent and heavy snow, Harry found it unpleasantly ironic that the weather would choose Christmas Eve to rain. At least it gave him an excuse to keep his hood up and his head down. The streets were full of holiday traffic, despite the freezing downpour, and he had this irrational fear that at any moment someone was going to grab hold of him and say 'I know you!'.

But no one grabbed him except an old beggar on the street, and there was nothing akin to recognition in those milky eyes.

He wandered around for over three hours, not knowing what to do with himself, ducking into shops for brief snatches of time to warm himself up and cast a few more charms to dry out his clothes. He eventually found himself in a large square a few blocks from the Wizengamot and the Iron House, a giant fountain covered in beasts, magical and magic-related, set in the middle and spitting out snow instead of water from its founts. The square appeared to be a junction between several places of interest, and it conveniently provided an information kiosk with a map and directory of the entirety of wizarding London and even those few muggle places it overlapped.

It took him fifteen minutes to find Grimmuald Place on the map.

It took another hour to actually get there.

Another seven minutes of walking back and forth between house twelve and fourteen before he could actually see it. Half a second to get through the door and out of the rain.

“Who are YOU?!”

Harry let out a squawk of surprise and nearly ran right back outside. He found himself looking up at the portrait of a rather unpleasant woman, who stared down at him like he were some sort of bug. He pulled back his hood. Her eyes widened, and she looked even less pleased to see him.

“James Potter! What do you want? Isn't it bad enough you got my Sirius thrown into Askaban? Come to steal the silverware, as well? Kreicher! Kreicher come out at once!”

He blinked at her stupidly. There was a loud pop and an elderly house elf appeared beside him. He looked as unhappy as the woman at his appearance. He actually hissed at him.

Then the elf blinked, squinted, frowned.

“Tisn't Potter, my Lady. Too young.”

The woman squinted as well. “He looks just like him though... same stupid hair. Who are you boy? Talk quick or I'll have you locked in the basement.”

Good grief, was he in the right place? Surely, Sirius would have thought to warn him about a crazy portrait and her nasty little helper.

“Um... Harry, I mean... Harold, Harold Rook of the Rook Family,” he said, and bowed politely.

“Rook, you say? I think I've heard of them... Scottish stock?”

“I... yes.”

“Bah. Are you one of my sons' friends? They never did have any taste.”

He felt a rush of annoyance. The look he gave her seemed to make her hesitate, but she just sneered.

“What do you want then? No one is here, but if you think to steal something-”

"Madam, I assure you, you own nothing I want," he said stiffly. Beside him, Kreicher hissed. He was very tempted to hiss right back. "I was left something in the kitchen freezer. Once I have it, I'll leave your..." he ran his eyes over the decaying structure, "... home and be on my way."

She seemed to consider. Apparently, nastiness was like politeness to her, because her smile turned strangely congenial.

"Kreicher, take this young gentleman to the kitchen."

"Yes, Mistress," he said, bobbing his head. He glared at Harry. "Come on, then..." he said, and then started muttering. The house was... nasty. There were cobwebs everywhere, an inch of dust covering everything, and disturbing surprises around every turn. The row of elf head wall mounts was just plain disgusting.

"Here you are, sir," the elf said, gesturing about what was either a kitchen or potion's laboratory. Some searching and a few cleaning charms revealed an ancient refrigerator, and when he opened the freezer, was startled to find it still ran cold. There was a shoe box inside. Well, a shoes box and a couple of frozen mice. He took out the box and set it on the table, opening it. There wasn't much inside. Two thousand pounds in muggle money, half that amount in sickles, a map of muggle London, a little blue note book filled with names and information about them, and a matching red book with a series of instructions and tips on escaping to Europe and what to do when he go there.

He sat at the table (after clearing it of cobwebs and spiders, and skimmed through the contents of the books. Halfway through, the red book proved useless. The blue book was completely useless from the start. It was outdated advice and instructions, made before he'd been targeted for assassination. Getting out of Britain would be fairly easy... getting around Europe wouldn't. Everyone Sirius had listed as people who might help or look after Harry were linked to Dumbledore. He'd be dead almost as soon as he stepped onto the continent.

"Shit," he muttered, and shrunk it all down and put it in his pocket. He'd known he couldn't leave before, what did he think had changed? Aside from the fact that he seemed destined to destroy anything resembling a family?

Merlin, Larousse...

She wanted to be his mother. She was going to adopt him with Snape. And as scary as that sounded, the fact that one was now dead and the other probably despised him was far worse. All she had wanted to do was be his mother, and he... she died because she thought of him as her son.

A sob threatened to choke the life out of him, so he swallowed it repeatedly until it settled in his stomach like a rock. He couldn't do this again. Couldn't fall apart and let the rest of the world handle it again, because he knew now the world was unsympathetic. The Dursley's had made his life miserable, torn apart any hope of belonging. He'd started patching things together again after WYRA, but the stitches weren't strong enough and were all coming undone. The friendships and lives and family were all so vulnerable now.

Sirius and Remus were gone, and he might not see them again until after graduation (or never if something happened). Snape would never forgive him, and what would that mean for Draco and Hermione? Would they be forced to stay away from him? Was that for the best considering the violence that seemed to surround him? Voldemort was rarely around, and how would he react when Harry voiced his reluctance to continue his education in paganism? And Natalie...

He wasn't in love with her, he realized. He liked her. He thought she was pretty and smart and daring, but he had barely thought about her at all since they'd parted ways at the train station. He had just thought about leaving the country and hadn't thought of her once. He really was a selfish bastard. He was letting her risk her life and reputation for him, and he didn't have anything to offer her except his friendship.

What was he going to do? He couldn't leave the country. He wasn't suicidal and at the same time he had fallen in love with Britain and the wizarding world.

Perhaps he could leave Hogwarts?

Yes, that's it. He could withdraw and go somewhere else, careful not to let anyone else get too close. Maybe he could even home school... assuming he could find a home. He wouldn't have to face Snape's hatred and his friends would be safely out of his vicinity. If he could just convince the Dark Lord... or do something to get himself expelled, he could find a way to make it work. He'd miss the school and everyone there, but they'd be safe.

The weight in his stomach eased and his head felt clear. Now that he had a plan, something he could actually take charge of and do, things didn't seem so hopeless. He was going to do the responsible thing by protecting his loved ones, still remain loyal to his country, and complete his education.

Now he just had to find his way back to Victoria and explain why he ran off in the first place.

Ugh. He was going to be in so much trouble when Voldemortnd out about this. Worse, Victoria might be in trouble too. Just another example of how his selfishness got his friends in trouble.

He shrunk down his shoe box and placed it in his pocket, then made his way out of the house. Kreicher followed him out, eyes glued to his every move. He bowed to the woman in the portrait on his way out.

"Thank you. I bid you a pleasant evening," he said, though he wouldn't have cared if she spontaneously caught fire. She sneered at him.

"Oh, yes. Looking at the door every second of every day is what I love most-"

He shut the door before hearing the end of her rant. He was instantly soaked. With a heavy sigh, he made his way back in the direction he'd come from.

And immediately realized he was lost. Bother.

He tried casting a locating charm on Victoria, but he didn't know her last name, and it failed. Voldemort, likewise, couldn't be located, but Harry assumed that was because of anti-detection spells. He didn't know the necessary incantation for actual places (sort of silly that he'd know one type and not the other, now that he thought about it), and he didn't think he knew anyone else in London. He couldn't keep wandering the streets though. It was growing dark and the air was growing cold enough to turn the rain to sleet, and if he was out and about after the shops closed he'd be in real trouble.

He thought long and hard on it, first trying to remember how to get back to the square with the kiosk, but only got more lost. He wandered past a couple of banks and law firms, and it suddenly came to him.

Robert Reicher. The lawyer he'd met at his first adoption party, along with his partner Kyle. He still had their card, and it showed they worked out of London, somewhere on Taperty Street. He hoped that street was nearby. He cast a location spell for 'Robert Reicher' and let out a sigh of relief when his wand let out a strand of light, pointing him in the right direction.

He actually passed Taperty Street after two blocks, but it was Christmas Eve so he was likely at home. Another four blocks and the shops gave way to townhouses and apartments, and Harry found himself in front of a three story brick house, squashed between two similar houses and a tiny yard with a rather lopsided snowman waving his stick hand at passersby.

The light on the porch was lit.

He felt suddenly shy. What exactly was he interrupting? It was Christmas Eve after all, so they were probably celebrating. They might even have family over. And here he comes just barging in and mucking up their plans. He should just go and see if he can find someone on the street to-

The door opened in front of him.

"Hello, can I help you?" Robert Reicher asked, looking a bit dubious from the doorway.

"Ah..." Well, he might as well just ask him for directions and then leave him be. "I... I'm sorry to disturb you, but I'm afraid I've gotten lost. You wouldn't happen to know where Walburton Square is?"

Robert blinked, then nodded. "Yes, I know where that is. Come inside, it's freezing out there."

"Oh, thank you."

The inside of the house was much larger than the outside and blessedly warm. There was a staircase leading upstairs in front of him, and a hallway leading towards the kitchen beside that. To his left was a dining room, and to his right a family room with a large Christmas tree and a fire. Kyle Reicher came out of the kitchen, a little girl with curly blond hair on his hip and another slightly older one following behind.

"Who is it Robert?" he said, a bit cautiously. "You don't have to go to the office, do you?"

"Nothing like that. Just a lost traveler."

Work avoided, Kyle looked considerably more pleased to have company.

"Welcome to our home then. I'm Kyle, that's my husband Robert, and these are our daughters Alyssa and Morgana."

Harry bowed to the little girls. "My Ladies."

Morgana, the one actually walking, giggled.

"Come to the kitchen and have some tea with us while Robert draws you a map," Kyle offered.

"Thank you, but I wouldn't want to impose-"

"Don't worry about it," Robert said, wandering off towards the family room. "It's Christmas. Good will to all men. Even those really mysterious young men, who hide under their hoods."

"Oh... sorry about that."

With a bit of unease, he pulled back his hood. Robert was already out of the room by the time he did it, but Kyle took one look at him and recognized him immediately. In fact, so did little Morgana. They both gapped at him, eyes wide. Morgana recovered first and let out a squeal of delight.

"You're the prince! Daddy, it's Prince Harold! He's really here!"

Despite the lingering chill, Harry felt his cheeks burn. Kyle, likewise, looked embarrassed. Robert returned to the hall in an instant. Thankfully, he didn't gape.

"Harold?"

Harry smiled weakly. "Merry Christmas?"

"Papa, you really do know a real prince? You didn't just make it up?" Morgana asked, tugging on Robert's hand to gain his attention. Robert hesitated, looking uncertainly at his guest. Harry decided a little goodwill on his part would be appropriate. He knelt down on one knee so he was closer to her eye level, hoping he looked princely enough.

"Of course, Lady Morgana. I met your fathers when I was not much older than you. They kindly offered their aid to me if I should ever require it," he said. She grinned.

"Does that mean my daddies are knights?"

The males present all gave each other a questioning glance.

"Yes, they are my knights," Harry said, "But they are 'secret' knights, so you must never tell anyone or my enemies would try to come after them. Can you keep their secret, my Lady?"

She nodded vehemently.

"I will, I promise! Lyssa does too! Won't you, Lyssa?"

The little girl nodded with remarkable solemnity for a five year old.

"I thank you both. I am quite in your debt."

He climbed to his feet again, looking to the adults to make sure he hadn't bungled anything, but they seemed more amused than anything. They all went to the kitchen for coffee and cocoa. When they were done, Kyle took the girls upstairs so that they could have a 'secret knightly meeting'. Harry felt decidedly awkward. He hadn't wanted to drag them into his problem, and thinking back on their last meeting and his rude behavior, he had no right to expect it. It didn't help that Robert was just studying him, not saying a word.

"They're very cute," Harry said, staring down at his mug. "I thought you were looking for boys though?"

Robert's intent stare softened a bit.

"I was. Kyle didn't care whether it was a boy or girl though... He had it right. It was six months after we met you that we found them. They were standing together, just holding hands as tightly as they could and not talking to anyone, as if they expected someone to just snatch them away from each other. It broke my heart, because I knew that's exactly what would happen. Nobody adopts two girls together. They'll take two boys or a boy and a girl, but never two girls, even if they're sisters. I think that was the first time I really felt for any of the children I met. You were right to say I wasn't suited to adopt anyone. I'd been thinking about it all wrong until that moment. I was just thinking of how a child could benefit me, socially and in business, but then it became all about how I could help them. So we adopted them both.

Put us in debt for the next five years, but it was worth it. They are worth it. They've changed everything."

Harry smiled a bit, though it brought a swelling of sadness in his heart, thinking of his own family and the family that almost was.

"But enough about me. What about you? How on earth did you end up at our front door? Aren't you suppose to be surrounded by a squad of Guardians at all times?"

He shook his head. "No, not now anyway. Moody and the other terrorists are dead, so I'm safe for the time being. I was at a funeral yesterday, and I was suppose to go back to Hogwarts today, but I went out for a walk and got lost."

"And you got here purely by chance?"

"You're the only name I know in London. I don't know how to locate places, just people."

"Ah, that explains it. I'm surprised you even remember us."

"Kyle gave me your business card..."

An irritated look crossed Robert's face. "I bet he did. He hands them out like candy."

Kyle chose that moment to wander in. "It's called networking, Robby. That's what a marketer does. The girls are in the bath, so we have about fifteen minutes. So what brings you to our neck of the woods, Harold?"

He repeated the explanation he'd given Robert.

"Oh, yes, I read about the funeral in the paper. I'm sorry. It must have been awful to lose ... her." Harry could hear 'your mother again' in the awkward pause. He shook his head.

"I didn't even know she was going to adopt me until this morning. It was bad enough before I knew. She always tried to be kind to me, but I still ended up having fights with her."

Kyle put a comforting hand on his shoulder.

"I think we'd better let someone know where you are. I'm sure your guardians are worried by now," Robert said, standing up from his chair. "I'll fire call WYRA. They should be able to sort this all out and send someone to get you back where you need to be."

He left Harry alone with Kyle, far more the sympathetic type despite how two little girls may have softened him. There was an awkward moment of silence, as Harry tried to grope for something to say that didn't involve his latest catastrophe.

"So... Knight Kyle..."

The man grinned.

"Do you know it so much easier to get little girls to read when it's interesting for them? And it's interesting to read about princes, especially when you might actually meet them. Morgana is the only child in her school who actually reads the newspaper."

Harry sighed. "Is that a good thing? I have to say I've never been impressed with it."

"It seems to be impressed with you. You've been popping up in it fairly often. I was right, by the way. Robert really did regret not snatching you up."

"I think you both made out well with your daughters. I'd only have brought you stress... and assassins... and werewolves... and the Dark Lord, which isn't nearly fun as it sounds."

"You seem to have done well with yourself, though. Hogwarts is a very prestigious school."

“... I'm going to transfer.”

“Why? Did something... oh, your... teacher died there.”

“That's not why I'm leaving. Well, not the only reason. There's a lot of people I care about who are there. Some of them were nearly killed because I was there. I've become a target, and a lot of the people coming after me don't have very good aim. I'm not going to let anyone get hurt just because they're near me when the next attack or accident or political plot comes along. I've been selfishly risking their lives for too long already.”

Kyle stared at him, seemingly startled by what was being said. He'd never seen or heard a boy Harry's age talk like this. In fact, he's never seen anyone talk like this except in books and plays and radio dramas. It was difficult for him to come up with a response to that.

“That's really... conceited.”

Harry looked startled. “What? How is that conceited?!”

Slowly, Kyle's thoughts came together into something he hoped proved both true and helpful. “I get where you're coming from. You don't want other people caught up in your battles. I can understand that. Deciding what battles are yours, that's up to you, but deciding other people's battles for them is most definitely not. You talk about not wanting others to get hurt, but what about you? There are others who don't want you to get hurt. They don't want you fighting your battles alone. Do you have any right to tell them what they can and cannot risk? If you think you're a danger to your friends, then tell them so. Let them know the risks so they can decide for themselves what to do.”

Harry's expression tightened. “Even if it kills them? Like it did... her.”

“... As hard as this might for you to hear... yes. They have a right to decide if your battle is their battle as well and you're not doing anyone any favors by pushing them away. I can't help but think a lot of people would be sad if you left them behind.”

A lot of people? No, not... well.

Hermione would. His godfathers too, but they might be separated already. Ginny. Clyde might, but he had lots of friends to fall back on. The twins, perhaps. Natalie, definitely. Draco. Yeah. Colin Creevey would be destitute without his favorite subject. Ron would hunt him down for leaving him to take care of the rookies. Tom might already be missing him, if he hadn't forgotten about him already. There were a couple of other people, not real friends but friendly acquaintances, who he thought might want him to stay for various reasons.

"I think you know what I'm talking about," Kyle said, smiling a bit. "So before you go do anything drastic, talk to them."

Harry nodded, not entirely convinced. Was he being conceited? He just wanted to protect his friends. Protect his school. But perhaps Kyle was right about letting them make their own decisions. He should at least give them the opportunity to walk away on their own. No hard feelings.

He didn't have long to think about it, because two little girls in matching bathrobes and unicorn slippers came scuttling through the door, followed by Robert.

"They're sending over someone now," Robert said. "It should only take a half an hour or so."

"Will you tell us a story, please?" Morgana asked, eagerly. "A true story?"

"A true story?" Harry asked.

"Yeah, an adventure story. Something that you did. Princes have lots of adventures, don't they?"

Harry thought for a moment, and found a several adventure stories he could use... with a little tweaking.

"Yes, that's very true. Princes have many adventures. Alright, I think I know a story you might like."

"Lets go into the family room, then," Robert said, "The chairs are much more comfortable."

So they all moved into the family room. The sky was dark and dreary outside, but the family room was filled with warm light from the fire and the Christmas tree. Harry took a seat in the middle of the couch, the girls taking point on either side of him, while Robert and Kyle settled themselves into their own chairs.

"Hhhmm, how shall I begin? 'Once upon a time, which was really just a over a year ago, there stood... still stands... a great castle. The largest and most beautiful castle in all the land, and all the people who saw it, noble and peasant alike, wished to go and live there, but only a very few were allowed."

"Is it Hogwarts?" Morgana asked.

"Yes, it is. I've gone there for two and half years and still haven't seen all there is to it. But there was a dangerous secret. Deep beneath the castle, below the dungeons, below the moat, below the very lake, there slept a dragon..."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"... and with the aide of the Black Knight, they returned the fair maiden to her family and peace settled over the castle once again. The End."

The little girls were both looking at him as if he'd sprouted another head.

"What? It really did happen," Harry insisted.

"No way!" Alyssa exclaimed, the only thing she'd said all evening.
"Did you really?!"

"I did, really... more or less."

"That is so cool! Do you still have the magic sword?"

"Yes, but it's back at the castle." And now that he thought about it, under a lot of rubble. Would the GGs find it? Wonder how Lestrangle was going to explain that.

"What about the maiden? Are you going to marry her?"

"Nope, we're just good friends."

"Is the Black Knight your 'secret' knight too?"

"Well, technically he's the King's 'secret' knight... which means you can't tell anyone about him, just like your fathers. Promise?"

"Promise!" they said in unison. Morgana turned to her two very amused fathers. "And you have to promise too!"

"Of course, we promise," Robert said, Kyle nodding in agreement. There was a knock at the door, and Robert stood to answer it.

"It must be Wyra. You girls better say your goodbyes." There was a collective whine, but it was easily ignored.

"Will you come back again? Please, please, please!" Morgana begged, tightening her hold on his arm, as if threatening not to let go if he didn't answer correctly.

"Yeah!" Alyssa agreed, "Please, please, please?!" Harry thought he'd like to agree, but couldn't see it happening any time soon. He tried to placate them anyway.

"Of course. How could I turn away from my brave knights and beautiful ladies?"

The girls wrapped their soft little arms around him, squeezing as tightly as they could. He hugged them back, a painful pressure building inside him again.

'I could have had this,' he thought. 'If Larousse had lived and had children, I could have had a brother or sister like this.' And as if the universe was playing a cosmic joke on him, Snape walked into the family room behind Robert. Harry could only stare, the potion's master standing like the grim specter of Christmas future.

"Potter," he greeted without inflection.

"...Professor," Harry greeted dubiously back. One look at Snape, and the girls had quickly run over to Kyle, as if sensing their prince might not be enough against this new threat. Harry stood, and bowed to the Reichers. "Thank you for your hospitality. You've been very kind."

"We were all glad to have you. You have a Merry Christmas," Kyle said. "And good luck."

"Thank you."

Snape stalked out of the house, and Harry hurried to keep up, scurrying to put on his cloak as Robert handed it to him at the door. Dread fell over him like the heavy rain, weighing him down and stealing his strength. He couldn't face Snape yet. He was almost as afraid of what the man would do as what he would say. The moment they stepped out of the Reicher's front yard and onto the walk, Snape tossed something at him and he caught it on instinct. There was a violent sucking sensation, but almost as soon as it had started it reversed itself, and Harry found himself pitched into a pile of slush.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape checked the street for observers, then touched the empty can he had converted into a portkey. An unpleasant sensation later and he landed a bit awkwardly on the road outside Hogsmeade. In the distance he could see Hogwarts' lights shining up the road. Potter had fallen and was still trying to orient himself, so the he jerked the boy up onto his feet.

"It's too cold for you to be playing in the snow, Potter," he muttered, dragging him towards a Hogwarts' carriage and pushed him inside.

The boy clawed his way inside and into a seat. He pressed himself against the far corner as if he was expecting some sort of attack. Instead, Snape the carriage door shut and knocked on the roof. The carriage lurched forward. "Would you care to explain yourself before I decide on a suitable punishment?"

The boy's wide eyes quickly found the floor. "I got lost."

"... Don't play stupid, Potter, however naturally it may come to you. You didn't get lost from your hotel room. You ran away. You've ruined several people's day off trying to look for you, including my own. What were you hoping this stunt would accomplish?"

The Gryffindor was curling in on himself with every irritated barb, and rather than satisfy Snape it only served to irritate him. He had a very bad day, wandering London in search of Harry, who still happened to be under the effects of an anti-locator charm, in the rain and sleet with far too many last-minute shoppers congesting the streets. The truly sad part was that he was grateful. His alternative was to listen to all of Vesper's friends and colleagues get all weepy and tell the same overly sentimental stories at his hotel. That didn't mean he wasn't going to let the inconsiderate little brat have it.

"Nothing to say? Well, I hope you're satisfied with the attention you've earned, because when we get back to the castle you'll be spending it in my potion's lab cleaning cauldrons. Merlin, I have half a mind to give you your thirty strokes. The extra ten for running back to the castle and then another ten for running around London unsupervised and missing your appointment at the Iron House."

At this point, Potter was practically curled up into a ball.

"Bloody hell," Snape muttered, running a hand through his hair in frustration. He really didn't want to deal with this. He wanted to find a pub somewhere and get drunk. Or go to his room and get drunk, which had less risk of his falling unconscious in a ditch.

The carriage pulled up to the castle, and he dragged Potter inside and down into the dungeons. With the arm in his hand, he could feel the series of fine tremors running through the boy's body. Was it cold or fear? Either would be suitable given the situation.

They entered his private rooms, and he shoved his charge into the bathroom. "Shower," he snapped, then shut the door. Potter's belongings were gathered at the entry way of his rooms, per his instructions, and he shuffled through his trunk shamelessly, until he found a suitable change of clothes. Setting them by the door, he could hear the shower running. "Your clothes are by the door."

He went to his kitchen, rummaged through the cupboards and found some bread and sausage. That, at least, he could make edible. He took two plates and cut pieces of bread and meat for himself and Potter, then made some tea. By the time he was done with that, Potter had emerged from his shower and stood just outside the kitchen with his dirty clothes under his arm and waiting for instructions.

"Leave it all in the bathroom. The house elves will get it. Then come eat."

Potter did so, then sat across from him. Tentatively, he started to eat, peeking at him often as if he expected him to take it away. Snape ignored him in favor of finishing his own meal. It wasn't impressive and certainly the house elves would have gladly given him something more satisfying, but he didn't want to deal with their mothering him or Potter, which they would if they saw either of them in their current state. When they were finished, he ordered Potter to wash the dishes and put them away, which he did with the same annoying compliance. Merlin, a cowed Gryffindor was a fine thing, but the Dark Lord's protégé should have a little more spine.

Perhaps he really thought he was going to give him thirty strikes? Technically, he'd earned them. He'd gone off and risked himself twice in the last week and he wasn't one to shirk his responsibilities as a disciplinarian, but...

He'd seen Potter cry already, heavy, quiet tears as the medi-wizards carried Vesper's body away. He didn't think he could stand seeing them again so soon, not even if the pain was only physical. Besides, he didn't want to deal with a sulky Gryffindor for another week. He still needed to know why he'd run away though.

"You're staying down here for the rest of the holidays," he said. The boy paused, the plate in his hand dripping into the sink. Then he just nodded, and mumbled 'yes, sir'. Ugh. He wasn't going to deal with a sulky Gryffindor. Whatever had him acting like a thoroughly beaten puppy, Snape was quite determined he get over it very quickly. Even if he had to go to drastic measures to achieve that.

He went to his liquor cabinet and pulled out a bottle of brandy, and then to another cupboard and took two glasses. His guest watched him cautiously.

"Sit down, Potter."

He poured them both a drink, and took the first sip himself. His underage friend didn't look as eager to begin.

"Try it."

Reluctantly, the boy did and, predictably, grimaced. Snape didn't hide his smirk.

"You get used to it. Sip it slowly. Hopefully, it will get you relaxed enough that you might avoid shrinking into nonexistence when I ask you again why you ran away."

"I-"

"Finish your drink first, and consider yourself lucky I don't just use verisaterum."

Snape simply watched intently as Potter took another sip, avoiding eye contact. By the third sip he had stopped grimacing. He had almost drank it all when he finally had enough to break the silence.

"I don't know why you didn't just give me a calming draught..." the boy finally said. Snape smirked.

“A calming drought would make you calm. It would also make it easier for you to lie with a clear head. Brandy has the benefit of keeping you calm, and hopefully too stupid to lie. Judging by your sudden ability criticize, I'd say it was working. One more glass, I think.”

He took Potter's almost empty glass and refilled it half way. It was received with little enthusiasm, but he took another mouthful. Snape wasn't the least bit surprised when the already partially drunk child started talking some more.

“Is it true?”

Snape lifted a brow. “Yes, you really do dress like a hooligan. Unless you're referring to some other completely random subject?”

Potter actually had enough liquid courage to scowl at him, which was actually pretty damn funny. If only McGonagal could see her little golden boy now.

“Was she going to adopt me?”

Oh-ho. So he'd seen that article in the paper. Who ever had leaked it was likely roasting over a spit somewhere... or receiving a rather hefty sum from the Dark Lord's 'Dubious Activities Fund' which was made up of fifteen percent of Britain's tax revenue. It didn't include the 'Take Over the World Fund' which constituted twenty-five percent of the publicly extorted national wealth all on its own.

... And he should probably hold off the second glass himself or he'd end up rambling about random subjects in his head, prompted by Potter's completely ambiguous statements.

“She was going to try. The Dark Lord didn't tell you that she'd asked?”

“No... would she have succeeded?”

“Would you have let her?”

That earned him another funny scowl. Or was it a grimace?

“Would you?”

Touché. Answering that question would lead to other questions he wasn't going to answer without at least another two glasses.

“So you ran away because you learned she was going to adopt you? So what? It's not like she could do it now.”

Potter looked at him then, looking perplexed, which wasn't quite as funny as the glare but still pretty close.

“I got your wife killed. Aren't you mad at me?”

Snape let out a rather annoyed snort. Was that what all this was about? He supposed he could be flattered that his opinion meant so much to someone that they ran away rather than face his verbal persecution. Or maybe physical persecution since he did still have that cane. Either way, it was an appropriately juvenile response. I'm scared, so I'll run away.

If only the other Gryffindors were half as smart.

“No. It doesn't really matter. It was a battle. She was a casualty. Victim of friendly fire. Died in the line of a duty she had accepted without enlistment. If I felt the need to take revenge for every mistake on the battlefield, I'd have had to kill half the Death Eaters I know, including my godchildren's father.”

Now that he thought about it, Lucius still owed him twenty galleons for that time he'd knocked him off his broom in the middle of a fight with some aurors and sent him to St. Mungo's.

“This is the price of war. And we are at war, you know?”

“We are?”

So naive.

“Yes. This sort of thing happens all the time. The war never really ended. It just got quieter. Now rather than open warfare we get these random attacks by disgruntled soldiers and widows and orphans. It doesn't have anything to do with you. It's just the times we live in.”

There was a long silence, both lost in thought of his revelation. Snape hadn't really thought about it before, but what he said was true. All these attacks were carried over from a war that was supposedly over more than ten years ago. Hardly a month went by without the newspaper listing some conspirator trying to kill a former Death Eater, handing out anti-government propaganda, blowing up some building, or instigating a riot. Even the Death Eaters and Purebloods caused their own political strife, acting like spoiled children when the Dark Lord didn't hand over the country like some shiny toy they'd whined for. It would probably continue to be that way until everyone who remembered Voldemort's rise to power was dead and buried.

“Will it ever stop?” Potter asked, his green eyes shiny with liquor. Or were those tears? Don't you dare cry. If you cry I won't have any reason not to beat you.

“Maybe you'll live to see the end of it. I doubt I ever will.”

“... Do you think I'm dangerous?”

Snape couldn't hold back the bark of laughter at that. Technically, Harry had proven to be quite dangerous when pushed, but right now he was just a boozy thirteen-year-old with bad eye-sight. The scowl he got just made him laugh harder.

“I don't mean me!” the boy protested. “I mean because Dumbledore wants to kill me... and maybe the headmistress. Is everyone I know gonna end up a casualty, like Professor Larousse?”

Alright, that was a bit more sobering. Especially given his godchildren were close to him, and his concern was legitimate. Hell, in terms of physical proximity he was close to him.

“You're safe from Dumbledore. The Dark Lord is right. He won't try to kill you again any time soon. And if you're worried about the headmistress you're more than welcome to join my plot to overthrow her. Anyone else who shows up will be dealt with. Don't concern yourself with things you can't control."

"I can leave."

"No you can't."

"Why can't I?"

"Bad press."

"Shit."

Snape smirked at that. "Liar. You don't want to leave. You like it here."

"I don't want anyone to get hurt because of me."

"Maybe you'll luck out from now on. Of course, you'll have to quit Dueling Club with that particular philosophy. It's counter productive in that sort of sport."

The conversation was about as productive as it was going to get, so Snape decided to end it before they started repeating themselves or getting pointlessly sentimental. He set the small glasses in the sink and got Harry a tall glass of water.

"Drink this or you'll get a hangover, and I'd rather you didn't vomit in the cauldrons you will be cleaning this evening. Or did you think your teen angst got you out of trouble?"

For someone who was about to be punished in the most tedious of manners, Potter looked surprisingly grateful as he accepted the water. Snape dismissed it as thankfulness that he had gotten off easy, and made a mental list of chores he'd have the foolish boy complete to thoroughly erase the notion from his empty head.

Ooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Book III:

Chapter 21: The Prince's Penance

Harry still managed to get a hangover, but in the scheme of things it was a small price to pay for Snape's forgiveness. He didn't think he could survive, regardless of what Kyle had told him, if Snape suddenly developed a vendetta against him. The potion master had unknowingly offered the absolution Harry desperately needed in order to cope with what had happened to Larousse. So, despite the positively abysmal week of scrubbing, polishing, dusting, organizing, inventorying, moving, writing, reviewing, and correcting in the darkest, chilliest, most depressing part of the castle and sleeping on the couch of a man who went to bed late and got up ridiculously early, Harry felt considerably better going out than he had going in.

Those few students he'd encountered on his trek back up to his dorm room were stunned to realize he had actually been in the castle the entire time. When some of them had offered their condolences over Larousse, he felt the urge to run back and spend another week down the dungeons alone. He didn't have time for that though. The rest of the students would be arriving back at Hogwarts that evening, and even though he had finished his homework, Snape hadn't spared him enough free time to do anything else except eat, sleep, and perform basic hygiene.

Unpacking was at the bottom of his things to do. The first thing he wanted was to write letters. Taking several pieces of parchment and some quills he found himself a quiet, sunny place in the library, and started to write. The first was a short thank you letter to the Reichers with a few extra lines hoping they had a good holiday and a happy New Year. The second one was to Victoria, apologizing for running away and leaving her in a fix. The third to Voldemort, requesting an explanation of what the hell happened with the ritual, because last year hadn't been anything like that. They hadn't even made their personal blood offerings and yet they still came out saturated with magic (albeit not enough to sink the country else the Dark Lord could have popped Moody like a pimple without having to move), but had quickly used it all up. The fourth was to his godfathers telling them he was well, and hoping to hear how things were going with them soon. The fifth took considerably more thought.

Harry didn't like apologizing on paper. He would much rather apologize in person, as he felt too awkward putting it in writing. To make it even more awkward, not only was he apologizing, he was also inquiring on Tom's health and life outside Hogwarts and wishing him the best of luck in his recovery. He ended up writing three different versions and then rewriting the last one into something barely recognizable to the original, and still wasn't satisfied. It was the best he could probably do without Hermione's help, and frankly it felt too personal for outside revision.

Then he realized he was going to have to send all the letters via Snape except the one to the Reicher's and that just brought a whole new level of embarrassment to what he was doing. Oh well, it was the right thing to do. He'd been extremely selfish lately and impinged on the kindness of others while neglecting a friend who needed support. It was time that he stopped acting like a martyr and took responsibility for himself.

oo
oo

McGunny ran into Potter on the way back from the owlry. He had been sending off thank you notes for gifts he'd received, needing a distraction from the moral conundrum he was facing in regards to what had happened over the last few weeks. Part of the school had been blown up and a professor and her killer were both dead. Somehow, Potter had known about the attack and attempted to get everyone to safety. Then McGunny had to go and fuck things up by mentioning the werewolves being left behind. He didn't doubt for a second that what he had told Potter had sent him running back to the castle and Professors Snape and Larousse running after him, which in turn resulted in the confrontation with Moody.

He wasn't sure how he should feel about his involvement. It had been Potter's decision to go back, but it was based on what he had told him. Did that mean he was somehow responsible for Larousse's death?

It didn't really feel like it. He had liked her as a teacher and certainly she hadn't deserved to die, but he couldn't bring himself to see what had happen as his fault. Or even Potter's fault. Potter had been trying to save his family, however socially outcast that family might be. Then everything got complicated when the professor died and then it was learned she was going to adopt Potter. Which led to his moral conundrum.

What should he tell the school?

It was his obligation to explain things as thoroughly and objectively as he could, both the good and the bad, but he couldn't see the fact that Potter had risked a very popular teacher's life for a couple of werewolves going over well with the student body. And despite his own sense of objectivity, he sympathized with Potter. Life had been difficult for him lately and no one seemed to be making any effort to ease the strain. Something like this could have him relegated back to the 'Black Cat of Gryffindor' status from his first year. Potter was strong and he'd survive it, but McGunny didn't want to be the one responsible for it. He had until the rest of the newspaper staff showed up that evening to figure out what he was going to do.

So it was a rather remarkable coincidence that the subject of his uncertainty should meet him half way up the stairs. They blinked at each other, mutually surprised by the other's appearance. The young Gryffindor was paler than usual, with dark circles under his eyes, that made him look sickly and skeletal. His smile was tired and cautious.

"Oh, hey, McGunny," Potter greeted.

"Hello, Potter," he replied, then realized he had a rare opportunity to talk to the other boy alone. "Did you just get back? I didn't think the train was suppose to arrive until four."

"Oh, no, I've been back all week. Just..." he trailed off. McGunny nodded.

"Didn't want to deal with anyone else yet?"

“Ah, yeah. I know they mean well but I can only stand to hear 'I'm sorry for your loss' so many times.”

“I'll try to refrain, then... I don't suppose I could get an interview while we're standing here?”

“Um... no?”

With that his chance was lost, because Potter bolted up the stairs like he expected to be chased. Despite the rudeness of the departure, McGunny was rather amused. Let it never be said that Potter was a glory hound. In fact, he seemed positively terrified of media attention. Or perhaps he was beating himself up over what happened. He sighed.

Could he really print a story, of which he had very little information himself, knowing it only served to stir up ill feelings against the boy and disrupt the tentative trust that had developed between them?

He could.

But he wouldn't.

That would be impractical as well as morally questionable. If he was very careful, and a little bit clever, he wouldn't even have to lie. Merely twist the words into a different perspective.

Heroism and villainy was all about perspective anyway.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“I'm sure he's fine. He'd have sent us an owl if he wasn't,” Draco insisted for the hundredth time as Hermione chewed her fingernails. Beside her, Natalie looked out the carriage window at the setting sun and said nothing. She had been strangely reserved since they met up at the train station, her usual mockery absent. Draco wanted to prod her for answers, but he had his hands full with his sister.

"No, he wouldn't. He's got too much pride. He thinks he has to face all his problems on his own. I really don't understand his reasoning sometimes."

"He's fine. It's not like he's really alone. Uncle Severus is there and Professor McGonagal and some other random people not important enough to remember."

"Uncle Severus isn't in any state to look after anyone," she insisted, convinced that the man was steeped in quiet grief. Draco was more skeptical, finding very little in his recent behavior to suggest Snape was anything but in complete control of himself. He'd even remembered to send them their Christmas gifts.

"We'll know when we see them," Natalie said off-handedly as the carriage came to a halt. She climbed out first, and looked around. The castle keep was crowded with students hurrying to get out of the cold. She gave up her search when she realized it was unreasonable to expect Harry to block an entry way just to wait for them.

She stalked towards the Great Hall, her pace quick with intent, and forced Draco and Hermione to rush to keep up. She outpaced Ginny and Clyde, who were walking together, and went right pass Pansy Parkinson and Millicent Bulstrode, who were snickering to each other at her approach. She'd deal with the last two later, but she had someone more important that she wanted to see. She stepped into the main chamber, bright and warm, but looking sad and plain after a month of beautiful decorations, and turned towards the Gryffindor table.

Harry was in his usual spot, and he seemed to be waiting for her... or rather them. He raised his hand in greeting, but didn't come over to meet her. She didn't really blame him. He looked as if someone had been keeping him prisoner in their dungeon for ten years, and wasn't in any state to battle through a crowd. The smile he gave her was tired and sad, but from what she had heard from Hermione it was better than the nothing he'd given her at the funeral.

"He looks better," Hermione said, sounding relieved. Natalie raised an eyebrow. The Gryffindor princess gave an ironic smile. "His eyes are clearer. I think he's stopped wallowing, at least."

"Should we all go talk to him?" Draco asked, "Or wait till after dinner?"

"Lets wait till after dinner. He won't want to talk with the entire school listening in," Natalie said, though all she wanted to do was go over and hug him and kiss him and make him smile for real. "We'll meet in the dueling hall, say in an hour?"

"Alright," Hermione agreed and went to join her friend. Natalie was severely irritated when she went ahead and sat next to Harry and gave him a hug right in front of everyone. Didn't she realize that was the girlfriend's job?

oo
oo

Harry felt awkward being hugged. That was odd because he'd liked getting hugs from his godfathers, but 'girl hugs' left him shy and embarrassed, particularly when being done in front of the entire school. At least, he had an excuse. Everyone knew about Larousse, everyone knew she was supposedly going to adopt him, and thus everyone was walking on eggshells around him. There had been no accusations or even accusatory looks yet, but then the paper hadn't mention his involvement in Moody's destruction or Larousse's death beyond helping to evacuate the school. He wondered how long it would be before those few students who had actually been there leaked out that Harry had lead the teachers right back into danger or if they ever would. Did they even realize what he had done? Surely, McGunny did. He'd seen Harry run off himself, and he was the Hogwarts' Herald's editor and chief. Of course, McGunny hadn't questioned him, and he always seemed to be the sort not to make assumptions when it came to a story. There was no real telling what the next issue of the paper would tell or what reaction it would bring.

"Welcome back," he said. "I hope your Christmas wasn't completely ruined."

"No worries. Lucius was absent through most of it, so it was actually one of my happier holidays," she said lightly, but her smile faded quickly. "I've been worried about you. You look tired."

"I've been in detention for a week. I'm very tired."

"Detention? What for?"

Killing my teacher.

"I skipped my appointment at the Iron House and got completely lost in London. Took nearly six hours before anyone found me. Snape wasn't happy with me at all. Nor was the sentinel who had to travel all the way from London on Christmas morning to take my statement. Bother what a mess."

"How on earth did all that happen?"

He shrugged.

"Can it wait? I have a feeling everyone else will want to know too. Plus, I have something important to discuss with you all."

She nodded. "Alright. We're suppose to meet up with Draco and Natalie in the dueling hall. Did you want to bring anyone else?"

"Ginny, the twins, Clyde, and... I guess, Ron. Yeah, I suppose I'll need to talk to him too."

That clearly surprised her. That Harry would have a meeting with his friends was one thing, but Ron hardly qualified as more than a barely tolerated acquaintance. What could they possibly have to say to one another?

Harry didn't feel it a worthy subject to get into for the moment, and turned his attention to eating his dinner. He spared just enough courtesy to greet Clyde, Ginny, Fred, George, and various other individuals who came and went in his line of sight, but otherwise seemed to ignore his surroundings.

"I'll meet you there," he said, finishing his meal before anyone else was even half way done, and left the table. He could feel many eyes on his back as he left the hall, but pretended not to notice. He hadn't even reached the dueling hall when Natalie caught up with him. She spun him around and wrapped him in her arms, holding onto him tightly.

"I'm sorry, Harry."

His first instinct was to hold her back, like he did Hermione, but then he remembered he wasn't in love with her and he'd led her on for long enough. So instead he gently pushed her away.

"You don't have anything to be sorry about."

She didn't seem to realize something was wrong yet, and continued. "I'm sorry you were here alone. I tried to convince my mums to let me come back, but they wouldn't let me."

He hesitated, his mouth going dry with the realization he was about to say something that would hurt her. "They were right. You should spend your holidays with the people who love you."

She looked as if he had just slapped her, surprise gradually giving way to disbelief and then horror.

"Why did you say that? Why did you say it like that? I'm not expecting a 'death to us part' vow, but come on."

"I'm sorry."

She looked like she was going to hit him, which he was expecting, but instead she clenched her fists and forced herself to remain calm. "Is it Hermione? Ginny?"

His look of perplexity must have been answer enough for she asked a different question.

"Do you like another girl?"

He smiled just a little at that. "If I were to like any girl it would definitely be you, but I don't think I can. Either I'm too young or too weird or too something... or not enough of something. I don't know, but I can't love you like you want. I can't love anyone like that. I thought liking you as a friend who held my hand and occasionally kissed was enough, but it's not, is it? Not for you? It's not really fair, especially since..."

He felt a headache building as he fought to keep back tears and grief and hurt and a dozen other things from twisting his expression. He massaged his temples as an excuse to cover his face for a moment.

"Larousse died for me, Natalie. She died because she loved me like a son or at least thought she did, but I didn't love her. I pitied her. Sometimes I even admired her. But I never loved her, and now I have to live with knowing she died for something that wasn't worth dying for. A casual affection that wouldn't lead to anything. I can't do that again. I can't stand the idea of something happening to you because you thought we were something we're not. We're just kids, and you're my friend. That's it."

"That's it?" she repeated, disbelieving.

"That's it. I'm sorry. It's for real now. I can't be your boyfriend."

They didn't say anything for a minute, didn't even move. He was more resolved than he had been before, and she seemed to realize it the longer she stared into his tired eyes. Finally, she nodded.

"Okay."

"Okay? You're okay with this? Just being friends?"

"Fuck no," she snapped, fire returning to her eyes. Her temper could easily match his own when provoked, and he knew he'd been whacking it with a stick since he'd told her staying home was the right thing. "I'm not okay with just being your friend. I was your friend, then I was your girlfriend, then I was your friend, and then I was your girlfriend again, and now I'm suppose to be your friend again? Screw you, Harry. I'm not a damn yo-yo. I'm not playing this game every time you get a savior complex and then get over it the next week. We're over, Harry. Completely. We're not dating, were not talking, and hopefully we won't even be thinking about each other pretty soon. Happy fucking New Year!"

And with that she stormed away and he just watched her. He felt sick watching her leave, knowing it was the end of a special friendship that could have been more someday. But someday wasn't soon enough. It hurt, more than he thought it would, even though he knew it was the right thing to do. That honesty was something to be upheld in the making of friendships and even in the ending of them, and he failed at that more often than not. He would have to do right by the others too, and if he were completely alone afterwards... that was a fear he'd have to face.

He went ahead to the dueling hall to wait for the others. The torches lit upon his entry, revealing rows of mannequins standing at attention, like soldiers ready for battle. They were all identical to one another in design, but Harry found his 'Rolfe' easily by the unique scars in the woods. He ran his fingers over the grooves and roughened sections of wood filled in with special polymer and resins to keep it's shape. He was inexplicably reminded of Moody, a monster if he'd ever seen one, tearing apart the body of another man to add to his own, a mockery of wholeness. Thought of himself, wondered if he weren't exactly the same, and then realized that was disgustingly melodramatic and didn't make much sense.

He really needed to get out of this funk or he was going to turn into one of those gloomy types who waxed on and on about pain and suffering and death until they turned a taboo subject into a tedious one.

The arrival of his friends effectively distracted him.

"Our Great Lord of Chaos!" the twins called as they stormed the hall, fighting each other to get through a door that should have been able to easily fit four of them. Fred squeeze through first, shoving his brother into Clyde, and rushed forward to throw his arms around Harry. "You kept your promise! And then some! Even we never thought you'd blow up the school!"

Okay, really that wasn't in anyway tactful considering he'd watched his teacher die that day, but it did surprise him enough that he didn't immediately plummet into depression again. "I didn't actually blow up the school," he pointed out, "Moody blew it up. I just happened to be nearby."

"So modest!" Fred said, ruffling the smaller boy's hair.

"That isn't funny!" Hermione scolded as she entered the room. "Someone we all know died! Show a little respect."

George rolled his eyes at his brother (wisely facing away from Hermione when he did so).

"It's too bad that," Fred said. "She was a great teacher, but not all there in the head. For Merlin's sake, she wanted to marry Snape. She was chewing mushrooms for sure."

"George!" she shrieked in outrage, while Harry could only gape.

"Fred, actually. And she didn't perform three miracles before she died, so stop treating her like a saint. It's sucks what happened, but it happens all the time all over the place."

Harry supposed that was true, but didn't necessarily think they should be glib about it.

"They have a point," Draco said. "However crass they state it. If it bothers you so much, just remember that their heathens and don't know any better."

The twins smiled at him, causing the Malfoy heir to gulp.

"Anyway," Clyde interrupted, "Hey, Harry."

"Hey, Clyde," he said, smiling slightly, "Welcome back. Where's Ginny?"

“Trying to convince Ron to come,” Draco said, looking put upon, “The idiot is being stubborn. Thinks you're trying to turn us all into your minions to ordered around on a whim.”

“Ooh, sounds potentially kinky,” George chirped, earning a slap upside the head from Hermione. And another slap from Ginny as she walked through the door with a sulky brother on her heels.

“Alright, tell me what you want so I can leave,” the dueling captain said, crossing his arms impatiently. Suddenly, Harry wished he'd talked to Ron separately. Or not at all. If the boy got killed for being in his vicinity, would that be so bad?

Well, too late now.

“I have something to tell you, and then I need you all to make some important decisions.”

“Think he's going to ask one of us to marry him?” Fred asked George, who looked thoughtful. “Maybe. Might explain why Cypher was so pissed off.”

Harry glared at them. “This is a matter of life and death. Possibly your own. So could you be serious for ten bloody minutes?”

It sobered up everyone's demeanor except the twins (and Ron's, who looked as constipated as ever). He took a deep breath and began to explain to them what really happened that day at the castle, keeping the matter of the ritual that led him back to the castle a vague prequel and detailing the events that followed meticulously. He'd practiced this speech in the bathroom mirror half a dozen times, until he could tell it without feeling the need to vomit.

“... and then the medi-wizards took her body away.”

Everyone was silent, even the twins, for a long moment. Ron coughed into his hand, and fidgeted uncomfortably, breaking the silence.

“Well that's... a really bloody fucked up story and all mate. Does it have a point?”

Everyone scowled at him, but he ignored them. Harry nodded.

“The point is... someone or something has tried to kill me every year since I've gotten here. I've had so many brushes with death... it's like knowing I'll get the flu every winter. It's sucks, but I know its going to happen. I just... it can be contagious. Larousse died saving me. Other people have gotten hurt just being near me. I need all of you to decide if it's worth it. If our friendships is worth risking your life for. And in Ron's case whether he still wants me around the other duelists knowing they might get blown up off the platform rather than on it.”

Ron snorted. “Whatever. They're just rookies.” He stalked out, muttering about stupid Gryffindor nobility or noble Griffindor stupidity or something to that effect.

“Our father's a Death Eater, Potter,” Draco said, shrugging, “So it's not like you're any safer hanging out with Hermione and me. We've had people try to kidnap or hurt us and done just fine without the flowery speeches. I'd rather have you guarding our backs and us guarding yours than go at it alone. It's common sense.”

Harry turned to Hermione whose face was pinched in determination.

“Not quite how I'd put it, but Draco's right. It's better if we stick together. We'll be happier and safer that way.”

Ginny just nodded, mirroring Hermione's stance. Harry turned to the twins just in time to see them grinning at each other, and then at Harry. Suddenly, they both held out their arms and charged towards him.

“Group hug!”

Harry's survival instinct kicked in and he bolted around them.

“Thanks guys!” he shouted back to the others quickly, “I really appreciate-”

Clyde interjected, "We know, Harry! Tell us later. Just run or they'll catch you!"

"Traitor! You just want to get Harry alone for some private luv'ins!"* Fred accused, causing his nephew to turn beet red. Luckily, this was just enough of a distraction for Harry to slip under his outstretched arms and through the door. From there he managed to escape into the castle, feeling laughter bubbling up from inside him for the first time since Larousse's death.

He wasn't alone! He had lost Natalie, but everyone else had stayed. They knew and understood the risks, and he would try so hard to truly earn that loyalty they had so willingly given. He would find some way to make himself worthy of it.

Somehow.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The New Year began on a dark note for the Order of the Phoenix. Three of their spies were dead and the families they'd left behind were either imprisoned or under surveillance. Their end was even harder to bare when they later learned that their comrades were mere hours away from learning that Larousse was a trap from 'Ladybug', their inside source at one of the wizarding newspapers. Moody was lost to them long before he'd died, but the ignominy of his actions and subsequent defeat sat ill with those who had known him personally. Augusta Longbottom had only escaped captured through her strict adherence to anonymity, but even she had come dangerously close to discovery.

So with heavy hearts and steely resolve the Order gathered at their newest hideout, an abandoned muggle farm house some twenty miles outside of Hamburg, to decide their next course of action.

"My friends," Dumbledore began solemnly. "We've suffered a grave loss this last year. Our brave agents in Britain have paid for their beliefs with their lives and the reputations of their families, and worse yet, their sacrifice was used to benefit the Dark Lord and escalated tension in Britain and Europe.”

As Tonks listened, her hair began turning an ever darkening shade of gray, like a storm was building around her head and at any moment lighting bolts might shoot out of it. Beside her, Viktor's expression told a similar story. They were the youngest members of the Order, and they still took every defeat personally. Johan, Gilfred, Timmons, Fredric, and Phoebe took it all in stride, their true feelings on the matter buried under layers of jaded acceptance.

“However, some good did come of this,” he continued. “The German Minister of Magic has agreed that the situation in Britain is a direct threat to the country and can no longer be ignored. There is a project in the making to uncover and make public the Dark Lord's plans to send his growing army into the continent. It is an extremely delicate situation, but one that promises to bring about the decisive actions we have been driving towards since the Dark Lord took power.”

From the window he was guarding, Johan made a derisive sound. “Another scheme? What will you use now? Cripples and vampires? Animangi and centaurs?”

“School children, actually,” Dumbledore said. “Among others, but mostly school children.”

Everyone looked suitably horrified except for Krum, who, being a school child himself and actively participating in an underground war, didn't see the problem.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

High above the English countryside, where the the Earth became little more than a patchwork quilt of fields and trees and rivers, Turnis mentally cursed wizards. One moment, he had been sitting warm and snug in his roost with the rest of the Hogwart's owls, ignoring the few students who came and sent off some of his neighbors to deliver their letters, and the next, he had been rather rudely manhandled and tossed out a window into the cold, gusty winter with a letter flopping around awkwardly from his leg.

He was very tempted to tear the blasted thing off and leave it in a snow bank, go back home, find the vulture of a man who'd ousted him, and poop on him for good measure. He wouldn't of course. He wasn't stupid. A free roost and free food for the occasional delivery was a sweet deal, and he wouldn't break his contract over something as petty as a few ruffled feathers.

So he flew on, as fast as he could, south towards England with a tailwind to make the trip that much faster. The sooner he got rid of the letter, the sooner he could get home to snuggle with Leila, the pretty barn owl with the mischievous glint in her sloe-eyed gaze. The address on his letter was wrong, as was the name, but Turnis had been doing this for seventeen years and knew not to rely on a wizard's sense of geography or spelling unless he wanted to find Atlantis before he found the correct address. The magical signature was strong though, and easily traceable to a cottage deep in a young forest.

He circled once to look for potential predators, found nothing more threatening than a couple of hungry foxes, and landed on a windowsill. It looked directly into a kitchen, where he saw the biggest rat in his life nibbling on a sandwich. He had to blink and shake himself twice before he realized it was actually a human, and he was still a bit skeptical. This wasn't who he was looking for. The one he was looking for was upstairs, but this one might let him inside. He pecked at the window.

The rat-man jumped, dropping his sandwich. Turnis laughed, a screeching sound to human ears. The rat-man glowered at him, but shuffled over to open the window.

"What does he want now? He could have easily kept all of this junk at one of his-"

Turnis ignored him and flew past, dodging his madly groping little paws and went straight for the stairs just beyond the kitchen. The entire place was quite small, especially for a wizarding home, and it took him only a moment to find the magical signature he was looking for. The upstairs was just an open space with magical artifacts secured behind magicked display cases. The entire place radiated magical energy, but the one he was looking for stood out easily from the rest.

He landed on the case, ruffling his feathers and wondering what to do now. Normally, his intended recipient actually had hands. Of course, normally, his intended recipient had a body. Beneath his claws and glass, a golden coin pulsed with dark intent like the heart of some sleeping monster just waiting to be awoke. Turnis tapped on the glass with his beak.

“What are you doing over there?! Shoo shoo!” the rat-man shouted, running up the stairs with a broom in hand. Turnis screeched at him in annoyance.

“Shoo! Get out of here this instant or I'll cook you over a spit!”

An empty threat he'd heard many times before and wasn't impressed by. He wasn't going anywhere until he delivered his letter. He tapped on the glass a bit harder this time. The pulse of magic started to quicken. At last, he was getting somewhere.

Rat-man's broom came up to push him away from the case, but he hissed at it and flapped his wings angrily, refusing to budge. The magic beneath him beat so fast now it sounded like the hum of a bee, and was steadily increasing in power. It seemed Turnis had succeeded in waking it up. Which was good, because he really didn't want to stay here long enough for his attacker to get brave with his broom. Or remember that he actually had a wand.

“That's it, you're barbecue!” The nasty little wizard was fumbling inside his robe, and Turnis was ready to bolt, delivery or no, but then the world went white.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom stretched his wings and gave an experimental flap. Everything moved easily and painlessly. Good, he hadn't damaged his new body. He reoriented himself just in time to dodge a curse from Pettigrew and flew straight for him, slashing at the man's face with his talons as he passed. Pettigrew screamed and curled himself up on the floor, covering his bloody face with his hands. With nothing to fear at his back, he flew down the stairs, out the open window, and into the forest. He kept going until the little cottage was miles away and flew into barn. In the comfort of darkness, he took stock of himself.

Possession of an animal wasn't particularly difficult, especially when you had little connection to the original body (or in his case, object) housing your soul, but he had so little power left after his brother had killed him. Certainly not enough to take possession of Pettigrew, not that he would have forced himself into that body even as a last resort. So he'd slept, soaking up what little power he could, until at last an opportunity presented himself.

Turnis wasn't physically impressive, being a mere tawny owl and heavy with years, but his magical intuition was impressive. He'd found his way to him despite the measures the Dark Lord had erected against such an action. Perhaps his elder counterpart hadn't factored in owls when setting up his little hiding spot, but that would have been unforgivably foolish on his part. Voldemort was many things, but foolish was not one of them.

It didn't matter now, though. He was free and no one the wiser.

A dragging sensation on his leg drew his attention. There was a letter. Hardly unusual. The fact that it was addressed to him, or rather Thomas Rook, was. He pulled it off his leg, and very carefully broke the seal with his beak. In the scant moonlight, his enormous eyes scoured the page.

Dear Tom

I hope this letter finds you well. I have been meaning to send it since I learned you weren't coming back to school this year, but there have been so many distractions. I am truly sorry...

Harry. Tom let out a shrieking laugh. His dear Harry had re-birthed him a second time! His timing was perfect. Despite his apology, three months ago he wouldn't have had the strength to possess even an owl, and would have ruined his chance at escape. This was destiny. The will of something. God or the Earth, he didn't care.

He beat his wings and took to the sky. There was somewhere he was supposed to be and since fate had proven kind so far, who was he to defy it?

oo
oo

Before anyone suggests it, no Clyde does not have a crush on Harry. The twins don't either, even though they have fun pretending they do. They aren't actually gay.

If you're confused about the Tom, Pettigrew, owl, cottage thing, here it is in summary. Tom was never really 'dead', his soul merely moved into a magical coin, which the Dark Lord gave to Pettigrew to keep safely hidden away in the little cottage with various other magical artifacts (he's a collector and has several such places, and he's assigned Pettigrew as janitor in one since he has nothing for the over grown rodent to do lately). Turnis, the owl, was given Harry's letter, and used the magic of Harry's intent (which is particularly strong due to his dalliance into Earth magic which owls' ability to find people is also based on) to find Tom rather than the name or address (that Snape used, not knowing that both were fake. Voldemort never told him the truth about Tom, remember?). Tom took possession of Turnis' body without Pettigrew knowing it and escaped. Clear?

IMPORTANT NOTICE

I'm behind on my writing. I usually have three chapters written at any given time, but now I don't even have one, so I'm taking a break to get these advance chapters written. I know you don't like it, but it's better than me missing a week after a cliff hanger or during the middle of some event in the story, and this is likely to happen. I've started a new job, am applying to graduate school, and it's the holidays. The graduate school application is actually why I've fallen so far behind. I've been scrambling to find recommendation letters and write my statement of purpose. Sigh. Please be patient. The story is going to get crazy fast in book IV.

Book IV:

Chapter 1: Foreign Affairs

"Allbright, you're after Ginny," Ron said, stepping off the platform as his sister made her way up. The entire Hogwarts' Dueling Club was at their fifth dueling tournament in Edinburgh, competing against Westwidden, the local wizarding school. Three platforms had been set up in the great hall to accommodate three different skill levels; beginner, intermediate, and semi-professional, and each had their own selection of four judges. Spectators were placed safely behind a ward, protecting them from the odd renegade spell and protecting the duelists from overzealous fans and angry parents. The ward muffled some of the noise from the crowd, but you could still hear the cheering and shouting and cursing, and even if you were deaf you could tell who was rooting for who by the color of robes they wore and the many signs and flags they were waving.

The locals were decked out mostly in blue and black and made up the majority of the crowd, but Hogwarts' supporters were every color under the sun and were by far the most enthusiastic. There were also a lot more student supporters, who had considerably less shame than their adult neighbors.

As Ron walked by one crowd of girls he smirked at them and they broke out into squeals of delight. With a considerably less friendly look towards Allbright, he said. "Don't screw up."

The young Hufflepuff grimaced, but nodded. Harry placed his hand on the boy's shoulder and smiled.

"Don't mind him. He says the same thing to everyone. You're going to do fine. I've seen the other guy, he's got poor endurance. Just keep up your defense and he'll tire himself out. Got it?"

"Yeah, thanks Captain."

Technically, Harry was still just vice captain, but since Ron tended to ignore the 'Rookies', they had, unofficially, given him that honor. It annoyed the hell out of Ron, but not enough for him to actually take charge of them. Harry just grinned and went to talk to the arrogant bastard who was standing next to Snape and watching Fred duel... or rather toy with the Westwidgen team captain on the semi-professional platform. There were only a handful of duelist in either school qualified to be semi-professional, and all of them sixth or seventh years. Both Jr. Division duelists looked on with a sort of longing as the two boys battled it out in what appeared to be a fight to the death. Harry shook himself out of it to talk to Ron.

"If you don't want to bother with the rookies, that's fine with me. But I'd appreciate it if you didn't shoot down their morale just before they're about to fight."

The red head tore his eyes away from Fred to glare at Harry in annoyance.

"We're sitting in third position because you can't teach them to do more than put up shields. We'd be going to the championship if it wasn't for losers like Allbright."

Harry came very close to setting fire to Ron with his eyes alone at that moment. Instead, he grabbed his arm and hissed in his ear.

"Don't put your fucked-up leadership skills on my shoulders, Weasley. My rookies have been performing on par or better with every other school's beginner level duelists, despite the fact that you've neglected to give them their fair share of duels during practice and despite the fact you've gone out of your way to make them feel like shit. If they were performing poorly, which they're not, it'd be your damned fault as their captain. The only reason we're in third position is because the Sr. Division sucks at swordsmanship. No, offense professor."

Snape shrugged. It wasn't his fault after all. Most Sr. Division duelists were supposed to have started practicing swordsmanship while in Jr. Division, but since the club was so new, most had only a year of practice. It wasn't a big deal. Sword fighting only came in to play when both duelists spent too much of their magic to fight with their wands. It had happened only twice since they started to compete, but one of those times had cost them the competition. Snape had decided to put more emphasis on it when they began practicing for next season. Otherwise, their team was doing incredibly well. They'd even featured in some of the national papers.

Ron jerked his arm free and shoved him away, looking ready to draw his wand.

"Boys," Snape warned evenly, his expression neutral, "Save it for the platform."

They broke it off, and Harry stalked back to the other end of the platform to watch Ginny finish her duel and lend his support to Allbright. The youngest Weasley walked off the platform, shaking out her hand and grimacing.

"Damn, I should have seen that one coming. The Disarming spell is so obvious."

"You okay?"

"Yeah, nothing hurt but my pride. And I think my wand rolled underneath the other team's bench."

"Want me to get it for you?"

"Would you? I'm not afraid, but boys can be such perverts. Did you notice they don't have a single girl on their team?"

She found this strangely offensive, even though the Dueling Club had a mere six girls (it had been nine but two girls had graduated and Natalie had quit) out of almost forty duelists.

"Yeah, I noticed. I thought that one guy was going burst a vein when Owens knocked him off the platform," he chuckled. He saw the rookie head for the platform. "Good luck, Allbright! Alright, wait here while I get your wand."

He circled around the room to avoid getting in the way of the judges and headed towards Westwidgen's bench, a long row of blue and black uniforms and buzz cuts. They all watched him approach suspiciously. The crowd on this side was mostly Westmidgen parents, and they hissed and booed as he passed them. He stopped in front of the bench.

“Excuse, my friend believes her wand rolled over here. Have any of you seen it?”

“Who wants to know?” a first year grumbled. He was the boy Owens had beaten, and still sour over the matter. Everyone was sour over the matter, in fact, especially since their team was losing.

“Me, obviously,” Harry said, knowing they knew damn well who he was. Most people did nowadays.

“Well, we don't have it,” said another boy.

“I never said you did. I said it may have rolled under your bench. Would you mind moving for a moment so I can look?”

“Maybe we would.”

Typical. Harry wished he could just take out his wand and summon Ginny's, but all someone would have to do is accuse him of casting a spell on an opposing team, and their entire school would be disqualified. So Harry sighed and held out his hand and closed his eyes.

“What are you doing, weirdo.”

“Magic, you neophyte... come.”

Ginny's wand leaped into his hand. There was a gasp and several boys jumped up and away from him. He just turned and walked back to his team. Hermione was there, her arms crossed.

“Must you provoke them?”

“Don't be silly. That was me avoiding provoking them. Well, except for the 'neophyte' comment, but they started that one.”

“Do you even know what 'neophyte' means?”

"Isn't that Ron on a good day?"

She slapped his shoulder, but he just grinned and went to find Ginny. She was talking to Owens, and they both grinned at him. Clearly, they had seen what he had done.

"Show off," Owens said.

"You shouldn't waste your magic going wandless during a competition," Ginny pointed out. Harry shrugged.

"I've won all my matches already, and it's not like my job requires a lot of magic. I'll be fine."

Plus he'd been practicing since school had let out, and couldn't help wanting to 'show off' as Owens put it. His decision on whether he still wished to sacrifice his chance at heaven and seeing his family after he died for the different sort of immortality that paganism had to offer was still up in the air at the moment, but the subtle gifts in magic he had been granted since the ritual hadn't dissipated and he saw no reason (and also no way) to avoid using them. Wandless magic came easier to him now, though it was still draining, and his ability to sense magic as a smell or a change in temperature (which had always been there but never really noticeable until now) was becoming more and more pronounced. Aside from a few 'parlor trick' wandless summonings, like with Ginny's wand, he hadn't told or shown anyone, but he thought Snape and Hermione might both be suspicious.

Allbright won his match, just barely, but was ecstatically happy when Harry told him he'd done a good job. Allbright was the weakest duelist on the team, and he knew it, but he was so determined to get better that Harry couldn't help but admire him and want to help him reach his goal. If he could one day get the Hufflepuff skilled enough to fight as a semi-professional, he thought all the stress and annoyance Ron caused him would be well worth it.

The last match was between Cedric Diggory and the Westwidgen Vice Captain (Fred had already defeated the Captain), which Cedric won with a spectacular Arching Arrow spell, a stun spell that flew over the target and then turned around to hit them from behind, bypassing any shield that didn't encompass the back as well as the front. Hogwarts won 58 matches to 22.

And just in time too. He was running late.

"Professor, I've got to go!" he said, running past him. "I'll see you at home!"

Snape glowered at his undignified escape, but waved him off. He still had an entire team of students to re-unite with their guardians. Potter was the least of his concerns at the moment.

The Gryffindor hurried through the crowds, careful to avoid the group of girls with the 'Potter's #1' sign, and out the school's auditorium doors. A long flight of stairs rolled down the hill where carriages and horses and stalls of valets keeping broomsticks and portkeys safe waited to transport their owners home. A single car stood out amongst the throng, surrounded by curious onlookers wondering who amongst the crowd was ostentatious enough to bring such a contraption to a humble school sporting event. Victoria stood at the passenger door in a chauffeur's uniform, keeping the crowd from touching or attempting to peek inside. Harry waved to her as he reached the bottom of the stairs, and she smiled and opened the door for him.

"I left your change of clothes inside, Young Master," she said.

"Thanks, Vicki," he said, and hopped into the back seat. Once inside, he knew he was invisible to everyone outside, but he still waited until Victoria drove them away from the crowds and into the city to start changing. Black dress slacks, a pressed white shirt, gray vest and red tie replaced his dueling leathers, and a light black robe with the symbol for the Court of Foreign Affairs (a crown of laurels and sword set in the center and 'Honor to our Brothers in War and Peace' spelled out in Latin encircling it) stitched across the left breast to make it all official looking. His watch was found amongst the pile and he slipped it into his pocket. While waiting to arrive in London, he attended to the care of his dueling uniform, casting the routine cleaning spells and strengthening spells and repair spells.

“How did the Oxford Ogres do today, Vicki?” he asked by way of conversation.

“Still duking it out last I checked. I think the Irish Selkies are going to win though. The Ogres' Seeker was acting a blind fool after he got hit with a bludger.”

Harry sighed, “They never should have replaced Jameson.”

“Amen to that.”

Traffic was flowing smoothly on Saturday, and they made it in good time to the Forum, a series of buildings set about in a circle, each designated to supervise Britain's relationship with different parts of the world. Below ground all these buildings were connected, but only a handful of individuals had the security clearance to walk those conjoined halls. Harry had been through them once with the Dark Lord and the Judge of the Department of Germanic States, Isaac Drumm, on the first day he had been assigned to work there. He had never been below again, but he could recall his unease walking those quiet, empty halls and the sense that bad things happened behind the series of locked doors that bore no names or numbers.

They pulled up to the Department of Germanic States (sadly termed the DOGS House), a majestic building with Baroque architecture and an abundance of paintings involving the Black Forest, largely considered the most magical forest in the world even by British wizards. He didn't wait for Victoria to open the door for him, but called out a quick 'thanks, I'll see you later' and sprinted for the entrance. His watch was already starting to grow warm, so it was with some sense of urgency that he approached the security check point manned by a young Brass Cult* lieutenant. He was checked head to toe for spy paraphernalia, handed a security badge, and then waved through. An elevator took him to the third floor.

The moment he stepped off the elevator he was welcomed with a rather nasty scowl from his supervisor, Simeon Schultz, who had the misfortune to resemble his namesake. He didn't like Harry, and had made that fact known from day one. The Gryffindor didn't know his reasoning, but he thought it might be professional jealousy. Judge Drumm actually knew him, a mere mail room clerk, by name and would talk to him when he delivered the man's mail, where it took Herr Schultz three years to reach mail room supervisor and another two months for his boss to actually remember his name.

"You're cutting it close, Herr Potter," Schultz grouched, crossing his unusually long arms.

"Sorry, sir."

"Don't apologize to me, apologize to Richter Drumm und Ambassadeur Swartzmann. They asked to see you when you finally decided to show up."

"Ambassadeur? As in, a German ambassador?"

"That's right, the first one we've seen in person for seven years so don't keep him waiting."

"Yes, sir. Is there any mail for the Judge?"

A pile of envelopes and scrolls were shoved into his hands, and he hurried on his way. Men and women sitting in cubicles and offices, poked out their heads as he passed asking for reports and deliveries to and from Düsseldorf and Mainz and Erfurt. He apologized as he went, promising to get it all taken care of as soon as he got back. Mail room clerk was by far the most hectic of Harry's summer jobs, but he thought it might also be his most fun. There was a contagious excitement in the air. Everyone was busy with important things that he got to help with, and despite it all being centered around another country, it made him feel strangely patriotic for his own. It was as if his job was to show Germany what a fine country Great Britain really was, and that they would be good friends if given a chance.

The Judge's office was concealed behind an ornate wooden door, on which was carved a dragon that would blow fire at you if you tried to open the door by force. Wisely, Harry knocked first.

"Kommen Sie bitte herein."

Inside, the office was laid out like a study, filled with books and instruments and comfortable furniture for studying or working in repose. The Judge, a slender man in his sixties with a grandfatherly demeanor and a lawyer's shrewdness, sat in an over stuffed chair across from an unfamiliar gentleman who could only have been Ambassadeur Swartzmann. He was in his late forties, with a handsome Scandinavian face, a thick mustache, and despite being a little heavy in the middle a picture of physical strength. They both smiled at Harry as he entered.

"Guten Tag, junger Mann. Wie lief dein Wettkampf?" the Judge asked.

"Ganz gut, dankeschön. Hogwarts hat sich in diesem Wettkampf sehr gut gemacht. ."

"Excellent news. Do you think you'll make it to nationals this year?"

"I'm afraid we only placed third. Next year we'll definitely go."

"Herr Potter here is part of Hogwart's new dueling club. They've done very well for themselves," the judge explained to the ambassador. Swartzmann grinned and nodded.

"A fine sport."

"Ah! Forgive me, where are my manners? I haven't introduced you both. Harold, this is Ambassador Franz Swartzmann from the German Ministry of Magic. Ambassadeur Swartzmann, this is Herr Harold Potter, temporarily on loan to us from Hogwarts."

"A pleasure to meet you," Harry said, shaking his hand politely. The man's grip was firm, but Harry thought if he'd applied full pressure he could easily ground the bones in his hand to dust.

"Likewise. And I would just like to say, that I hope, despite the rumors going around, you know the Ministry of Magic and the witches and wizards of Germany wish you no ill will."

Harry blinked. He'd almost forgotten about Moody's support from Dumbledore, who in turn was supposedly supported by Germany and various other European nations. He had been working very hard to forget about the Moody fiasco and its deadly conclusion in its entirety, and had succeeded but for the occasional nightmares and Natalie's conspicuous absence. He forced a smile.

"That is good to know. I hope to visit again someday without worrying about assassins and angry mobs... and that came out really badly, didn't it?"

Swartzmann just laughed, a booming sound like a fog horn.

"Ah! Young man, I hope you introduce yourself to Krum. He could use some of that British humor."

"Krum?"

"One of Durmstang's students and a professional Seeker for Bulgaria's national quidditch team. He's the most likely to be the schools champion during the Triwizard tournament. Real intense guy. Driven, I guess you could say. How about Hogwarts? Can you think of any likely champions? Think you might try yourself, perhaps?"

Harry just blinked at him, not understanding a thing he was talking about. Judge Drumm chuckled.

"I'm sorry, Ambassador, I forgot to mention I hadn't told him yet. It's suppose to be a secret until the start of the school term, after all. But I suppose I've been a bit too strict. Herr Potter has proven himself quite capable of discretion," he said, then turned to Harry to explain.

"It's really quite exciting. Germany and France have both agreed to participate in an international school competition called the Triwizard Cup. A sort of magical decathlon. Traditionally, Hogwarts used to host this competition every forty years or so, but the war disrupted things. It seems diplomacy is finally starting to pay off. Hogwarts will be receiving some forty or fifty exchange students for the year, and if everything goes smoothly, we hope to expand our friendly relations into other sectors such as trade and tourism once again."

Swartzmann nodded. "There's an election coming up, so the Minister is under a lot of pressure to ease international tension. This is an excellent opportunity for both our countries."

That did indeed sound very exciting and important, which resulted in a definite unease settling over Harry. A school competition didn't seem that bad on the surface, but having been nearly fed to werewolves by sore losers in quidditch and nearly throttled by Ron on several occasions in dueling club, the threat of juvenile intrigue was very real. British wizards were bad enough, who knew what level foreign wizards played at?

"So what do you think?" Swartzmann said, "Interested in trying your hand? We've heard rumors all the way in Berlin about some of your exploits. Killed an acromantula, didn't you? Befriended werewolves? Fly like the devil. Ah, I bet Krum would love a chance to fly against you. What do you say? It could be a lot of fun!"

Harry shook his head.

"My hands are quite full without knocking heads with professional quidditch players, thank you."

The ambassador sighed, but didn't look too disappointed. "I suppose it doesn't matter. You'd only be what? Fourth? Fifth year?"

"Fourth."

"So young. The competitions are pretty dangerous so only sixth and seventh year students are permitted to compete. Oh, well."

The unease evaporated. It seemed that just this once, someone else was going to be in more danger than him, and no one could say he was shirking some weird responsibility to school and country by avoiding the matter. Rules were rules after all.

A full year of nothing more hazardous than Ronald Weasley in a mood (or possibly Snape in more of a mood than usual), sounded wonderful. His grades hadn't been bad last year, but they were not what they could have been. This year he wanted to focus on his studies, quidditch (would there be a house cup with two other schools taking up residence for the year?), dueling club, and any other skills that would decrease the chances of him dying before graduation.

He shook himself out of his distraction.

“Sounds great,” he said, seeing they were still looking at him. “I’ll try my best to help them feel welcome. Oh, and I forgot, you’ve got mail, sir.”

Judge Drumm nodded. “Thank you, Harold, just put it on my desk, and I’ll let you get back to work. It was good to chat with you.”

“Thank you, sir. It was a pleasure, Ambassador.”

“Likewise, Herr Potter. You have a nice day.”

Harry bowed slightly to them both and left. What an interesting turn of events. Should he tell any of his friends? How secret was 'secret' in this case? National news worthy certainly, but national secret worthy?

He wasn't given much time to think about it. No sooner than he stepped out onto the floor than people started demanding their reports and mail and forms and a variety of materials deemed too sensitive to left flying through the air like it did at the Court registration offices or the Court education department. What exactly had been Voldemort's intention when setting him up with a job here? One that was technically meant for someone with German language skills higher than that of an eight year old? True, his German vocabulary had not only returned but was greatly increased since he'd started working almost a month ago and the pay was impressive for a part-time minor, but he wondered who he had cheated out of a job with the Dark Lord's meddling.

The sudden idea that Voldemort was setting him up to rule Germany popped into his head, almost making him laugh.

Until he remembered, you could never tell with that man.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry arrived home at a quarter after five, with Inana waiting on the porch for him like a loyal puppy and Snape expecting him to cook dinner like an overbearing husband.

"You're late," the potions master informed him.

"No, I'm not," he said, dismissively, heading for the kitchen. "If I were late my watch would have gotten hot. I can make yesterday's leftover stew into a pot pie or I can roast the chicken. The pie would be faster, but it's up to you."

"I ate the stew for lunch. And you're fifteen minutes late."

"I'm fifteen minutes later than usual, but I'm not late. Would you mind washing and rinsing the vegetables?" He wandered around the kitchen, picking up pots and bowls and herbs and measuring spoons as he went. The kitchen had become his domain, just as the potion lab was Snape's, and though his professor liked to tease him with names like 'fishwife' and 'Miss Potter', even he knew better than to challenge his authority there.

"I've been working in the potion's lab today."

Didn't necessarily mean the man didn't try to get around it occasionally.

Harry gave him a look, that threatened to become nagging if Snape didn't do as he was... well, requested. Snape rolled up his sleeves and went to the cupboard. "Don't blame me if mushrooms start growing out of your ears. Did you stop somewhere?"

"No, I was just running behind. There was a visitor today, and I ended up talking to him. Do you know Ambassador Swartzmann?" While Snape prepared the vegetables, Harry made a glaze with herbs and chicken broth. This was a routine that had been established the year before, and as bizarre as it seemed once the young Gryffindor returned to Hogwarts, it was natural and even comfortable in their house.

Yes, it felt like their house now. Last year, he had only been a guest. These days it felt more like a home. A home with an older, bossy, nosy, and perpetually hungry man as a roommate, but home nonetheless. He couldn't say why or how exactly things were different. It had to have been Snape's doing, though he wasn't any nicer or less snarky than before. There were days when he thought it was because Snape was going to adopt him at one time, which meant he had to have felt something other than professional responsibility towards him. Those days were few because it didn't take him long to remember it had all been Larousse's idea and Snape hadn't seen him as anything more than indulgence to his fiancée. He took out the chicken from the 'chilling cupboard' and started to glaze it.

"Not personally," the man said, flicking his wand about so that he wouldn't actually have touch his food. "But the Dark Lord has made him known to me. What do you know of his intentions here?"

"Triwizard tournament."

"Ah, yes. Do you understand its significance?"

"Probably not. I know it's the first time in over a decade Germany's allowed civilians to visit. I know... I heard the German minister is under a lot of pressure to ease the tension between our countries. I know I don't have to worry about it since I'm not old enough to compete."

Snape snorted, the potato dropping out of the levitation charm as a result.

"This tournament is a competition, plain and simple, just on a larger scale than previously. It's a matter of national pride. Depending how each champion performs, generalized statements about the character and educational quality of their school and country can be made. Superiority- is this still edible?"

"Just wash it off again."

“Superiority can be inferred. It is each champion's intention to be considered the most powerful, skilled, and intelligent and pass on their glory to their nation.”

“Does this mean we're really just fighting a miniature war?”

“Essentially. Now what do you want with these?”

“Put them in the pot.”

“Of course, it's a war of pride. The Dark Lord believes this sort of thing is necessary in order for Europe to recognize his sovereignty over Britain. If the youth of the nation are as strong or stronger than they were during the reign of the Ministry, what right does anyone have to say that his cause was not justified?”

“And if we lose badly?”

“... Europe will feel justified in denouncing him... continuing to denounce him and then things will get messy. I'm not worried. I've visited both schools. They have some subjects they excel in, but their education is mediocre overall in comparison to Hogwarts. Now what?”

Harry cast a spell into the pot, slicing the vegetables into large chunks. He poured the rest of his herb broth over them, set the chicken on top, and put the whole thing in the oven.

“Forty-five minutes and it should be done.”

“Mm... you have a letter. I left it on your bed.”

Harry was half way up the stairs before he remembered to call back a 'thank you!' He entered his room, and found it the same organized chaos he'd left in the morning. Elsbeth's perch and Inana's basket both rested empty on their own stands by the open window, charmed to open whenever either creature approached (Inana found she could come and go by climbing the gutter and rain spout). In the corner of the room that received the most light, he had set down a large white sheet now splattered with paint, an easel, and art supplies carefully stored in totes and bins and tin cans. His latest piece featured Elsbeth on her perch hallowed in moonlight in oil pastels, her large yellow eyes peeking open as he entered before closing again in sleep. His growing collection of books rested on a bookshelf, along with his collection of magical artifacts, a box of letters, and photographs, but soon he'd need another shelf it was getting so crowded. His desk was likewise cluttered with Hogwarts' memorabilia; summer homework assignments, old text books, parchment and quills, and his student manual. Only his cold weather clothes and most secret of possessions remained in his school trunk; his wooden box, Sirius' fang necklace, the runaway box, and the Marauder's Map (once again in his possession, because the twins were broke for Christmas) were carefully hidden away in the folds of his Baluvian cloak and beneath an ever growing number of security spells.

The letter rested on his bed. He read the return address.

'Die Reicher Familie'. He smiled. He had been keeping up a fairly steady correspondence with the Reichers since they'd given him shelter on Christmas Eve, or more precisely he was keeping correspondence with Morgana, her crayon drawings the only clue to as to what the ghastly squiggles that passed for her handwriting stood for. Their letters brought a bitter sweet sensation to Harry, who felt both blessed to have her affection and lonely when he realized she would eventually grow out of it. Her attention was due to childish infatuation, not kinship after all.

He opened the letter and found himself looking at a drawing of the Reichers standing on the beach, blocky beige bodies with red smiles, except for Robert who was very pink and frowning. Harry burst out laughing, easily imagining the poor man's sunburned vacation. He read Morgana's unique calligraphy and managed to make out 'Jersey' and 'swimming' and 'Papa looks like a lobster'.

He spent his time before dinner writing a reply, involving a tale about Sir Weasley the Boorish, a vagrant night and villain whom Prince Harold was intent on turning into a real boar, complete with a little cartoon Ron being transfigured into a pig.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

While Harry amused himself upstairs, Snape went to his study to attend to his own mail. Among the usual bills and requests for his expertise on some project or another, was a letter from the Court. More specifically, Voldemort, though he had refrained from signing the letter himself. It contained orders for a report on Harry's current status and instructions for the boy's upcoming stay at the werewolf colony. As far as Snape could tell, Harry was as obnoxiously happy as he had been last year except for the unexplained happening that had driven the Cypher girl away from him and clean out of dueling club.

Sending the boy to play with a bunch of moon-madden savages in the forest didn't seem conducive to keeping him well, but that really wasn't any of his business. Potter was involved in a form of magic Snape had only a vague understanding of, and whatever it was it required the instruction of a pagan, not a potions master or professional duelist.

It was with an uneasy fascination that Snape was waiting to see what precisely Potter was going to become. Another dark lord? It seemed unlikely, given Voldemort's intolerance for challengers. What then? Theorizing would bring no definite answers, so he moved on to the other item contained in the missive.

A list.

More specifically, a list of healthy, single, Pureblood women. A list of potential wives. He snorted. It was five months until he had deemed it an appropriate time to start searching for a 'Mrs. Snape', but it seemed the Dark Lord was getting impatient. Did he perhaps want him to start a family so he could officially adopt Potter as Larousse had wanted? His fiancé's death had done wonders for the Gryffindor's public image, not only repairing whatever damage his parents' rebellious history had brought down on the boy but instilling a sort of paternal instinct in the public. Potter had gone from 'young upstart' to 'Britain's lost son' in the span of a week. The Court was still filtering out sympathy mail from those few letters by people Potter was actually permitted to correspond with.

If that was the Dark Lord's game... there wasn't really anything Snape could do about it except be grateful that he'd only have to put up with it for two or three years. It wasn't like Potter's company was intolerable. Some days, the boy proved to be quite interesting.

Alcohol was usually required at the end of such days.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The summer solstice announced itself with a storm. It blew in shortly after midnight, awakening Harry with the sound of thunder. He stayed up for almost an hour watching the lightening illuminate the countryside, and feeling the magic against his skin like an electric charge.

And then he was hit with a powerful compulsion, like an Imperius Curse. He stripped out of his nightclothes, left his glasses on the nightstand, and walked out of the house. He was completely blinded. Blinded by the dark, blinded by the absence of his glasses, blinded by the rain in his eyes, but his feet found their footing true.

The rain was heavy with magic, Earth magic tasting heavily of Voldemort's unique flavor. Harry knew it for what it was. The result of a ritual, a summoning of gods and spirits, a joyous dance between Mother and child. He looked up to the sky and opened his mouth, swallowing down the water and magic, making it a part of himself.

Lightening flashed directly overhead, and he laughed at the electric tickle that ran through his body. His feet were soon doing more than walking, they were running and leaping and twirling, rushing him far away from the house and into the meadow. The mud squished beneath his toes, but didn't swallow him. The rocks rolled under his feet but did not trip him. He danced his way through the tall grass and brambles without fear or self-consciousness, feeling only power and joy.

He wasn't sure how long he remained dancing out in the rain, for he knew no fatigue and his focus was on nothing more than the happiness reveling in his compulsion brought him. He didn't even know when the storm had ended and he'd collapsed.

What he did know was that he had fallen asleep outside, and that he must have slept late, because he woke up very naked in the middle of the meadow with the Dark Lord and Snape staring down at him.

And suddenly, he felt all his self-consciousness return with a vengeance.

"Did you have fun last night?" Voldemort queried, handing him a cloak. "I know I did."

Harry wrapped the cloak around himself and risked a peek at both men. Snape seemed stuck somewhere between intense curiosity and blatant disapproval, but not the least bit embarrassed about staring down at a naked person. Voldemort was dressed in his shaman robes, and grinning like a fox. Harry could feel his magic, the same magic he had felt last night, tingling against his skin like electricity.

"What did you do?" he groaned.

"Just a little summoning ritual. A Welsh storm god to be more precise. It seems you got caught up in though. I forgot that your element is water. How do you feel?"

Harry climbed to his feet and tried to take stock, but he was feeling disoriented and his definite lack of clothes wasn't helping him.

"Wet. And muddy... and I've got to pee."

Snape snorted. Voldemort chuckled.

"You did drink a lot of water. Come on, you can clean up back at the house. It wouldn't do to greet the Head Alpha as you are now."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

While Harry showered, Voldemort and Snape waited with cups of tea in the study. Snape was brimming with questions over what had just happened. He hadn't even been aware Harry wasn't in the house until the Dark Lord showed up at his door three hours before he was expected and told him to follow him. The meadow was unpleasantly wet and muddy, but he didn't dare voice his complaints, and soon forgot them altogether when they came upon Potter lying naked in a circle of crushed grass. Even more startling was the abundance of clovers that seemed to have grown up directly beneath the child, fluffy white blooms smelling sweetly of nectar.

It was one of those 'interesting' moments Snape was coming to dread, and the intense wave of curiosity that followed was unlikely to be satisfied. The Dark Lord seemed content to ignore it.

“Should I expect this sort of thing routinely?” he asked.

Voldemort looked at him over his tea cup, incongruous in his barbarian garb and perfect manners. He smirked.

“I shall make him a ward. It wouldn't do if someone found out they could summon Harry like a mere nature spirit. Although, I may have invited him to join in the ritual myself by accident.”

“I thought you would be performing a solstice ritual during the full moon?”

“The full moon isn't close enough to the solstice to be worth it. Besides, I can't really entrust my apprentice's wellbeing to the moon. She has proven... unreliable.”

Imagine that, Snape mused.

“But you are still going to celebrate with the werewolves?”

“My participation in werewolf festivities is primarily for diplomatic reasons, but I intend to make use of my time there to teach Harry more of the pagan arts. He has seen so little of it, but it has a strong hold over him already.”

Snape nodded, believing this was very much the case. He had noticed the unusually quick progression of the boy's magic, particularly his wandless magic, and the odd moments when the child seemed to just know things he shouldn't. Like when the weather would change or what herbs and vegetables were at their best or what sort of spell a duelist was going to cast. Little things no one would think much of unless they saw how frequently accurate these predictions were. It made Potter's reticence ironic.

"I believe he is having doubts, my Lord."

Voldemort gave him a curious look. "Doubts?"

"About becoming a pagan. Vesper's death shook up some questions in him about the afterlife. He's been questioning his godfathers about it in his letters."

"What have they said?"

"Nothing. They wish to see him in person before they discuss it. I thought you should know before you let them run off with him."

Voldemort nodded, but didn't look too concerned.

"Thank you, Severus. I'm glad you told me, but I'm not worried. At this point, Harry can no more claim himself a child of God than his godfathers can. The Earth has a firm hold over all their spirits. It would require an extremely potent spiritual conversion for Harry's soul to reject what has been offered to him, and more sacrifice than I imagine he is willing to give. I will be careful with him, however. He may or may not be able to become a Christian, but his dedication to paganism can still be greatly influenced by his experiences and his belief in choice."

Snape considered that, and wondered at its meaning. He wasn't a Christian really nor a pagan, as both religions seemed to him bizarre and pointless and more than a little bit scary. There were forces out there beyond the scope of human understanding, he accepted that, but why anyone would want to or have to tie their soul to some deity with questionable intent was beyond him. Why would such beings even want to tie spirits to them? Did they taste yummy?

"You received my list, I trust?" Voldemort asked, interrupting his internal musings.

"Of eligible women? Yes, I narrowed down my selection to four, but I haven't done much more than that. It's still several months before I can start placing formal inquiries."

"I know you want to be respectful to your fiancé's memory, but if you delay too long you will certainly lose opportunities. These are women of quality. They will have many offers before you even try your hand."

Snape tilted his head in concession, but didn't seem particularly bothered. Voldemort sighed. The potions master could be such a child when it came to some things. Before a lecture could be given, or really an order, Harry entered the study, squeaky clean from his shower. He was dressed in leathers, with Inana resting around his neck, and a light black cloak folded in his arm.

"How do you feel now that you are dry, clean, and don't have to pee?" Voldemort asked, amused when the boy blushed and looked at his toes.

"... Tingly... kind of lightheaded."

"Good. Just relax and let the magic settle."

Harry just nodded. Aside from a few brief encounters and setting him up with the job at the Court, they had seen very little of each other in the past couple of months. The Dark Lord had been busy with a series of new projects, and Harry hadn't had much time on his hands once the spring semester had started. He was feeling shy, and being discovered naked in a field had done nothing to relieve that.

The Dark Lord set down his tea and stood.

"Thank you for the tea, Severus. I think we will be going now. See you in six days."

"A pleasant journey, my Lord," the potions master said, escorting them too the door. To Harry he gave a warning look. "Behave."

Harry crossed his arms and muttered, "Kind of hard not to misbehave in a werewolf colony."

oo
oo

Fenrir watched Blackbone from inside his house as the younger alpha paced in the shade of an oak tree nearby. Every so often, the man would stop, look towards the path leading into the commune, then resume pacing. The Head Alpha found Blackbone's behavior vaguely amusing coming from someone normally as aloof as rebellious male.

"What do you see, Father? A snorkleburk?" came a curious voice, and a moment later, Luna was beside him, peeking out the window with him. "It's Blackbone. He's moving around like he sat on an ant hill."

Fenrir chuckled, and patted Luna on the head. The goddess that had previously been inhabiting her body was now gone, but though she now lacked that omniscience that defined her divinity she wasn't left entirely untouched. The strangest things still came out of her mouth, but now they amused Fenrir more than guided him.

"You're friend is coming today. Twilight Seeker. Do you remember him?"

Luna thought for a moment. "Harry?"

"Yeah, that's the one."

She smiled, and wandered off. Fenrir watched her go and wondered what she was up to. Nowadays she was even more mysterious that she had been before. She was no sooner gone than movement drew his attention back towards Blackbone. A young beta came running down the path, and the alpha grabbed his arm before he let him pass, snarling something. The beta cowered, said something, and the alpha released him. Blackbone stalked out of the commune and into the forest.

There was a knock on his door.

“Greyback!”

“Enter,” he commanded, and the beta from the path opened the door and stepped inside.

“God Eater is here.”

Greyback stalked towards the door, and glared at the young beta, who cringed and cowered, staring resolutely at his toes.

“I don't suppose you told Blackbone this fact before you told your alpha?”

“Ah! I- I'm sorry! He w-wouldn't I-let me p-pass!”

Fenrir knocked him to the floor a powerful backhand, snarling. “Decide now whether you fear your alpha or Blackbone more!”

He walked away from beta, still curled up on the floor. It was becoming an increasing problem, his packs not knowing when to bow to Blackbone's natural dominance and when to uphold their Head Alpha's desires. The black werewolf's status had been diminished after his months away at Hogwarts, but he had returned more aggressive and defiant than before. The fights between them had become increasingly violent. The packs were becoming uneasy.

One of them was going to kill the other before the next summer solstice, of that Greyback was certain. He wasn't worried about himself, as far as alphas went he had been the most successful in history in terms of increasing the werewolf population and improving their quality of life, and he would go to his grave satisfied with that. Blackbone was a strong man, a strong leader, and despite his sometimes juvenile sense of humor, he wasn't afraid to get serious. Greyback's only true fear was that Blackbone, out of some misguided attachment to the wizarding world and his grudge against the Snake Lord, would foolishly undo everything that he had built in war that could only hurt them.

It was a matter he desperately needed to discuss with Voldemort.

And with Harry Potter.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. For those who forgot, the Brass Cult is Voldemort's new army. British Assembly for Cultural Preservation and Defense - BrAss Cult. Also named because their uniform buttons and insignia are made of brass, at least for the typical foot soldier. The higher the rank, the more expensive their uniform fixtures.

2. Also, note, 'Judge' in Voldemort's Court isn't the same thing as a 'judge' in a muggle court. 'Judge' is a high ranking Court official, in this case rather like an ambassador. German translation is Richter.

And yes, I know this wasn't a very action packed chapter, but a little background in what's happening in Harry's life and in the world since school ended is necessary. Next chapter has more action in it, I promise. Voldemort and pagan rituals feature prominently, which I'm sure makes all of you quite happy.

Book IV:

Chapter 2: Political Skirmishes

The forest was still wet from the early morning storm, and a lingering chill had Harry wrapping his cloak tightly around him and Inana laying docile beneath it. He was muddy again already, and with each soggy step his condition was only getting worse. Harry didn't mind in the least. Voldemort had told him that his element was water, and surely he was right, for the young Gryffindor's skin tingled pleasantly at every stray drop that landed on his exposed skin. In the ozone laden air, he could smell out that which he couldn't see. Plants and animals and decomposing earth.

Voldemort watched him with equal parts amusement and fascination.

"You seem quite happy. Has the rain always made you feel this way?"

Harry thought about it and shook his head.

"I always liked water, but I never really liked rain. Of course, I wasn't allowed to play in the rain when I was younger. They always said I'd get sick. What about you? Do you like the rain?"

"Not particularly, but water isn't my element."

"Fire?" he guessed. Voldemort smirked.

"Yes. Is it that obvious?"

"Yeah... You're a conqueror, after all. Fire seems the most likely element for conquerors."

"Water can do considerably more damage than fire," Voldemort pointed out.

"I've never heard of conquerors drowning countries. Although, if we're talking about witch and wizard conquerors, I'm sure there were a few who managed it."

"Bulgief the Wet. More of a Viking pirate than a conqueror really. Used to created huge tidal waves that he'd use to wash his boats straight into coastal towns and cities, and then pillage in the chaos."

"Never heard of him."

"Was drowned by angry selkies before he got far. They didn't appreciate all that human trash getting washed into their underwater villages."

Harry smiled, and shook his head. They said nothing for a while, simply enjoyed the forest, and ignored the werewolves that watched them from their hiding places. Voldemort was the first to break the silence.

"Harry, are you afraid of dying?"

The boy looked at him in surprise. "Why?"

"I'm told you've been having doubts about continuing to learn the old magicks. Are you afraid of what will happen to you after you die? Are you afraid of hell?"

"Hell? I hadn't thought about hell. You said if the Earth took my spirit, I'd simply be reborn."

"And do you not want to be reborn?"

Harry was quiet for a long moment.

"I don't know. I want to see my family again. They were Christian. They'd definitely be in Heaven."

"Are you sure? The requirements for Heaven are difficult to meet from what I hear. Are you certain they are in Heaven?"

"Definitely. They are definitely there," he said, his voice sharp with conviction.

“And what if they are and you do indeed see them again one day? Then what? Will that make you happy for eternity? Will that satisfy you?”

Harry looked at him, confused.

“I have never understood the appeal of Heaven. Where is the challenge once you reach it? An eternity of bliss? How dull. All the people you love in life? Don't you think there are more interesting people to be met? Other people to share your love and your hatred with?”

“But to live forever in different bodies?” Harry interrupted. “To die forever? To lose and forget about everyone and everything that had meaning in your life over and over again? I don't see the appeal in that either.”

“To experience the length and breadth of existence, of course. To know all the joys and sorrows and wonders the world has to offer. It is such a magnificent world.”

“My mother... my father...”

“You will have other mothers and other fathers.”

Harry blinked. He hadn't thought of that. If he were reborn, he would indeed, have new parents. A new family to start over with. Brothers? Sisters? Grandparents? He had never had anything more than his parents before. The Dursley's didn't count.

“What if I'm not born human?”

“You are highly sentient. You will not rebirth into a mere dumb animal or a tree. If you're not born human, you will be born to some other sentient race, which tend to raise their young.”

“ ... ”

“Just think about what I have said. You were made for this world. You will achieve great things here.”

[illegible]

Viktor looked up, turning away from the horse he had been harnessing to a cart, to see his father standing behind him. The cart was laden with the finest quality wood, soon to be carved into broom handles and other magically rich devices, but only if he managed to get it all into town before the next rain hit.

“That's not what I meant. I meant you shouldn't go to Britain. It's not safe for you there. You've said that to your mother and me for years now.”

“And you wait till now to believe me? Or did you believe me, and just not care?” he asked, returning to finish hitching up the cart. His father had the decency to look uncomfortable, quite a feat for a man who boasted being the descendant of Viking chieftains, and looked the part.

“Whatever the case, it doesn't make it any safer for you,” the man said, crossing his arms and looking firm. It was the sort of look that intimidated most of the townsfolk into awe and submission, but Viktor, who had the same stubborn blood running through him even without his father's Scandinavian features, plus his Bulgarian mother's stoic indifference to bravado.

“Shall I wait until the danger comes pounding on our door? I will go to see for myself what threat, if any, the Dark Lord poses to Bulgaria and to our village,” he said.

“Absolutely, not!” Krum Sr. shouted, “That isn't your responsibility.”

Viktor turned a dark glare over to his father.

“Maybe if you actually gave a damn about Germany's future, I wouldn't have to take responsibility!”

“Viktor!”

“I have to go,” he interrupted before they really go into it. He really did need to go if he wanted to get to the village before the wood was ruined. “We'll talk later.”

His father let him go. They both knew they would only end up fighting and nothing would get resolved. Viktor had a will and a know how about him that frustrated his father to no end, and Viktor wasn't going to change anytime soon, regardless or perhaps because he loved his father.

Or perhaps because he loved his grandmother and the grandfather he never got to meet. It had been Grandma Freida's tales by the fire side that motivated him to fight now, tales of how the tyrant Grindlewald and his followers had deceived and lain waste to most of wizarding Europe, and how it was the cowardice of the people that had allowed it to happen. His own grandfather, Fredrick Yule, had died trying to stand up for what was right, defending a family of squibs from Grindlewald supporters. His grandfather had died, and the Yule family had fled east like hundreds of other families until they settled in the Bulgarian mountain village of Anastas. Four years later, Frieda had married a broom maker, Iordan Krum, who in turn had adopted his father, Xiomar and given him his name and trade. Xiomar honored the Krum name by upholding the family trade, but he held an even greater pride for his blood history and a love for the country of his birth that he had passed on to his only son. He had made sure that Viktor knew German and gone to great length to ensure his son was admitted to the Durmstrang Institute. It was why Viktor couldn't turn a blind eye to the danger he sensed, a danger that threatened to destroy all he loved and taken pride in, and perhaps why his own father refused to acknowledge it.

Regardless of his father's wishes, he was going to go. He was going to find out the truth for himself, about Voldemort, his Death Eaters, his Court, and his child protégé.

And if he did not like what he found there... he had Viking in his blood. He was not afraid to die in battle.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Greyback greeted his guests just outside the commune, cautiously searching the surrounding forest for Blackbone and Slivermoon, but they remained out of sight. Voldemort seemed to sense his distraction, but graciously ignored it. The Potter child seemed to be searching for the two errant werewolves, as well, but Greyback knew his vision was ridiculously bad. Aside from that, the boy looked significantly grown. He was not the brawny muscled creature that his own adolescent pups were, but there was a definite musculature to him, not unlike the Dark Lord's, and there were a few battle scars. His posture was straight, his gaze direct, but his constantly roaming eyes detracted from the overall dominant demeanor.

He smelled different than Greyback remembered. Better. More natural, at least. Caution, decomposing leaves, and snakes.

The alpha hoped these changes were something he could work with. The year before the pup had been too innocent, too curious, and too self-absorbed for anything more than learning and appreciating the world around him. Greyback needed someone who was strong enough to actively change it.

“Are you alright, my friend?” Voldemort asked, as they walked together through the commune. Harry trailed behind, following close, but not paying much attention to them. “You do not look well.”

This was likely true. The left side of his face was purple, his right arm was bandaged forearm to wrist, and he was limping just a bit. Minor wounds, but it was rare for anyone to see him in anything less than top form. He grinned.

"Blackbone's been real interesting lately."

That caught the boy's interest. Intense green eyes were suddenly locked on him. Greyback sent him a nasty leer. The boy glared back. Yes, he could work with that.

"He's challenged you?" Voldemort asked, concerned for a completely different reason than his protégé.

"Not directly, but he wants to."

"Can he win?"

"Sure. So can I. If I could trust him to do what needs to be done, I'd let him."

The crowds parted for them as they passed, easing their way to Voldemort's private tent. The tent itself had been modified a bit per the Snake Lord's instructions. A few items had been added, an extra pallet, an empty cistern, and box with parchment and ink stored safely inside. Greyback wasn't entirely certain what it all meant, but thought Harry's apprenticeship might have advanced a level. Despite his poor vision, the young wizard noticed the changes as well, and looked to his mentor curiously, but wisely didn't interrupt them.

"How bad is it?" the Dark Lord asked. "Is he unstable?"

"No. Not yet, but the full moon is only three days away. If we get through that, I think he'll be manageable until the winter solstice."

Voldemort frowned, but didn't say anything. He would leave the matter to Greyback. If he didn't like the result then he'd interfere, but not before.

"I'll leave you to settle. Boy, come with me."

Both wizards turned to him, surprised. The younger looked away reluctantly, the elder suspicious. Greyback snorted.

"Can't have you wandering around blind as a bat. Diana will fix you up."

"I can do it," Voldemort said.

"I'm not going to eat him," Greyback muttered. The dark wizard raised a brow, and the alpha rolled his eyes. "That was only once, and I was drunk."

A long sigh.

"Alright, but I expect him back in one piece."

The werewolf grinned, and before his charge could protest, grabbed him by his cloak and dragged him out of the tent. He wasn't halfway to Diana's little plot of earth when the boy worked up the nerve to speak.

"What do you want?"

"I just want to test something," he said, and paused, looking around. He found what he was looking for quickly enough. Blackbone was standing amidst a group of men, gambling over something or other, but his eyes weren't on the dice. He had eyes only for the alpha and the pup in his less than gentle hands. A smirk slowly slid across the elder werewolf's face, and he could practically see the hackles rise. "Yeah, this will work."

"What will work?"

"Hn. When Blackbone arrives, he's going to start a fight."

He started moving again, jerking Harry roughly along behind him. The irritated sound that vaguely resembled a growl, amused him greatly.

"When that fight starts, I want you to break it up."

“What?! Are you mad?”

“By wizarding standards or werewolf?”

“I'm not getting between two alpha werewolves! That's crazy by both our species' standards.”

Very true, but he needed answers.

“If you don't break up the fight... if you can't break up the fight, then I'll kill Blackbone. I'll kill him right in front of you, and no one will stop me. It's in my right.”

The pup's posture lost all its nerve, slouching into an arch of submission. Pathetic, but strangely endearing to his canine brain.

“No! Please, no. Why are doing this?”

“If you want to succeed in stopping the fight, you're going to have to straighten up. He won't listen to you if you're all curled up like that. It'll just make him protective.”

And sure enough, Blackbone came in fangs bared, seemingly out of no where, snatching his godson away and putting his body between them. Up close, the younger alpha looked as bad as Greyback, a gash across his face and chest, but it only made him look more savage. Greyback grinned, crouching in preparation for the attack, the knife in his belt in easy reach.

“Don't you touch him!” Blackbone snarled.

The other werewolves quickly made room, knowing if they started fighting they wouldn't care who got in the middle of it. The women took the youngest children towards the relative safety of the trees, while the menfolk and more daring youth made a loose circle. They said nothing, waiting anxiously for the outcome of a long awaited fight. There were not shouts of encouragements or taunts. This wasn't a mere scuffle or a display of dominance. To them this was a matter of life and death, not only for the fighters themselves but for everyone who would live under the leadership of the victor.

"Touch?" Greyback sneered. "I didn't want to touch him. I just wanted to smack him around a little. He's pretty damn uppety for a goggle-eyed pipsqueak. He needs to learn his place."

Blackbone snarled and made to lung, and he reached for his knife, but Blackbone was brought up short by a pair of slender arms. Potter had grabbed the charging werewolf around the middle and was holding tight.

"Stop! Sirius, just stop it! He didn't do anything and he wasn't going to!"

"The hell he wasn't!"

For all the anger in that pronouncement, Greyback noted that he hadn't tossed the child off, which would have been easy. Harry's slender arms tightened around the alpha's waist.

"No, he wasn't. We're just going to get my paints. Okay? You know I can't see without my glasses. He's just taking me to get my paints, so I can see. Please calm down. Please?"

Blackbone looked hesitant, his attention now torn between leaping at his enemy and turning to comfort the child. He seemed stuck in indecision, so Greyback prodded him, letting loose a menacing chuckle. Blackbone's eyes hardened, and he tensed for another attempt at attack.

"Sirius, no! I don't want to see it!" Harry shouted, demanding his attention again. "I don't want to see anyone killed in front of me again. Don't make me watch it! I swear to God I won't forgive you, if you do that to me..."

There was a moment of absolute stillness. No one moved, no one spoke, no one so much as breathed. Blackbone looked as if he'd been hit with a paralysis spell, his expression frozen in a sort of horrified shock. At last, Greyback broke out into a barking laugh.

“Ha ha! You should see your face.”

He moved forward, and the other man tensed but wasn't really able to move around with Harry still latched onto him. Rather than give him a well deserved smack to the head, he gave him one to the back instead, chuckling.

“So damn high strung lately. I was just mess'n with ya.”

The tension eased amongst the werewolves like an audible sigh, and the crowd broke up again to do whatever they were doing before. Blackbone just sort of blinked at him, not really trusting him, but not really distrusting him either. When it came to disputes and challenges, Greyback was always straight forward. He never made you guess his intentions.

“Come on, boy. Best not to keep a goddess waiting.”

He pulled Harry off the alpha easily enough, but no sooner had he pulled the child up than he jerked himself free. His green eyes were as savage as any alpha he'd known, and for just that instant Greyback thought the boy must see him perfectly from the inside out. It only lasted half a second, and the boy was putting himself between the alpha's again, distracting Sirius.

“I'm fine, Sirius. He's no threat to me. Just relax, okay? Once I'm done getting painted, let's get something eat. I haven't eaten since yesterday. Where's Remus?”

Reluctantly, Blackbone tore his gaze away from his enemy. “I don't know. He must still be out fishing. We weren't expecting you until later.”

“You should go find him. He would be hurt if we started anything without him.”

“But-”

They both looked at Greyback unhappily, and he leered back. Harry sighed.

“Don't worry about it. He's just messing around with us. He'll leave when he's bored.”

A very astute observation, and perfectly true, but now that Harry had passed his test with flying colors, Greyback needed to speak with him in private. He gave Blackbone a dismissive gesture.

“Go fetch your meeker half. The pup and I have a matter to settle.”

Sirius hesitated, but after looking between the Head Alpha and his godson for a long moment, gave up and walked away. Alone again, Greyback took Harry's arm more gently and lead him behind some stalls to where the goddess was waiting. Harry was more than a little surprised when the girl there wasn't Luna, but a freckle faced child of no more than nine. She regarded him with the same steady and omniscient gaze he remembered though, and the same undefinable luminosity. Then he recalled that Sirius had told him that the goddess was leaving Luna's body to possess someone else. This was obviously the new girl, but what had happened to Luna? What was she like now without a spirit inhabiting her body?

“Welcome back, Twilight Seeker,” the girl said, staring straight passed him. Her head inclined towards Greyback, “Greyback.”

“Diana,” he greeted, inclining his head to her respectfully. Harry remembered himself and bowed, but she was already turning away.

“Sit, child.”

Harry removed his cloak and uncurled Inana from his neck, placing them on a bench to keep dry before sitting on the stool in front of the girl. She took his chin in her soft, little hands and tilted it up, painting a red stripe over his eyes. He kept his eyes closed and relaxed under her ministrations, basking in the cool pulsing magic that her presence brought.

"That was impressive," Greyback said, drawing Harry's reluctant attention. "What you did back there, I mean. Wrapped Blackbone right around your little finger."

The teen scowled.

"It's nothing to be ashamed of. There aren't a lot of people who could stop an alpha like him in their tracks. That's a rare sort of power."

"Power doesn't have anything to do with it. He cares about me, and did what I asked because of it."

Diana smacked him on the nose with her paint brush. "Do not speak until I'm done painting your face."

Greyback barked out a laugh.

"You've got it wrong, pup. I love my children just as much as he must love you, but do you think their begging could ever make me restrain my nature? It isn't compassion that stays our hands. It's respect. He respects you. He respects the fact that when you say you will hate him, that you mean it. That when you say you can take care of yourself, you can. Last year, do you think if I had tested you like this that you would have been able to stop him?"

Harry couldn't reply, but his forced silence left him with forced thoughts. Would he have been able to stop Sirius then? Looking back on it, he didn't think he would have even tried. Sirius was the adult, the alpha, the person who looked after him, informed him of what was happening around him, and the man wasn't to be questioned anymore than he would have questioned his parents or teachers. Yet, last December he had been the one to look after his godfathers, he had been the one to tell them what was happening, and they had been forced to rely on him as much as he had relied on them. Werewolves defined themselves in terms of their dominance and submission to others, how had his attempted rescue of them altered his position in their family? They had been forced to leave too soon for Harry to even realize that there might even be a change.

“Pup, when the time comes for Blackbone to take my place, you are going to be to him, what Voldemort is to me.”

Diana's brush left his face, and he turned to glare at the man. “I seriously doubt that.”

Greyback smirked, but after a moment it slid off his face. Harry watched the physical change from playfully antagonistic to dead serious, the smoothing of his facial features, the straightening of his back, the rising tension in his shoulders and hands.

“I am not playing. I am mean what I say. Your position... your role amongst my packs has changed the moment your will overcame Blackbone's. You have the power to maintain the peace between our two peoples. The peace that Blackbone would throw away to destroy a single enemy among potential thousands.”

Harry looked away, turning to Diana to see what she was painting. She was fully focused on creating an eye on the back of his right hand.

“I don't know what you're talking about.”

“You can't ignore this. Now that I've told you, you have a responsibility. When your godfather finally succeeds in killing me, you must convince him not to go to war against Voldemort. If you do not stop him, the werewolves will all be destroyed, including him.”

“Stop it. What is it that you think I can do? Why do you even think Sirius would start a war with the Dark Lord, anyway? He cares about the werewolves. He wouldn't do something he knows would hurt them. He's not an idiot and doesn't need me holding his leash.”

“Like he was just five minutes ago? Rushing in, knowing we could kill each other, and over what? Instinct. The instinct to protect. The instinct to destroy threats. That instinct is what makes an alpha. It's an instinct that defies logic and even self preservation for the security of others. It is what allowed me to establish my packs and keep them safe, and it is that same instinct that Blackbone will use to tear it apart. He doesn't trust Voldemort or me, and the prisoners of war I brought into my fold have only made things worse. That's why I need you. I need you to curb that instinct, to appeal to the... wizard in him. The part of himself that will see beyond the emotions of the moment, to the long term good."

"Remus-

"Feh. A beta, no an omega. He won't contradict Sirius. Even if he did it wouldn't make a difference. It has to be you."

"I'm just a kid."

"Excuses. Do it or don't."

Harry closed his eyes and sighed. "I'll talk to him."

"I wasn't expecting you to wrestle him into submission."

"You're welcome."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Sitting under the awning of a little café in the shadow of Notre Dame, Fleur thought she should be quite comfortable even in the summer heat, but Clotaire's restless fidgeting was making it very hard to relax. Honestly, they might have been in a muggle café, but he didn't have to act like such a tourist. True, their clothes made her feel like she was on her way to a costume party, but that was half the fun of roaming these parts of the city. The thrill of being discovered, the participation in strange customs, the novelty of a completely foreign way of life.

"Veux- tu bien te calmer?"* she said to her companion, lifting her glass of sparkling grape juice for a sip. "No one is going to jump up and cut off your head."

He frowned and took a drink from his own cherry soda, and grimaced.

"I don't know why you like to come to these places."

"Where's your sense of adventure? Don't tell me you're going to university already complacent?"

"That isn't fair. Especially coming from someone with no sense of self preservation."

She smiled at him, condescendingly.

"Clotaire, why can't you just let that go? Someone has to go to Britain, and I think we both know I'm the most suited. Madam Maxime said so."

"That woman has the brain of a giant, just like the rest of her."

Slamming down her glass, she reached across the table and grabbed the boy by the lapel of his shirt and practically dragged him across the table. She glared down at him, her pretty face drawn back into the true horror of her veela heritage.

"Madam Maxime is a great woman, who's gone through a lot of hell because of insensitive assholes like you. N'ose pas te moquer d'elle!"

Clotaire floundered, terrified by her birdish face and embarrassed by the people who were now staring at them like they were mad.

"D'accord! Je ta demande pardon! I know she's a great woman, I just don't understand why she's going through with this silly idea! It's not your school's responsibility to start public relations with a country still in the middle of a civil war."

She let him go, and he quickly straightened up and smoothed out every possible wrinkle he could find on himself. She sighed as she watched him. Really, what had she been thinking when she agreed to go steady with this peacock? Sure he had an invite to every wizarding house party and club in Paris, but ask him to do anything truly daring and he became a narrow-minded coward.

“They're not in the middle of a civil war. That's just rumor-mongering. Truth of the matter is, we don't have a very good idea of what's going on over there.”

“Even better. They could be sacrificing virgins to dragons for all you know, and you're just going to skip right in.”

“Well, I'm lucky I'm not a virgin, then, aren't I? Besides, it can't be that bad. I'll be spending most of my time at the school anyways. How bad could a school be?”

He looked at her as if she were crazy. “It's Hogwarts, Fleur. Even we get news about that place. Plus all the Death Eaters send their kids there and even Voldemort's heir is supposed to go. I'm telling you if you leave, you'll be raped or dead or both within the week.”

“Then why don't you come and protect me?”

“Why don't you just stay here?”

She rolled her eyes. “You're just afraid you'll get raped.”

“Dammit, why do you have to make light of this? You're going to be gone for a whole year to some god forsaken country and when you get back, if you get back, you'll be going straight to university. This could be our last summer together and you act as if you don't care.”

“It had to end sometime.”

“Why? Why does it have to end? You could stay in France, we could get in the same university together, and... and...”

“And what? Get married?” she said, looking unimpressed. “You're dreaming. I'm going to The Luxemburg Institute after getting back from Britain. Do you think you could get in?”

He fidgeted in his seat, looking around to see if anyone was watching her make a fool out of him. She wasn't normally this antagonistic, and up until someone had put this stupid idea of going overseas in her head, she had been nothing but sweetness and fun.

"You don't need to go to Luxembourg and you sure as hell don't need to go to Britain. Why don't you just stay here in Paris? The university is great here, and all of our friends and family are here too. You could do a lot worse."

"But I want a lot better. I didn't have tutors since I was in diapers, lessons in music and magic and manners for ten years, or get into the finest magic school in the world just so I could settle for being your arm candy."

"Is that what you think? That I'd just drag you down? I want what is best for you. I want you to be happy. Why don't you think I could make you happy?"

She looked at him, looking somewhere between amused and frustrated. Delicate fingers came up to run through her hair, and he could only watch transfixed. Fleur was easily the most beautiful being he had ever met, and on most days he could hardly believe that she was his. Now he could hardly believe that she wasn't.

"Do you love me, Clotaire?"

He blinked stupidly.

"I... Of course, I love you. Why would you think I didn't?"

"You've never said it, you know?"

"I haven't? Yes, I have! I say it all the time."

"You say the words, but when you say them it's the same as when you say 'you're beautiful' or 'kiss me'. A complete stranger could say it the same way you do. Not that it matters, because I don't love you. I never have, and I never lied and said I did."

"Are you breaking up with me?"

"Yes. We're both almost adults. I think we should both stop playing childish games."

He stared at her, disbelieving. She stared back in cool amusement, then took a sip of her drink.

"You... you bitch! You cold-hearted little slut. You used me to get popular and now you're just dumping me?"

"Don't embarrass yourself by making accusations, Clo," she said, her expression darkening to match his own. "You used me to get popular, not the other way around. I suggest you remember that before you go off to rant to our friends about how I supposedly wronged you. We went out, we had fun, and now it's over. And just for that 'bitch' comment, I'll leave the bill to you. Waiter, check please."

She stood up, and when he looked as if he was going to get up as well, snapped her fingers. He was suddenly forced back into his seat with a heavy 'umph'. He tried to get up again, but couldn't budge.

"Goodbye, darling. I hope you find someone who can actually love you back someday."

She walked out of the cafe, pretending to be oblivious to all the boys who turned their heads to watch her go, and turned the corner into a narrow alley between the café and an antique store. Gabrielle leaned against the wall, wand in hand and expression disapproving.

"You could have handled that better," the girl said. "You didn't need to be mean."

"Oh, Gabi, you'll understand when you start dating. It's better not to leave them with even a little hope that you'll change your mind. They'll just keep waiting for you to come back if you do. Now give me back my wand."

Reluctantly, Gabrielle handed it over. It had been fun tricking Clotaire into thinking Fleur had done some wandless magic, and even more fun to actually do some magic of her own for once. Her big sister was always casting spells left and right, but she still had to wait another two years before she was allowed to get a wand of her own and that wasn't fair at all. Fleur would be far away in Luxembourg by the time she got her wand, and then she'd never get to show off how good at magic she really was. Fleur was always so far ahead of her.

"Sister, is it true that Britain is dangerous?"

The older Delacour looked down at her suspiciously. "Did you cast a hearing charm on yourself?"

"Umm..."

"Gabi, what did I tell you? You can only use the sticking charm or the mute charm, and not anything else, especially on yourself. You could have ruptured your eardrum with that spell."

"I'm not an idiot! And don't change the subject. Is Britain really dangerous?"

Fleur shook her head. "Of course not. Not really. I mean, there are dangerous people there like You-know-who, but they're not going to attack me or the other students. They're trying to make friends. Like that big stray dog your friend Nicodème found. It could have been very dangerous, but it only wanted to play. Right?"

"Oh... are you sure?"

"I'm quite sure."

"Then why was Clotaire so scared?"

"Because Clotaire is afraid of dogs. Even friendly ones. He is a coward."

"Then can I come? I want to see the tournament too. I bet you'll get picked to compete and I want to watch you. So can I? I'm not scared like Clotaire."

Fleur smiled, and put her arm around her sister's shoulder, pulling her close.

"I know, you are like me. And if I could take you, I would. I would take you and mama and papa, but I can't. I couldn't even take Clotaire. I just offered because I knew he would refuse. One day, we will all go. I want to see Ireland. They've got the most darling accents there!"

"When can we go? All together, I mean."

"Who knows? If I do a good job, maybe we can all go next summer."

"Really?"

"Maybe."

Gabrielle tilted her head so it rested against her sister's side as they made their way home, trying to be content with what she had been given. Truth was, she wanted what Clotaire wanted. She wanted her sister to stay in Paris. She wanted her to be safe and close, even if she was at Beauxbaton most of the year. She couldn't say that though. Fleur might not like her anymore if she did, just like she didn't like her boyfriend. She had to practice pretending everything was fine, because when she finally saw her sister off, she had to be able to smile instead of cry.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"It's so unfair," Draco whined, moving his blue stone across the board until it landed on a picture of a flower. The stone turned into three green stones. Natalie frowned, staring at her two remaining red stones and wondered if she should be more aggressive or evasive now that she was out numbered.

They were out in the gardens, under the shade of the gazebo and surrounded by the scent of roses and lilacs. Between them sat a strategy game and two glasses of chilled lemonade.

"Yes, I know Draco. It's awful. And to think, you could have been Ronald's stooge instead."

“Ch'. Youngest quidditch captain ever and I don't even get to play until next year. How lame is that?”

“Very lame. Extremely lame. The lamest thing I've ever heard of... except for the fact that your father bullied your aunt in order for you to get that position in the first place. It sort of steals my sympathy for you,” she said smugly, moving one of her red pieces to jump Draco's green. The green stone turned red. She had him three to two now.

“I didn't even get an explanation on why there won't be quidditch this year,” he continued, ignoring her comment. “I swear she just canceled it because she doesn't want me to succeed at something. She's always been horrid wench.”

“Mmm...”

He gave her an irritated look and destroyed one of her red stones, turning both stones blue.

“It's not like I expect you to understand. You've never tried to accomplish anything, only applying the minimum effort to anything you do. You quit on Potter and then you quit Dueling Club.”

She jumped his blue stone and found herself with two yellow stones, and cursed herself. She'd hadn't thought that move through.

“What do you know? He quit me. He kept on quitting on me. Was I just suppose to pine after him until he took pity? Besides, Dueling Club is for brutes. I'm joining the Riding Club this year.”

“Geh. Since when were you interested in something so... girlish?”

“There are boys in that club, you know. Diggory is in that club.”

“The Hufflepuff? Isn't he a little old for you?”

“Isn't quidditch captaincy a little much for you?”

“Touché. I've got you in Yield Position, by the way.”

"Damn... give me a second." She chewed her lip for a moment, then moved her stone to a corner. Not an ideal situation, but it gave her a few more moves safe from Draco's only remaining green stone. He smirked at her, knowing he had her on the retreat.

"You could always come back. We'd all be happy to have you. Even Harry misses you."

She snorted.

"No doubt he'd change his mind about that as soon as I showed up. Forget it, Draco. I'm through with him and I'm through with the Dueling Club. You're going to have to guard your sister's virtue from Harry all by yourself."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry waited with the new goddess for his godfathers to reappear. She didn't seem to mind, but then she didn't seem to care about much of anything as she stared out sightlessly into space. He thought to talk to her, to ask her things about the year before, but the girl was so unlike Luna he felt as if he'd be asking Snape about his Transfiguration homework.

Inana had slithered off his cloak and gone in search of breakfast, leaving him no one to talk to.

So he waited quietly and wondered what he might say to Sirius. His first thought was to say nothing, and let Sirius handle things as he saw fit as any adult should be able. His second thought was that if he had let Sirius handle things earlier, someone would have gotten killed. Well, bother.

"Harry."

He turned around to see Sirius and Remus standing behind him. Remus had new scars on his arm, but otherwise looked just as he remembered. He was carrying two large fish and a barbed spear over his shoulder.

"Hey, Prongslet, you up for breakfast?" the beta greeted. Harry smiled and nodded.

"Greyback left?" Sirius asked, scanning their surroundings.

"Yeah. It's like I said, once there was no one to aggravate, he lost interest."

"Huh." The alpha looked curiously at him. "Did he say anything to you?"

Well, there was as good of an opening as he was going to get and there was no point in putting it off. He couldn't imagine the subject getting any easier to talk about. He nodded.

"Um... about that. Do you think we could go somewhere private? With the fish?"

"Sure, we'll go to that hollow hill we took you to last year. Remember? Where we taught you how to string a bow?"

"Perfect."

They moved deeper into the forest, the number of werewolves gradually decreasing the farther they got from the commune until at last they came to the hollow hill. It was half a hill eroded away, provided them with a natural amphitheater and a small waterfall to hide them from both sight and sound. They gathered up dry tinder as they went, and once they arrive, built a small fire to cook the fish. Remus placed some flat stones in the fire, and once they were hot, cut off sections of fish to cook on top of them.

"So what did he say?" Sirius prodded after they had run out of things to distract themselves with. "Did he threaten you?"

Harry looked at his feet, then forced himself to look up. Body language was everything with werewolves, and he wouldn't be taken seriously if he couldn't look his godfather in the eye. This was harder than it seemed, because Sirius' eyes were so blunt. He never bothered hiding or reeling in any of his emotions or thoughts, and projected them so forcefully it was almost a physical thing sometimes. Right now, there was uneasy suspicion and Harry felt awful that his suspicions might be well founded. He needed to be honest.

"No, he didn't threaten me. He wanted me to talk to you about something."

"Talk to me? If he wants to say something to me, he can do it himself. It's not like he doesn't know where I am."

Harry couldn't quite bring himself to look at Sirius, but knew looking down would be bad, so instead he looked up, seeing trees and a gray sky with dabs of brilliant blue. He reminded himself that he was doing something important, and his godfather would understand.

"Well... maybe 'convince' you of something is more precise."

Remus chuckled. "Ah, that makes sense. Prongslet could definitely convince you of something better than Greyback could."

"Are you calling me stubborn or accusing me of spoiling our godson? I can't tell."

The beta just smirked, taking a piece of cooked fish, placing it on a large oak leaf and handed it to Harry. The teen accepted it happily, even as he burned his fingertips, and watched his godfathers stare each other down. Remus was no alpha, but to say he was subservient to Sirius, was not only inaccurate but dangerous. It would be like saying Harry was subservient to Snape. Sure he obeyed him, most of the time, but the potions master had to pick his battles carefully. Eventually Sirius just rolled his eyes, and made a tactical retreat back into his conversation with Harry.

"Convince me of what then?"

Harry shoved his fish, still too hot, into his mouth and used it as an excuse to stall long enough to figure out his wording. This backfired, for not only did he burn his mouth, he couldn't think of anything coherent in the mean time, and just blurted it all out.

“Don't fight Voldemort.”

Sirius just blinked, then raised a brow. “Well... okay. I can't say I haven't thought of punching him in the face a couple times, but I guess I can control myself...”

“I mean, when you become Head Alpha. When you have hundreds of werewolves willing to do whatever you say. Don't start a fight with him, just because you can.”

Sirius' perplexed expression faded into irritation.

“That really isn't something you need to concern yourself with. It has nothing to do with you.”

That brought a sting of hurt to Harry's heart, and then a wave of anger.

“How can you say that? Because I'm not a werewolf? Aren't I your godson? Aren't you the only family I have left? If you start a fight with the Dark Lord... it'd be war. You could be killed. You could get others killed. You could kill people yourself. And for what? Because you were enemies in the last war? That battle is over, so why prolong it?”

“Because it's the right thing to do!” Sirius shouted.

“How is that the right thing?” he shouted back. “Why do more people have to be hurt?”

“He's evil, Harry! You were too young to remember it, but he did horrible things. Unspeakable things for stupidest, most bigoted reasons.”

“So you're going to make sure I see it all for myself?”

“Would you close your eyes to everything he's done? All because he pats you on the head like a good dog from time to time!”

“You don't understand! He's... he's...”

“Like a father to you? You stupid brat, he's not your father! He would have killed your father if he'd ever been in the same room with him. He would have killed you and your mother along with him!”

“SIRIUS!”

It hadn't been Harry who demanded his attention. Harry was too busy being too shocked to so much as blink. There was so much hate in those gray eyes, and he was looking right at him. Remus' sharp call drew the alpha's attention, freeing Harry from his Medusa's gaze long enough to process exactly what Sirius had said. What he had implied.

Did he think of Voldemort as his father? No. Never. He had never trusted him that much, never loved him like that. He knew, perhaps better than Sirius, exactly what the Dark Lord was and why. He had seen the very composition of his fractured soul, and as horrifying as it had been there was a beauty in it. The same sort of beauty that is found in a force of nature, regardless of how destructive it was.

Would Voldemort have killed his family? Even him?

Harry didn't doubt it for an instant. But that was during a war. A war he didn't want to see reenacted.

“Do you think... I'm saying this because... it's what Voldemort wants? Do you think I'm doing this for him?”

Sirius didn't say anything, but he didn't have to. Such blunt, accusing eyes didn't require words. Harry stood up. He looked towards Remus standing by the fire, finding anger there as well, but directed at his mate's turned back. “I'm sorry, Moony, I don't feel much like eating anymore. I'm going to head back. I'll talk to you later.”

“Prongslet...”

He looked away before he could see Remus' expression, kept his eyes down so he wouldn't have to see Sirius, regardless of how weak it made him look. At that moment, he felt as frail as glass, pieces of himself chipping off with every step he took away from the hill. The last thing he heard before leaving was the sound of a fist hitting flesh.

“Sirius, you're such an asshole!”

It didn't make him feel the least bit better.

oo
oo

Jackal slunk from his hiding place above the hollow hilled, using the distraction of Slivermoon pummeling his alpha to slip away unnoticed. He made a b line towards the commune, careful to stay out of sight of the wizard child. It wasn't hard. The boy wasn't moving fast nor looking around. In fact, he was moving with all the vigor of a zombie.

Which was sort of funny, considering the boy's master was a necromancer. Perhaps he really was a zombie and the Dark Lord was screwing with everyone's head.

Hey, mushrooms!

No, he reminded himself, his alpha had sent him on a mission and now it was time to report back. He couldn't afford to get distracted. Focus, focus, focus!

What was he suppose to be focusing on again?

He stopped and tried to remember exactly what he had been doing. This was probably why he wasn't even in the running for taking over as Head Alpha, he thought. He really didn't have the attention span for it.

Oh! That's right, he was spying on Blackbone and the Dark Lord's apprentice to see how their 'talk' went. Not very good, it seemed. Jackal hadn't been able to hear most of the conversation, but it was pretty obvious the kid hadn't been successful in whatever he was doing.

He grinned to himself, thinking what Greyback's reaction would be. He would most certainly kill Blackbone now. What choice did he have? He couldn't leave the packs' wellbeing to a warmonger. It was only a question of how he'd go about the younger alpha's demise. Would he have the packs tear him apart? Would he kill the man himself? With his knife or barehanded or in wolf form?

Maybe if he were lucky he'd get to help. No doubt it would be quite a spectacle one way or the other.

Hey, mushrooms!

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

German translation: Krum's father: "You shouldn't go." Krum: "Don't worry, papa,..."

French Translation: "Would you relax?", "Don't you dare make fun of her!", "I'm sorry, I'm sorry!" (Okay, the last part not so much, but basically the same thing)

It's back to normal Friday updates after this, but I hoped you enjoyed the little change in pace.

Book IV:

Chapter 3: Royal Negotiations Continued...

By the time Harry made it back to the settlement, the shock had worn off. He was left instead with a confusing mix of emotions and thoughts. Depression over Sirius' harshness and the honesty in which it had been delivered, confusion about what he should do now and what it might mean for his impromptu family, and a sharp fear that his failure to convince the alpha would result in tragedy. Most of all, however, he felt frustrated. What did Sirius know about what Harry had gone through? Who was he to judge? Sirius hadn't been in his positions, hadn't had to face the same things with only his own admittedly limited judgment.

And Harry didn't regret. How could he? What could he have done differently that wouldn't have gotten him or others killed or imprisoned or hurt? Although there had been those who hadn't escaped that fate because he... But he couldn't have predicted that.

Voldemort himself could not be defined by convention and couldn't be held to the same standards as other wizards. He wasn't like other wizards and never would be. Harry doubted he could even be considered human, but he was a being Harry could find both nobility and devotion in. Voldemort was a creature whose nature he could forgive because the whole of his nature was greater than the sum of his cruelty and ambition.

Harry couldn't hate the man, despite all he had done. Not that he could or would trust him either.

At the same time, there was no way Sirius could understand this. It wasn't even fair to try and make him understand it. So what was he suppose to to do? Accept this animosity? Had their bonds truly been so weak to shatter so readily?

There were no answers to his questions. At least none that he could find in himself, and there weren't exactly many people he could ask advice of. His thoughts immediately shifted to Kyle Reicher and his sage advice on Christmas Eve, but perhaps this was a little beyond even his scope of understanding. Sna...eh... no.

The only person he could think to ask advice of was the other half of his problem. Of course, that might give Harry just the sort of perspective he needed to figure out his thoughts, feelings, and what he was going to do about it.

He moved carefully through the crowds, conscious of his lack of protection amongst the throng of notoriously violent men and women (and children if you ever caught yourself playing football with them), but everyone let him through with a casual sort of respect he'd seen for Greyback's children and mate. Arriving at Voldemort's tent, he found the man sitting on the floor and smoking a strange pipe. It was very long and thin, and made of a reddish wood and decorated with a golden serpent or dragon.

Harry paused, watching as the Dark Lord inhaled from the pipe deeply, then slowly exhaled a reddish smoke. The smoke undulated in an amorphous cloud for a moment, then took on the shape of... something. It wasn't any creature Harry recognized. When it held still it looked rather like the root system of a flower, veiny red threads spreading out into ever smaller threads, yet when it moved he got the distinct impression of legs and arms and fingers not unlike a human's, though he could identify nothing resembling a head. It was the size of a toddler, but watching it move purposefully around the Dark Lord's head it seemed like a somewhat older and more curious child.

"What is it?" Harry asked, coming to sit across from his mentor

"A tree spirit," he was informed. "A holly tree spirit to be more precise. I pulled her out of a woodpile three years ago. Some stupid muggle had cut down her tree for fire wood, poor dear."

It was strange to hear the man take pity on anything, but Harry felt a bit of pity of his own. The spirit moved towards him, undulating like a jellyfish. He wasn't afraid of her, but he was a little startled when she reached out to touch his face. Not expecting it, he sneezed and she dissolved into formless wisps, only to regather herself again and hover a little higher. He noted that with her this close the air smelled of holly flowers rather than the burnt wood smell he had been expecting.

“And what are you doing with her?”

Voldemort watched the spirit with some amusement. “Waiting for her to grow up. She's much too young for anything significant, right now.”

“And when she is grown?”

“I wonder. Perhaps I will offer her as a bride to one of my gods. Or I might give her a body of her own so that I might speak to her and learn the ways of trees. I have one hundred years to think of something.”

Harry blinked. “A hundred years? You're going to wait a hundred years just to decide with to do with her?”

“I imagine I'll have plenty to do while I wait. There's no point in hurrying. I have much longer than a hundred years to find things to fill my time with.”

Harry knew this. From what he had seen and experienced during the Solstice Ritual the Dark Lord could theoretically live as long as the earth itself, but he suspected it wasn't going to be quite that long.

“How long?”

Voldemort looked away from the spirit and down at Harry, seeming to contemplate his inquiry or more specifically why it had been asked. Finding nothing more than childish curiosity, he answered.

“I was promised a millennium about fifteen years ago*. So... nine-hundred and eighty five years to go.”

Harry gaped. The life span of the earth seemed like a long time, but having a definite number of years made it sound even more impossible.

“Who promised you?”

“Who? I wonder. It was prophesied by a woman from a long line of reliable prophets, but I don't suppose they know where their knowledge comes from any more than I do. The Earth probably, but they are just as often attributed to God. Maybe it's both of them. Maybe it's something else altogether. It is quite the mystery.”

The spirit had moved while they were talking, drifting down to Harry's thigh where his right hand was resting. The gentle touch of her thread-like appendages drew his attention, and he held out his hand for her and watched as she wrapped herself around all his fingers individually, caressing them lovingly. Harry wasn't sure if he should feel amused or violated.

The Dark Lord chuckled, but that wasn't a real indicator since he'd probably laugh at either scenario.

“What is she doing?”

“Your wand is made of holly, isn't it?”

He nodded.

“She's flirting with the spirit in your wand. Or perhaps it's more like she's leaving her scent on you for it to find. The little minx.”

Harry felt an embarrassed blush bloom across his entire face. He gave his hand a vigorous shake, freeing himself from her flirtation-by-proxy. The man laughed harder, and the Gryffindor decided it was a good time to talk about what he'd really come here for.

“Anyway,” Harry said, interrupting the laughter. “I wanted to ask your advice about something.”

That stopped Voldemort's amusement quick. He actually looked surprised. Harry had come to him before, but it was very rare and usually due to a lack of alternatives. As far as he knew, there were at least two others he could turn to before himself.

"And you felt you couldn't discuss it with your godfathers?" he asked, somewhat suspiciously.

"Actually... it's sort of about them. Well, Sirius, at least."

"Ah, I see. And what seems to be the problem?"

Harry told him about Greyback's test, about the task he'd given Harry, his subsequent failure, and Sirius' hurtful, honest accusations. The Dark Lord said nothing through the entire tale and indeed for several minutes afterwards. He sat silent and thoughtful, smoking from his pipe which was now giving off gray smoke but still smelled of holly and watching the spirit swim through the smoky haze. At last, he spoke.

"It is only two days from the full moon nearest the summer solstice. Your godfather is no doubt feeling emotionally volatile like everyone else. He meant some of what he said, I'm sure, but most of it was probably said out of frustration and as a natural reaction to you confronting him as an alpha. I believe it would be best to leave him be, let him spend his aggression during the full moon, and then speak with him again. I'm sure he'll be considerably more amiable then."

Harry felt a swell of hope in his heart. Could it really all just be a reaction to coming full moon? He had never been at the receiving end of Sirius' temper around the full moon, but then he had never challenged Sirius' then either.

"Do you think so? What about Greyback?"

"I will speak with Greyback and suggest he avoid making any hasty decisions until after the full moon, as well. If Blackbone continues to be stubborn, however, I cannot promise his safety."

"Thank you," Harry choked out, the relief he felt manifesting itself in an embarrassing display of tears. He tried again, forcing his voice to sound less shaky. "Thank you. How do I repay you for this?"

The Dark Lord smiled, somewhat condescending, but he felt too grateful to him to care. "I will simply accept your gratitude for this.

After all, it's in my best interest that you succeed in your task. I have no desire to arbitrate the political chaos the death of your godfather would create among the lycanthropes. He will make a fine leader for his people so long as he can learn to be... adaptable. Just like you."

Harry wasn't sure what to make of that. Frankly, he didn't care right now. All he cared about was that he had been given another chance to save his godfathers and possibly many others from death.

He promised himself that this time, he would succeed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

About the time Harry was finding his hope, Sirius was finding himself in a Grade A sulk. He had said some unforgivably stupid things and now his godson probably felt like crap and Remus had given him a well deserved slug to the face and stormed off. And whatever preconceived notions people might have about his beta's strength, that man could throw a punch like a mule could kick. This left him not only feeling sorry for what he'd said, but also sorry for himself.

Even worse, he only had himself to blame. Well, himself and Voldemort. Mostly Voldemort, though, because this certainly never would have happened if overgrown snake hadn't slithered out of whatever viper pit he'd come from.

As if things weren't bad enough, he didn't have anyone or anything to take it out on. Voldemort and Greyback would have made lovely targets, if not for the fact that his godson was absolutely right about the dangers involved with that, to himself and the other werewolves. He wasn't stupid. He had known the problems he was causing and could potentially cause would result in death, his own and others. It was just...

"Are you ill?"

He looked up from the tree stump he was sitting on to see Luna balancing herself perfectly on the top of a boulder. Strange, beautiful Luna, who came and went as mysteriously as the moon she was named for, a profound presence even in her silence. He could only stare at her for a moment, perplexed by her sudden appearance. She rarely approached people of her own accord aside from Athena and Greyback.

"You look like you're having stomach pains," she continued, when he didn't answer. "Do you need a laxative? I think we've got someone at home. I promise I won't tell anyone."

Sirius snorted. That was the other thing about Luna. After five years as a goddess she had missed several essential lessons in social graces.

"No, I don't have a stomach problem. I just feel bad about something I said."

"Something bad you said to Harry?"

He sighed and ran a hand through his hair. This wasn't something he wanted to talk about with her. There was no telling what would come out of her mouth.

"And how did you figure that out?"

"Jackal came by the house to talk to Father. He said Harry failed to convince you not to make war. Father said he would have to kill you now. He was really sad about that. Harry must be really sad too."

Sirius grimaced. It wasn't that he cared if Greyback would try to kill him now. He wasn't afraid of fighting the other alpha or even of being killed by him, but he sure as hell didn't want anyone to feel sad about it. And he really didn't want Jackal of all people to be privy to the things he'd said to Harry. He stared at his bare feet and the mud squeezing up through his toes, and wondered if there was any way to fix things.

While futilely trying to think of what Remus would do in his shoes, he failed to notice that Luna had moved until her nose was practically poking out his eyes. He jumped back, slipped, and fell off the stump and onto his back.

"Luna, don't do that!"

"Sorry," she said, coming to sit beside him and leaned in almost as close as she had before. "You should apologize to Harry before you die."

He smirked, and lifted a brow. "What makes you think I won't kill Greyback first?"

"I never said you should apologize before Father kills you," she said pragmatically.

With a sigh, he closed his eyes. There really was no winning against Luna.

"It wasn't suppose to be happen like this," he said.

"Like what?"

"James wasn't suppose to runaway in the middle of the fight. Dumbledore wasn't suppose to abandon his people. The Snake King wasn't suppose to become the Wise King. Harry was never suppose to be his prince."

Luna tilted her head curiously, pondering his words. He watched as her expression shifted, knowing she was tearing apart his words like a child tears apart a particularly complicated toy.

"Is Harry a prince because Voldemort made him one or his Harry a prince because Harry made himself one?"

Sirius blinked up at her stupidly. "Huh?"

"Did Voldemort make Harry a prince or did he make himself one?"

"What? I don't know what you mean by that."

She made a frustrated expression. "It isn't a trick question. Would Harry still be a prince without Voldemort being a king?"

"I... I don't know... I mean... Well, yeah. Harry is Harry. The big snake didn't have anything to do with him being brave or kind. That's purely James and Lily's doing."

"No."

"No?"

"Harry being brave and kind is Harry's doing. His parents aren't here to help or hinder him from being good or bad. It isn't their decision. It isn't your decision. It isn't Voldemort's. It isn't Father's. Harry is the way he is because that's how he decided to be. He loves you because he chooses to love you. He asked you not to make war with Voldemort because that is what he believes is right, not because it's what Father or Voldemort told him to do. But you knew that already, didn't you?"

Sirius said nothing. There wasn't really a point. She had him pegged, and her vaguely amused smile proved that she knew it too.

"And you know he's right, don't you? You know his way is the best way for everyone, because he made his decision out of love for everyone."

The alpha looked away.

"You better decide what you're going to do soon," she said, finally standing and moving away. "Father has run out of patience."

He sat up, but of course she was already gone as if she'd never been there. What to do now? He needed to speak with Harry and apologize, but that was easier said than done now that the Head Alpha was out for his blood. His best chance was to find Remus first, who could bring Harry to him without causing too much of a fuss, and they could start their conversation over again, preferably without anyone suffering any physical or emotional damage.

Of course, finding Remus might not be any easier than finding Harry.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom looked down imperiously at the masses crowding through the square, the summer heat wafting up in a humid haze, bringing with it the stink of the city. After a long, cold winter of hiding and building his strength, he thought the magic and warmth of spring and summer would be a welcome change, but all he had found was intolerable amount of sunlight and heat. The city only made it worse, for he thought he might be reasonably comfortable living in a hollow tree or the rafters of a barn, but his own purposes forced him into the squalor of the streets, at the busiest intersection in all of wizarding London. There was too much stone and not enough shade, too many people and not enough trees, but this was his medicine and he had already accepted that it would taste bitter.

And really he couldn't complain about his accommodations. Barnabas was a considerate landlord, if not particularly bright. He politely ignored him taking residence in his newspaper stand, and graciously renewed the cooling charm in his shadowy niche in the stand's awning every so often. In return, Tom refrained from crapping on him while he was working and leaving pellets* on the floor.

There was far too much noise during the day, but that was part of the reason why Tom had chosen this particular spot. The hundreds of witches and wizards that passed beneath him provided him with two essentials. Magic and information. They were just down the street from half a dozen Court Offices, including the Forum, and the officials and soldiers and sentinels all came to this stand to and from work, leaving behind traces of their magic and gossip which he devoured ravenously.

Already he felt strong enough to take the body of a human, and there were so many to choose from, but he had to be cautious. His plans involved more than living out the life of some government sheep, and he needed to find the perfect individual in which to pursue his latest quest.

Information was abundant, yet frustratingly incomplete. Those who came and went were in the center of political life, but their individual views did not see the shape of their own government as a whole. Tom thought, having listened to tantalizing bits and pieces from many perspectives, had a better view than most but even he couldn't say he understood current events completely.

He knew there had been a recent push to renew relations with Europe and he knew of the Triwizard Cup, but he did not know Voldemort's intentions in sponsoring it nor Germany or France's when they accepted the invitations. He knew about the recent death of the professor who was to adopt Harry and the national sympathy that had earned the orphaned boy when she had been killed, but not how Harry himself was taking the tragedy. He knew war was in the air, but not from which direction it would blow.

Britain was calm now, but only as a sleeping dragon that at any moment would awaken to set the world on fire. He needed to be ready. Ready to destroy his enemies and save his poor Harry from his brother's machinations. Ready to seize power when the chaos finally broke out.

He needed to return to Hogwarts.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry sat outside Voldemort's tent, performing his first official task as the Dark Lord's unofficial pagan apprentice. As was expected, it was little more than grunt work. He was making incense or more precisely, the extract that would compose the incense, grinding up nutmeg, clove, camphor, and opononex* with a crude wooden pestle and mortar. His teacher said it was for a summoning lesson, though he hadn't specified for what exactly. He'd gone off to talk with Greyback, and Harry wasn't about to delay him with questions that could wait for later.

"Mmm... smells nice. Are you trying to lure something?"

Harry looked up to see Luna nearly standing on top of him, but not the Luna he remembered. She was mostly the same shape, except for being slightly taller and with the beginnings of a feminine curve to her chest, and the same ivory skin, but the divine, disinterested ethereal glow had disappeared. Her hair, which had seemed yellow as corn silk, was now dirty blond and her slender body now came off as rather bony. Her aloof omniscience was replaced with wide-eyed curiosity and a complete lack of respect for personal space. If she had stepped any closer, he would be looking up her loincloth.

And there was another difference. Instead of the shimmery robes and layers of beads, she had dressed down to match her pack mates in a leather two piece with a poncho made of roughly woven hemp draped over her. All remnants of her former divinity were gone.

This didn't keep his last memories of her in human form (her very naked human form pressed up against him) from inserting themselves into his awareness, and a massive blush bloomed across his face. He quickly looked for something to say to keep his thoughts from straying into pervert territory.

"Er... yeah. Spirits. For later... um... He's teaching me summoning," he said bashfully, then tried smiling up at her. "Hi, Luna."

She smiled back down at him.

"Hi, Harry." He scrambled for something else to say in his awkwardness, but she beat him to it. "Can I help?"

"Oh. Sure. Grab that bowl of nutmeg and start peeling the shells off the seeds."

A silence fell, and though Harry couldn't order his thoughts enough to create a conversation, Luna looked perfectly at ease as she set about the task he had given her. For the life of him, he couldn't think of what to say. She had once known him with the omniscience only a deity could possess, and he hadn't known her at all except in the physical sense, which did nothing to ease his discomfiture.

"So..." he tried, not really knowing what was going to come out of his mouth. "How have you been?"

She paused in her peeling and considered. "I don't know. Father says I'm perfect, but Mother says I'm lonely. I'm not sure I believe either of them."

"You don't know how you are? What you're feeling? About anything?"

She shrugged.

"Well, I used to, but after the goddess took me, I just sort of forgot. But I'm learning. I know the important feelings. Anger. Fear. Love. But the subtler emotions like jealousy or pride... I don't know. I finally figured out 'worry' though. I kept getting it mixed up with anticipation and fear."

"I can see why that might confuse you. They're all pretty similar," Harry said sympathetically, though inwardly he was baffled by her naivety. "What are you worried about?"

"I'm worried Blackbone is going to kill Father."

Well, fuck. He looked away.

"I'm trying to talk to Sirius, but it hasn't gone well. If they can hold off killing each other until after the full moon, Voldemort thinks I might have more success."

She shook her head.

"No, one will have to kill the other eventually. It's in their nature."

Harry tried to wrap his mind around the idea that two people would be drawn to kill each other, not out of personal grievance or ambition or even of preference, but as a biological drive. Then came the horrible conclusion that one way or the other, Sirius was going to have to fight Greyback and he could be killed. Then came the other horrible realization that even if Sirius won, he was going to kill someone. Someone who happened to be the man Luna considered her father.

"I'm sorry," he said, unable to think of anything else. She looked at him intently for a moment, perhaps to gauge his honesty.

"I'm sorry too. I said I was worried Blackbone would kill Father, but the truth is I think the reverse is going to happen. Father won't allow Blackbone to kill him as things are now. Blackbone will-"

"Luna," he snapped. "Shut up."

Her already wide-eyes grew just a fraction, and she tilted her head curiously. "Did I say something wrong?"

He sighed. There wasn't a point to snapping at her. She didn't know any better, but he really didn't want to talk to her any more. Not if she was going to keep on this particular subject.

"No, Luna, but I don't want to talk about it. I'm trying to fix the things I can, but I don't see the point in talking about the things I can't. Especially when those things haven't even happened yet. We don't even know that they will happen."

There was a silence, this time mutually awkward and tense. Harry's eyes remained fixated on his hands, but he could feel her gaze on him. Nothing was said for a long time, and then she spoke again.

"Do you..." she started hesitantly, "Do you think you could fix this? Do you think you could stop them from killing each other?"

He turned to her, and to his surprise he found she was crying. Large tears poured soundlessly down her cheeks, her silvery gray eyes sparkling like shiny new silver Sickles. She didn't try to wipe them away or hide them or announce them with noisy sobs or sniffles like he had seen other girls do. In fact, she didn't seem aware of them at all. Her expression was exactly the same as it always was, a strange mix of curiosity and dreaminess, always making you wonder where her thoughts lay. She just looked... wetter.

He set down his pestle and mortar, and crawled the short distance towards her. She didn't pull away or hesitate when he pulled her towards him, and hugged her tightly. She merely rested her head on his shoulder and let him hold her, and thought how very much like Father he was in that aspect. Harry just held her for a long time, ignoring the wetness on his shoulder and numbness that was spreading through his legs.

"I'm going to try Luna. I'm going to try so hard to save them both. You've got to try too, okay? If we both try, maybe we can do it, and even if we can't, we will have tried, right? Will you help me?"

"... okay..."

"Maybe I can convince Voldemort to ask the moon goddess for advice... Or maybe you can convince Greyback to send Sirius away for awhile. I bet it wouldn't be hard to have him assigned as my personal guard again this year. We're suppose to be having an international event at school and could use the extra security, I'm sure. Don't worry, we'll figure out something."

She nodded against his shoulder, but didn't say anything, moving just a bit closer so they fit more comfortably. Harry mused it was much different than hugging Hermione. Hugging his friend always felt awkward, and he was never sure where to put his hands or how tightly he should squeeze her back or for how long. The science of hugging a witch was a mystery to him.

Hugging a werewolf, even a female one, held about as much decorum and intimacy as a pat on the back. Everyone did it. Men, women, children, friends, lovers, relative strangers. No one was going to question it, make lewd accusations, or scold them for doing it public. They didn't question it, and neither did Harry.

When Luna finally pulled away, it wasn't because of embarrassment, but because something had caught her attention. She turned towards the center of the commune where the majority of the werewolves were gathered for the festivities. Harry followed suit and realized something was going on. The people were excited, but not the sort of excited that preceded a hunt or one of their savage sporting matches. This was an anxious excitement, strung through with voices of disbelief and outrage.

Harry had a very bad feeling.

“What's going on?”

“I don't know,” she said, tilting her head curiously.

It didn't take long to find out. From the crowd ran a boy of no more than seven that Harry recognized as one of Greyback's sons. He looked proud and triumphant, but when he saw the person his sister was with that expression quickly disappeared.

“Luna...” he started, then stopped again, looking nervously at Harry.

“What is it, Specter?” she prompted.

“It's Father,” he said, cautiously glancing back at Harry. “He's killed Blackbone.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It wasn't hard to find the battle grounds. A steady stream of spectators moving towards them, deeper and deeper into the forest. Harry didn't pay much attention to who he was following, making his choices based on who was moving the fastest at the time and then selecting another after he had passed them. The forest was crowded and he bumped into several werewolves much older and stronger than him, but though a few turned to snarl at him, none were fast enough or brave enough to retaliate as he rushed pass them.

Heart beating like a humming bird, and feet near as quick, he raced his fear into the forest and felt its clammy breath whispering into his ear 'he's dead, he's dead' as he went. At last the migration of people ended at a small clearing, where a thick wall of bodies marked its boundaries. He was forced to slow down, and when he did his fear slammed into him with all the speed he had been using to avoid it. 'He's dead', a mere statement, became a fully illustrated vision in his mind's eye, with a body and blood and these hundreds of gawking faces.

But there were still noises coming from the clearing and the crowd here was deathly quiet as they had been when Greyback and Sirius had faced each other earlier that day. Merlin, had it really just been a few hours ago?

Fearfully, he touched the arm of the person nearest him to obtain some answers. It was a older man, stone faced and cold as he turned to him. There was a flash of recognition, perhaps even a second of pity, but it became just as quickly unreadable.

"You shouldn't be here for this," the man said. Despair threatened to drown the fear, but he swallowed it down so that he could speak.

"Is my godfather dead?"

The man studied him for a moment, but Harry was too impatient for him to sort his thoughts.

"Tell me!"

A grunt and a sigh, and finally an answer. "May as well be... he's down and out. Jackal is trying to finish him off but Slivermoon keeps- Hey!"

Harry didn't wait for him to finish, diving into the wall of people, and shoving his way through forcefully. It was hard, most of the people there were stronger than him and not a few of them landed him a hardy smack or elbow before they realized who he was, but he kept shoving and clawing and squeezing his way through until he finally broke out the other side.

It was how he had imagined it. There was blood everywhere, and Sirius lay unmoving, curled around the worst of his wounds. Everyone stood tensely, but for Greyback, looking more resigned than anything as he stared down at the man he had seemingly killed.

He made to rush to his godfather's side, but someone quickly drew him back and just in time too, because two large bodies landed where he had been running. There were snarls and vicious kicks and punches and biting, and in general what he imagined Sirius and Greyback's fight must have looked like.

But it wasn't those two alphas going at it, it was...

"Remus..." he breath. It was Remus, but not a side of Remus he had never seen before. The beta who followed quietly, who reasoned before he acted, and shied from his werewolf nature was beating the bloody shit out of an alpha. Harry watched disbelieving as the man grabbed hold of Jackal's head and smashed it into the ground, once, twice, three times. It would have killed a normal man, but the skinny alpha had enough moxie left in him to make a clawing swipe at his attacker, knocking the other man off him in a spray of blood. Jackal scrambled to his feet and made for Sirius' prone body, but Remus caught him by the ankle and dragged him back.

Not wanting to watch anymore, Harry waited till the two fighters were out of the way before sprinting towards Sirius. He came to a stop and knelt, looking for some place he could touch to feel for a pulse what wasn't sliced opened. In his search for undamaged flesh and with the noise of the fight distracting him, he nearly missed the Sirius opening one of his eyes, and would have if the rest of him weren't so very still.

"Sirius..." he whispered. "You damn fool..."

"Sor... nn.. sor...nnn..."

"Shhh... don't speak. Don't try to move. I'll fix this. Just stay still."

And even as he said it, he realized he couldn't fix any of it. He wasn't a healer, and even if he were he didn't even have his wand on him. Tears were falling fast and heavy now, and he couldn't see and couldn't think, only panic and mourn and pray for an answer.

And an answer came.

It came with the tears and the memory of a past prayer, and the awareness that tears were more than salt and water for those who worship the Earth. He stopped panicking and the tears were coming faster and heavier than ever, but that was what he needed.

"Where are you hurt the worst?" he asked, leaning in very close to him, letting his tears fall onto the man's face and flow into his open mouth. Sirius didn't answer at first or even move, but his tongue peeked out for just a second to lap up wetness at corner of his mouth. After a long, painful swallow, he spoke weakly.

“Sto... mach...”

Harry went to examine it, and nearly vomited. Even without removing Sirius' hand from the wound, he could see inside of it, all the way to the visceral organs nearly falling out. Another wave of panic and the thought it was too much for him to fix made him hesitate. His eyes found Sirius', to convey that there was nothing he could do, but those gray eyes were now wet with tears and he thought of Luna's tears and the promise he had made. He might not be able to do anything, but he had to try.

“I have to roll you over. I'm sorry, it's going to hurt.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Sirius' body didn't want to uncurl, but as close to death as he was, Harry's strength was enough to get him on his back and after that everything just sort of fell flat. It hurt. It hurt incredibly, and he didn't want to do it. There wasn't anything more for him to do at this point, but close his eyes. He was dying and he knew it, and more than anything he didn't want Remus or Harry to be there to see it.

But Remus was fighting and now Harry was fighting too, and they were both so brave he felt for all the world like a coward because he didn't think he could keep himself alive for them. His battle had gone along like it normally did with Greyback, blows landed by each of them, seemingly equal, until the Head Alpha had pulled out his knife. It wasn't something the elder man had ever bothered with before. Sirius knew from that point on there was no turning back, and had pulled out his own knife as well.

And lost. Again, his own damn fault, like everything else that day. He'd hesitated too much, mind distracting him with thoughts of Harry and everything he had said, the pleas he had made. What did that hesitation get him? His godson's hands in his guts and his tears in his mouth, and by the Goddess, Remus was going to kill someone and all to save a life that couldn't be.

On his back, he couldn't see Harry. His head was tilted too much, and irony of ironies, his gaze landed directly on Greyback. What a strange look on his face. He didn't think he'd seen the likes of it before. The blood thirst, the arrogance, the possessiveness he had always associated with the man was absent. The triumph he was expecting wasn't there either. Funny how he'd never noticed the man's eyes were blue or-"AAAAHHHHhhhhhh..." A slash of pain, so alike to the one Greyback had inflicted overcame him. He thrashed, finding strength in the throes of pains. Harry little body was knocked away, but returned a moment later, weighing down his legs, and bringing back the pain with his fingers burning his insides like acid.

"REMUS! HELP ME!"

His beta climbed on top of him as well, holding down his shoulders with his legs and his arms with his hands All Sirius could do was scream, the pain increasing exponentially, trying to knock them off. His love for them turning to hate in the midst of his suffering, and he gladly would have dragged them into death with him if he only had the strength.

And finally, blessedly, he passed out.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Merlin, Harry, what are you doing?"

He wished he had an answer to that, but right now he was working on instinct and instinct required a lack of rationality to work.

"Trust me. This is the only way."

And it was working. Unbelievably, it was working. Like a potion, everywhere his tears fell the wounds sizzled and then healed, clean and unscarred. It was too slow, though. Too much blood was lost already, and the tears repaired so little at a time. His own magic was burning away too quickly. It poured out with his tears, a strange form of wandless magic and likewise completely inefficient.

His only hope was that he could heal Sirius enough that the pack healers could take care of the rest. So far, none of them had dared approach to offer their assistance. The reason for their reluctance finally stepped forward, moving towards them with slow but obvious intent. Remus stiffened, and slowly looked over his shoulder at the approaching alpha. Greyback paused briefly to stare down at Jackal, unconscious and breathing raggedly on the ground, before stepping over him.

"Harry," Remus said, trying to draw the boy's attention to the latest threat.

"I see him," he said, clinging to his calm desperately when all his mind wanted to do was fly to pieces. "You can step away."

"Harry..."

"It's alright, Remus. You better step away now. I don't think I can patch up the both of you at the same time."

"..."

"Trust me. Please."

Reluctantly, the beta crawled off his alpha and slunk a short distance away, although close enough jump in if the Head Alpha attempted anything. When Greyback finally came to a stop a mere foot fall from crushing Sirius' head, Harry turned away from the wound to look up at him. He couldn't imagine that he looked at all intimidating or impressive crouched on the ground with tears streaming down his face, but the man stopped anyway. They regarded each other quietly for a long moment.

"It would be kinder to let him die at this point. You're only prolonging his suffering."

"He's not going to die," Harry insisted.

"I can't let him live. I've already explained to you why. Move aside. I promise to make it quick."

"No."

"Boy, you're asking for a world of hurt. Even if you managed to close the wound, he's too messed up to survive the full moon."

"I'll find a way."

"These isn't a way.

"At least let him try," a lite, feminine voice said. They both turned to see Luna, and behind her stood the Dark Lord, surveying the damage. His eyes settled on Harry crouching protectively over his godfather.

"I leave you alone for half an hour..." A heavy sigh, and he turned to Greyback. "You acted sooner than I had thought."

"I'm not one to beat around the bush," he said, smirking at his disgruntled look. "You gonna interfere now? You have more reasons to let me kill him than anyone."

"Which is why you should listen to me when I offer an alternative."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Alone in Voldemort's tent, the Dark Lord and Head Alpha relaxed a little in the absence of the packs and their own young charges. Luna, ever one to surprise, had been the one to find the Dark Lord and request his assistance, and had since followed the wizard child to look after Blackbone while the pack healers tended to them. Greyback wasn't sure how he should take her odd behavior. He didn't doubt she loved him as her father, but recent actions seemed to suggest that her affections might have taken on a new dimension with someone else entirely. He wasn't entirely sure what he should think of her choice of 'someone' either.

Certainly, Potter was a remarkable boy, admirable in many ways, but by the Goddess what kind of relationship could his little girl have with a wizard? A willful, pain in the ass, wizard no less?

“So what are you proposing? The boy already failed to convince the fool of the proper state of things. I didn't do this all on a whim.”

The Dark Lord smiled and shook his head. “I'm not going to reprimand you, Greyback. Your actions were perfectly reasonable. In fact, I was going to propose you do almost the exact same thing you did. Just... after the full moon.”

Sensing a plot, which was always did wonders to amuse him, Greyback took the bait.

“And how exactly would that improve anything? How does maiming Blackbone at all improve anything other than my mood?”

“It's simple really. You have heard of an Unbreakable Vow, correct? I believe werewolves have a form of it themselves.”

Greyback started. Oh wow. That was so supremely simple of a solution. An Unbreakable Vow between Blackbone and Voldemort would prevent Blackbone from ever defying the Dark Lord and leading the packs into trouble. True, it also left the packs vulnerable to Voldemort's whims, but there were ways around that.

“What difference does the full moon make? Can't you use your magic or nasty potions to heal him before the full moon?”

Voldemort snorted. “As you should be well aware, wounds inflicted by werewolves are 'cursed'*. They are much more difficult to heal than normal injuries. Even my best medi-wizards and witches wouldn't be able to heal him in time for the transformation not to kill him.”

“Why not? Your apprentice did some of it. I saw him closing the wound all by himself, and I don't think he had half an idea of what he was doing. You telling me, a true shaman, a full Druid priest*, couldn't do it?"

The Dark Lord scowled.

"That's exactly what I'm saying. My apprentice did something I could not possible do. It is a form of the 'Old Magics', a form that I cannot reproduce. It is based in love, a love strong enough to bend the laws of physics and the laws of magic. Blackbone is quite lucky that Harry seems to possess not only enough love to perform this magic, but the blessing of the Goddess to harness that magic to achieve a specific purpose. If Harry hadn't the intuition to use that magic, he might just as easily have killed them both. Or perhaps just you. That sort of magic tends to get vengeful when interrupted."*

"Can the boy fix him?" he asked, not bothered by his potential near-death. The Dark Lord smirked.

"I think he might, but not with his own magic. He's lost too much of it already just stabilizing Blackbone. There may be another way, however. It's tricky, but I think the benefits will be worth it for the both of us."

This all sounded very intriguing, although considerably more complicated than the Dark Lord's original plan. It might be worth all the fuss just to see what happened.

"Alright, I'll go along with it. What will you need on my end?"

The Dark Lord grinned.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape was just settling in to a nice, quiet vacation from having a nagging fishwife of a teenager underfoot, when a letter arrived and ruined it. He had finished catching up on his unread issues of Potion's Weekly(he was so far behind he'd completely forgotten that he'd actually written some of the articles), opened a bottle of fine whiskey (a birthday gift from Lucius), and was half way through his fourth year lesson plans (which were much funner with a slight buzz) when he received a rather unpleasant visit from a raven.

It all started with a loud tapping at his kitchen window, which he studiously ignored for ten straight minutes. When ignoring it didn't work, he sighed and went to find out what it was. The annoying creature sat perched on his windowsill with a tiny scroll attached to its leg, and when it spotted Snape, it made another round of impatient taps on the glass. And, of course, chipped it.

Scowling, he opened the window to let it inside. It flew straight at him, and he barely had time to duck. Unlike owls, ravens made poor deliverymen, and this particular raven was a nasty piece of work. It refused to hold still long enough to be relieved of its letter, and when he finally managed to get a hold of it, the little savage drew blood with its sharp beak.

Snape promptly let go of it, drew his wand, and exploded the little beast... then regretted it when he realized Potter wasn't there to pick up the feathers and guts splattered across his formerly clean kitchen.

Well, bother.

He fished the little scroll out of a gooey mass by the stove, checked it for curses, and opened it. It was from the Dark Lord, who was requesting some vials of Blood-replenishing potion, some pain potions, a particularly potent batch of Wolfsbane potion, and some 'Indestructible Parchment'.

What the bloody hell had Potter gotten himself into now?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

For those who don't know what owl pellets are, they are essentially owl fur balls. Any bones, fur, feathers, or whatever that an owl can't digest, they upchuck. Science classes often use these 'pellets' to be dissected in class and the skeletons inside reassembled to identify what was eaten. We are a strange, strange society.

Camphor and opoponex are real ingredients used in some incense and are types of tree resin, though not native to Britain. I just love their names.

I'm not just bullshitting here. Rowling really does state that wounds inflicted by werewolves are cursed and don't heal properly, even with magic. (Book 6, ch.27)

Shaman and Druid Priest are titles, not indicators of Voldemort's religion. He qualifies to be both, but isn't sole one or the other. Just like a doctor can also be a pilot and an investor at the same time. He's a pagan without a denomination, plucking out ideas and rituals that he likes and using them to suit his needs and philosophies.

If this situation is starting to sound familiar, well it should. Harry's essentially replicated the same sort of magic that would have saved Harry's life at the expense of Lily's, if the Potters had stayed in Britain. This 'Old Magic' is pagan magic at its purest and most powerful form, and Harry is better able to use it than his mother would have because of the bonds he has formed with the Earth. Voldemort can also use Old Magics better than most people, but 'Love Magic' [insert snickers here] escapes him because of course, he doesn't love at all.

Book IV:

Chapter 4: Treaties

“You understand, of course, that if you do this, there is no turning back,” Voldemort said solemnly. “You may look the same and think the same and feel the same, but your soul will be different. The Christian God will never accept you. Your fate will be tied to the whims of the Earth.”

Harry nodded. As much mental anguish as his spiritual debate had caused, he could see no way for him to turn back. With the opportunity to save a life, one he could never reunite with on the other side, the decision to pursue paganism was made that much simpler. Beside him, Sirius remained unconscious, gray skinned and cold to the touch, but stubbornly taking one wheezy breath after another. On the other side of Sirius, Remus held his hand, and sat so perfectly still he seemed as much a part of the Healer's House as the rows of pallets and shelves of herbs.

For them, Harry would officiate his decision and accept the consequences that would follow. Sirius, who was surely suffering far more than he would just holding his tenuous grasp to life, deserved no less.

“Very well,” the Dark Lord said, the hint of a smile, of pride, sneaking into his tone. “I will make preparations. Stay here and listen to the Healers. Eat when they tell you to, rest when they tell you to. You will need your strength.”

The Dark Lord left, so only Harry and his godfathers remained. The rest of the healer's patients had been moved, none being as seriously injured as Blackbone, not even Jackal with his cracked ribs and broken jaw. Remus sported injuries of his own, a gash across the face that had nearly taken his left eye being the worst of it, but came out of the fight relatively well considering. The healers cleaned and bandaged his wounds at the same time they had tended to Blackbone, the beta refusing to be separated from his alpha.*

Harry had watched it all nervously from across the room. Luna had come with him, sitting him down on an empty pallet, and tended to the cuts and bruises he hadn't even realized he'd acquired in his haste to find Sirius. His feet were cut up pretty badly, and she had sat on the floor with a basin to wash them. He didn't recall much of what she had actually done while watching the elder women and the odd omega male stitching Sirius back together, but he did remember at one point that she had painted honey onto his feet.* She'd explained what it was for, but he'd been distracted by a keening sound from across the room before she was half way through it.

She and the healers had all left with the Dark Lord's arrival. He had performed a few healing rites of his own, ignoring Remus' suspicious glare, and by the end of it Sirius lay more peacefully, if not any better. Now Harry was alone with them, and not at all sure what to say. Remus seemed to need his attention the most at the moment.

"It's going to be okay, Moony. This will work."

His godfather looked up at him, his expression pained.

"I'm so sorry, Prongslet."

"Remus?"

"I'm so, so sorry. I know it's horribly selfish and unfair of me to expect this of you. That I should tell you that you don't have to do this. It's not your responsibility. Sirius made his decisions and I, as his mate, failed to protect him. This is all our own fault, but I can't... I can't ask you not to do this. I don't think I could forgive myself if you didn't and he died."

The beta looked away, covering his eyes with his free hand, the other not leaving Sirius' for even a moment. Harry reached across Sirius, and placed his hand over both his godfathers'.

"Oh, Moony, please don't start crying. No one can seem to hold it in today, and I'm so tired of the tears. You don't have to feel bad about this. You have no idea how happy I am to be able to protect you for once."

"I'm still so sorry. Especially after what Sirius said... you know he didn't mean it, don't you? We both love you like a son."

Harry smiled weakly, even though Remus was still turned away.

"I know, and when we get through this I expect a full apology... and a pair of leather boots. A really nice pair of leather boots."

The beta choke out a laugh, rubbing away the tears before looking back up at him. He looked awful, battered and exhausted, but the hopeful look in his eyes was all Harry needed or wanted. It was his turn to finally make things right for once.

"You'll have the nicest damn boots in Britain, Prongslet, I promise."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

A night and day passed, and Sirius' condition did not improve. Harry's magic had prevented an infection in the stomach wound, but there were plenty of other wounds that hadn't been treated quickly enough, and now the man was feverish and refused to awaken. Voldemort had come and gone only twice since obtaining Harry's approval for Sirius' unconventional treatment, and the most he was willing to do for the injured man was cast a calming spell to ease his sleep. The fever he deemed necessary to fight off the infection, and potions would only complicate an already delicate situation.

Harry tried to take comfort in the Dark Lord's confidence that his godfather would survive, but it was hard to remain optimistic with the pall of death lingering over the entire hut.

"You must eat, Seeker," one of the Healers instructed, handing him a bowl of fruit. He ate because that was what Voldemort had instructed him to do, but the smell in the confined space and constant buzzing of flies had robbed him of his appetite long ago. The Healer, a formidable alpha female, eyed him critically. "Then you must go take a walk and get some fresh air. At least two laps around the field, and then you can come back."

Now, Harry hesitated, looking to Sirius and Remus, who remained dutifully by his side. The beta looked back at him, and smiled a little. "It's fine. I'll keep an eye on him. Go stretch your legs."

Reluctantly, he left the hut with his fruit and started towards the field where the performances were held. Even from a distance he could see the platform had been torn apart and burned sometime the night before. Outside the air was hot and smelled of food and flowers and people, and though it was a great improvement from the stale, musky scent of the healer's hut, Harry felt ill at ease.

He was distinctly aware that people were watching him, and not just the casual observation he was used to, but people actively moving around and following his movements. When he turned to see exactly who was staring at him, no one even tried to pretend they weren't. Their expressions were strange, not entirely aggressive, but definitely tense.

He stood staring back at them for over a minute, waiting for someone to do or say something, but no one approached him and eventually he walked away.

"Dammit, what is everybody's problem?" he muttered, not caring if anyone heard. The walk to the field was uneventful, but he received a bit of a surprise when he arrived. Voldemort was there, instructing several werewolves as they began the assembly of two large cages. Harry suspected they were for the ritual, but since he hadn't asked for specifics (he really didn't want to know exactly how much this was going to hurt since he'd already decided to do it regardless) he had no clue exactly what (or possibly who) they were for.

There was a very obvious pause in the work when Harry approached Voldemort, but an annoyed snap of the Dark Lord's fingers reminded them who they were working for and they returned to their task. The man sighed and smiled indulgently. Harry felt his annoyance rise. He wasn't expecting him to care about his godfather, but he really wished he didn't have to act so ecstatic about how all of this was turning out.

"What's got you so chipper?"

If Voldemort noticed his irritation, he ignored it completely and grinned even more mischievously.

"Why shouldn't I be happy? We're making history tonight. This is a thing of legends."

"If it works," Harry pointed out.

"It will work."

"How do you know if this is the first time it's ever been tried?"

The Dark Lord smirked, and pointed towards a holly grove where the goddess possessed Diana stood watch. "I consulted her first."

Harry supposed that was something, but he didn't feel wholly reassured. Diana's goddess had been in possession of Luna during the last solstice, and he still didn't know how much of the attack that night was Luna's doing or the goddess'. What happened tonight might leave him a werewolf or at least with Lycanthrosis or perhaps with something completely new, and that might be her intention. If this was a trick and Sirius died, he thought he might be capable of murder... divinity or not.

He changed the subject before his thoughts grew too dark.

"What's with everyone acting so weird? I've never seen them this interested in anyone but Greyback."

"They may be barbarians, but they are aware that you're doing something very special. Something to protect one of their own, even though as a wizard, you are an ancestral enemy. You are an enigma to them."

"You're not their enemy."

"No, but I serve only myself, and they know that."

"Well, I wish they would stop."

Voldemort ruffled his hair. "Eat and then go take a nap. We'll perform a ritual cleansing a few hours before sunset and make our final preparations."

"Yes, Teacher," Harry said offhandedly, wandering off. He failed to noticed Voldemort's surprised and then pleased expression. He hadn't even thought about the fact that this was the first time he'd used the honorary title on the man.

oo
oo

When Harry stripped off his clothes for his 'ritual cleansing', which truthfully wasn't anything more than a shower under a waterfall to wash off his paints, he assumed he was actually going to get them back.

"Is it really necessary that I not have any clothes?" he asked, pointedly not looking at Diana as she painted him yet again, this time with a mixture of blood and oils, or Voldemort as he took detailed notes. The delivery of parchment and potions that afternoon via Elsbeth had led to a flurry of activity that left Harry reeling after a day and a half of nothing but waiting. This resulted in Harry being rushed from the Healer's hut to Voldemort's tent to ingest a variety of nasty herbal concoctions, the sacrifice of a dove (which was unpleasant but not nearly as psychologically jarring as killing the sianach had been), his shower in the great outdoors, and now standing around naked not far the field while the goddess-possessed child had her wicked, artistic way with him. Spirals and stars and the moon in all Her phases painted with his godfather's blood covering every inch of his body.

Every inch.

"I mean, is a pair of shorts too much to ask for?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"You're starting to whine, you realize that I hope?" the Dark Lord said, not looking up from his notes.

"I'm not whining. I'm... learning. Isn't that what apprentices are suppose to do? I just want to learn why I have to spend the night in the buff."

The shaman sighed. "You said you didn't want to know the details."

Harry didn't speak for several minutes after that, although anyone could hear him squirming and yelping when Diana 's brush descended below his naval. The Gryffindor nearly screamed like a girl and ran away right there. After a minute of the most violating experience of his young life, she moved on to his legs and he could actually breath again.

"I'm not going to get raped, am I?" he blurted out.

"A little late for bringing up that particular concern, don't you think?" Voldemort asked sardonically.

"It just now came to mind."

"You should be happy to know, that no, you will not be rape or involved in a sexual act of any sort once the ritual has begun. In fact, I would highly recommend avoiding touch of any kind. Hence, the lack of clothes."

"Mm... How much longer? It's starting to get dark."

And probably chilly too, but he was burning with too much embarrassment to notice something like that.

"A half hour until sunset. A little under an hour until moon rise. How do you feel?"

"Naked? And kind of itchy."

“Don't scratch or you'll get the blood under your fingernails. You'll end up giving yourself lycanthropy if you draw blood with your fingernails. It's bad enough that you have so many cuts on your legs and feet.”

Harry started to ask how the Dark Lord had gotten so much blood out of a nearly dead man to begin with and why he would scratch himself bloody, but then thought better of it. He'd ask for an in depth explanation after everyone got through the night. Anything before that would probably just make him more nervous, and he was already anxious enough as it was.

So he had to stand there, embarrassed, itchy, and pointedly not thinking about what was going to happen while the blood dried and the Dark Lord took pages and pages of notes. It didn't help matters that he was nearly blind again after washing off his paints.

A rustling sound, distinctly not the sound of Voldemort's parchment, drew his attention and as blind as he was, he still caught the movement of a large form. Feeling even more embarrassed than before, Harry pointedly turned his body away.

“We're ready for you,” came Greyback's guttural voice. “We've already moved Blackbone into position.”

“The Healers gave him the potions?” the Dark Lord asked.

“Yeah, though how you can call that swamp muck anything other than poison is beyond me.”

“I don't expect you to understand, but I couldn't very well take anymore blood without replenishing what little was left. Slivermoon has taken the Wolfsbane Potion?”

“He's ready, just like everyone else,” the alpha growled impatiently. There was a tense silence, and Harry could feel the man's gaze fall on him. “You ready, boy?”

As embarrassed as he was, Harry still bristled at the challenge in the werewolf's tone.

“Yeah. What the hell took you so long?” he snapped.

Greyback just snorted, and walked away. Voldemort stood, folding up his papers and quills and placing them in the folds of his robe. He took Harry by the arm and lead him in the direction Greyback had gone.

“Since you seem so eager, we should head over now. I still have an incantation to perform and than we must secure ourselves before the moon rises.”

The walk to the field was incredibly awkward for Harry, who could feel people staring at him again, and though most of them were as naked as he was, they could actually see him. Their attention only made him itchier, and his hands shook to scrape away the drying blood and oil from his skin. The closer they came to their destination the more werewolves appeared, crowding in around them though never so close as to touch, and the simple stares were supplemented now with sniffing and low keening sounds.

They broke through the trees, and the masses parted before them to create a path leading to the area Voldemort had cleared earlier. As Harry drew closer he could make out the bars of the cages. There were two of them and they stood side by side with about a yard between them. One of them was completely empty, but the other was carpeted in deer hides and instruments and...

“Sirius?”

“It's all right, Harry.”

“Remus?”

His godfather moved from Sirius' side to his, and reached out to touch him but hesitated when he saw there was no place he hadn't been painted in blood.

“I'm here. I'll be here through the whole thing. I promise.”

The Dark Lord ignored Remus and lead Harry into the cage.

"We haven't much time. Kneel here. I am going to be speaking in Gaelic, so when I ask you a question you will agree by saying 'aontàim' and when I remove the wolf spirit from Blackbones' body, hold out your arms and say, 'tagaimid'. Do you understand?"

"Aontàim. Tagaimid," Harry repeated, tasting the words and nodded. He knelt on one side of Sirius and Voldemort stood on the other. Luna appeared out of the periphery of his vision, bearing the staff the Dark Lord had foregone up till then. If Harry weren't embarrassed before he certainly was now. He had only glanced at her briefly, and she was quite blurry, but not so blurry that he didn't realize she was also naked.

Voldemort struck his staff on the ground the werewolves around them quieted. Another strike to the ground, and they stilled completely. Another strike and then another and another. And then earth shook, not with magic, but with the force of hundreds and hundreds of feet stomping down, picking up the rhythm where the shaman's staff had left off. Voldemort took the staff in both hands and lifted it above his head, the werewolves continuing the drumming beat around them.

"Deathair, mac tìre," the Dark Lord began, continuing on, chanting to the rhythm in words Harry didn't understand, but felt against his senses like the summer breeze, laden with strange scents and the promise of storms. "... beocht fuil?"

The Dark Lord look down at him expectantly, and the beat pulled from him the word with perfect synchrony.

"Aontàim."

The itching against his skin intensified, prickling like a numbed limb. And the Dark Lord repeated his incantation, the rhythm beginning to increase.

"Aontàim."

A shiver run up his spine, then another, sending waves of prickles up and down his body.

The chant switched to different lyrics, faster and faster, the urgency of the summoning carried in the Earth, beating like a heart beneath him. A black haze slithered out of Sirius' mouth, expelled in a series of choking gasps. Harry couldn't see what it was perfectly, but he was close enough to get an impression of the spirit. It wasn't like the delicate holly spirit, drifting about like an aerial jellyfish, but shimmied about purposefully, like a sidewinder, on the ground but barely touching, sliding in and out and over and under Sirius' body, nervously seeking shelter.

Harry held out his arms to it.

“ Tagaimid.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Harry!”

Ginny sprung up in her bed, her terrified cry echoing in her little bedroom. Through her open window she caught sight of the moon hanging fat and yellow, staring down at her like the bestial eyes from her dream. She recoiled, her hand slipping off the side the bed, and tumbled on to the floor awkwardly. Her foot caught the nightstand and knocked it to the floor with a resounding crash.

She had not even righted herself when the door to her room burst open. To her mortification, it was Abraham who caught her with her knickers in the air.

“Gin! What's the ma- Eep!” he quickly turned his eight year old self around and back the way he had come. A moment latter, her mom and aunt stumbled in, curlers in their hair and wands drawn. Thankfully, she'd managed to get her knees under her and righted her nightgown.

“Ginny, what happened?!” her mom exclaimed, flipping on the light.

In her little bedroom, surrounded by her books and photographs and hand-me-down bricabrac she felt all kinds the fool, the yellow eyed moon now nothing more than a celestial bauble, far removed from anything relevant to her. She looked up at her mom and aunt's worried faces, and blushed with embarrassment and shame.

"N-nothing," she said, "I had a bad dream and fell out of bed. I'm sorry, I didn't mean to wake you."

Her Aunt Suzanne sighed in relief, and luckily didn't seem to be overly bothered by the impromptu wakeup call. You could never be too sure with Suzanne. She had inherited the same temper as her sister as well as her red hair, and you never could be too sure when her maternal patience would snap.

"I'll leave it to you, Molly," the woman said and walked out. Through the door, Ginny could hear her talking to her own son. "She's fine Abe. Go back to bed."

Ginny groaned. Abraham might have been too startled right now to make much of a fuss, but she could just imagine the ridiculous songs he would be singing in the morning to commemorate her less the elegant fall. She used to think having older brothers was a real pain, but having a younger brother was ten times worse. Even if he was just her cousin, they had lived together since he'd been nothing more than bulge in his widowed mother's tummy, and the familiarity bred familial contempt.

Her mom helped her to her feet, and even though she really didn't need it, Ginny let her tuck her back in. She could tolerate a little babying after waking everyone up in the middle of the night. Of course, her mom wouldn't let it go at that.

"It sounds like a pretty bad dream. Do you want to talk about it?" She said it very casually as she righted the night stand, and returned the nick-nacs to their proper place, but Ginny blushed and looked away.

"It was just a stupid dream. A monsters under the bed kind of dream."

"Monsters under 'Harry's' bed?" she asked knowingly.

As if she couldn't get anymore embarrassed. "... I'm just worried about him. He said he was going to visit his godfathers at the werewolf colony. I'm sure he isn't visiting during the full moon and his godfathers will protect him and everything, but... It's just a stupid dream."

Her mom smiled comfortingly, walking towards the window to look at the moon outside.

"It's a evil sort of moon. I'm not surprised you're having bad dreams."

She closed the curtains, blocking it from view.

"All better. If you're worried about your friend, you should write him in the morning. You'll definitely feel better."

Ginny thought about it, hating how childish she felt being worried over nothing and having her mom coddle her. But... she had been feeling strangely anxious all week, since she'd last seen Harry at one of their dueling tournaments. He had been so excited to be seeing his godfathers, seeming to forget completely that he'd be surrounded by werewolves. Even though he had told her he wouldn't be visiting until after the full moon when they'd be at their most mild, she couldn't help but feel his expression had been strangely stiff when he'd said it.

"...okay. Just don't tell, Abe. He's going to be unbearable enough as it is."

"You have my word. Goodnight, dear."

"Goodnight, mum."

Mrs. Weasley smiled and kissed her forehead, smoothing out her bedsheets before finally turning off the lights and heading to bed. With the curtains closed her room was dark as pitch, but strangely comforting after the dreams of glowing eyes and bodies in the moonlight. Thank goodness her mom hadn't asked for specifics. If she ever found out that Harry had been naked in the dream, she doubted she would ever see Hogwarts or Harry again.

oo
oo

Sirius woke to a full moon and howling. For several long minutes, he thought he was dreaming or dead. He lifted his hand to his face and stared through his human fingers at the Moon, and felt strangely unmoved by the sight of Her. Dreams, he thought. Just dreams.

But pained, human cries found their way through the animal sounds, frantic and tapping against his psyche persistently. Reluctantly, he turned his head towards the sound. Bars and beyond that werewolves, pacing excitedly, snapping and clawing at his prone form but too far away to reach. It sounded like they might have gotten something... someone, but no, if they had gotten someone that person would have been dead and eaten long before.

A scuffle broke out, one moderate-sized werewolf tenaciously chasing three others away, and it took him only a moment to recognize Remus. The significance of the cries suddenly made itself known to him.

"H-har..." he coughed, unable to speak with his sandpaper tongue.

"Yes."

He was too weak to immediately turn his head, but his eyes found Voldemort's readily enough. The great snake was right beside him, and he felt himself tense at the proximity and his own helplessness. The Dark Lord merely smiled coldly, and made a gesture back to where he had been looking before. Remus was busily chasing away anyone who got too close, and through his efforts Sirius could just barely make out a naked form writhing on the ground a short distance away behind another set of bars.

"I had to tie him down," Voldemort offered, "Taking possession of your wolf knocked him flat, but once the full moon rose he was ready to crawl out of his own skin. It's a good thing I thought ahead."

Sirius was confused, but he hadn't the strength to question and really his only care was that his godson was suffering. Sensing the injured man's distraction, the Dark Lord took Sirius by the chin and forcibly turned his head back towards him.

"I know you're very tired, Blackbone. I know you're very weak, but I need you to concentrate for just a few more minutes."

Sirius glared at him, attempted to growl but only ended up coughing painfully.

"Now, now, don't be like that. I've done you an incredible favor. I've saved your life. I've obtained you a pardon. With Harry's help of course."

Voldemort sighed, and tilted his head as Harry's distress faded into a long moan. Around them, several werewolves broke out into long mournful howls, mingling their songs with his.

"You owe us both a great deal, Blackbone. He suffers now to save your life, and I risk losing my precious apprentice to obtain your pardon. I'm going to collect the compensation due to us, one way or another."

Sirius didn't really understand why he was even alive or looking at the full moon as a human or really anything beyond the point that this was all somehow Voldemort's doing and he was going to pay a terrible price for it. The thin blanket that had been placed over his body, was pulled back so that the Dark Lord could retrieve his hand, and he felt a quiver of fear and revulsion at the touch but hadn't the strength to pull away.

